The respondents declined to avail themselves of the leave granted to them by the supreme court to file a supplementary answer setting up the settlement, but, instead, filed their bill in chancery to restrain the action at law, and obtained in that tribunal a rule to show cause why the prayer of their bill to restrain the appellant from prosecuting his action at law should not be granted, and a temporary stay of the action. Upon the return of the rule the order to show cause was made absolute and the stay continued. The appellant then gave notice to strike out the bill upon two grounds, one of which was that the bill did not allege any ground for equitable relief. The vice chancellor refused to strike out the bill, and it is upon that order, and the order restraining the appellant from prosecuting his action at law, that the appellant appeals to this court.

Messrs. Carrick & Wortendyke, for appellant:

The action of the supreme court, embodied in the rule discharging the rule to show cause, was a determination of the issue before the court which is conclusive upon the parties, not only in the action itself, but in any other form in which they might seek to relitigate the question.

Kalisch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The interposition of the court of chancery between the appellant and the respondents in their controversy in the supreme court cannot be sustained upon the facts before us. The agreement, in writing, entered into by the appellant and the respondent Savage for a complete accord and satisfaction of the matters in dispute between them and which were the subject of an action at law then pending in the supreme court, is clear and explicit in its terms. The fact that Savage fully performed his part of the agreement was not controverted. The legal effect of the performance by Accord and satisfaction—effect.

Savage of his agreement was to extinguish the appellant's claim that was made the basis of the action against Savage in the supreme court. But as this settlement was made between the litigants privately and without judicial sanction, the settlement was, as a matter of course, not entitled to judicial recognition until brought properly before the court in which the action was pending. The appellant, it appears, not only refused to perform that part of the agreement whereby he had obligated himself to discontinue the action, but attempted to repudiate the entire agreement and insisted upon proceeding to a trial of the cause. The action of the appellant in that respect could in no manner alter the legal effect of the settlement.

It would be an anomaly in the judicial procedure of this state to countenance the right of the respondents to oust their adversary from the forum in which he was properly seeking his remedy, because, peradventure, he might set up facts in reply to their defense of an executed compromise, matters which are only cognizable in a court of equity. For that is practically what the respondents are seeking to do.

Under the state of facts presented, the respondents' regular course to pursue was to have applied to the court in which the action at law was pending for leave to file a supplementary answer setting up the executed accord. Before the adoption of the new Practice Act, such a situation would have been met, under the common law, by an application for leave to file a plea puis darrein continuance. This plea was peculiarly adapted to the situation which the facts set out in the respondents' bill and affidavit present. In discussing the office of this plea, Stephen's Pleading (on p. 66) says: "It is to be observed that the effect of such a plea is not to impugn the right of action altogether, but only the right of further maintaining it, i. e., since the period when the matter of defense arose; and in this respect it differs from an ordinary plea in bar, which is in the nature of an absolute and general exception to the plaintiffs' right to maintain the action, and tends to deny that it was properly brought. A plea of this kind is always pleaded by way of substitution for the former plea; on which no proceeding is afterwards had. It may be either in bar or abatement; and is followed like other pleas, by a replication and other pleadings, till issue is obtained upon it."

If the plaintiff's replication to the additional plea set up matter which did not raise an issue of fact, cognizable in a court of law, the proper course was to demur, but now, under the new practice, such a situation may be met by a motion to strike out the reply to the supplemental answer.

The accord set up and executed by the respondent Savage will afford a complete defense to the appellant's action at law, unless it should appear that the appellant was induced to sign a release (for such was the legal effect of the written agreement fully performed by the respondent Savage), by false and fraudulent representations as to the value of the stock. Of course, if the execution of the instrument was induced by fraud, that can be shown in an action at law.

While there is a resemblance in the circumstances of the present case to those which appeared in Headley v. Leavitt, 68 N. J. Eq. 591, 60 Atl. 963, and Trenton Street R. Co. v. Lawlor, 74 N. J. Eq. 828, 71 Atl. 234, 74 Atl. 668, in which cases this court held that the jurisdiction of the court of chancery was properly entertained, yet, upon an analysis of the cases cited, there will be found as much difference intrinsically from the case sub judice as one might expect to find between an original writing and its facsimile. The prominent distinguishing feature between the present case and the cases cited is that in neither of the latter was there a complete accord. In Headley v. Leavitt (N. J.) supra, the defendant attempted to set up in the action at law on certain promissory notes the accord and satisfaction as a defense; but the proof showed that he had not performed his part of the compromise, and the defense, therefore, was overruled. Subsequently, he did perform and filed a bill to restrain the action at law on the ground that he had an equitable defense, and then the court directed that the action at law should be restrained unless and until the plaintiff consented that the complete accord and satisfaction might be set up as a defense. In that case this court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Gummere (on p. 595), said: "The subject of litigation which resulted in the judgment was one which was cognizable by a legal, rather than an equitable, tribunal. The contract which the appellant sought to set up as a defense to the action in the supreme court would, if it had been executed by him, have constituted a legal and not an equitable defense to that action. Subsequent performance of the contract on his part gives him no right to have the forum of the litigation changed to a court of equity and to deprive the respondent of the determination of a jury upon the question of the existence or nonexistence of such contract."

In Trenton Street R. Co. v. Lawlor, supra, the agreement for compromise was made while the action at law was pending. Lawlor's attorney, with authority from Lawlor, agreed to take a certain sum in compromise, and this Lawlor refused to accept. The case, therefore, was one of unexecuted accord.

In the present case, it appeared that the accord had been fully executed by the respondent Savage, and of which the respondents could have availed themselves by a proper plea in the action at law, hence there was no ground for the interference of a court of equity. The appellant's motion to strike out the bill for want of equity should have prevailed.

The decree will be reversed, with direction to the Court of Chancery that the bill be dismissed, with costs.

ANNOTATION.

Right to enjoin prosecution of civil action because of matters arising pendente lite.

Equity will enjoin the prosecution of civil actions for matters arising pendente lite, where such matters do not constitute an adequate defense at law or the remedy at law is not adequate. Trenton Street R. Co. v. Lawlor (1908) 74 N. J. Eq. 828, 71 Atl. 23, 74 Atl. 668; Harvey v. Ryan (1906) 59 W. Va. 134, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 445, 115 Am. St. Rep. 897, 53 S. E. 7.

In the case first cited, it appeared that in an action for personal injuries the plaintiff agreed to a compromise immediately preceding the trial. Subsequently, he refused to execute a release or accept a tender of the agreed amount. Thereafter he noticed the case for trial after having substituted counsel. Thereupon the defendant instituted an action to restrain the prosecution of the suit. The court held that while a compromise was a good defense at law, still the compromise here remained unexecuted and was, therefore, unavailable as a defense at law, so that an injunction was proper.

So, in Harvey v. Ryan (W. Va.) supra, it appeared that the complainant's testator had purchased a lot of land with general covenants of warranty from an intestate of one of the defendants. The complainant had given his bond to the defendant's intestate for the purchase price. Subsequently an action of ejectment was instituted against the complainant's testator, by a person who claimed a paramount title. Pending the ejectment action, a suit was commenced for the payment of the bond. The complainant's testator obtained a temporary injunction restraining the action on the bond pending the result of the ejectment action. The ejectment action having been decided against the complainant's testator, and all the interested parties having died, the complainant, who was executor, revived the suit, praying for a perpetual injunction restraining the prosecution of the action on the bond by the personal representatives of the deceased. On motion the bill was dismissed. In reversing that judgment the court held that equity would intervene, since complainant did not have an adequate defense at law, the action on the bond being on a sealed instrument, wherein the lack of consideration could not be pleaded at law.

Similarly, in Williams v. Neely (1904) 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 134 Fed. 1, it appeared that, since the final hearing of an action on a note given for a tract of land, the defendants had paid certain liens against that land. They thereupon instituted an action to restrain the action on the note, and for an adjudication of the rights of the parties. It was held that the court had jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights and interests of all the parties, and so put an end to the litigation. The court said: "In case it shall appear, as counsel have intimated, that since the final hearing below the complainants have paid and secured releases of these liens, the court should reduce the amount of the recovery in the action at law upon the note by the amount, not exceeding the value of the annuities at the time such payments were made, which the complainants have necessarily expended in paying the liens of the annuities upon their land and in defending their title against them. That court undoubtedly has jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights and interests of all the parties to this suit in the three quarter sections of land to which the liens attach, and to put an end to this litigation."

In Marshall v. Bryant Electric Co. (1911) 107 C. C. A. 599, 185 Fed. 499, it was held that a manufacturer who had intervened in and successfully defended one customer against a charge of infringing a patent might enjoin the further prosecution of an infringement suit brought by the patentee against another customer.

If the enforcement of a judgment in a civil action would be unconscionable, equity will enjoin the enforcement. Elder v. Prussing (1902) 101 Ill. App. 655. In that case it appeared that, in an attachment suit, the defendant gave a recognizance, whereupon the attachment was dissolved. By the bond the surety was given the management of the defense. Prior to the trial the principal became a bankrupt and interposed that plea, in violation of his recognizance agreement. Subsequent to the interposition of the plea of the principal's discharge in bankruptcy, a personal judgment was obtained against the bankrupt principal, but with a perpetual stay of the execution against him. The plaintiff in that suit thereupon sought to enforce the judgment against the surety, who instituted a suit to restrain such enforcement, pending a defense which his principal had prior to his plea in bankruptcy. The court held that it would be unconscionable to enforce the judgment against the surety.

If a defense arising since issue joined may be adequately presented in the action, equity will not interfere. Williams v. Wilson (1878) 124 Mass. 257; Deepwater R. Co. v. Motter (1906) 60 W. Va. 55, 116 Am. St. Rep. 873, 53 S. E. 705; Burkhart v. Scott (1911) 69 W. Va. 694, 72 S. E. 784. And see the reported case (SAVAGE v. EDGAR, ante, 1021).

In Burkhart v. Scott (1911) 69 W. Va. 694, 72 S. E. 784, it appeared that a verdict had been obtained in an action in assumpsit, and the defendant therein effected a compromise with the plaintiff. Subsequently the plaintiff instituted a bill to restrain the defendant therein from making use of the agreement of compromise, alleging that it was procured by fraud. The court held that complainant had an adequate remedy at law, and therefore equity would not interfere. It was said: "The original bill states no cause for injunction. The law court can determine whether or not the compromise was fraudulently made to defeat Wamsley's fee, and if it should find that it was in fact fraudulent it has the power to reject the paper as evidence. . . . Injunction is one of the extraordinary remedies, and equity will not relieve by injunction when there is a plain and adequate remedy at law. In fact, it is essential to confer jurisdiction by injunction that it must appear that no adequate relief exists in law on the facts averred, and a bill which fails to show the want of such legal remedy is factually bad."

In Deepwater R. Co. v. Motter (1906) 60 W. Va. 55, 116 Am. St. Rep. 873, 53 S. E. 705, it appeared that an action of assumpsit had been begun. A number of creditors of the defendants brought suit against them, and garnisheed the complainants. The defendants in those actions sued to enjoin the prosecution of the action of assumpsit and the garnishment proceedings. The court held that the persons bringing those actions could not be deprived of the tribunal in which they chose to bring their legal action, saying: "Clearly the demand of Motter & Company is legal in character, triable by a jury in a law court in the action of assumpsit, and under the Constitution Motter & Company are entitled to such trial, unless we can see some plain reason why equity should deprive them of it. As between the railroad company and Motter & Company, a law court can give adequate and full remedy by testing whether any amount is due to Motter & Company, and if so, how much. They have right to have that amount determined by verdict and judgment, as such judgment would be conclusive, not only between the railroad company and them, but as between Motter & Company and their creditors, as to the fund liable for debt. Turner v. Stewart (1902) 51 W. Va. 493, 41 S. E. 924. Say that the railroad company could sue the conflicting creditors in equity to settle their rights as to the fund in its hands (this is not decided), still that fact cannot disable Motter & Company from sustaining a suit at law. The fact that these creditors on various claims are pursuing the railroad company is a matter between them, not between the company and Motter & Company, and cannot put it in the power of the company to exclude Motter & Company from their proper chosen tribunal. It is this right of Motter & Company to have their demand passed by a jury that must be the dominant factor. We must not ignore that right. The law forum's relief, as between the company and Motter & Company, is full and adequate to fix their rights. When we are met by the plea that it is not adequate between the company and the creditors of Motter & Company, we answer, that is another matter, and that the action of the circuit court leaves the injunction in force as to that."

In Williams v. Wilson (1878) 124 Mass. 257, it appeared that suit had been begun on a note secured by a mortgage, given as part of the purchase price of an undivided half of an estate. The vendor had since sold one half of his remaining half. The co-owners thereafter sold a portion by metes and bounds to another, releasing the vendee from the mortgages thereon. They advised the mortgagee of the contemplated sale and the agreed price, and he advised immediate completion. Prior to that transaction, the mortgagee had commenced an action on the note. In a suit to enjoin the action on the note on the ground that the last purchaser was discharged from all liability on the note by reason of the conveyances and releases, it was held that the defense was available in the action on the note and mortgage.

In the reported case (SAVAGE v. EDGAR, ante, 1021) it is held that the complainant was not entitled to an injunction restraining the prosecution of a suit at law, though the parties had completed an accord and satisfaction after issue joined; since the accord and satisfaction could be pleaded in a supplemental answer. v.

JOHN OBRIGEKEWITSCH, Doing Business as Dickinson Roller Milling Company, Appt.

(— N. D. —, 168 N. W. 45.)

Master and servant — obvious risk — machinery in motion.

1. The danger of having one's fingers crushed, if placed between the rollers of a machine for the purpose of removing material which has clogged the same, and while the engines are working and the machine is in operation, is a risk which is so patent and apparent that an employee of reasonable intelligence would be presumed to know and appreciate it.

— warning — knowledge.

2. The rule requiring the employer to instruct his employee and to warn him of dangers is only for the purpose of supplying the latter with information which he is not supposed to have, and, if it is shown that the employee did, in fact, possess the knowledge and an appreciation of the danger, a failure to warn him can in no sense be said to be the proximate cause of the injury; and, if not a proximate cause of the injury, it cannot be actionable negligence.

— presumption.

3. An employee is presumed to see and understand all dangers that a prudent and intelligent person of the same age and experience, and with the same capacity for estimating their significance, would see and understand.

— safe and unsafe method of work — instruction.

4. Where there is a safe and an unsafe way of doing the work, the master must give the servant instruction how to do it to avoid injury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Stark County (Crawford, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Casey & Burgeson for appellant.

Mr. W. F. Burnett, for respondent: Plaintiff was entitled to have the issues submitted to a jury.

Ross v. Double Shoals Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 298, 52 S. E. 121.

The court will not disturb the verdict of a jury, if there is a question of fact for them to pass on, or any evidence of negligence.

Bruce, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries, occasioned by the hand of the plaintiff being caught and crushed between two rollers in a flour and feed mill. The plaintiff was a man thirty-nine years of age. He had worked at the blacksmith's trade for years in Russia, before coming to the United States, and during such employment had repaired wagons, plows, etc. He does not, however, seem to have been there employed around machinery. After coming to the United States he farmed for a while, and while doing so, and for about eight months, used an ordinary farm feed mill. He had been working for about three and one-half months at the particular employment at which he was injured, and that employment seems to have furnished all of his real knowledge of grinding machinery. The machine at which he was injured was an iron frame with three sets of rolls inclosed, about 18 inches apart, and one above the other. There was an opening in the iron frame just below each set of rolls. This opening was covered by an iron door which fitted into the machine so as to prevent dust coming out, and the bottom of the door was about 6 inches above the set of rolls below. In order to get his hand caught in the rolls, it was necessary to put it in the door, and down from 4 to 6 inches, before it would reach the top of the rolls, or it would have to be drawn by something or by some means down that distance. So, too, as the rolls were about 17 inches in diameter, it would be necessary that the fingers should be put or drawn a few inches lower between the rolls before they would be caught. The negligence charged is:

"That the defendant carelessly and negligently failed to instruct the plaintiff in respect to the mechanism of the said grinding machine, or as to the use thereof, or as to the manner of operating the same, and neglected to warn the plaintiff relative to the risks incident thereto, and especially of the danger and risk of his hands being caught or drawn in between the rolls of said machine, although the plaintiff was ignorant of said danger and risks.

"That the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide a proper belt for the operation of said machine; that said machine was intended to be equipped, and should have been equipped, with a belt 6 inches in width; that prior to the time plaintiff entered the employ of the defendant one of the belts on said machine had worn out, and the defendant negligently replaced the same with an old 4-inch belt, which was inadequate and not of sufficient strength or width to properly operate and turn said grinder machine, and that the defendant, with knowledge, negligently permitted, allowed, and authorized the use of said defective, unfit, and worn belt in the operation of said machine and equipment so furnished by him, and negligently failed and neglected to warn and instruct the plaintiff of such dangerous, unfit, and defective appliance.

"That on or about the 18th day of November, 1914, while the defendant was operating said machine in the usual and ordinary manner, under instructions and by the direction of the defendant, the said machine, by reason of said defective and unfit belt and appliance, choked up and clogged, thereby making it necessary for the plaintiff, in the course of his employment, to clean the same to prevent injury to said machine and belting and to protect and preserve his employer's property, and that, while the plaintiff was cleaning said clogged machine in the usual and ordinary manner, by reason of said defective belt, and by reason of the failure of the defendant to warn and instruct the plaintiff as to the dangers incident to the use of said defective machine and appliance, the plaintiff was injured as hereinafter set forth, to wit: While cleaning said machine in the usual and ordinary manner, and without negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the said machine, which had become clogged, as hereinbefore set out, suddenly started, and caught the right hand of the plaintiff between the rolls of said machine, and cut and bruised the same so that two fingers thereof had to be amputated, and all the joints of plaintiff's said hand became ankylosed, so that the plaintiff has totally and permanently lost the use of said hand."

The answer is a general denial, and, in addition, contains the defense that the plaintiff was not employed to work around the machine at all, nor did his duties take him there, and that:

"Further answering, the defendant alleges that the belts driving the feed mill were in first-class condition for doing the work of grinding grain, and the rolls and everything connected with such work were properly covered, so as to prevent accidents of any kind; that the plaintiff had no right or authority to be anywhere near such rolls, and, in order for him to have his hand injured, it was necessary for him to open the door of the covering for such rolls and stick his hand in there; that the rolls between which he stuck his fingers were not used for the grinding of grain at all, but were running spread apart and idle; that the defendant hired a miller for the purpose of looking after the grinding of feed, as well as the grinding of flour, and it was not the duty of nor was plaintiff allowed to have anything to do with the rolls grinding the feed by which his hand was hurt.

"That upon information and belief defendant alleges that plaintiff, on the day in which he was hurt, came into the mill intoxicated, and, because of such condition, opened the door of the cover securely covering such rolls, stuck his hand between said rolls while running, and by so doing injured two fingers of his hand; that he was not at that time performing any duty imposed upon him by the defendant, nor was he doing anything that he was instructed or allowed to do, and his injuries were caused because of his intoxicated condition, and his negligence in interfering with the machinery his duties did not require him to touch in any manner."

The defense of intoxication was clearly presented, and must be conceded to have been determined in favor of the plaintiff by the verdict of the jury. The defense that the plaintiff was not employed to work around the machinery appears to have been abandoned.

The defenses of contributory negligence and of the assumption of risk are hardly pleaded. The only real defense that is left is that of lack of negligence on the part of the defendant. On this point, however, it would appear that the claim that the belts on the so-called slow side of the machine were too small, and that this occasioned the machine to choke up, should be eliminated, if, indeed, it has any merit, since these belts were on the machine at the time of the employment. The plaintiff knew of none other, and the machine choked at the beginning of his employment, and choked repeatedly afterwards. Perhaps larger belts would have prevented the choking, though of this we are by no means certain. The case, however, is very similar to that in which one is employed to drive an automobile, which has no self-starter, and who breaks his arm while cranking the machine. It may be true that there would have been no accident if a self-starter had been furnished. No court, however, would hold the master liable for the lack of the equipment.

The question, then, which is presented to us is, Where a person is employed to work in a mill and in the grinding of grain, at a machine which is so equipped that it is liable to clog when grain is run therethrough, and when no specific instructions are given as to the care of the machine and as to the method of cleaning it when the clogging takes place, and when, soon after the employment, the machine does clog and the employer uses a method to relieve the difficulty, which is dangerous and palpably dangerous to anyone, an adult employee, merely because the employer has used that method, can continuously continue so doing without complaint, and can later, and when injured, recover damages, because he was not told that the method used was dangerous.

To put the question in another form, Is it negligence for an employer to fail to warn an employee of a danger that is so obvious that one of his age and experience should readily realize it, and refrain from a practice which such employee must realize is fraught with danger?

The plaintiff himself testifies that no specific instructions were given to him as to how to clean out the machine when it clogged, and admits that there was a way to stop the rolls and to thus work in safety, and that that was to either throw off the belt or to stop the engine.

After stating that the machine clogged about a week after he started to work he testifies as follows:

He (Obrigekewitsch) came right over and cleaned out that machine, and then he pressed on the belt, and the machine started again. I simply told him that it stopped; that he would have to come over there. He opened one of the little doors, and cleaned it out with his hand.

Q. I will ask you to state whether or not Mr. Obrigekewitsch pulled out the feed, or whatever there was in there, with his hand, out onto the floor, out through the door.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, when he pulled the feed out, what did he do, if anything?

A. He pressed on the belt, and the machine started up again.

Q. After this did the machine clog again?

A. Yes. It stopped a great many times, especially when the grain was a little damp, or a little damp oats, why it bothered considerably.

Q. What did you do then, when the machine stopped?

A. I always proceeded to clean the machine the same way as I seen it done, the same way as I seen Mr. Obrigekewitsch clean it.

Q. Now, did Mr. Obrigekewitsch ever give any warning or caution about the danger of any parts of the machinery in the mill?

A. He never told me, or I never asked.

Q. Did Mr. Obrigekewitsch see you clean this machine afterwards at different times?

A. I could not state positively he seen me, because I was always busy and had to watch the roll closely. He could have been there many times, but I could not say positively that I seen him there. The machine clogged so many times that I could not state. Sometimes it was two or three times a day, and sometimes it would not clog for a couple of days. Just as soon as wet grain would come around it would clog two or three times or more.

Q. Did you always, or did you not, use the same method of cleaning it out as that you had seen Mr. Obrigekewitsch use?

A. Yes, sir. I never asked anybody else afterwards. I was crippled on the 17th day of November. The machine was clogged as usual.

Q. On each of the times when the machine was clogged and you cleaned it out with your hand, what, if anything, did you do to the belt to start it?

A. After I cleaned it out and seen the machine would pretty near go, I would either bear down on the belt with my knee, or sometimes on my hand, and then the machine would get hold again, and start running. On the day of my injury I started to clean the machine. As usual it clogged up on me, and I got it nearly all out. I didn't see it was cleaned out well enough, so I wanted to take out another handful, and just about the time I was reaching in for the rest of it, or the last handful, to get a little more out of there, the machine suddenly moved and caught my finger.

Q. Did this machine ever start like that before, on any occasion when you cleaned it, without pressing on the belt?

A. The machine has never started that way before, and I was certain it would never start. If it had started, I would have been more careful and have looked out for it.

It is perfectly clear that it would have been the height of folly to have attempted to clean the machine when the rolls were revolving, for, even if the fingers would not touch, they would have been drawn down by the feed and particles that were being ground. The evidence shows that in the past this portion of the machine had frequently choked; and, although the other rolls were still turning on the occasion of the cleaning by the employer, and the particular rolls did not then revolve again until the belt was pushed against the wheel, had anyone the right to rely on such a fact? We think not. The method employed by the master was certainly a dangerous one, but this fact must have been apparent to anyone of any intelligence, and the evidence is far from showing that the plaintiff lacked ordinary intelligence in this respect. Crowley v. Pacific Mills, 148 Mass. 228, 19 N. E. 844; De Souza v. Stafford Mills, 155 Mass. 476, 30 N. E. 81; Coullard v. Tecumseh Mills, 151 Mass. 85, 23 N. E. 731; Ciriack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. 146 Mass. 182, 4 Am. St. Rep. 307, 15 N. E. 579; Berger v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 78, 38 N. W. 814, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 251; Connolly v. Eldredge, 160 Mass. 566, 36 N. E. 469; Groth v. Thomann, 110 Wis. 488, 86 N. W. 178; Gardner v. Paine Lumber Co. 123 Wis. 338, 101 N. W. 700; Roth v. S. E. Barrett Mfg. Co. 96 Wis. 615, 71 N. W. 1034; Kroger v. Cumberland Fruit Package Co. 145 Wis. 433, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 473, 130 N. W. 513.

We realize that there are cases where an employee is entitled to rely upon the superior knowledge of his employer. Even, however, if the action of the employer in cleaning the roller in the way that he did could in any way be construed to be an instruction, it can hardly be believed that he had any superior knowledge in this respect. Surely, everyone who has worked on a farm or anywhere else knows that it is dangerous to try to remove particles from between turning wheels, and that, while machinery is in operation and the engines are working, the rolls are liable at any time to start revolving, even though they may be temporarily clogged, and this even though the pressing of the belt thereon may increase the friction and more surely and immediately produce the result.

It is perfectly true, as pointed out by the plaintiff, that it is a general rule that, where there is a safe and unsafe way of doing the work, the master must give the servant instructions how to do it to avoid injury. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Watts, 64 Tex. 568.

There is, however, no reason to believe that in the case at bar the question of skill was involved. It was a mere question of the ordinary knowledge which everyone possesses. The plaintiff himself testifies that there was a way to stop the rolls and to thus clean the machinery with safety, and that was either to throw off the belt or to stop the engine. The question is not one of contributory negligence or of the assumption of risk. It is a question of negligence merely. The case comes within the rule that "there is no duty of warning and instruction, if the employee's duties are simple and the danger obvious, or if, by any other means, he possesses knowledge of the risk to which he is subjected. The rule requiring the employer to instruct his employee and to warn him of danger is only for the purpose of supplying him with information, which he is not presumed to have, and, if it is shown that the employee did, in fact, possess the knowledge [and an appreciation of the danger] the failure to warn can in no sense be said to be the proximate cause of the injury, and, if not the proximate cause of the injury, of course it cannot be actionable negligence. The employee is presumed to see and understand all dangers that a prudent and intelligent person of the same age and experience, and with the same capacity for estimating their significance, would see and understand." 18 R. C. L. 569, 570.

The authorities upon the subject are very numerous, and are practically all to the same effect. In Marsden v. Johnson, 89 Ill. App. 100, the plaintiff, a boy of sixteen years, was injured while trying to remove a cornstalk, which had clogged the machine. Among other things the court said: "A boy sixteen years old, if of ordinary intelligence, is possessed with sufficient discretion to avoid obvious and apparent dangers, and certainly must know, if he puts his fingers into revolving rollers of the character of those of the machine in question, he cannot escape injury. It would hardly occur to the appellant, or its foreman, as necessary to warn the employee not to put his fingers into these revolving rollers. The danger appears to have been patent and obvious to the most casual observer, as it seems to us, and hence we are of the opinion that it was not negligence on the part of the appellant not to have given this warning."

In the case of Lowcock v. Franklin Paper Co. 169 Mass. 313, 47 N. E. 1000, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 659, it was held that the employer was not negligent in failing to instruct a boy of fifteen "that his hand would be caught, like the paper, if he put it in too far between revolving cylinders, as the danger was apparent." It was also held that "the statement of an employer to an employee, putting paper between a revolving cylinder and a moving belt with the use of a split stick, that he could use his hands, and it would not be dangerous, does not assert or suggest that his hands would not be caught and drawn along like the paper, when in contact with the inward moving surfaces."

In the case of Crowley v. Pacific Mills, 148 Mass. 228, 19 N. E. 344, the court said: "The plaintiff's injury was received, according to his own testimony, in consequence of his putting his finger in between the roll and the cylinder, in order to smooth the cloth just before it passed upon the cylinder, by taking out a 'double edge,' as it was called, that being a term applied to the turning over or under of the edge of the cloth. The plaintiff was seventeen years old, and had been at work for about six months upon a machine substantially like that upon which he received the injury, except that the distance between the roll and the cylinder was less upon the latter machine; and he had been at work upon the latter machine nearly two weeks. The operation of the machine was simple. In view of the plaintiff's age and experience prior to the time of the accident, no duty then rested on the defendant to give him instruction in reference to the risk of possible injury. It could not be deemed necessary at that time to tell him that, if he should put his hand in between the cloth and the revolving cylinder, just at or just before the place where the cloth came in contact with the cylinder, there was danger that his hand would be caught. The omission to do this did not constitute negligence on the part of the defendant."

In the case of Kuich v. Milwaukee Bag Co. 139 Wis. 101, 120 N. W. 261, it was held that "where an employee about fourteen and one-half years old, feeding bags into a printing machine, could not fail to appreciate the danger if her fingers were grasped by the nippers grasping and drawing the bags into the machine, and the employee had been engaged in the operation of such machines for several months, and she possessed the intelligence and information to understand the danger incident to her work, the employer was not required to instruct her, or to give her warning as to the danger of her fingers being caught by the nippers."

Numerous holdings to the same effect are everywhere to be found. See 18 R. C. L. 569, 570, and note to Cronin v. Columbian Mfg. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 111; Ewing v. Lanark Fuel Co. 65 W. Va. 726, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 65 S. E. 201.

Most of the cases cited are cases of minors. If the rule is applicable to minors, much more must it be applicable to adults.

We, therefore, hold that no negligence was shown, and the judgment of the District Court is reversed, with directions to dismiss the complaint.

ANNOTATION.

Duty to warn servant of danger of cleaning, adjusting or repairing machinery while in motion.

I. Mature servants, 1036.

II. Minor servants:

a. In general, 1036.

b. Presumptions, 1037.

c. Questions for jury, 1037.

The present annotation is confined to a treatment of the cases involving the question of the duty of the master to warn his servants as to the necessity for stopping machinery while cleaning, adjusting or repairing it. This limitation, of course, excludes cases which merely determine the duty of the master to warn or instruct a servant as to the proper methods of cleaning, adjusting or repairing machinery while it is in motion, and which do not involve the element of stopping it while such duties are being performed.

I. Mature servants.

A master is under no duty to warn a servant of mature years and average intelligence of the dangers of cleaning a machine without stopping it, where such servant, by reason of familiarity with machinery in general, and with the particular machine in question, knows or ought to know that it is dangerous to clean it without stopping it, and that it may be easily stopped for that purpose. H. D. Williams Cooperage Co. v. Kittrell (1913) 107 Ark. 341, 155 S. W. 119. And see Henry v. King Philip Mills (1892) 155 Mass. 361, 29 N. E. 581.

And where a mature servant puts his hand into a machine while it is in motion for the purpose of cleaning it, but without knowing the construction of the machine, or what he will meet, no action can be maintained on the ground that the master should have warned the servant against doing so while the machine was in motion. Robinska v. Lyman Mills (1899) 174 Mass. 432, 75 Am. St. Rep. 364, 54 N. E. 873, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 571.

Nor is a master in duty bound to warn a mature servant of the dangers of attempting to unclog or clean a machine containing rapidly revolving knives, rollers or gears, without stopping it, where such danger is obvious. Chmiel v. Thorndike Co. (1902) 182 Mass. 112, 65 N. E. 47 (holding such to be the rule even in the case of a stupid foreigner who was slow in learning to use the machine); HANEL v. OBRIGKEWITSCH (reported herewith) ante, 1029; Stoll v. Hoopes (1888) 10 Sadler (Pa.) 291, 14 Atl. 658. And this is especially true where the servant of his own volition attempts to make the adjustment instead of calling upon machinists employed to perform such duties. McCue v. National Starch Mfg. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 106, 36 N. E. 809.

But even though the servant is of mature years he must be warned of the dangers of unclogging a machine while it is in motion if it appears that because of hidden or concealed dangers, or because of inexperience or general lack of intelligence, or because he has been misled, he is ignorant of the dangers in question and the master knows or ought to know of such conditions. De Costa v. Hargraves Mills (1898) 170 Mass. 375, 49 N. E. 735; Kasjeta v. Nashua Mfg. Co. (1904) 73 N. H. 22, 58 Atl. 874; Tucker v. Lowe (1917) — N. H. —, 102 Atl. 376; Rice v. Dewberry (1906) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 715.

II. Minor servants.

a. In general.

Where a minor employee has knowledge of the dangers attached to the cleaning, adjusting or repairing of a machine while in motion, the master need not warn him that it should be stopped while such duties are performed. Brammer v. Pettijohn (1907) 154 Ala. 616, 45 So. 646; Bedgood v. T. R. Miller Mill Co. (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 364.

And where a minor employee is capable of understanding the obvious dangers of unchoking or adjusting a machine without stopping it, the master is under no duty to warn the servant of such danger (Brammer v. Pettijohn (Ala.) supra; Hess v. Escanaba Woodenware Co. (1906) 146 Mich. 566, 109 N. W. 1058); at least, unless the master knew that the servant was inexperienced and did not fully understand and appreciate the danger (Birmingham Candy Co. v. Shepherd (1915) 14 Ala. App. 312, 70 So. 193; Bedgood v. T. R. Miller Mill Co. (Ala.) supra).

Of course where a minor servant, either because of immaturity or inexperience, does not know of the dangers attending the cleaning, adjusting or repairing of a machine without stopping it, and the master is or should be aware of such ignorance, it is his duty to warn the servant. Glover v. Dwight Mfg. Co. (1888) 148 Mass. 22, 12 Am. St. Rep. 512, 18 N. E. 597; Driscoll v. Rolfe (1908) 75 N. H. 586, 71 Atl. 379; Owens v. Ernst (1892) 1 Misc. 388, 21 N. Y. Supp. 426, affirmed without opinion in (1894) 142 N. Y. 661, 37 N. E. 569; Walters v. Rocky Mount Sash & Blind Co. (1911) 154 N. C. 323, 70 S. E. 635; White v. San Antonio Waterworks Co. (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 29 S. W. 252; Greenville Oil & Cotton Co. v. Harkey (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 225, 48 S. W. 1005; Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Plummer (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 563, 122 S. W. 942; United States Leather Co. v. Showalter (1912) 113 Va. 479, 74 S. E. 400. And see Vanesler v. Mason Cigar & Paper Box Co. (1904) 108 Mo. App. 621, 84 S. W. 201.

So where a minor inexperienced servant has been misled as to the safety of removing things from the rollers of a moving machine upon which they had caught, by watching others do it while in motion and with the evident consent of the master, it has been held that the master should warn such servant of the dangers of so removing things without stopping the machine. Manning v. Excelsior Laundry Co. (1905) 189 Mass. 231, 75 N. E. 254.

b. Presumptions.

The presumption is that a minor of tender years does not understand or appreciate the danger, though patent and obvious, of unchoking with the hand a machine containing revolving knives without stopping it, so as to relieve the master of the duty to warn such a servant of the dangers of such a practice. Birmingham Candy Co. v. Shepherd (1915) 14 Ala. App. 312, 70 So. 193.

And in Texas it has been held that the presumption as to knowledge, intelligence, and obviousness of dangers attending the cleaning of dangerous machinery while in motion does not attach to a minor that applies to an adult. White v. San Antonio Waterworks Co. (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 29 S. W. 252.

So in Virginia it has been held that the mere fact that a servant was over fourteen years of age did not of itself relieve the master of the duty of informing him that it was dangerous to clean a machine while it was in motion. United States Leather Co. v. Showalter (1912) 113 Va. 479, 74 S. E. 400.

On the other hand it has been held that there is no presumption that a minor seventeen years of age, acting as off-bearer for a ripper saw lacks either the experience or the intelligence which would warn him of the danger involved in replacing a belt upon a rapidly revolving pulley and, therefore, that the master in the absence of proof of a lack of knowledge need not warn him that he should not attempt to replace a belt while the pulley was revolving. Bedgood v. T. R. Miller Mill Co. (1919) — Ala. —, 80 So. 364.

And where the servant was eighteen years of age it has been held that the presumption was that he had sufficient understanding to appreciate the obvious danger of unclogging with the hand a machine running at high speed and known to contain revolving knives so as to relieve the master of any obligation to warn him that the machine should be stopped for the purpose of unchoking it, at least in the absence of a showing that from inexperience or other causes he did not so understand and that the master knew that he did not. Birmingham Candy Co. v. Shepherd (Ala.) supra.

c. Questions for jury.

It has been held that the question whether or not a minor at the time of an accident had acquired sufficient knowledge of the dangers attached to the cleaning of a dangerous machine while in motion to exempt the master from liability in case of injury, upon the ground that he was excused from warning the servant as to such dangers, is one for the jury. White v. San Antonio Waterworks Co. (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 29 S. W. 252.

And whether the danger of cleaning or unchoking a machine while in motion is so obvious to a minor of ordinary intelligence as to relieve the master of warning a servant is for the jury where the evidence leaves such obviousness in doubt. Birmingham Candy Co. v. Shepherd (1915) 14 Ala. App. 312, 70 So. 193; Doyle v. Pittsburgh Waste Co. (1903) 204 Pa. 618, 54 Atl. 363; Neilon v. Marinette & M. Paper Co. (1890) 75 Wis. 579, 44 N. W. 772. And see O'Connor v. Adams (1876) 120 Mass. 427.

And the question of the master's knowledge as to the minor servant's lack of understanding of the obvious danger is a jury question where the facts tend to show that he must or ought to have known that the servant was continually unchoking his machine without stopping it. Birmingham Candy Co. v. Shepherd (Ala.) supra.

So the master's negligence in not giving proper instructions as to the starting, stopping and cleaning of a machine upon which a minor servant is put to work is for the jury where the evidence, both as to the knowledge and experience of the servant, and the amount of instructions actually given, is conflicting. Glover v. Dwight Mfg.

And it has been held that even though a servant of "tender years" (boy sixteen years of age, 5 feet 7 inches in height and bright and well developed) knew that there were knives in a feed cutter and that if his hands came in contact with them he would be injured, it should be left to the jury to determine whether the servant should have been instructed that the machine might safely be unclogged by stopping it and that he should not use his hands for that purpose while it was in motion. Ertz v. Pierson (1902) 130 Mich. 160, 89 N. W. 680, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 599.

2. When both parties request a peremptory instruction and do nothing more, they thereby assume the facts to be undisputed and in effect submit to the trial judge the determination of the inferences proper to be drawn therefrom. And upon review a finding of fact by the trial court under such circumstances must stand if the record discloses substantial evidence to support it.

Evidence — relevancy — negating inference — ratification.

3. Facts and circumstances concerning a wife's indorsement in blank of national bank stock certificates are admissible in evidence to negative the inference that by such indorsement she ratified a prior unauthorized transfer of such stock to her by her husband and assumed the duty promptly to remove her name from the bank books or suffer the liability imposed upon duly registered shareholders.

ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the District Court for the District of New Jersey in favor of defendant in a suit to enforce an assessment against her as an alleged stockholder of the First National Bank of Bayonne. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Barber, Watson, & Gibbon-ey, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant was a record shareholder.

Cecil Nat. Bank v. Watson town Bank, 105 U. S. 217, 26 L. ed. 1039; Harvey v. Stowe, 134 C. C. A. 635, 219 Fed. 17.

Defendant is liable as an owner, for the assessment.

The acceptance of the bond and mortgage of William H. Vreeland as collateral security for the payment of the assessment was not a waiver of the right to recover of Mrs. Vreeland.

Pauly v. State Loan & T. Co. 165 U. S. 606, 41 L. ed. 844, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465; Hubbell v. Houghton, 86 Fed. 547, affirmed in 33 C. C. A. 574, 63 U. S. App. 31, 91 Fed. 453; Re California Nat. Bank, 53 Fed. 38; Price v. Yates, Fed. Cas. No. 11,418.

Mr. Pierre P. Garven, for defendant in error:

Defendant was not a shareholder and liable for the assessment.

Donnelly v. State, 26 N. J. L. 511; Webster v. Hudson County, 86 N. J. L. 256, 90 Atl. 1110.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

Williams, as receiver, sued defendant in error in the United States district court for New Jersey to enforce an assessment against her, levied by the Comptroller of the Currency (Rev. Stat. § 5151), because she apparently owned certain stock of the First National Bank when it failed, December 6, 1913. She admits that the certificates were made out in her name, and at time of the failure were so entered on the bank books. But she claims that, without her knowledge or consent, her husband caused them to be thus issued and entered. And further, that although she signed blank powers of attorney indorsed thereon, and thereby made it possible to transfer the stock from her name, she never really approved, ratified, or acquiesced in the transfer to herself.

Each side asked for an instructed verdict without more; the trial judge directed one in favor of Mrs. Vreeland, and in support of this action said: "Although the burden was upon the defendant to show that she was not in fact the owner of the stock (Finn v. Brown, 142 U. S. 56, 67, 35 L. ed. 936, 939, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136), I think that she has borne the burden by proving that the placing of the stock in her name in the first instance was unauthorized,—without her knowledge and consent,—and that she did not thereafter acquiesce in this act or in any way ratify it. . . . I am constrained to hold, therefore, that the defendant is not liable and that a verdict should be directed in her favor." Final judgment entered upon the consequent verdict was approved by the circuit court of appeals (156 C. C. A. 632, 244 Fed. 346).

In respect of the evidence and its conclusions therefrom the latter court said:

"The plaintiff proved that the defendant was a shareholder of record and that she did nothing to remove her name as such. This was sufficient to establish prima facie the defendant's liability. Finn v. Brown, supra; Matteson v. Dent, 176 U. S. 521, 530, 44 L. ed. 571, 575, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419. The burden then shifted to her (Finn v. Brown) to show that the act of making her a shareholder was in the first instance unauthorized; that it was without her knowledge or consent; and that she has not since acquiesced in or ratified it. That she has sustained the burden upon the first two points is not disputed; therefore the remaining question is as to evidence of her ratification. . . . Considering this testimony in connection with corroborating testimony, it appears to us that what Mary A. Vreeland did, in legal effect, was to make a valid execution of a power of attorney for the transfer of stock. That act, in so far as it authorized a transfer of stock, she cannot avoid by pleading ignorance. As the question here does not involve the validity of the act to effect a transfer, but concerns its evidential imputation of the knowledge with which it was done, we are of opinion that the circumstances which attended the act were a part of it and affected the evidential inferences to be drawn from it. These circumstances show that before acting, the defendant requested to be informed as to what she was asked to do; this information was denied her. It was denied her under representations and influences which, when she acted, led her to believe she was doing something entirely different from that which she was actually doing; that is, she was made to believe she was correcting a mistake of her husband,—a mistake affecting his affairs—not that she was dealing with or assigning away her own property. Therefore, we think the circumstances were such as to negative the knowledge which otherwise it is presumed her act would have imparted. They contradicted the normal imputations of her act, and left her without that knowledge which was a prerequisite to a valid ratification of her husband's unauthorized act."

It further held: "Instead of submitting the case to the jury, however, each party asked the court for binding instructions in his favor, which, under Beuttell v. Magone, 157 U. S. 154, 39 L. ed. 654, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566, is not a submission to the court without the intervention of a jury, within the intent of Rev. Stat. §§ 649, 700, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 1587, 1668, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 130, 205, but is equivalent to a joint request for a finding of fact by the court, and when the court, acting upon such request, directs the jury to find for one of the parties, both are concluded on its finding. In this case the parties submitted to the court the question of the wife's ratification of her husband's unauthorized act; that question was one of fact; upon it depended her liability. The court's decision, as evidenced by its instruction to the jury that they render a verdict for the defendant, was a finding of fact, which concluded both parties as effectually as if the same fact had been found by the jury."

The established rule is: "Where both parties request a peremptory instruction and do nothing more, they thereby assume the facts to be undisputed, and, in effect, submit to the trial judge the determination of the inferences proper to be drawn therefrom." And upon review, a finding of fact by the trial court under such circumstances must stand, if the record discloses substantial evidence to support it. Anderson v. Messenger, 85 C. C. A. 468, 158 Fed. 250, 253; Beuttell v. Magone, 157 U. S. 157, 39 L. ed. 655, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Empire State Cattle Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 210 U. S. 1, 8, 52 L. ed.

Appeal—review of facts—directed verdict requested by both parties.

Counsel for the receiver maintained that, when Mrs. Vreeland indorsed the certificates in blank at the request of her husband, who declared this necessary to enable him to correct his mistake, she thereby indisputably ratified his unauthorized transfer of the stock to her and assumed the duty promptly to remove her name from the bank books or suffer the liability imposed upon duly registered shareholders. But we think the courts below rightly held that facts and circumstances concerning this indorsement could be shown in order to negative the inference which would have followed if unexplained. Glenn v. Garth, 133 N. Y.

18, 36, 37, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344. And as without doubt there is substantial evidence tending to show she had no actual intention to ratify, affirm, or acquiesce in her husband's unauthorized act, we must accept that as finally established.

In Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 138, 33 L. ed. 531, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290, which involved the liability of a married woman for an assessment levied against national bank stockholders, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, this court approved a charge: "If the stock in controversy was transferred upon the books of the German-American Savings Bank to and in the name of the defendant without her knowledge and consent, she was entitled to a verdict, unless she subsequently ratified and confirmed such transfer." And it was further said: "We must not be understood as saying that the mere transfer of the stocks on the books of the bank, to the name of the defendant, imposed upon her the individual liability attached by law to the position of shareholder in a national banking association. If the transfers were, in fact, without her knowledge and consent, and she was not informed of what was so done,—nothing more appearing,—she would not be held to have assumed or incurred liability for the debts, contracts, and engagements of the bank. But if, after the transfers, she joined in the application to convert the savings bank into a national bank, or in any other mode approved, ratified, or acquiesced in such transfers, or accepted any of the benefits arising from the ownership of the stock thus put in her name on the books of the bank, she was liable to be treated as a shareholder, with such responsibility as the law imposes upon the shareholders of national banks."

Approval, ratification, and acquiescence all presuppose the existence of some actual knowledge of the prior action and what amounts to a purpose to abide by it. Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet. 607, 629, 9 L. ed. 246, 254; Western Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 152 U. S. 346, 352, 38 L. ed. 470, 473, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 572; Glenn v. Garth, supra. When defendant in error signed blank powers of attorney she did not know what her husband had done and certainly entertained no purpose to approve transfer of the certificates to herself. She thought she was merely doing something to enable him to correct his avowed mistake, and nothing else. Nobody was misled or put in a worse position as the result of her act.

National banks—liability of shareholder—knowledge of transfer.

"As between the original parties that could not be deemed a ratification which was accompanied by a refusal to ratify, and a declared purpose to undo the unauthorized act. The form adopted, by itself and unexplained, would tend to an inference of ratification, but it is not left unexplained. The actual truth is established, and that truth must prevail over the form adopted as between parties who have not been misled, to their harm, by the form of the transaction as distinguished from its substance. . . . The presumption which might have flowed from the form of the transaction disappears upon the explanation made, and in view of the substantial truth proved by the evidence."

The record reveals no material error and the judgment below is affirmed.

NOTE.

The liability of one whose name appears upon corporate books as a stockholder without his consent is discussed in the note, beginning at page, 1049, post.

FRANK SHEAN, Appt.,

VIOLET N. COOK, Admr., etc., of Carrie M. Cook, Deceased, et al.,

(— Cal. —, 179 Pac. 185.)

Corporation — liability of stockholder — stock standing in name.

1. Where the constitutional definition of stockholder is one who owns shares in a corporation, a woman is not liable to creditors for shares standing in her name, where, upon being notified by her husband that he had placed them in her name, she immediately repudiated the transaction and reassigned them to him, although he did not transfer them on the books, and the statute provides for liability of such persons as appear on the books to be stockholders.

Appeal — view of evidence — conclusion of court.

2. Upon appeal from a judgment in defendant's favor in an action to enforce the liability of an alleged stockholder for the debts of the corporation, on the ground that defendant was not a stockholder, the evidence must be considered in the view most favorable to the conclusions of the court.

Definition — stockholder.

3. The term "stockholder," in a constitutional provision imposing upon stockholders of a corporation liability for corporate debts, must be construed in the light of a statutory definition of the term existing at the time the Constitution was adopted.

Estoppel — to deny liability as stockholder.

4. One is not estopped to deny liability as a stockholder of a corporation in favor of one who was ignorant, when credit was given the corporation, that the name of the one against whom the estoppel is claimed was upon the books as a stockholder.

Evidence — report to probate court.

5. That a man, while guardian of his wife, reported stock standing in her name on the books of a corporation as belonging to her, is not conclusive against his testimony, in an action to hold her estate liable as a stockholder to creditors of the corporation, that he placed the stock in her name, but she immediately repudiated the transaction and he neglected to retransfer the stock.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of defendants, in an action brought to enforce the liability of the feme defendant as stockholder of a certain corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Pillsbury, Madison, & Sutro and A. E. Roth, for appellant:

One who appears as a stockholder on the books of a corporation must be held liable for the debts of the corporation.

Hurlburt v. Arthur, 140 Cal. 106, 98 Am. St. Rep. 17, 73 Pac. 734; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 593, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776; Moore v. Cloyd, 74 Cal. 174, 15 Pac. 670; Cook, Corp. § 260; Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 636, 40 Pac. 1047; Duke v. Huntington, 130 Cal. 274, 62 Pac. 510; Hughes Mfg. & Lumber Co. v. Wilcox, 13 Cal. App. 22, 108 Pac. 871; Irons v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 27 Fed. 593, 121 U. S. 58, 30 L. ed. 874, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788; Finn v. Brown, 142 U. S. 56, 67, 35 L. ed. 936, 939, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Kenyon v. Fowler, 83 C. C. A. 567, 155 Fed. 107; Abbott v. Jack, 136 Cal. 510, 69 Pac. 257; O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 529, 44 Pac. 227; Thomas v. Matthiessen, 232 U. S. 221, 58 L. ed. 577, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 312; McCabe Constr. Co. v. Utah Constr. Co. 199 Fed. 976.

The statements contained in the inventory relative to the ownership of the stock were admissible as statements made by a sworn officer of the court, who was acting under a duty imposed by law in making the inventory.

A person whose name has been entered on the books of a corporation without his consent may thereafter do certain acts which, as a matter of law, constitute an acceptance of the stock issued in his name.

Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 139, 149, 33 L. ed. 534, 537, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290; Greene v. Sigua Iron Co. 31 C. C. A. 458, 88 Fed. 203; Simmons v. Hill, 96 Mo. 679, 2 L.R.A. 478, 10 S. W. 61.

The assignment of the certificate of stock by Carrie M. Cook constituted an acceptance thereof and made her liable to the stockholders.

O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 523, 44 Pac. 227; Abbott v. Jack, 136 Cal. 510, 69 Pac. 257.

The courts will presume that the creditors relied upon the entries which appeared on the corporation books.

Wilbur, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover from Carrie M. Cook upon her stockholder's liability for indebtedness incurred by the Morton L. Cook Company, a corporation, in which it was alleged she owned 49,095 shares of the total capital stock of 50,000 shares. Morton L. Cook, her husband and guardian, was joined as defendant. The court found that Carrie M. Cook was not a stockholder in the corporation, and rendered judgment in favor of defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Mrs. Cook has since died, and the administratrix of her estate with the will annexed has been substituted. The main question presented by the appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the court that Mrs. Cook was not a stockholder in the corporation. In determining that question we must consider the evidence from the view most favorable to the conclusion of the court.

Appeal—view of evidence—conclusion of court.

The corporation was organized March 6, 1903. Morton L. Cook was the owner of 49,095 shares. On the 28th of October, 1908, he caused a new certificate for these shares to be issued to Carrie M. Cook. Mr. Cook took this certificate to his wife, telling her that they had decided to make her the principal stockholder of the Morton L. Cook Company. She immediately repudiated the transaction and refused to accept the stock or to have anything to do with the matter. Two or three days later her husband told her that, if she was not going to have anything to do with the corporation, she should sign an indorsement that he had written upon the back of the stock as follows:

October 28, 1908.

I hereby assign any and all int. I may have to this stock to Morton L. Cook.

She thereupon signed said indorsement. Mr. Cook, who was during this whole period president of the corporation, took the stock to Mr. Alderson, who was the secretary, and said: "Mr. Alderson, that is all off; just let that matter remain in abeyance; I will take it up again at a later date." The stock certificate ever since October, 1908, has remained in the custody of Morton L. Cook in his safe deposit box in San Francisco. Mrs. Cook never had anything to do with the corporation or with said stock, other than as stated. The corporation was actively engaged in business, and the indebtedness upon which plaintiff sued was incurred by the corporation between the 1st day of January, 1912, and the 1st day of February, 1914. Before that time Mrs. Cook, on December 10, 1910, had been declared an incompetent, and her husband had been appointed her guardian. She was under this guardianship up to the time of her death. It is obvious that there never was any contract or agreement between Mrs. Cook and the corporation that she should become a stockholder. Upon being tendered the stock, she refused the same, and returned it to the president of the corporation, who had presented it to her, and for the purpose of perfecting her repudiation and permitting the ownership of the stock to appear upon the books in conformity with the real fact she indorsed the same, so that such stock might be transferred on the books of the corporation in the usual and proper manner. Morton L. Cook was at all times the owner of the stock. Appellant's contention is that, as Mrs. Cook was shown by the books of the corporation to be a stockholder, and, by reason of the presentation to her of the stock certificate and her indorsement thereof, must have known that fact, she was liable for her proportionate share of the indebtedness of the corporation during such period as the stock continued to appear upon the books of the corporation in her name. This contention is based upon the following provision contained in § 322 of the Civil Code relating to stockholders' liability: "The term stockholder, as used in this section, applies not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such, but also to every equitable owner of stock, although the same appears on the

The statutory liability of stockholders is declared by our Constitution (art. 12, § 3): "Each stockholder of a corporation, or joint-stock association, shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation or association."

At the time this constitutional amendment was adopted, the Civil Code, in accordance with the general law concerning the subject, declared: "The owners of shares in a corporation which has a capital stock are called stockholders." Civ. Code, § 298, enacted 1871.

The term "stockholder," therefore, as used in the Constitution, must be construed in the light of this definition, and the liability, therefore, attaches to the owner of the stock. Section 322 of the Civil Code uses the exact language with reference to stockholders' liability as that contained in the Constitution, excepting that the words, "of joint-stock association," and the words, "or association," are omitted in the statutory declaration of liability. The remaining provisions of § 322 are obviously and necessarily for the purpose of carrying out the constitutional and statutory liability thus declared. Under the constitutional declaration of liability, carried into § 322, that liability is predicated upon ownership of the stock. Western P. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 166 Cal. 346, 136 Pac. 284, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 825. It is evident that the legislature, in its declaration that "the term stockholder . . . applies not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such," etc., had in mind the provisions of § 324, Civil Code, relating to transfers of stock upon the books of the corporation, and the effect of such books as evidence of ownership. The term "stockholder" had already been defined (Civ. Code, § 298), and it was neither necessary nor desirable to again define the term. By the terms of § 324, Civil Code, it is provided that title to the stock may be transferred "by indorsement . . . and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation." In considering whether the fact that the name of Mrs. Cook appeared upon the books of the corporation as a stockholder made her liable under the statute to plaintiff, it will be necessary to consider some of the previous decisions of this court upon the subject. In Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 571, 82 Pac. 248, and Shattuck & D. Warehouse Co. v. Gillelen, 154 Cal. 778, 99 Pac. 348, the court had under consideration the statutory liability of a stockholder in a nonbanking corporation, where the books of the corporation showed the defendant to be a stockholder at the time the indebtedness sued upon was incurred. Gillelen was a pledgee of the stock, but by mistake, which he endeavored to correct, the stock was issued to him personally, and he was shown by the books of the corporation to be a stockholder. In the latter case it was said, with reference to § 322, Civil Code: ". . . The only rational construction of the section that the language, 'such persons as appear by the books,' etc., must be limited to persons who knowingly or voluntarily permit their names to appear as stockholders."

In both cases it was held that a construction of the section which would lead to the result that "would necessarily preclude one from showing that, while upon the face of the corporate books he appeared to be a stockholder, yet in fact he was not, that he had never owned or subscribed for any stock or authorized the issuance of any to him by the

In Welch v. Gillelen, supra, it was held that the relation of the stockholder to the corporation was one of contract; that one could not become a stockholder, and liable to the creditors of the corporation, because of entries in the stock book of the corporation made without his consent. See also People's Home Sav. Bank v. Stadtmuller, 150 Cal. 108, 88 Pac. 280; Geary Street, P. & O. R. Co. v. Bradbury Estate Co. — Cal. —, 175 Pac. 457. In Shattuck & D. Warehouse Co. v. Gillelen, supra, concerning appellant's contention that the stockholders were liable, it was said: "The decisions relied on by the appellant in that case [Welch v. Gillelen, supra] were shown to be cases where the party asserting that he was not a stockholder had either knowingly and voluntarily assumed that position upon the books of the corporation, or, if he had not originally done so, had, by his subsequent conduct, estopped himself from denying the relationship."

The case of Hurlburt v. Arthur, 140 Cal. 106, 98 Am. St. Rep. 17, 73 Pac. 734, involved the statutory liability of stockholders in a banking corporation under §§ 321 and 322 of the Civil Code. The question of an unauthorized issuance or transfer of stock was not involved or considered. While the construction of §§ 321 and 322, Civil Code, is there considered, the effect of the opinion must be determined in the light of the point under discussion, namely, the liability of stockholders in a banking corporation. In such case the stock books and public notice of transfers are by statute declared to be conclusive evidence of the ownership of stock. Civ. Code, § 321. It was therefore held that, where the holder of stock as pledgee had the stock transferred to him in his own name and was shown on the books as owner thereof, and not as a pledgee, he was liable as a stockholder to creditors. The same rule also holds good in other corporations. Welch v. Gillelen and Shat- tuck & D. Warehouse Co. v. Gillelen, supra; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776. In Baines v. Babcock, supra, the defendant, who was shown by the books of the corporation to be the owner of stock, offered to prove that he was the real owner of only 425 shares issued to him by the corporation, and that the others standing in his name on its books were owned by other parties, and that they were issued to him as matter of convenience to enable him to negotiate a loan for such owners. The evidence was excluded because of the rule, which was there stated to be well settled, "that one to whom stock is issued by the corporation, and who has the same placed in his name on the corporation books as the owner, is liable to the creditors of the corporation as though he were the absolute owner; and this whether he was in fact a pledgee, agent, or trustee for the real owner."

As was suggested in Hurlburt v. Arthur, supra, the construction placed upon the sections of the National Banking Act by the Federal courts is of assistance in construing §§ 321 and 322 of the Civil Code. Section 5151 of the U. S. Revised Statutes provides: "Shareholders of every national banking association shall be individually responsible," etc.

Section 5210 of the U. S. Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9773, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 789), like § 321 of our Civil Code, requires the keeping of a list of stockholders for the inspection of shareholders and creditors, but it does not provide that such lists shall be "conclusive evidence as to who are stockholders," as does § 321, Civil Code. The general tenor of the decisions of the Federal courts is very well set forth in Williams v. Vreeland, 156 C. C. A. 632, 244 Fed. 346, circuit court of appeals, third district. In that case the facts were very similar to the instant case. There the wife indorsed a dividend check, which, however, was issued in her husband's name, and also signed a power of attorney upon the back of the stock authorizing its transfer. She did not know that the stock had been issued in her name, and her signature to the power of attorney for the transfer of the stock was procured without her seeing the face of the certificates or knowing what they were. Her husband placed the certificates before her, face down, and said: "Mary, will you sign these papers for me?" She said: "What are they?" He replied: "They are some bank stock; I have made a mistake." The court states the rule to be applied in testing the question of liability to the creditors of the corporation, of the wife, under the circumstances, as follows: "The test of liability, therefore, seems to be the fact of being a record shareholder, knowledge of that fact, and some act in approval or ratification of it. Along this line the cases have been tried."

The court cited with approval the decision of the court of appeals of New York in Glenn v. Garth, 133 N. Y. 35, 43, 30 N. E. 651, 31 N. E. 346, and quoted therefrom a part of the opinion pertinent here, as follows: "It [a ratification] implies a conscious and intended approval of the act done. It rests upon the actual and existing purpose to make such approval. Hence the courts say that it must occur with full knowledge of all the facts. . . . Where the shareholder consciously accepts that relation, he ought to bear its burdens as well as enjoy its benefits, and it is easy to imply a promise to perform that duty. But where he does not accept the relation, where it was put upon him by another without authority and against his will, where, instead of accepting its benefits, he repudiates them at serious loss, where his mind and that of the company never met in any contractual relation, where it was not his duty to pay, and he explicitly refused to take what was offered, all foundation for an implied promise is gone. The facts do not admit of it, for the law does not raise a fiction to accomplish a wrong. And thus again we come to the proposition that the real truth must be ascertained, and when ascertained must control. And that real truth is that the defendants repudiated and did not ratify the unauthorized act of McKim. The whole force of a ratification lies in conscious and intended assent with full knowledge of the facts. If there is no such intent and no such volition, but a contrary intent and an opposite purpose, there is no ratification. The absence of any such intent and the presence of a different one is clearly disclosed by the facts."

The United States circuit court of appeals sustained the finding of the trial court that Mrs. Vreeland was not liable as a stockholder of the bank to the creditors of the corporation. In the instant case Mrs. Cook refused to accept the stock offered her, and her indorsement is not the usual power of attorney consistent with an assumption of ownership of the stock, but is more in the nature of a quitclaim. There is no element of estoppel in the case. The creditors did not know at the time credit was extended that Mrs. Cook was shown by the books of the corporation to be a stockholder.

Appellant relies upon the case of Abbott v. Jack, 136 Cal. 510, 69 Pac. 257. In that case, at the request of the husband, a certificate for 330 shares of stock had been issued to Mrs. Jack as owner, March 14, 1896, and the same stood in her name on the books of the corporation until July 17, 1899, when it was surrendered and canceled, "and her acceptance of the stock is shown by her written assignment of it to R. E. Jack, her husband, of date March 16, 1896." It was there held: "From this it appears that she became a stockholder of the corporation on or before March 16, 1896, and that she continued to appear as such on the books of the company until the cancelation of the certificate, July 17, 1899. She therefore continued to be a stockholder, as the term is defined in § 322 of the Civil Code, and under the provisions of that section (no facts being found to exonerate her) she continued to be liable, along with her husband. Civ. Code, §§ 322, 324; Duke v. Huntington, 130 Cal. 274, 62 Pac. 510; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 593, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776; Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 174, 15 Pac. 670; O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 528, 44 Pac. 227."

The holding of the court would thus seem to be that the issuance of the certificate, coupled with the indorsement and the fact that her name appeared upon the books of the corporation, ipso facto created Mrs. Jack a stockholder, and the finding of the court to the contrary was erroneous. The court added: "R. E. Jack indeed testified that on notifying her of the issue of the stock she refused to receive it; and he further testified that he told her, if she would not receive it, she must assign to him. . . . On a new trial the question of her liability as affected by the facts testified to by R. E. Jack, or otherwise appearing, can be considered; and as it is clear that there is a liability on her or her husband, or on both, the plaintiff, if he be so advised, should be permitted to amend his complaint by charging the latter with such liability."

The reversal of the trial court in that case seems to be based rather upon the condition of the record than upon the substantive rights of the parties. It is said: "But there is no finding as to these or other facts tending to exonerate her, and their effect cannot, on the record as presented, be considered."

The necessary implication from the decision is that, if the court had found the fact to be that the wife had refused to receive the stock and had assigned it to her husband for the purpose of making effective her repudiation, she should not be held as a stockholder. In view of the construction placed upon the record in that case, the decision cannot be said to be an authority for the plaintiff in this case, but rather, on the whole, either leaves open the question as to the effect of the repudiation by the wife of the transaction, or decides that question in favor of the nonliability of the wife. In the case of Abbott v. Jack, the fact that § 321 of the Civil Code makes the books conclusive evidence of the liability of the stockholder is apparently not relied upon by the court. In so far, however, as this case can be considered an authority for the proposition that the stock books of the corporation are conclusive as to the liability of stockholders in a nonbanking corporation, the case has been overruled by the subsequent cases of Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 571, 82 Pac. 248, and Shattuck & D. Ware-

In addition to the facts heretofore stated, it may be said that M. L. Cook, the husband, while acting as guardian, reported to the court sitting in probate, on several occasions, that the stock in question belonged to his wife and was a part of her estate. These declarations, however, merely went to the question of his credibility, and the court having based its decision upon the truth of his statement concerning the original transaction, if we hold his statement sufficient to support the finding that she was not a stockholder, as we must do upon the authorities above quoted, the judgment must be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of one whose name appears upon corporate books as a stockholder without his consent.

This note includes the effect of estoppel, by negative conduct of the person in whose name the stock is entered on the corporate books, in failing to take proper steps to remove that misleading appearance, but does not include the effect of affirmative conduct consistent with his status as a stockholder, with the exception of a purported transfer or assignment for the purpose of correcting the corporate books.

The liability of assignees for the benefit of creditors, trustees in bankruptcy, etc., has been excluded.

It is held, generally, in a number of cases that one whose name is put upon the books of a corporation as a stockholder without his knowledge is not thereby subjected to the liability of a stockholder. WILLIAMS v. VREELAND (reported herewith) ante, 1038; Carey

v. Williams (1897) 25 C. C. A. 227, 51 U. S. App. 204, 79 Fed. 906; Foote v. Anderson (1903) 61 C. C. A. 5, 123 Fed. 659; O'Connor v. Witherby (1896) 111 Cal. 529, 44 Pac. 227 (obiter); Robinson v. Lane (1856) 19 Ga. 337; Girard Life Ins. Annuity & T. Co. v. Loving (1905) 71 Kan. 558, 81 Pac. 200; Glenn v. Garth (1892) 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344.

Even if stock is issued to one with his knowledge, but without his consent, it has been held that this fact alone does not render him liable as a stockholder. Greene v. Sigua Iron Co. (1896) 22 C. C. A. 636, 45 U. S. App. 162, 207, 76 Fed. 947; Carey v. Williams (1897) 25 C. C. A. 227, 51 U. S. App. 204, 79 Fed. 906; Sigua Iron Co. v. Greene (1900) 44 C. C. A. 221, 104 Fed. 854, certiorari denied in (1901)

180 U. S. 637, 45 L. ed. 710, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 920; Foot v. Anderson (1903) 61 C. C. A. 5, 123 Fed. 659; Grier v. Union Nat. L. Ins. Co. (1914) 217 Fed. 287; Mudgett v. Horrell (1867) 33 Cal. 25; Girard Life Ins. Annuity & T. Co. v. Loving (1905) 71 Kan. 558, 81 Pac. 200.

As stated in one case, the entry of the name of one upon the corporate books does not preclude him from showing that he was in fact not a stockholder, and that the issuance of stock in his name was unauthorized. Welch v. Gillelen (1905) 147 Cal. 571, 82 Pac. 248.

A statutory provision that "a person in whose name shares of stock stand on the books of the company shall be deemed the owner thereof as regards the company" has been held to mean only that the corporation which has acknowledged such a person as a stockholder, and admitted him to be such upon its record, shall not be at liberty to dispute the relation; it does not mean that the books are evidence that the person whose name has been entered is in fact a stockholder, as against him. Carey v. Williams (1897) 25 C. C. A. 227, 51 U. S. App. 274, 79 Fed. 906.

A person cannot be compelled to become a member of a corporation without his knowledge or consent. Kisner's Estate (1916) 254 Pa. 597, 99 Atl. 168.

One who has not consented cannot be made a member of a corporation incorporated, by an act of the legislature, for the purpose of laying out a street, and thus subjected to assessments for the expense of making the street. Ellis v. Marshall (1807) 2 Mass. 269, 3 Am. Dec. 49.

In the case of issuance without consent, liability, if it exists, must exist by virtue of some act or omission on the part of the person whose name is thus placed upon the corporate books, after knowledge of the fact.

It seems clear that one whose name has been put upon corporate books as a stockholder without his knowledge or consent may ratify the act. If he does ratify the act, he becomes a stockholder. Musgrave v. Morrison (1880) 54 Md. 161. The silence for seven years of a large stockholder in a corporation in whose name some of the other officers subscribed for stock, notifying him of the same, has been held to be evidence of ratification to be submitted to the jury. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Cowell (1857) 28 Pa. 329, 70 Am. Dec. 128. Although the mere transfer of stock by a husband to his wife's name without her knowledge or consent, on the books of a savings bank, afterwards converted into a national bank, would not make her liable as a shareholder of the national bank, yet if, after such transfer, she joined in the application to convert the savings bank into a national bank, or ratified such transfer, or accepted the benefits of the ownership of the stock, she is liable to be treated as a shareholder. Keyser v. Hitz (1889) 183 U. S. 138, 33 L. ed. 531, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290. In Glenn v. Garth (1892) 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344, a broker purchasing stock for a customer under a custom by which the broker took an assignment of the certificate from the vendor in blank, and held the certificate so assigned as security, but did not have the stock transferred to himself upon the corporate books, was held not to become a stockholder and liable to an assignee for the unpaid part of the stock, because of the fact that an agent, without authority, caused the stock purchased to be transferred to the broker upon the books of the corporation. The court, after stating that the broker did not authorize or consent to this transfer, states that he could only become responsible by estoppel or ratification. There was held to be no ratification from the fact that, upon the discovery of the mistake, the broker wrote to the agent, repudiating the transfer and denying his authority to make it, and directing him as the means of undoing the mischief to sell and transfer the stock, and, to enable him to do so in accordance with established form, signed and executed and assigned such blank of the stock. The fact that the assignment was executed is stated to be an act recognizing ownership, if unexplained, but in view of the circumstances which were shown it did not amount to a ratification. It was further held that the act of the broker in paying for the stock did not amount to ratification. A statute providing that a person in whose name shares of stock stand on the books of the company shall be deemed the owner thereof as regards the company is held not to be conclusive, but only prima facie, evidence of the ownership. That the mere transfer of stock in a national bank from husband to wife, without the latter's knowledge and consent, does not impose upon her the individual liability attached by law to the position of stockholder, is held also in WILLIAMS v. VREELAND, (reported herewith) ante, 1038. And it is further held in this case that the wife cannot be deemed to have approved, ratified, or acquiesced in such transfer, so as to assume the position of a shareholder, by indorsing the certificate in blank in the belief that she was enabling her husband to correct his avowed mistake. The facts and circumstances concerning the indorsement of the certificate are held to be admissible in evidence to negative the inference that by such indorsement she ratified the unauthorized transfer to her, and assumed the duty promptly to remove her name from the bank books, or suffer the liability imposed upon duly registered shareholders. The assignment of the stock certificate by the person in whose name it was issued was given great weight as evidence of an acceptance, in Abbott v. Jack (1902) 136 Cal. 510, 69 Pac. 257. One who had accepted a transfer of shares of the capital stock in an association merely for the purpose of attending a meeting of shareholders to form a quorum, and who subsequently signed a power of attorney to retransfer the shares when the meeting was over, was held liable as a contributor where no retransfer was made under the power, although he remained in ignorance that the share still stood in his name, in Ontario Invest. Asso. v. Leys (1893) 23 Ont. Rep. 496.

Ratification presupposes consent. This note has been confined to cases in which there has been no consent, hence ratification in general has been excluded. Assuming that there has been no consent at any time by the person whose name has been placed upon corporate books as a stockholder, it seems clear that his liability, if any exists, must be based upon the principle of estoppel. Estoppel has been confused with ratification in this regard. In McHose v. Wheeler (1863) 45 Pa. 32, it is stated that if one is named as a member in a charter, which is a public act, and does not disavow the relation as soon as he discovers the use made of his name, he cannot evade his liability as member merely by showing that he was not in fact a subscriber and never paid in any stock. He must, according to the court, immediately and publicly disavow the act, or be deemed as ratifying it as relating to creditors. The holding in McHose v. Wheeler is more properly attributable to the principle of estoppel from the failure to disavow the act.

One case stated that one to whom stock is transferred without his knowledge or consent can only be made liable on the ground of fraud. Robinson v. Lane (1856) 19 Ga. 337. In this case it was held that, if the person to whom stock is transferred without his knowledge or consent acquiesces in such transfer after it is brought to his knowledge, he is presumptively liable as a stockholder.

Estoppel has not been discussed in many cases. One case takes the broad view that there must be some act done by the party or with his assent, creating the apparent relation, before there can be an estoppel. Glenn v. Garth (1892) 133 N. Y. 18, 31 N. E. 344. The court, in denying that there was an equitable estoppel, states that that question is not reached, "because, before it can be reached, there must be shown to exist some act of the party, done by him or with his assent, creating the alleged apparent relation. That fact must be established before any question of estoppel can arise. If the act done, the false appearance created, is the act not of the party, but of some third person, such party is in no manner bound or affected by it, unless he either originally authorized it or subsequently ratified it. Only by the one process or the other can it become his act, and until he can be held responsible for it there can be no question of estoppel; and there is not a case cited on the original argument or on the brief now presented, in which the rule of estoppel was applied, which failed to show that necessary and conscious and voluntary act of the party estopped." The action in this case was by a trustee for the benefit of creditors, and the court specifically states that neither the company nor any of the creditors did anything or forbore anything upon the faith of defendant's ownership of the stock. It is from this viewpoint, that is, whether any creditor relied upon the person as a stockholder, that most cases approach the question. No estoppel exists in favor of a creditor who had no knowledge at the time credit was extended that the defendant appeared as a stockholder on the books. SHEAN v. COOK (reported herewith) ante, 1042; Glenn v. Garth (1892) 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344, supra. Some cases which seemingly approve of the theory that no estoppel exists in favor of a creditor who had no knowledge that the defendant appeared on the books as a stockholder have not rested the denial of the existence of an estoppel wholly on this principle, but have relied in part upon other equitable incidents in the defendant's favor. Welch v. Gillelen (1905) 147 Cal. 571, 82 Pac. 248; Shattuck & D. Warehouse Co. v. Gillelen (1908) 154 Cal. 778, 99 Pac. 348. In these cases there was held to be no estoppel in favor of a creditor who did not know that the defendant's name appeared on the stock book as a stockholder, where the defendant, who was a pledgee of the stock, had issued in his name, a certificate which erroneously omitted to characterize him as a pledgee and where, upon the issuance of the certificate, the pledgee made prompt and reasonable efforts to have the correction made, but some time, including that in which the debt sued upon was incurred, elapsed before the correction was actually made.

A subscriber to stock in a proposed increase of the capital stock of a bank, to whom, without his knowledge or consent, old stock is issued, is not liable as a stockholder, nor is he estopped by receiving dividends which he believes to be dividends on the new stock, but which in fact are dividends on the old stock thus issued to him. Stephens v. Follett (1893) 43 Fed. 842.

In May v. Genesee County Sav. Bank (1899) 120 Mich. 330, 79 N. W. 630, a pledgee of stock who requested the corporation to issue a new certificate to him as pledgee was held not liable as a stockholder, where the certificate was issued to him as absolute owner, and, upon his request to have it issued to him as pledgee, the corporate officer replied that it was just as well to let it stand as it was, and this was done. The court states that the pledgee did not know that his name had been entered upon the books of the corporation as an absolute owner, and that he did not hold himself out as owner, and that he cannot, therefore, be held liable under the statute, although he received a certificate absolute in form, the court stating that "the certificate is no notice to creditors of the bank. It is the record of stockholders kept in the bank, upon which depositors and other creditors rely. A transfer absolute upon its face may always be shown to be an assignment as collateral security. . . . Mr. May, the cashier, knew that this stock was held in pledge, to secure a loan to Mr. Bement. It was his duty, for the protection of his own bank if for no one else, to so enter the transfer upon its books. His failure to do so cannot affect the rights of the defendant."

FOUR CORNERS BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION, Respt.,
v.
FRANK SCHWARZWAELDER, Appt.

(88 N. J. Eq. 545, 103 Atl. 240.)

Corporations — failure of director to disclose lien — liability.

1. A building and loan association loaned money on a mortgage of a city lot; its solicitor certified that the mortgage was a first and valid lien; in fact, there was a prior mortgage held by an estate of which the defendant, one of the directors of the association, was an executor; the property was described by reference to the street lines as the only monument and by a number on a land company map; the name of the mortgagor in the mortgage held by the estate was different from the name of the mortgagor in the association's mortgage; the defendant had nothing to do with making the loan; he had no actual knowledge that the property covered by the two mortgages was identical; he held as executor many mortgages and in the course of his business examined many properties; he knew his mortgages by street numbers and not by numbers on a land company map; the association's mortgage was accompanied by a regular abstract of title in which defendant's mortgage was not mentioned, and attached to which was a certificate by the association's solicitor, then a lawyer in good standing, that the association's mortgage was a first and valid lien. Held, that the defendant could not be found guilty of negligence for failing to apprise the association of the existence of the prior mortgage; that the directors had the right to pursue the usual business custom and trust the solicitor to close the loan and record the mortgage, and that as the loss did not come until the solicitor turned aside the money from its proper destination—the satisfaction of the first mortgage—the association had already suffered the loss without the defendant having had any opportunity to prevent it, and he cannot be held for negligence.

A building and loan association loaned money on a mortgage of a city lot; its solicitor certified that the mortgage was a first and valid lien; in fact, there was a prior mortgage held by an estate of which the defendant, one of the directors of the association, was an executor. The defendant had examined and valued the property for the purpose of a loan on the application of one Wagner, and had reported to the association; the estate's mortgage was given by Daly; the title was at the time of Wagner's application in Crocker, the solicitor of the association; the minutes of a subsequent meeting of the directors, at which defendant was not present, recite that Wagner had sold the property (which was untrue); that all the committee, including the defendant, reported in favor of a loan to Sims (which was untrue as far as defendant is concerned). The defendant never actually had to do with the loan to Sims; his knowledge is claimed to have come from hearing the minutes with these false recitals read over at a later meeting; this fact was not sufficiently proved, but if the defendant knew all the facts, he knew the loan was large enough to enable Sims to satisfy the prior mortgage to the estate, and, up to the time the check of the association for the loan was cashed, might anticipate that the estate mortgage would be paid before the solicitor closed the loan with Sims; the defendant had no reason to anticipate that the solicitor would forge a discharge of the estate mortgage; when the check had been cashed and the money turned aside from the satisfaction of the prior mortgage, the loss was already incurred. Held, the proximate cause of the loss was the rascality of the complainant's own

Building and loan association — duty of director in passing loan.

3. A director of a building and loan association owes to the association in passing upon loans to be made by it, only the duty of ascertaining that the usual papers, bond, mortgage, insurance policy, and abstract of title are at hand, and that the company solicitor has certified that the title is clear.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Chancery in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover for losses alleged to have been sustained through defendant's negligence in the performance of his duties as director of the plaintiff association. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas S. Henry and Francis Child, for appellant:

Without establishing fraud or gross negligence or misuser on the part of the defendant, he cannot be held responsible for complainant's loss.

Mr. Andrew Van Blarcom for respondent.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant seeks to recover of the defendant the loss on two mortgages in which it had invested. This loss was caused by Crocker, the complainant's solicitor, falsely certifying that the mortgages were first liens, when, in fact, there were prior mortgages which he had procured to be canceled of record by false discharges.

The case differs from cases brought by receivers in the interest of creditors or stockholders, of which Williams v. McKay, 40 N. J. Eq. 189, 53 Am. Rep. 775, 46 N. J. Eq. 25, 18 Atl. 824, is the leading instance. It differs also from cases brought by stockholders suing in their own right (Gerhard v. Welsh, 80 N. J. Eq. 203, 82 Atl. 871), and from cases where there was habitual neglect of duty, and the loss might have been prevented by proper attention; and from cases where the loan on its face was illegal or forbidden by the by-laws. The present case is more like Citizens' Bldg. Loan & Sav. Asso. v. Coriell, 34 N. J. Eq. 383. There the defendant was held liable for losses on loans made on personal security, which on their face were in violation of a by-law, but not liable for loss due to a defective acknowledgment of a mortgage, because, as the chancellor held, the directors properly relied on the knowledge and attention of the solicitor for the legality of the mortgages. In the present case, the proximate cause of the loss was the fraud of the solicitor; the complainant is seeking to hold the defendant for the fraud of its own agent, who either paid the money to the mortgagors improperly and without seeing to it that prior liens were lawfully discharged, or more probably embezzled that money himself. To sustain the complainant's claim, reliance is had upon the fact that the defendant, as one of the executors of an estate, held a prior mortgage on each property. The real question, therefore, is whether the defendant was under any duty to the complainant to give actual notice of the existence of the mortgages held by the estate. Mortgages on two properties are involved, one of which may be called the Aschenbach East Orange mortgage, and the other the Sims South Orange mortgage.

The Aschenbach mortgage was on a city lot on North Eighteenth street, East Orange, described by metes and bounds referring to the street lines as the only monument; the number of the section and lot on a land company's map is also stated. There are no other identifying marks. The prior mortgage held by the estate of which defendant was an executor was given by William L. Daly. It is not shown that the defendant had anything to do with making the Aschenbach loan; the appraisal was made by a committee of which the defendant was not a member. It is not claimed that he had any actual knowledge of what property was covered by the Aschenbach mortgage, but it is sought to hold him on the theory that he was negligent in failing to discover that a mortgage given by Aschenbach was on the same property on which the estate held a prior mortgage given by Daly. As there was no similarity in the names of the two mortgagors, he can only be held in case we are prepared to say that he ought to have examined the description in the Aschenbach mortgage and recalled that it was the same description as in the Daly mortgage.

Cases might arise where a director of a building and loan association should be held even to so stringent a liability. It would depend on the circumstances of each case. Here the defendant as executor held many mortgages; in the course of his business he examined many properties; the description in the Aschenbach mortgage contained nothing to excite attention; it must have differed little from the description of adjoining lots; the defendant knew his mortgages by street numbers and not by numbers on a land company map. The name of the mortgagor was different. Above all that, the Aschenbach mortgage was accompanied by a regular abstract of title in which the Daly mortgage was not mentioned, and a certificate by the complainant's solicitor, then a lawyer in good standing, that the Aschenbach mortgage was a first and valid lien. We think that the most that could be required of defendant by way of care, upon an examination of the affairs of the association would be to ascertain that the usual papers, bond, mortgage, insurance policy, and abstract were in hand, and that the solicitor had certified, as he had. In most cases this would be more satisfactory even than an actual reading of the mortgage.

But even if the defendant could

Building and loan association—duty of director in

be found guilty of negligence in this respect, there would still remain an insuperable difficulty in the complainant's way. It is not claimed that the defendant should have been present when the mortgage was executed and the money paid. As business is done, that would be obviously impracticable. The directors had the right to pursue the usual business custom and trust the solicitor to close the loan and record the mortgage; in fact, such were the solicitor's duties under the by-laws. He alone could properly attend to paying off prior encumbrances and making sure that complainant's mortgage was a first lien. The loss did not come until the solicitor turned aside the money from its proper destination,—the satisfaction of the first mortgage,—and either wrongfully paid it to Aschenbach or embezzled it himself.

When the money was thus turned aside, the association had already suffered the loss without the defendant having had any opportunity to prevent it. He might, indeed, have subsequently made an examination and discovered that the mortgage was not a first lien, but there is nothing in the case to show that this discovery could have made it possible for the complainant to prevent the loss. The solicitor could hardly have been solvent; his dishonesty speaks loud to the contrary; at any rate, in the absence of evidence, we cannot find that he was solvent.

As to Aschenbach, no suggestion is made that recovery could ever have been had of him. If it could, complainant ought not to seek it of defendant. The result is that if we could find negligence on the part of the defendant, it necessarily came too late to be the cause of complainant's loss, and the decree below was wrong. This is not a punitive proceeding, but an attempt to recover actual damages caused by defendant's negligence.

The facts as to the Sims South

Orange property are somewhat more complicated. The property belonged, in 1909, to Roland D. Crocker, who was the solicitor of the complainant. He conveyed to Mabel Daly, by deed dated October 1, acknowledged October 11, and recorded October 19, 1909. Mabel Daly and her husband, William H. Daly, mortgaged to the defendant and his coexecutor October 11, 1909, by a mortgage dated and acknowledged on that day and recorded October 21, 1909. The property was then reconveyed by the Dalys to Crocker by a deed dated October 11, acknowledged November 19, and recorded November 20, 1909, and the title remained in Crocker until as late as April 1, 1913, when he conveyed it to Sims. On October 10, 1912, Louis Wagner applied to the complainant for a loan on this property, which then belonged to Crocker, subject to the defendant's mortgage. The defendant and two others were appointed a committee to appraise the property. The defendant alone did so. Thereupon the directors ordered that the committee be continued, and report to the officers who were given power to grant the loan if a satisfactory report was made; and later, the officers were empowered to grant such amount as should be unanimously recommended by the committee. The defendant never formally joined with his fellow committeemen in recommending a loan. Wagner never owned the property; and proceedings for a loan to him were dropped. It seems probable that both Wagner and Sims were merely tools of Crocker. On April 25, 1913, the complainant's minutes recite that Wagner had sold the property to Sims (which was untrue), that all of the committee (including the defendant) reported in favor of a loan to Sims (which was untrue, as far as the defendant is concerned); it was then ordered that the committee's recommendation be received and granted. The defendant was not present at this meeting. He never actually had to do with the loan to Sims. The effort is to bind him by the acts of the others, because at a later meeting on May 23, at which he is said to have been present, the minutes of the meeting of April 25 are said to have been approved. The fact is doubtful, since the approval of May 23 seems on its face to relate to a special meeting of April 30, and not to the regular meeting of April 25. The secretary, however, testifies that the approval of May 23 covers both the meetings, April 25 and April 30. The defendant denies that he ever heard the resolution of April 25 read. The point is of some importance, since it is all there is to show that the defendant knew anything about a Sims loan. In view of the defendant's denial, and the secretary's admission of the careless way in which the minutes were kept, we think the complainant has failed to sustain the burden of proof. This question, however, loses much of its importance in the view we take of the case. If we assume that the defendant knew that the Sims loan was to be on the same property as the abandoned Wagner loan, and that he ought to have recalled that the estate held a mortgage given by Daly on the same property, that would not charge him with knowledge that the Sims mortgage would be a second mortgage. The amount proposed to be loaned was $1,500 more than the mortgage held by him and his coexecutor. He had the right to assume that his mortgage would be paid out of the money loaned by the association on the new mortgage. He must assume that, if he believed that Crocker, the solicitor, was an honest man; the complainant itself so held Crocker out by making him its solicitor. If we assume that the defendant knew all the facts that the most careful investigation would have disclosed, he knew that, although the loan had been authorized in April, the check had not been cashed until July 10. Up to that time he certainly might anticipate that his mortgage would be paid, and it would serve no useful purpose, and would no doubt be regarded by his fellow directors as a foolish intrusion for him to inform them of the existence of a mortgage of which the law charged them with constructive notice. Their very proper answer to him would be: "Our solicitor will find the existing liens when he examines the title, and attend to their satisfaction."

The prior lien would have been satisfied in the ordinary course; but the complainant's solicitor, instead of taking the ordinary course, undertook to satisfy the record by a forged discharge. The defendant had no reason to anticipate the solicitor's crime. Until the check had actually been cashed, and sufficient time had elapsed for Crocker to pay off defendant's mortgage without his in fact doing so, the defendant might properly trust that the complainant's own solicitor would protect his client's interests. A delay of three months is not unusual when prior liens have to be satisfied. When the check was cashed and the money misappropriated, the loss was already incurred, as in the case of the Aschenbach mortgage. Nothing that the defendant could do would save the complainant from the loss. If there had been proof that by prompt action the money could have been saved, the case would be different; the failure to take prompt action might be negligence of the defendant, intervening between Crocker's act and the final loss to complainant. In that event, the failure to act promptly might well be the proximate cause; but in the absence of such evidence, the proximate cause is the rascality of the complainant's own solicitor.

The decree must be reversed and the record remitted in order that there may be a decree dismissing the bill. The defendant is entitled to costs in both courts.

ANNOTATION.

Duty of director to disclose existence of lien or claim against property on which corporation or association lends money.

A search has brought to light no decision other than that in the reported case (FOUR CORNERS BLDG. & L. ASSO. v. SCHWARZWAELEDER, ante, 1053), on the question of the duty of a director to disclose the existence of a lien or claim against the property on which the corporation or association of which he is a director lends money.

In that case it appeared that the plaintiff association sought to hold the defendant, one of its directors, on the theory that he was negligent in failing to discover that a mortgage given to secure a loan by the association was on the same property on which an estate, of which the defendant was an executor, held a prior mortgage. It appeared that the defendant as executor held many mortgages; that the description in the mortgage in question contained nothing to excite attention; that the defendant knew his mortgages by street numbers, and not by numbers on a land company's map; and that the name of the mortgagor was different. In addition, the mortgage in question was accompanied by a regular abstract of title in which the mortgage to the estate was not mentioned, and a certificate by the complainant association's solicitor, then a lawyer in good standing, that the mortgage in question was a first and valid lien. The court holds that the most that could be required of a director by way of care, on an examination of the affairs of a building and loan association and in making a loan on property, would be to ascertain that the usual papers,—bond, mortgage, insurance policy, and abstract,—were in hand, and that the association's solicitor had certified that the loan was a first and valid lien; that the directors had the right to pursue the usual course of business, and trust the solicitor to close the loan and record the mortgage; and that as the loss did not come until the solicitor turned aside the money from its proper destination, the loss had already occurred without the director having had any opportunity to prevent it. It further appeared that an application was made for a loan on another piece of property, on which the defendant as executor also held a mortgage, and he examined the property as one of a committee appointed to appraise it. This application was dropped; but, subsequently, the minutes of the association recited that the person making the application had sold the property to another (which was untrue), and that all of the committee had reported in favor of a loan to the purchaser (which was untrue so far as the defendant was concerned, he not having been present at the meeting). The court holds that, assuming that the defendant knew that this loan was to be on the same property as the abandoned loan, and that he ought to have recalled that the estate held a mortgage on the same property, this would not charge him with knowledge that this loan would be a second mortgage. The amount being greater than that of the mortgage held by him and his coexecutor, he had the right to assume that his mortgage would be paid out of the money loaned by the association on the new mortgage. Also, the court says that, since the check for the amount was not cashed until practically three months later, up to that time he certainly might anticipate that his mortgage would be paid, and that it would have been useless, and probably would have been regarded as a foolish intrusion, for him to have informed his fellow directors of the existence of a mortgage of which the law charged them with constructive notice, and that, when the check had been cashed and the money misappropriated, the loss had already been incurred.

The decision in Toledo Sav. Bank v. Johnston (1895) 94 Iowa, 212, 62 N. W. 748, is of interest in this connection, as passing on the duty of a director to advise his associates of claims against a firm to which they were lending money. In this case it appeared that the defendant had for many years been a director of the plaintiff bank, and a member of its investment committee, it being his duty, as such, to examine the loans made by the bank, and report to the other directors on the propriety and safety thereof. While acting in this capacity, he sold a general stock of merchandise owned by him to a firm composed of his brother and another, wholly on time, the firm executing its notes to the defendant for the purchase price, which was secured by a mortgage on the entire stock of goods, and all additions thereto. This chattel mortgage was never recorded, nor its existence disclosed to others. Subsequently, a new firm was organized, composed of the defendant's two brothers, but which was never responsible for its debts. This firm made large overdrafts on the bank from time to time, which were merged into notes, often renewed, and, at the time it quit doing business, was indebted to the plaintiff bank in the sum of more than $4,500. The defendant was aware at all times of these transactions with the bank, and frequently, in his official capacity as director and member of the committee aforesaid, approved of the loans made; but he never at any time disclosed to the bank, or to any of its officers, the fact that the firm was indebted to him for the full value of their stock, or that he held a mortgage thereon to secure the purchase price. On the contrary, he allowed the firm to appear to the bank and its officers as solvent and responsible, by reason of being apparently full and absolute owners of the stock of merchandise, free and clear of all liens. Later, the defendant took a new mortgage on the stock of goods to secure the purchase price thereof, but this he withheld from the record, and concealed from the bank, but, learning that suit was to be commenced by the bank to collect the amount owing it from the firm, the defendant placed his chattel mortgage on record the day before it was instituted, and afterward, by virtue of an arrangement between himself and his brothers, took the whole stock in satisfaction of his claim, and delivered up and canceled the notes he held against the firm. The bank attached the stock of goods, caused it to be sold as perishable property, and applied the proceeds, less costs, on its claim against the firm, there still remaining due the bank, after making this credit, the sum of about $1,300. The court affirmed a decree declaring that the stock of goods was subject to the bank's attachment; that the defendant's chattel mortgage was fraudulent and void, as against it; that the defendant was enjoined from asserting his mortgage against plaintiff, or from bringing an action at law against it,—also granting an accounting and a personal judgment against the defendant for the balance due it from the firm, which it alleged it had lost through the negligence, fraud, and breach of duty and of trust of the defendant. The court said: "But little is said in argument upon the real merits of the case. Indeed, we doubt if much could be said in justification of defendant's conduct. He, as a director in the plaintiff bank and as a member of its investment committee, was in duty bound to exercise the most scrupulous good faith and perfect honesty, and at least the same degree of care and prudence which is generally exercised by business men in the management of their own affairs. By voluntarily assuming these relations, he invited confidence, assumed to possess the requisite skill and knowledge needed in the conduct of the business, and impliedly represented that he would bring them to bear in the discharge of his duties. He, among others, invited depositors to confide to it their savings, and undertook to carefully, prudently, and honestly loan them in such manner that they would not be lost. It was his duty, as a member of the investment committee, to advise his associates of any and every thing known to him affecting the financial condition and situation of proposed borrowers, and this without being asked. He impliedly contracted to give this information. That he did not do so he concedes, and his excuse is, first, that he was not asked about the financial condition of W. S. Johnston & Company, and, second, that the officers of the bank knew of the condition of the firm, or that he was justified in believing they did know. The first is no excuse whatever. Defendant owed an active duty to the bank, its stockholders, and depositors, which he did not discharge, and cannot shield himself by saying no one asked for the information he possessed. The second is not sustained by the evidence. The other officers did not know of the exact financial condition of the firm. They had the right to assume, as there were no encumbrances of record against the stock owned by the firm of Johnston & Company, that the goods were clear, and that the bank stood on an equal footing with other creditors. They had the right, also, to assume that none of their own directory would attempt to enforce his private claims upon the stock, to the prejudice of the bank and its interests. It may be that these officers, or some of them, knew that the firm did not have much money when it commenced business, but they did not know that it owed one of the directors for the entire stock. They did not know that but little, if any, of this indebtedness to defendant had been paid; and they had the right to assume that, if the firm was not doing a successful business, defendant would inform them of this fact. They might reasonably assume, had they known of this indebtedness to defendant for the stock, that it was being extinguished from time to time, and could rely upon defendant's informing them if such were not the fact. We think the decree in this case is a just and equitable one."

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Imperial County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Eshleman & Swing for appellants.

Messrs. U. F. Lewis and Conkling & Brown, for respondent:

Punctuation is no part of the English language.

Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. 47 L.R.A. 308, 39 C. C. A. 45, 98 Fed. 240.

The contract is to be interpreted against the promisor.

Lennon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage securing a promissory note in words and figures as follows:

$7,200.

In instalments, for value received, we, or either of us, promise to pay to W. K. Stoddart, or order, the sum of seventy-two hundred dollars ($7,200), payable as follows: The sum of $1,000 on or before October 27, 1912, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable at maturity; the sum of $2,000 on or before one year; the sum of $2,000 on or before two years; the sum of $2,200 on or before three years, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually. Should the interest not be so paid it shall become a part of the principal and thereafter bear like interest as the principal. Should default be made in the payment of any instalment of interest when due, or in any instalment of the principal when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States of the present standard. This note is secured by mortgage of even date.

John Golden.

Anna Golden.

The appeal is from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and comes here on the judgment roll alone. The court in its judgment allowed interest on the entire sum, which is assigned as error. It is contended by counsel for appellants that the second and third instalments mentioned in said note were not to bear any interest. Respondent contends that each of said instalments bears interest from the date of the note at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

Although the note is awkwardly drawn, its sense in all respects is easy to determine. It is divided into four instalments, the first one being for $1,000, which fell due within a period of six months from the date of the note, and the interest at 7 per cent per annum is provided to be paid at the maturity of this instalment, which makes it apparent why interest was mentioned in connection with this instalment separately. The three other instalments, payable in one, two, or three years, naturally group themselves as the part of the loan for which interest was to be paid at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually. If, instead of the semicolons used in the note, commas had been used, we think there could not have been a suggestion that any of the instalments were to run without interest, or, if the first semicolon had been used, and, in place of the second and third semicolons, commas, then we think no suggestion of the kind could be made. Aside from the mere matter of punctuation, there is not a circumstance suggested why the second and third instalments should not bear interest. Punctuation, at best a most fallible guide, is always subordinate to the text, and is never allowed to control its meaning. Contract—construction—punctuation. Contract—construction—choice. Interest—construction of note—when payable. Costs—allowance of damages—frivolous appeal. Phenix Ins. Co. 47 L.R.A. 308, 39 C. C. A. 45, 98 Fed. 240. It would be doing violence to accepted rules of construction to uphold the contention that the parties by their agreement manifestly intended to exclude the instalments in question from the payment of interest, and intended that only the first and fourth instalments should bear interest.

A principle of construction well settled is that where one construction would make a contract unusual and extraordinary, and another construction, equally consistent with the language employed, would make it reasonable, fair, and just, the latter construction must prevail. Stein v. Archibald, 151 Cal. 220, 90 Pac. 536.

The appeal is frivolous to the point of precluding the possibility of its having been taken in good faith, or for any purpose save to delay the satisfaction of the judgment, and therefore, in addition to affirming the judgment, it is ordered that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendants the sum of $100 damages because of the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: Wilbur, J.; Melvin, J.

I. Introductory.

The present note includes the effect of punctuation on the construction of contracts and deeds. Standard forms being required by statute, the effect of punctuation on the construction of insurance policies has been excluded, excepting in those cases where no resort was had in the decision to the statute standardizing the policy.

II. Punctuation as controlling construction.

Punctuation or the absence of punctuation in a contract or deed is ineffective to control its construction, as against the plain meaning of the language of the instrument.

Thus, in Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (Fed.) supra, it was said: "Punctuation is no part of the English language. The Supreme Court says that it 'is a most fallible guide by which to interpret a writing.' Ewing v. Burnet (1837) 11 Pet. (U. S.) 41, 54, 9 L. ed. 624, 630. The Century Dictionary tells us, what is common knowledge, that 'there is still much uncertainty and arbitrariness in punctuation.' It is always subordinate to the text, and is never allowed to control its meaning."

In Elsey v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Ind.) supra, it was said: "The rules of punctuation are not absolutely fixed and inflexible, and all persons do not follow such rules as are established."

In Abbott's Estate (Pa.) supra, the court said: "Punctuation is an uncertain aid in the interpretation of written instruments, and is to be resorted to only when other means fail."

In Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (Fed.) supra, it appeared that, in an action on an insurance policy, the insured contended that two members of a clause were merely separated by a comma, and that the clause, "unless other damages occur," related as well to the first member of the clause as to the second. The clause was as follows: "This company will not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur from hail or lightning, directly or indirectly, or by the blowing of chimneys, loose clapboards, weather vanes, and shingles, unless other damage occur." The court held, however, that the words, not the punctuation, were the controlling feature of the construction of a contract, saying: "But it is said that in the policy the two members of this clause are divided by a comma only, and stress is laid upon this fact. But in a contract the words, and not the punctuation, are the controlling guide in its construction."

In Wilson v. Wilson (1915) 268 Ill. 270, 109 N. E. 36, it appeared that in a deed the following clause was used: "But if said John Wilson and Julia Wilson, his wife, should die intestate (with no children), the above," etc.

The scrivener who drew up the deed testified that he understood that the words, "intestate" and "with no children," were synonymous, and that was why the words, "with no children," were parenthesized. The court held, however, that punctuation was ineffectual to change the apparent meaning of the instrument, saying: "The punctuation in this instrument will not be permitted to change the meaning, if, reading the instrument altogether, the meaning is clear."

In Osborn v. Farwell (1877) 87 Ill. 89, 29 Am. Rep. 47, the following paragraph in a lease was under construction: "If said Darling shall be required by the United States government to leave and vacate said premises before the termination of this lease, a proportionate allowance of rent shall be made to said Darling by said Farwell for the time his occupancy of said premises shall be abridged from such cause. And in case said premises shall be destroyed by fire, so as to be rendered untenable, a proportionate allowance of rent shall be made to said Darling by said Farwell for the time said premises shall thus remain untenable; and such allowance may be paid by said Farwell in said lands in Dunklin county, at the same price paid by Farwell, . . . at the election of said Farwell." The owner of the building claimed that he could make a payment in land for the abridgment of the term, while the lessee claimed payment in cash. The court held that, notwithstanding the period at the end of the sentence, "If said Darling, etc. . . . shall be abridged from such cause," the landlord was to make the payment, at his election, in land. The court said: "Punctuation in written contracts may sometimes shed light upon the meaning of the parties, but it must never be allowed to overturn what seems the plain meaning of the whole contract."

In Elsey v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1915) — Ind. —, 109 N. E. 413, the action was instituted on an insurance policy which contained the following clause: "Article 6. Any one of the following, namely—sunstroke, freezing, hydrophobia, asphyxiation — suffered through accidental means (excluding suicide, sane or insane, or any attempt thereat, sane or insane), shall be deemed a bodily injury within the meaning of this policy." The question became material whether the clause, "suffered through accidental means," qualified the word "sunstroke." In arriving at the conclusion that the clause did qualify the word, the court said that, while the punctuation of a contract should be considered in the construction thereof, still it should not be a controlling element.

In Spicer v. Spicer (1917) 177 Ky. 400, 197 S. W. 959, an action for the interpretation of a deed, the court said that, although the deed was almost wholly lacking in punctuation, still the meaning was reasonably clear.

In People's Nat. Bank v. Nickerson (1911) 108 Me. 341, 80 Atl. 849, a sheriff's deed was under construction. The court stated the facts and its conclusion as follows: "The language of the deed, so far as necessary to quote it, is: 'Having given notice in writing of the time and place of sale to the judgment debtors in the execution hereinafter mentioned and having given public notice of the time and place of sale by posting up notifications thereof in a public place in the town of Pittsfield, and also by posting up notices thereof in one public place in each of the adjoining towns of Palmyra and Detroit thirty days before the time of sale.' The defendant urges that the words, 'thirty days,' are applicable only to the notices posted in adjoining towns, and not to the notice given to the debtors. We think a fair construction requires that the words should be applied to all the notices. It was obviously so meant, and it should be so read. The comma after the word 'Pittsfield' raises the only doubt. But punctuation, or the want of it, is not decisive in the construction of an instrument, or a statute even, if the meaning is clear."

In Olivet v. Whitworth (1896) 82 Md. 258, 33 Atl. 723, an action to determine whether the heirs of the testatrix or her husband were entitled to a trust fund, the court said, in construing a trust deed: "That punctuation alone is not necessarily conclusive must be conceded, as it is well known that draftsmen of legal instruments frequently ignore all the rules on that subject, to which grammarians and rhetoricians attach great importance. The most learned and accomplished lawyers oftentimes pay but little attention to it in their preparation of legal documents. This may be because the copyist or the writer to whom the paper is dictated has not followed the directions or intonations of the author, or it may be because it is known that the cases are few that are determined by punctuation, or for other reasons. But when there is an ambiguity which may be wholly or partially solved by it, provided the punctuation itself has not created the ambiguity, it can be considered (Weatherly v. Mister (1874) 39 Md. 629; Black v. Herring (1894) 79 Md. 149, 28 Atl. 1063), but it can never be permitted to overturn what seems the plain meaning of the whole instrument."

In Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church (1877) 37 Mich. 264, an action of ejectment, the construction of a trust deed became material. After granting, bargaining, selling, conveying, and describing the land, the grantor provided as follows: "Together with the appurtenances; and does also bargain, sell, assign, and transfer to said trustees and the survivors or survivor, or successors of them as such trustees, all my household goods and personal property of any and every kind, to have, hold, use, and enjoy the same, and lease or dispose of the same, or cause the same to be used, and to receive the rents, profits, and income thereof, and to use or dispose of the same on trust, and for the uses and purposes following." The question arose whether the clause, "to receive the rents, profits, and income thereof," related to the personalty only or to both the personalty and the realty. Holding that the clause related to both realty and personalty, the court said: "Had the punctuation in this deed been different, and the words, 'to have, hold, use,' etc., been introduced as the commencement of a new sentence, no reasonable doubt could have existed as to its being applicable to the different kinds of property which preceded it. It is laid down as a rule in reading and construing deeds that no regard is had to punctuation, since no estate ought to depend upon the insertion or omission of a comma or semicolon. And although stops are sometimes used, they are not regarded in the construction or meaning of the instrument."

In Rice v. Lincoln & N. W. R. Co. (1911) 88 Neb. 307, 129 N. W. 425, wherein the construction of an option contract was involved, the court said: "The second proposition of defendant on this point, that the contract should be construed to limit the exercise of the option to the time of the construction of the road, we think is right. 'We further agree that said company may proceed in the construction of said road over said land, and we will sell to the said railroad company such additional right of way as they may require at the rate of $60 per acre, with the privilege of changing any watercourse necessary in the construction of said road.' By the first paragraph of the contract plaintiff agreed to convey 'the right of way for the railroad of said company.' The company was to 'proceed with the construction of said road over said land,' and might need for that purpose 'additional right of way.' The evidence shows that orchard, farm buildings, and other valuable improvements are located so near to the right of way that, if this contract should be construed to mean that after the road was completed the company might take such part of the farm as it saw fit, it would be too unconscionable to be enforced in a court of equity. Punctuation marks in a contract will not be allowed, in a court of equity, to give the contract an unconscionable and inequitable meaning. If this contract were written with the clause, 'with the privilege of changing any watercourse necessary,' in parentheses, it would perhaps be patent to all that the words following, 'in the construction of said road,' limit the words, 'as they may require.' The agreement is that, if the company should require 'additional right of way . . . in the construction of said road,' plaintiff shall convey it and be paid therefor at $60 per acre. The exercise of the option, then, was limited to the two years in which the construction was to be completed, and the rule against perpetuities is not violated."

In Bunn v. Wells (1886) 94 N. C. 67, it appeared that in a deed the habendum was separated from the clause of warranty by a semicolon. The court held that the use of the semicolon had no effect upon the construction of the deed, saying: "Some importance may be attached to the fact that the habendum in the deed for our construction is separated from the clause of warranty by a semicolon, but that can have no effect in controlling the construction, for it is a rule in reading and construing deeds 'that no regard is had to punctuation, since no estate ought to depend upon the insertion or omission of a comma or semicolon, and, although stops are sometimes used, they are not regarded in the construction or meaning of the instrument.' 3 Washb. Real. Prop. 343, and cases cited in the note."

In White v. Smith (1859) 33 Pa. 186, 75 Am. Dec. 589, the action was on the following contract of guaranty: "I hereby bind myself to the aforesaid White for the true and faithful performance of the aforesaid agreement on the part of the aforesaid Smith in case Smith should die within the three years I agree to pay up to that time and deliver the property to White as above stated. Jonathan Smith Elijah Robinson." It was contended that, in order to give every part of the writing its meaning, a period should be placed after "aforesaid Smith" and before "in." The court said: "The want of proper punctuation is, if objectionable at all, no more allowable in vitiating the contract, or in destroying its effect, than bad grammar, the rule against which is a maxim of the law. To allow the contractor to punctuate in mitiori sensu of his own words would be something of a novelty. I think no case can be found upon which the sense of a contract has depended upon the absence of punctuation marks—words are the most usual evidence of intent, and, formed into sentences, are to be taken to express the meaning of the party using them. Punctuation may aid in ascertaining the true reading of a production, but the production may be read and interpreted without such aids."

In Abbott's Estate (1901) 198 Pa. 493, 48 Atl. 435, a claim was presented against the estate of a decedent for a balance due for a bond and mortgage. The bond contained the following provision: "It is hereby agreed that any judgment entered by virtue of this bond shall be restricted in its lien operation and effect to the premises described in a certain mortgage bearing even date herewith, given by said obligors to the obligee." The claimants contended that as there was no comma after the word "lien" it should be considered as an adjective qualifying the nouns, "operation" and "effect," and that the restriction in the bond of the judgment was in its operation and effect as a lien only. The court held, however, that punctuation could not be resorted to to give words an unusual meaning.

In Skamania Boom Co. v. Youmans (1911) 64 Wash. 94, 116 Pac. 645, it appeared that in a deed of conveyance the following reservation was made: "All the timber on the above-described premises, and the right to enter into and upon the same for the purpose of removing said timber, and the construction and maintenance of a logging road thereon forever." Through several mesne conveyances the defendants became the owners of the land, and cut some of the timber thereon. In an action for damages the defendants contended that the word "forever" merely applied to the maintenance of the logging road, while the plaintiff contended that it applied to the timber as well as the road. The court held that punctuation was of little aid in construing a deed, saying: "The appellants first contend that the word 'forever' in the reservation clause in the first deed refers only to the construction and maintenance of the logging road, and that the respondent had only a reasonable time in which to remove the timber; whilst the respondent insists that the word 'forever' has reference to both the right to remove the timber and to construct and maintain a logging road. The appellants argue that the punctuation in the reservation clause compels a construction in their favor. The original deed is not before us, but assuming that the certified copy carries the punctuation of the original deed, we do not think that the reservation clause is susceptible of the construction contended for by the appellants. It is elementary that a deed, like any other written instrument, will be read as an entirety for the purpose of determining its true meaning. The punctuation of an instrument is ordinarily of little aid in construing it. As was said in Ewing v. Burnet (1837) 11 Pet. (U. S.) 41, 9 L. ed. 624. 'Punctuation is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing; it may be resorted to, when all other means fail; but the court will first take the instrument by its four corners in order to ascertain its true meaning; if that is apparent on judicially inspecting the whole, the punctuation will not be suffered to change it.'"

But in Aylwin v. Robertson (1904) 7 Terr. L. R. (Can.) 164, an action to recover possession of premises leased for a certain term of years, under a lease also containing a provision fixing the rental to be paid should the lessee continue in possession after the expiration of the term, it appeared that a notice of three months to quit the premises was required by the lease. The notice was given a few months after the lessee was let into possession. The question became material whether the provision requiring a three-months' notice related to the provision for the term of years, or to the provision after the term of years. It was held that in construing an instrument inter partes punctuation could be relied on. It was said: "In view of the peculiar ground stated for not relying on the punctuation of an act of Parliament, I infer that if it had been the practice to punctuate the act on the roll that such punctuation might have been relied on, and in the absence of any authority to the contrary I have come to the conclusion that the punctuation may be relied on in construing a deed or agreement or any other instrument inter partes, and when one considers what an entirely different meaning may, in many instances, be given to a sentence by punctuation, I see no reason why parties to any such document might not choose to make their intention clear by punctuation. At the same time I concede that in view of the careless manner in which deeds and agreements are punctuated, even by the most careful conveyancers, if punctuated at all, the courts should be very careful indeed, and in many cases scrutinize the document very carefully and examine it from other standpoints before they give effect to the punctuation. In the case of the clause in the lease in question the punctuation is peculiar and somewhat marked. The whole clause has only two punctuation marks in it, one a comma at the end of the word 'agree,' and the other a semicolon after the word 'specified,' that is, between the provision for the month to month tenancy and that for the notice terminating the possession."

While punctuation is ineffective as against the plain meaning of the language used by the parties to a contract, still the rules of punctuation may be used to assist in determining the intent of the parties. Joy v. St. Louis (1890) 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243, affirming (1886) 9 Fed. 546; Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1899) 47 L.R.A. 308, 39 C. C. A. 5, 98 Fed. 240; Allen v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (1915) 269 U. S. 234, 109 N. E. 1035; Olivet v. Whitworth (1896) 82 Md. 258, 33 Atl. 723; White v. Smith (1859) 33 Pa. 186, 75 Pa. Dec. 589; Johnson v. McCoy (1911) 112 Va. 580, 72 S. E. 123.

In Olivet v. Whitworth (1896) 82

Md. 258, 33 Atl. 723, it was said: "Although punctuation alone is not a safe standard by which to interpret a writing, yet if there be an ambiguity it may shed light on the meaning of the language to be interpreted, and in this case we must ignore it if we adopt the construction contended for on behalf of the appellees."

In Joy v. St. Louis (1890) 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243, affirming (1886) 29 Fed. 546, on construing a doubtful clause in a tripartite agreement whereby three railway companies entered into an agreement for the use of a right of way, the court gave effect to a comma, saying: "I know that the matter of punctuation is never relied upon to defeat the obvious intent; but when the meaning is doubtful, the punctuation is certainly a matter tending to throw light upon it."

So, it was said in Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (1899) 47 L.R.A. 308, 39 C. C. A. 45, 98 Fed. 240: "The court will take the contract by its four corners, and determine its meaning from its language, and, having ascertained from the arrangement of its words what its meaning is, will construe it accordingly, without regard to the punctuation marks, or the want of them. The sense of a contract is gathered from its words and their relation to each other, and after that has been done, punctuation may be used to more readily point out the divisions in the sentences and parts of sentences. But the words control the punctuation marks, and not the punctuation marks the words. If there was not a punctuation mark in this whole clause, its meaning would be plain, and whether a comma or a semicolon is placed between the two members of the sentence, the two members are there, separate and distinct, as a result of the obvious meaning of the words and their arrangement. The comma and semicolon are both used for the same purpose, namely, to divide the sentences and parts of sentences, the only difference being that the semicolon makes the division a little more pronounced than the comma; but at the last it is the sense of the words, taken together, that dictates where the punctuation marks are to be placed, and what they shall be."

In Allen v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (1915) 269 Ill. 234, 109 N. E. 1035, affirming (1915) 193 Ill. App. 193, it appeared in an action against a guaranty company on an indemnity bond in favor of the sureties of a county treasurer, the sureties contended that the clause, "amounting to larceny or embezzlement," qualified only the word "dishonesty" in the clause which provided that the defendant company should "pay and reimburse the obligees aforesaid all costs, losses, damages, and expenses which they may sustain or suffer by reason of any act of fraud or dishonesty, amounting to larceny or embezzlement on the part of said David Hamilton Lyons, in connection with the duties of his said office, and which shall have been committed during the period from December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1903." The court, in holding that the punctuation supported the construction of the defendant, said that punctuation in the construction of a contract was not controlling, but it could be used to shed light on the meaning of the parties.

IV. Insertion of punctuation.

In order to effectuate the intent of the parties the courts will insert the necessary punctuation. English v. McNair (1859) 34 Ala. 40; Seay v. McCormick (1881) 68 Ala. 549; Burgess v. Badger (1888) 124 Ill. 288, 14 N. E. 850; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. American Bonding Co. (1911) 31 Okla. 669, 122 Pac. 142; Doe ex dem. Willis v. Martin (1790) 4 T. R. 65, 100 Eng. Reprint, 882.

In Seay v. McCormick (1881) 68 Ala. 549, it appeared that a mortgage was made conveying "my entire crop of corn cotton seed fodder peas potatoes and cane that I may make the present year on my place," no punctuation marks being used. The mortgagor sold a bale of cotton for which the mortgagee brought trover. Holding that the mortgage covered cotton as well as cottonseed, the court said:

"So, likewise, the instrument being artificially drafted and without any points or marks of punctuation, as appears from an inspection of the original, the rules of proper construction authorize these to be supplied by the court so as best to effectuate the intention of the parties."

In English v. McNair (1859) 34 Ala. 40, an action of detinue was instituted to recover certain slaves and other personal property. It became material to construe a written instrument, the essential portion of which was as follows: "Said property to be used and employed by us for our sole use and benefit, but nevertheless to be held subject to her order, and to be returned whenever she may make demand of us until the day of final settlement of said estate without recourse to said property being rendered necessary in order to pay off the debts and claims against said estate, and when the rights of said M. M. George as sole heir to said estate shall accrue to her, she will substitute for this instrument such other conveyance as she may deem proper." The court inserted the necessary punctuation as a matter of course, saying: "There is some obscurity in the instrument of writing given by English and wife to Mrs. George. The obscurity is increased by the want of punctuation, the omission of capitals, and the probable want of words intended to be inserted. After a careful examination of it, and endeavoring to so punctuate and construe it as to allow effect to all the words, and to secure consistency among them, we understand it as constituting a bailment by the latter, as administratrix, to the former, and determinable upon the demand of Mrs. George at any time before the final settlement of the estate. We understand it also to contain an agreement that, if recourse to the property for the payment of claims against the estate should not be necessary, Mrs. George would, when her right as sole heir to the estate accrued to her, substitute for that instrument such other conveyance as she might deem proper. It also contains a clause giving to Mrs. George's coadministrator, A. W.

Spaight, in the event of her death before a final settlement, all the rights of Mrs. George under the instrument for the purpose of making a final settlement, provided that English and wife should not be liable for the non-appearance of the property, if detained by death or accident. The correctness of our construction will be apparent to anyone who will look at the instrument and regard a period as inserted after the words, 'until the day of final settlement of said estate,' and the succeeding words, 'without recourse,' etc., as commencing a new sentence, and the initial 'w' as a capital."

In Burgess v. Badger (1888) 124 Ill. 288, 14 N. E. 850, it appeared that a contract was entered into between certain creditors of a bankrupt for the purpose of protecting the estate of the bankrupt against certain claims, and also for collecting the claims of creditors against his estate, which was worded and punctuated as follows: "Whereas for want of an agreement in writing, there may be some misunderstanding as to the contract existing between Joseph N. Barker, William T. Burgess and A. C. Badger in regard to prosecuting certain suits in the interest of the estate of S. J. Walker in bankruptcy, this memorandum is made for the purpose of putting said agreement in writing as follows: The suits prosecuted under this contract are: The International Bank v. R. E. Jenkins, assignee Aug. Bauer v. Same; R. E. Jenkins assignee v. Union Trust Co., Greenbaum & Foreman et al., and cross suit; Eli Kinney v. Bauer et al., and the agreement is that of whatever fees may be realized either under contracts with creditors of Sam'l J. Walker or from R. E. Jenkins assignee out of the funds received by said estate from or by reason of said suits, J. N. Barker is to receive one fourth; W. T. Burgess one fourth and A. C. Badger one fourth; A. C. Badger retaining the remaining one fourth as a compensation for the raising of money which was necessary to carry the suits to the higher courts. Jan'y 15, 1881. Joseph N. Barker, W. T. Burgess, A. C. Badger." In regard to the punctuation the court held that punctuation would be inserted so as to give the agreement a reasonable rather than an unreasonable meaning. It was said: "Burgess admits that, punctuating the language of the operative part of the instrument one way, it will include secured as well as unsecured creditors. Since, therefore, the language, as the instrument was written, was not punctuated at all, it would seem plainly to be required to be punctuated in this way so as to give a reasonable, rather than an unreasonable, construction, as thus: 'And the agreement is that of whatever fees may be realized either under contracts with creditors of Samuel J. Walker, or from R. E. Jenkins assignee out of the funds received by said estate from or by reason of said suits,' etc. The word 'creditors,' not being qualified, includes, of course, junior lienors, as well as unsecured creditors."

In United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. American Bonding Co. (1911) 31 Okla. 669, 122 Pac. 142, an action by a surety for contribution, the material provision of the bond was as follows: "Now, therefore, the condition of the above obligation is such that if the said Capitol National Bank shall promptly collect all drafts, checks, and certificates of deposit which may be delivered to said depository by the territorial treasurer for collection and if said Capitol National Bank shall at all times solely keep and have forthcoming when required all moneys of the territory of Oklahoma, so collected in said bank; and shall in all respects duly account for all moneys according to law and shall also pay all drafts or checks that may be issued to the territorial treasurer by said depository and shall in all respects conform to all of the provisions of a certain contract entered into upon the 6th day of March, 1903, by Cassius W. Rambo as treasurer of the territory of Oklahoma, party of the first part, for the period of one year, beginning on this 6th day of March, 1903, then this obligation to be null and void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect." To make clear the condition which was interpolated by the draftsman of the bond, the court inserted a parenthesis as follows: "and shall in all respects conform to all provisions of a contract entered into . . . , party of the first part." The court held that the use of parentheses was permissible to show the intent of the parties, saying: "This intent is made clear by inserting parentheses as we have done supra, by the use of which is indicated the part to be excluded from a sentence or to indicate an interpolation. Webster, Int. Dict. To give effect to the whole, or to make clear the intent, the use of parentheses is permissible. Speaking of an act of Parliament, Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., in Doe ex dem. Willis v. Martin (1790) 4 T. R. 39, at page 65, 100 Eng. Reprint, 882, said: 'By putting stops or using the parenthesis, as pointed out by the plaintiff's counsel, it becomes perfectly clear; and we know that no stops are ever inserted in acts of Parliament, or in deeds; but the courts of law, in construing them, must read them with such stops as will give effect to the whole.' We see no reason why the same rule should not apply in construing other written instruments, or that other proper punctuation marks may not be used where, as here, the meaning seems otherwise doubtful. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 20."

[ In Doe ex dem. Willis v. Martin (1790) 4 T. R. 65, 100 Eng. Reprint, 896, the court, in inserting punctuation in a marriage settlement under construction, said: "And that brings me to the next question, whether the children took estates for life or in fee, which arises on these words: 'And for want of such appointment, then to the use of all and every the child or children equally, share and share alike, to hold the same, if more than one, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if but one child, then to such only child, his or her heirs or assigns forever;' and the question is whether the words, 'his or her heirs,' may not with propriety, and ought not, considering the whole settlement and the manifest intention of the parties, to act as words of limitation on all the preceding words in the sentence? I cannot bring myself to doubt but that they may. By putting the stops, or using the parenthesis, as pointed out by the plaintiff's counsel, it becomes perfectly clear; and we know that no stops are ever inserted in acts of Parliament, or in deeds; but the courts of law, in construing them, must read them with such stops as will give effect to the whole: if then, we use the points suggested by the counsel, the clause will read thus: 'To the use of all and every the child or children equally, share and share alike, his or her heirs or assigns forever.'"

But in Lyles v. Lescher (1886) 108 Ind. 382, 9 N. E. 365, it appeared that the grantor of a tract of land in the deed of conveyance used the expression, ". . . to Anna Lyles and Isaac Lyles' heirs. . . ." The court held that while the contention of the present owners, that the just construction of the deed was that it should read to Anna Lyles and the heirs of Isaac Lyles, would require the insertion of a word and a punctuation mark which were not authorized by the language used, saying: "Appellee's counsel, assuming that if the deed is to the heirs of Anna and Isaac Lyles jointly it is void, contend that this is not a just construction, but that the proper construction is that it is a grant to Anna Lyles, and to the heirs of Isaac Lyles. This contention cannot prevail. The deed on its face purports to be, and is prima facie, a grant to the heirs of Anna Lyles and Isaac Lyles jointly.

. . . No other construction can be placed upon it. Looking alone to the words employed, without directly violating the plain and well-known rules of grammar. To make the deed properly and fully express what the appellees claim would require us to supply a punctuation mark and an additional word. This we cannot do on the basis furnished by the language of the deed alone. The remaining inquiry is whether the acts of the parties gave such a construction to the deed as should protect the title in the hands of bona fide purchasers. It appears that possession was held by Anna and Isaac Lyles during the life of the latter, that after his death it was held by Anna, and thenceforth by her immediate and remote grantees. It appears, also, that the grantor himself caused the deed to be placed on record. These acts, in our judgment, gave a construction to the deed which makes it effectual as a conveyance. As we have said, a change in the punctuation by adding a single mark, and one word, would make the deed mean exactly what the acts of the parties have construed it to mean, that is, that it divested the appellant of title, and we think their construction, as evidenced by their conduct, should prevail, at least as against intervening third parties. . . . Here a little insignificant change, nothing more, perhaps, than the rejection of the sign of the possessive case, would make this deed operate as the grantor, by his acts, certainly declared it should operate, and we ought not to sacrifice the substantial rights of purchasers to so small a matter. If we should do so, we would make the deed inoperative, defeat the rights of intervening purchasers, and disregard the acts of the grantor; but in upholding the deed we do him no injustice, for it is evident that he meant to divest himself of title, and we do no more than carry that intention, so plainly manifested by his acts, into effect, and give protection to rights acquired on the faith of his deed and his acts."

H. S. CHASE & COMPANY

v.

E. M. McCRAY, Appt.

(178 Iowa, 885, 160 N. W. 346.)

Landlord and tenant — reletting — release of tenant — reservation of obligation.

1. An agreement between a landlord and creditors of the tenant, who take possession of the leasehold by permission of the landlord, that the reletting shall not constitute a release of the obligations of those liable on the original lease, does not bind one who signs the lease with the lessee, but who was not present or represented when the agreement was made.

Trial — jury — termination of lease.

2. The jury must determine whether or not there was a reletting of premises abandoned by a tenant under evidence tending to show that the landlord surrendered the possession to creditors of the tenant who obligated themselves for payment of a monthly rental, and were not permitted to terminate the agreement except on thirty days' notice in writing.

Evidence — surrender of lease — alteration of premises.

3. Upon the question whether or not the landlord accepted the surrender of a lease by reletting the property, evidence is admissible that the new tenant altered the premises for the purpose of conducting a business different from that for which the premises were let.

— possession for benefit of tenant — notice.

4. Upon the question of acceptance of a surrender of a lease, evidence is admissible that the tenant did not receive notice that the landlord had taken possession for his benefit.

APPEAL by defendant McCray, from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due for certain business property. Reversed.

Statement by Preston, J.:

This is an action to recover rent alleged to be due for business property in the city of Des Moines. There was a trial to a jury. At the close of the testimony the court sustained plaintiff's motion to direct a verdict for $2,795.22. Judgment was rendered against defendant E. M. McCray for that amount, and he appeals.

Mr. Guy A. Miller, for appellant:

Where a tenant abandons leased property and the abandonment is accepted by the landlord, the obligations of each party under the lease cease and determine.

Kean v. Rogers, 146 Iowa, 559, 123 N. W. 754; 24 Cyc. 1372; MacKellar v. Sigler, 47 How. Pr. 20.

Evidence of the fact that the leased premises were rented to other parties and remodeled is material as bearing upon the question as to whether or not the abandonment of the tenant was accepted by the landlord.

Kean v. Rogers, supra; 24 Cyc. 1374; Meeker v. Spalsbury, 66 N. J. L. 60, 48 Atl. 1026; Buckingham Apartment House Co. v. Dafoe, 78 Minn. 268, 80 N. W. 974; *Gray v. (N.S.) 398, 92 Pac. 153, 14 Ann. Cas. 1086.

Where a landlord takes possession of leased premises abandoned by the lessee and rents them to another, he must notify the first tenant that the premises are rented for the tenant's benefit, or it will constitute an acceptance of the abandonment and put an end to the lease.

Upon abandonment by the tenant of leased premises, the landlord may give notice to the tenant of his refusal to accept a surrender and sublet the premises for the unexpired term for the benefit of the lessee to reduce his damages.

Messrs. Henry & Henry for appellee.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant E. M. McCray is the only one appearing and contesting the action, and he is the only one against whom judgment was entered. Plaintiff's petition was filed December 16, 1914, and alleges that defendants are indebted to it in the sum of about $2,700 on a lease of the premises for the period between the time the defendant and the Evans Company vacated the property and when it is claimed the plaintiff rented the same. The written lease was executed February 5, 1912, between H. S. Chase & Company, party of the first part, and the Evans Company and Louis J. Evans, John Evans, and E. M. McCray, parties of the second part. The lease is signed as follows: "H. S. Chase & Co., First Party, by H. S. Chase, Pres. The Evans Co., by Lou. Evans. Lou. Evans. John Evans. E. M. McCray."

The defendant E. M. McCray denies liability, alleging that after the premises were abandoned the landlord took possession of the same and leased them to other persons, and thereby released said defendant and accepted another tenant in his place; that this defendant surrendered the premises to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff accepted the surrender of the same, and permitted the same to be remodeled by a new tenant without the consent of this defendant, and therefore released him from any further obligation under the lease.

The Evans Company is a corporation, and E. M. McCray and the others were, at the time of the execution of the lease, members thereof. The lease was to run for a period of ten years and eight months from February 1, 1912, at a monthly rental of $275. The company began to conduct a restaurant therein. Some time thereafter defendant McCray sold out his interest in the company to John Evans, and ceased to be connected with the concern; some seven or eight months after that the company and John and Louis Evans ceased to operate the café, and closed the doors of the establishment, and, as defendant contends, abandoned the premises.

Appellant claims that alleged abandonment was about the 1st of January, 1914, but some of defendant's evidence at least tends to show that this was about the last of March or first of April, 1914. At any rate, a short time thereafter certain creditors of the Evans Company held a meeting, at which the plaintiff, one of the creditors of the Evans Company, was represented. The Evans Company and some of the others were also represented at this meeting by an attorney, but this defendant was not represented at any of the meetings of the creditors, and did not consent to anything that was done by the creditors with respect to the leased premises. The creditors decided to appoint from their number a committee of three for the purpose of reopening the restaurant and operating the same. The plaintiff, through its president, H. S. Chase, agreed with the creditors of the company that they might take possession of the premises and pay a monthly rental of $300, $275 per month being the rental charge to the creditors, for their use of the premises, and $25 per month to be applied upon the back rent of the Evans Company. This contract was in writing, but had been lost and was not produced at the trial. Under this agreement, the creditors of the Evans Company took possession, but the exact date is not disclosed, for the reason that the court refused to permit such testimony to be given. But the creditors commenced to pay rent on April 15, 1914, and continued to pay rent until October 15, 1914, thirty days prior to which last-mentioned date written notice was served upon plaintiff by the creditors of an intention to surrender the property on October 15, 1914.

Defendant claims that during the time the creditors had possession of the premises they remodeled them, making a cigar store out of the front part and a cafeteria out of the rear part of the room, one C. C. Taft paying rent for the front part of the store. But the court refused to allow defendant to prove some of these circumstances.

When the creditors surrendered the premises to plaintiff, October 15, 1914, plaintiff took possession of the same, and made an effort to rent it, took possession of the personal property in the front end of the store, and either sold or credited the same on the rent account. The property was rented again by plaintiff May 1, 1915, and no claim for any rent is made subsequent to that date.

The foregoing is the substance of appellant's statement of the facts, and is not disputed by appellee, except it claims that the creditors' agreement contained a provision that nothing therein should affect the rights of the landlord under the original lease. There is evidence to this effect. But the question is, or one question, whether defendant McCray is bound thereby, he not having been represented at the time the agreement was made.

The real question in the case, we take it, is whether or not there was an abandonment of the premises by the lessees and an acceptance by the plaintiff, the lessor. As stated, the trial court excluded some of the evidence offered by defendant, and, as we think, erroneously so, because the evidence excluded would have a bearing upon the question as to whether there was an abandonment and an acceptance thereof by plaintiff, and would tend to sustain defendant's contention. This matter will be referred to later in the opinion.

the evidence in detail, but state our conclusions that there was sufficient evidence to take the case to the jury on the questions above indicated. It is largely a question of fact whether there was a surrender and acceptance by plaintiff, or whether plaintiff took possession for the benefit of this defendant. We ought, perhaps, to refer to the testimony of the defendant as to the conversation this defendant testifies to with the president of the plaintiff company. He says: "I had a talk with H. S. Chase in the fall or winter of 1913 about my liability on this lease. It was before the company went out of business, about seven or eight months. The conversation was in Mr. Chase's store on Walnut street, and I told him that I wanted to be released from the lease, and asked him if I could get off of it. I told him I intended to sell out. He told me I didn't need to worry about it, or didn't need to be off, or something like that. He said he would be glad to have it himself in case it was possible to get, and that he would be glad to have the premises back. He said it was very cheap rent we were paying, and that he could probably rent for more than we were paying."

This evidence is not denied, although Chase was a witness. Whether this evidence alone was sufficient we do not determine. There are other circumstances in the case bearing upon the question as to whether there was a surrender of the premises to plaintiff, and an acceptance. As to the law, some of the cases relied upon are cited by both sides.

It is contended by appellee that where leased premises are abandoned by a tenant, the landlord has the right to take possession of the same for the protection of the tenant, and to attempt to relet the same for the benefit of the tenant, and such taking possession does not constitute a surrender of the lease by agreement of the parties or by operation of law. On the other hand, it is contended by appellant that where a tenant abandons leased property and the abandonment is accepted by the landlord, the obligations of each party under the lease cease and determine, and they cite, to sustain this, Kean v. Rogers, 146 Iowa, 559, 123 N. W. 754; 24 Cyc. 1372. And they say that the evidence of the fact that the leased premises were rented to other parties, and remodeled, is material as bearing upon the question as to whether or not the abandonment of the tenant was accepted by the landlord, citing the same cases and Higgins v. Street, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 398, and note (19 Okla. 45, 92 Pac. 153, 14 Ann. Cas. 1086), and other cases.

They also contend that where a landlord takes possession of leased premises abandoned by the lessee, and rents them to another, the landlord must notify the first tenant that the premises are rerented for the tenant's benefit, or it will constitute an acceptance of the abandonment and put an end to the lease, citing again the two cases first before cited and Armour Packing Co. v. Des Moines Pork Co. 116 Iowa, 723, 93 Am. St. Rep. 270, 89 N. W. 196; Gray v. Kaufman Dairy & Ice Cream Co. 162 N. Y. 388, 49 L.R.A. 580, 76 Am. St. Rep. 327, 56 N. E. 903. And, further, that upon abandonment by the tenant of leased premises the landlord has three remedies: First, he may at once enter and terminate the contract and recover the rent up to the abandonment; or, second, he may suffer the premises to remain vacant and sue on the contract for the entire rent; or he may give notice to the tenant of his refusal to accept a surrender, and sublet the premises for the unexpired term for the benefit of the lessee to reduce his damages, citing Higgins v. Street, supra.

The trial court seemed to think that the relation of defendant McCray to the lease was that of a guarantor, and also seemed to think that there was no consideration for the surrender of the premises, but these questions are not pleaded nor argued. The trial court held, as indicated by it, that it was agreed between defendant and plaintiff that the reletting of the premises to the creditors of the Evans Company should not constitute a release of the obligations of the defendant McCray under the lease. But we think this finding is not sustained by this record. The only testimony we discover concerning this is that given by H. S. Chase, who testifies that it was agreed between plaintiff and the creditors of the Evans Company that taking of possession by creditors should not prejudice the rights of plaintiff in the original lease. But, as stated, it is not shown that McCray was present or represented at this meeting, and it is contended by appellant that he was not so present or represented.

The trial court also took the view that there was no lease between the creditors of the Evans Company and the plaintiff. Some of the witnesses say that there was no new lease to the creditors, but, from an examination of this evidence, we think the witnesses so testifying meant that there was no written evidence of the lease. If plaintiff surrendered or relet to the creditors of the company the leased premises whereby they became liable for the payment of $300 per month as rent, and were not permitted to terminate the agreement until thirty days' notice in writing had been given to plaintiff of an intention so to do, as we understand the written contract to provide, then there was a lease; at least, that was a question for the jury whether plaintiff did relet the property to the creditors, and whether the creditors were tenants of the plaintiff under a tenancy from month to month, especially as to the defendant McCray, who claims to have had an agreement with plaintiff for a surrender. In Keane v. Rogers, 146 Iowa, at page 63, 123 N. W. 755, supra, we said: So, also, reletting of the premises is not always conclusive. If the landlord relets on account of the tenant, it is a circumstance of no value; but if the landlord relets on his own account without notifying the original lessee, and he does not consent thereto, such reletting is generally held to show an acceptance of the surrender, unless the lease itself provides for such reletting. There was no provision relating thereto in the lease in question, and the use of the premises by Mr. Emery, and the plaintiff's demand for rent therefor, furnished evidence tending to support the claim of the defendant that there was a mutual surrender of the lease. . . . It is also the general rule that an absolute and unqualified taking of possession by the landlord shows an acceptance, unless the landlord indicates to the tenant, at that time, his purpose to hold him liable for the rent. . . . In this case the plaintiff, through his agent, took such possession without a word to the defendant Hofmaster. It is true that several months thereafter he notified Hofmaster that he intended to hold him for the rent; but, when a complete surrender has taken place, a lease cannot be revived by the action of only one party thereto."

See also Armour Packing Co. v. Des Moines Pork Co. 116 Iowa, 723, 93 Am. St. Rep. 270, 89 N. W. 196.

2. We shall now refer as briefly as may be to some of the evidence excluded by the trial court, which we think would have a bearing upon the issue. Defendant should have been permitted to show that the front part of the leased premises was changed into a cigar store. And defendant should have been permitted to show that he did not receive a notification from plaintiff subsequent to October 15, 1914, that plaintiff had taken possession of the premises for defendant's benefit. There may be other similar questions, but we shall not notice them specifically. The error is not likely to occur upon a retrial.

—possession for benefit of tenant—notice.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NOTE.

The landlord's reletting and efforts to relet after tenant's abandonment or refusal to enter as an acceptance of the surrender is discussed in the note beginning at page 1080, post.

v.

L. RENARD et al., as Trustees of the Creditors of the Cosmos Wine & Liquor Company et al., Appts.

Landlord and tenant — attempt to relet as termination of lease.

1. Acceptance of a surrender of a lease will be effected if, after the lessee's refusal to take possession or be bound by the lease, the lessor assumes absolute control of the property and attempts to let it without any notice to the lessee that he is not acting in his own right.

Evidence — rescission of lease.

2. The sale by a lessor of a building after the lessee has repudiated the lease and refused to take possession of the property, without notice to the lessee, is conclusive evidence that the lessor is then holding the property solely for his own benefit, and in no way for the benefit of the tenant.

Pleading — answer — acceptance of surrender of lease.

3. An answer in an action for rent alleged to be due under a lease, which seeks cancelation for fraud and alleges the giving of notice of rescission which the lessor refused, is not an admission that there never was an unqualified acceptance of lessee's surrender of the property.

[See 16 R. C. L. 1103.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due under the terms of a written lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph E. O'Donnell and Costello & Costello, for appellants:

There was a surrender of the lease by the tenant and an acceptance by the landlord of such surrender.

Angellotti, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover a judgment for money alleged to be due as rent under the terms of a written lease, the defendants being the trustees of the creditors of the lessee corporation (a dissolved corporation), and the sureties on the bond given by the lessee for the payment of the stipulated rent and the observance of the other covenants of the lease. The cause was tried with a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff for $7,500. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The action was for rents at $900 per month for the period commencing November 14, 1908, and ending June 14, 1910. The lease was one dated March 6, 1907, of a lot of land and a building to be erected by the lessor thereon, for the term of ten years; said term to begin when the building was completed and ready for occupancy, at $900 per month for the first five years, and $1,000 per month for the second five years. Before the completion of the building and in February, 1908, differences arose between the parties. During that month, a formal notice of rescission signed by the lessee was left on the premises and received by the lessor. It stated substantially that the lessee, by reason of the fact that it was induced to enter the lease by certain alleged false and fraudulent representations, and also because the building had not been completed as soon as promised, elected to rescind the lease, offered to restore all property in said building and premises, and demanded that the lease be rescinded and surrendered. The lessor on February 17, 1908, sent to the lessee the following notice, viz.: "Your notice of rescission I have received and the only answer I have to make to it is that the rescission of a lease requires the action of all parties thereto, or the judgment of a competent court. Your building will be ready for occupancy within the next forty days."

On May 14, 1908, the lessor notified the lessee that the building was completed, and tendered possession thereof, and demanded payment of the first month's rent, and the lessee refused to accept it or any portion thereof, or to pay any rent under the lease. This apparently ended the communications between the parties until the commencement of this action over four years later, November 14, 1912. The lessee never went into possession of the premises, and never paid any rent.

Almost immediately after May 14, 1908, the plaintiff began efforts to secure a tenant for the property. She, however, secured no permanent tenant, although she endeavored to do so. It was put into the hands of various real estate agents for that purpose, and there were large signs "painted on the building, placed on it" for the purpose of attracting tenants. Various "To let" signs were placed on the building by plaintiff, the first as early anyway as July, 1908. The premises were let by the lessor temporarily to various parties. They were first so let during the latter part of 1908 "for between a month or two months," $324 rental being received. In the spring of 1909, the premises were so let for about three months at $150 a month. Again they were so let to various tenants through a real estate agency, for "a trifle less than" $600. On July 10, 1910, according to the allegations of the complaint, plaintiff finally disposed of said building. During all of the time after June, 1908, plaintiff apparently treated the property as absolutely at her disposal for her own benefit, just as though the lease to the defendant lessee was not in existence. After the refusal of the lessee to accept the premises, no word, oral or written, was conveyed to it to the effect that plaintiff did not hold possession of the premises solely in her own right and for her own benefit, and without regard to the lease. No suggestion was made to the lessee that she intended to let the premises for the benefit of the lessee, or at all, and no information was given as to the fact of any of the tenancies. And finally, in July, 1910, as we have seen, the building was permanently disposed of by plaintiff, apparently without any information as to the intention to dispose of it being given to the lessee.

Upon these facts, as to which there is no conflict, it seems clear to us that the doctrine of Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145, 27 Pac. 369, is applicable. It is true that the facts of this case differ in some particulars from those of Welcome v. Hess, supra; but they differ in no such way as to make the conclusion arrived at there inapplicable here. The real thing there decided was that where the premises are abandoned by the tenant, who avows his intention not to be bound by his lease, the assumption of actual possession and absolute control of the premises by the lessor, including efforts to let and the actual reletting thereof to others, without saying or doing anything to so qualify his acts as to indicate that he is not acting in his own right and for his own benefit, as owner entitled to possession, without saying or doing anything to indicate that he is acting for the benefit of the lessee or reletting on the lessee's account and for his benefit, he will not be heard thereafter to say that he has not accepted a surrender of the term. This is the settled law in this state, although there are cases to the contrary in some other states. The discussion of the question in Welcome v. Hess, supra, was such as to make it unnecessary to consider the matter at length in this opinion. The law on this question was very clearly stated by the district court of appeal of the second appellate district in an opinion written by Presiding Justice Conrey in Rehkopf v. Wirz, 31 Cal. App. 695, 161 Pac. 285, as follows: "Where a tenant abandons the leased property and repudiates the lease, the landlord may accept possession of the property for the benefit of the tenant and relet the same, and thereupon may maintain an action for damages for the difference between what he was able in good faith to let the property for and the amount provided to be paid under the lease agreement. Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 Pac. 797. But a lessor who chooses to follow that course must in some manner give the lessee information that he is accepting such possession for the benefit of the tenant, and not in his own right and for his own benefit. If the lessor takes possession of property delivered to him by his tenant, and does so unqualifiedly, he thereby releases the tenant. Baker v. Eilers Music Co. 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 Pac. 1056; Welcome v. Hess, supra. An unqualified taking of possession by the lessor and reletting of the premises by him as owner to new tenants is inconsistent with the continuing force of the original lease. If done without the consent of the tenant to such interference, it is an eviction, and the tenant will be released. If done pursuant to the tenant's attempted abandonment, it is an acceptance of the surrender and likewise releases the tenant."

It is clear that the mere fact that the lessee refused to accept possession at all and never went into possession does not present any material distinction, in view of the subsequent acts of the lessor. Nor does it materially affect the matter that the lessor, notwithstanding her efforts in that behalf, failed to obtain a permanent tenant for a term extending beyond the term prescribed by the lease to defendant corporation. Of course, such a letting without any act or word to qualify its effect would have very clearly shown an absolute acceptance of the surrender of the term, just as the permanent disposition by the lessor of the building in July, 1910, showed to a certainty that the lessor was then holding the premises solely in her own right and in no way for the benefit of the tenant. But her efforts to obtain a permanent tenant were just as potent in their effect as showing her attitude with regard to the premises in this connection, as would have been her actual letting in the event of finding such a tenant, and her conduct in this regard, together with her conduct generally in relation to the premises from as early as July, 1908, bring the case within the rule we have referred to, notwithstanding her failure to obtain a permanent tenant. The refusal to accept the offer of rescission made in February, 1908, and the subsequent tender of the premises and demand for one month's rent in May, 1908, are also of no importance in so far as the question we are considering is concerned. These things, of course, showed the then attitude of the lessor in the matter, and the desire that the lessee should accept the premises under the lease. But even then the lessor did not indicate that in the event of the lessee's refusal to accept possession she would nevertheless continue to regard the property as belonging to the tenant for the specified term. And, as we have seen, her subsequent conduct with regard thereto was a complete negation of any such attitude on her part.

Some reliance is placed by plaintiff in this connection upon certain allegations in defendants' pleadings by way of further answer and defense and cross complaint. In addition to their denials of the allegations of the complaint in this action commenced November 14, 1912, they sought a conclusion of rescission of the contract of lease on the ground of alleged false representations which induced the making thereof, and in this connection alleged the giving of the notice of rescission in February, 1908, to which we have referred, and that the plaintiff "refused and still refuses to rescind or cancel said lease." So far as the question of surrender that we have been discussing is concerned, the only force that can be attributed to this allegation in the connection in which it is used is, of course, by way of admission of the defendants that there never was any unqualified acceptance by the lessor of possession and control of the premises for her own exclusive benefit, notwithstanding the lease. We cannot read it as intended to have or as having in fact any such meaning, or as being of any importance in the solution of the question we have discussed.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

ANNOTATION.

When landlord's reletting or efforts to relet after tenant's abandonment or refusal to enter deemed to be acceptance of the surrender.

- I. Introductory, 1080.
- II. Intention a question of fact, 1080.
- III. Application to various cases, 1087.

I. Introductory.

It is well settled that the parties to a lease may by agreement terminate the same and the landlord resume possession of the premises. Such a termination of a lease requires the consent of both parties. The consent of the lessor need not, however, precede the surrender. If it exists at any time, surrender is completed and the lease terminated. For example, if the landlord accepts a surrender or abandonment of leased premises that has already taken place with the intent to terminate the lease, the lease is terminated as effectually as if there had been a valid agreement of surrender in advance. What amounts to an acceptance of such a surrender is a broad question. Primarily, it is a question of the landlord's intention. There are, however, certain rules which preclude the giving effect to this intention in all instances. According to one line of authorities, a lessor cannot, upon an abandonment of the leased premises by the lessee, relet them without terminating the lease; at least, there can be no reletting without the consent, express or implied, of the lessee thereto. According to a second line of authorities there can be no reletting of the abandoned premises without accepting the surrender, unless notice of the refusal to accept the surrender and of the intention to relet on the tenant's account is given the tenant. If there is a notice of the lessor's refusal to accept the surrender, and that he will relet on account of the tenant, a reletting is not, as a matter of law, an acceptance of the surrender according to this rule. According to a third line of cases, a reletting is not conclusive as a matter of law as an acceptance of such surrender, irrespective of the question of notice. The cases are agreed that mere attempts to relet do not conclusively show an acceptance of the surrender.

Under the first of these theories, and the second in the absence of notice, the intention of the landlord in reletting the premises is immaterial, for the rules conclusively ascribe to such reletting a certain effect, viz., an acceptance of the surrender and consequent termination of the lease. But under the third theory, and the second one in cases in which the requisite notice was given, the reletting is not as a matter of law an acceptance of the surrender. And this is true with reference to attempts at reletting. It does not follow, however, from the fact that the landlord may relet or attempt to do so without accepting the surrender, that he has done so in every instance. He may intend to accept the surrender, and thus terminate the lease; if he did thus intend to accept the surrender the lease is terminated; if he did not intend to accept such surrender, the lease is not terminated. In other words, the latter rules give free scope to the landlord's intention. The present note is concerned only with the bearing of a reletting or attempts to relet upon the determination of this intention.

II. Intention a question of fact.

The intent with which the landlord acts in reletting premises is primarily a question of fact, and therefore for the trier of facts, usually the jury.

Canada.—Matthias v. Pace (1882) 15 N. S. 366.

In Hodgkiss v. Dayton-Brower Co. (1915) 156 N. Y. Supp. 907, there is held to be a question of fact as to whether there had been an acceptance, where the landlord repossessed himself of the premises, made alterations therein for the purpose of reletting, and made efforts to relet the same over the tenant's objection to any reletting on his account. Giving a tenant permission to leave some of his property on the premises after the date of his abandonment has been held to be evidence from which acceptance of the abandonment may be presumed. Stanley v. Koehler (1857) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 354. In Schachter v. Tuggle Co. (Ga.) supra, it was left to the jury to say what the intent of the landlord was where, upon being tendered the keys by an undertenant who was about to vacate the premises, the landlord replied that he would take the keys, but would have to hold for the rent the person responsible therefor, but that he was willing to try to relet the premises. In Huling v. Roll (1890) 43 Mo. App. 234, where the jury found there was an acceptance of the surrender, the court does not discuss the evidence on which the findings are based, merely stating that the question was one for the jury. The facts, however, are interesting, and show that after the abandonment by the tenant the landlord took possession and, without consulting the tenant, set to work to rent it, putting it into the hands of a number of real estate agents, and a month after the abandonment, and after making several costly alterations and repairs upon the building, leased it for a period beyond the term of the original lessee. On the contrary, in Buck v. Lewis (1891) 46 Mo. App. 227, an instruction to the effect that if the landlord personally, or by his agent, accepted the keys to the leased premises from the tenant, and "took possession of said tenements, or rooms, during the month of July, and tried to rent the said [premises] to other parties on their own account, without the privity or consent of defendant, then the plaintiff cannot recover the rent for said month," was held erroneous. A reletting which was held not to amount to an acceptance took place in Leavitt v. Maykel (1911) 210 Mass. 55, 96 N. E. 51, but in this case there was an express written agreement that the lessor might relet without affecting the rights of the parties.

Even under a lease expressly providing that the landlord may relet on behalf of the tenant in case of abandonment there has been held to be a question whether or not the landlord intended to accept the surrender, in reletting the premises or attempting to do so. Vogel v. Piper (1903) 89 N. Y. Supp. 431. See Stern v. Thayer (1894) 56 Minn. 93, 57 N. W. 329, infra. The act of the landlord, who had a dispute with his tenant in which the tenant stated that he was going to move and the landlord replied that he was glad of it, in thereafter, and before the tenant had actually left the premises, entering upon the property and posting a notice that the same was for rent, is held to be an acceptance of the surrender, in Crane v. Edwards (1903) 80 App. Div. 333, 80 N. Y. Supp. 747. The fact that the landlord increased the rent upon reletting the premises does not require a finding that there was an acceptance. Payne v. Hall (1912) 82 N. J. L. 362, 82 Atl. 518.

In some cases an express agreement has been entered into subsequently to the abandonment of the lease that the lessor should procure a tenant without affecting the rights of the parties. In some such cases the rerenting has not been urged as an acceptance. Stekette v. Pratt (1899) 122 Mich. 80, 80 N. W. 989. In American Sav Bank & T. Co. v. Mafridge (1910) 60 Wash. 180, 110 Pac. 1015, the lease was sold by agreement of the parties. In Cox v. McKinley (1911) 10 Ga. App. 492, 73 S. E. 751, there seems to have been express agreement that the landlord should relet for the tenant. But in others in which the taking possession under such an agreement has been urged as an acceptance, this contention has been denied, and the landlord held to have taken possession for the purpose of rerenting under the contract. Morgan v. Smith (1877) 70 N. Y. 537; Hoster-Columbus Associated Breweries Co. v. Stag Hotel Corp. (1910) 111 Va. 223, 68 S. E. 50.

The question of fact as to the landlord's intention is often stated in another form, viz., if the landlord relets on account of the tenant, there is no acceptance of the surrender; but if he relets on his own account there is an acceptance. BERNARD v. RENARD (reported herewith) ante, 1076; Kean v. Rogers (1910) 146 Iowa, 559, 123 N. W. 754, approved in H. S. Chase & Co. v. Evans (reported herewith) ante, 1071; Dobbin v. McDonald (1895) 60 Minn. 380, 62 N. W. 437; Pelton v. Place (1899) 71 Vt. 430, 46 Atl. 63. In Kean v. Rogers (1910) 146 Iowa, 559, 123 N. W. 754, the court, in discussing the evidence tending to show the acceptance of a surrender, observes, that the reletting of the premises is not always conclusive. "If the landlord relets on account of the tenant, it is a circumstance of no value; but if the landlord relets on his own account without notifying the original lessee, and he does not consent thereto, such reletting is generally held to show an acceptance of the surrender, unless the lease itself provides for such reletting." In this case, evidence that the lessor relet the premises to another, and demanded rent of him, was held to be evidence tending to support the claim that there had been an acceptance of the surrender. It is held in Goodfield Realty Co. v. Wormser (1910) 125 N. Y. Supp. 521, that the fact that the landlord relets the abandoned premises, without expressing in the new lease that he acted as agent of the original tenant, is not determinative that the landlord did not regard himself as acting for the original tenant. In Buck v. Lewis (1891) 46 Mo. App. 227, an instruction that if the landlord accepted the keys and took possession, and tried to rent to other parties on his own account without the privity or consent of the tenant, he could not recover rent, was held improper. But the phrase, "on his own account," did not receive special consideration.

It is held in some cases that the landlord's consent to a surrender cannot be inferred from unsuccessful attempts to relet. Gaines v. McAdam (1898) 79 Ill. App. 201; West Side Auction House Co. v. Connecticut Mut. Ins. Co. (1899) 85 Ill. App. 497, affirmed in (1900) 186 Ill. 156, 57 N. E. 839; Bradley v. Walker (1900) 93 Ill. App. 609; Lane v. Nelson (1895) 167 Pa. 602, 31 Atl. 864. In Gaines v. McAdam (Ill.) supra, the attempt was by an agent, and the court states that the unsuccessful attempt of an agent to rent premises does not raise an inference of the landlord's consent to the surrender. Apparently, however, it is assumed that the agent had authority, and the decision is based on the ground that the unsuccessful attempt to rent the premises does not raise an inference of acceptance. The mere fact that the landlord attempts to secure another tenant is not of itself any evidence that he intended to accept the surrender by the original tenant. Duffy v. Day (1890) 42 Mo. App. 638; Reeves v. McComeskey (1895) 168 Pa. 571, 32 Atl. 96. Accordingly there has been held to be no question of fact for the jury, where the landlord has made such an attempt. Scott v. Beecher (1892) 91 Mich. 590, 52 N. W. 20; Joslin v. McLean (1894) 99 Mich. 480, 58 N. W. 467.

An attempt to relet is not such an act as of itself releases the tenant. Pier v. Carr (1871) 69 Pa. 326. Merely advertising the place for rent cannot be considered as an acceptance of the surrender. Redpath v. Roberts (1802) 3 Esp. (Eng.) 225; Ontario Industrial Loan & Invest. Co. v. O'Dea (1895) 22 Ont. App. Rep. 349. Whatever may be the effect of an actual renting of the premises, it has been held that unsuccessful attempts at reletting cannot be regarded as an acceptance, especially where the landlord has notified the tenant that he will relet on behalf of the tenant. Dorrance v. Bonesteel (1900) 51 App. Div. 129, 64 N. Y. Supp. 307. At least, unsuccessful attempts to relet or advertising for rent are not conclusive that the landlord has accepted.

Canada. — McBride v. Ireson (1915) 35 Ont. L. Rep. 173 (tenant was notified by landlord that premises would be relet, but that until then the tenant would be held for the rent).

The declaration of a landlord that his tenant had given up his lease, accompanied by an unsuccessful attempt to lease to another, is not conclusive evidence that their relation has ceased. Milling v. Becker (1880) 96 Pa. 182.

One court, in discussing the effect of a statement by the landlord at the time the tenant delivered the keys to him that he would take them and hold them for the tenant so as to be able to let the premises for him as his agent, states that this conversation would seem unmistakably to negative any intent on the part of the landlord to accept the surrender of the term, and although not assented to by the tenant, that fact rendered no less emphatic the landlord's refusal to accept the surrender, and unless, therefore, the landlord did some act which would indicate a change of mind, it would be difficult to find a rule of law which would create an acceptance by her of an attempted surrender against her will. Dorrance v. Bonesteel (1900) 51 App. Div. 129, 64 N. Y. Supp. 307, holding that a receipt of the keys to the leased premises with the express intention of taking them as the agent of the tenant, together with a subsequent attempt to relet the premises, do not constitute, as matter of law, an acceptance of the surrender.

But it has been stated that, in the absence of a provision in the contract authorizing him to do so, the lessor's re-entry upon the premises and attempt to relet the same in his own name after the abandonment thereof by the lessee is evidence tending strongly to show an acceptance on his part of the surrender of the premises. Feust v. Craig (1907) 107 N. Y. Supp. 637. On a subsequent appeal of this case the silence of the landlord for two months after his agent had received the keys from the tenant, who notified him that he had abandoned the premises, and attempts to relet, were held to make a prima facie case of surrender. 109 N. Y. Supp. 742. The landlord had also been notified of the tenant's intention to surrender the premises. When the keys were delivered to the agent, the tenant notified the agent that he surrendered the premises, to which the agent replied, "All right."

Some general observations appear in the reported decisions as to the weight to be given a reletting by the landlord, as evidence of such acceptance. The supreme court of Maryland states that the acceptance of keys by the landlord, repairs to the house, and the reletting of the premises are insufficient of themselves to show an acceptance, "unless, under all the circumstances, they are of such a character as to show a purpose on the part of the tenant to vacate, and on the part of the landlord to resume possession, to the exclusion of the tenant. If, at the time when the keys were returned to him, the landlord notified the tenant that he received them under protest, would rerent, and hold him for rent, and the defendant assented to such renting, the presumption which might otherwise arise that there was an acceptance of the property would not be reasonable; and if under such circumstances he rented the property, it would be plain that he would do so for the lessee's interest, and not with the intent of accepting the surrender. But if the landlord without such assent on the part of the tenant does an act, such as taking possession of and reletting the premises, which is utterly inconsistent with the relation of landlord and tenant, then a surrender is implied and the tenancy is at an end." Biggs v. Stueler (1901) 93 Md. 100, 48 Atl. 727. Temporarily taking possession by another tenant for a limited time, of part of the leased premises by the landlord, is not one of those unequivocal acts which will terminate the lease, but the effect of such an act depends upon the intention of the landlord. Mickleborough v. Strathy (1911) 23 Ont. L. Rep. 33.

It has been held in a case involving a lease containing a provision authorizing the lessor to rerent the premises upon an abandonment by the tenant, for and on behalf of the tenant, that to amount to an acceptance of the surrender which will terminate the lease by operation of law, there must be some unequivocal act on the part of the landlord which unmistakably evinces an intention on his part to terminate the lease and the relationship of landlord and tenant, and that the proof is insufficient if there be no evidence of acts which will bind on the principle of estoppel. Stern v. Thayer (1894) 56 Minn. 93, 57 N. W. 329. Within this rule a direction of a verdict for the landlord was held proper, where the evidence showed that some time before the abandonment the tenant informed the landlord that he was going to vacate, and would get a good tenant to occupy when he moved out, but that the landlord objected to the lessee securing a tenant and told him not to do it; that he had a scheme for renting the rooms himself; for this reason he did not want the tenant to secure a tenant. It was further in evidence that the landlord had some conversation with a prospective lessee, who examined the rooms after the abandonment, but did not rent. Subsequently a "To let" sign was placed on the premises. This decision is based largely upon the estoppel theory, the court stating that in nothing that was said or done by the landlord were there any of the essential elements of an estoppel.

It is the doctrine of some cases that a reletting creates no prima facie case of acceptance. Auer v. Penn (1882) 99 Pa. 370, 44 Am. Rep. 114; Lane v. Nelson (1895) 167 Pa. 602, 31 Atl. 864. The renting of the premises to another tenant after notice to the lessee that the lessor will hold him for the rent does not raise a presumption of surrender. Auer v. Penn (Pa.) supra. The acceptance of the surrender cannot be implied from the fact that the landlord put the premises in the hands of an agent to rent, and caused the rent notice to be placed on the premises. Lane v. Nelson (Pa.) supra.

On the contrary, it has been stated that if the landlord takes possession of the abandoned premises and relets them he will be deemed to have accepted a surrender, unless there are facts rebutting this inference. Underhill v. Collins (1892) 132 N. Y. 270, 30 N. E. 576; Bloomer v. Merrill (1865) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 485, 29 How. Pr. 259. Winant v. Hines (1887) 14 Daly (N. Y.) 187, holding contra, is thus overruled. Within this rule, there was held to be no acceptance of the surrender where, a short time prior to the surrender, the landlord had, in an interview with the tenant, refused to accept a surrender of the premises and told him that he should hold him for the rent, but would let the premises on account of the tenant, and under these circumstances the tenant left the premises and sent the keys by another person to the landlord. Underhill v. Collins (N. Y.) supra. The court states that the landlord, in reletting the premises, did only that which he had promised and had the right to do. A similar decision appeared in Bloomer v. Merrill (N. Y.) supra, where, after the lessor was advised that the lessee was intending to leave the premises, he told the lessee that he would let the premises on the lessee's account and would hold him responsible for the rent. The letting was held to be no evidence of the surrender. These cases are decided upon the theory that there was an implied consent by the tenant to the reletting. The Underhill Case is distinguished in the subsequent case of Gray v. Kaufman Dairy & Ice Cream Co. (1900) 162 N. Y. 388, 49 L.R.A. 580, 76 Am. St. Rep. 327, 56 N. E. 903, where a reletting was held to be an acceptance of the surrender, although the landlord expressly states in a letter to the tenant subsequent to the abandonment, that he would not release the tenant, but would relet on his account and hold him for any loss that might be sustained, to which letter the tenant did not reply; and where, subsequently thereto, some negotiations were had between the landlord and the tenant in regard to reletting, but finally the landlord relet without the consent of the original tenant. It is held that the consent of the tenant to the reletting cannot be implied from his silence and failure to answer the letters. The removal of the tenant after a notice that the landlord would hold him responsible for the rent does not, it seems, raise an implied consent to the reletting, where the landlord does not state in addition thereto that he will relet the premises and hold the tenant for the deficiency. Schmidt v. Vahjen (1911) 143 App. Div. 479, 127 N. Y. Supp. 1038; Gaffney v. Paul (1899) 29 Misc. 642, 61 N. Y. Supp. 173; Hodgkiss v. Dayton-Brower Co. (1915) 156 N. Y. Supp. 907. In Schmidt v. Vahjen (N. Y.) supra, the occupancy by the subsequent tenant was gratuitous, and the court states that the landlord's case is not aided but harmed by the fact that he charged no rent. In Hodgkiss v. Dayton-Brower Co. (N. Y.) supra, it is stated that the landlord's statement to the tenant of intention to hold him liable for rent, "and to relet for the latter's account," does not sustain an implied agreement for such reletting. The question as to the necessity and sufficiency of the lessee's consent is, however, not exhaustively considered herein, as it is not within the scope of the note.

It is apparent that the landlord's intention is to be determined from all the circumstances, since it is, as stated above, primarily a question of fact. Accordingly, it has been held improper for the court to take the case from the jury and hold as a matter of law that there was no acceptance of the surrender, where a nonresident landlord, upon hearing that his tenant intended to abandon the premises, rented them to another before the tenant actually moved out, and without any notice to him. Hays v. Goldman (1903) 71 Ark. 251, 72 S. W. 563.

And so, where an agent of the landlord, upon hearing of the abandonment, instructed another to get the keys and put up a "For rent" sign on the premises, and had the water turned off, rubbish removed, and some of the rooms repapered, and had an offer of a little less than the original tenant was paying for the premises, but declined to accept it, but finally secured a tenant at the same price that the original tenant was paying. Sessinghaus v.

A verdict for the plaintiff was reversed in Fagelle v. Etna Importing Co. (1912) 133 N. Y. Supp. 465, where, after the abandonment of the premises, the lessor visited them and left the keys with his housekeeper, ordered her to open and clean out the premises, and some day thereafter he placed a "To let" sign on the premises, the court stating that even if these acts, standing alone, should be held insufficient to constitute an acceptance of the surrender there seems little doubt that, if coupled with other circumstances showing an intent by the landlord to resume possession for his own benefit, they would be sufficient to show a valid acceptance.

A finding that there was no acceptance of the surrender is sustained by evidence that the lessor, upon a declaration by the lessee that he was unable to pay rent, consulted the surety for the lessee, who not only consented but advised that the premises should be relet, whereupon an agent for letting placed a notice upon the premises that they were "To let," and procured a tenant by that means, and after the tenant had been so procured, the original lessee removed from the premises with the sureties consent. Ogden v. Rowe (1854) 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 312. The lease involved in this case contained a provision that the lessor might enter and relet in case of an abandonment.

Evidence that the landlord objected when told by the tenant that he was about to abandon the premises, and notified the tenant that he would be held for the remainder of the time, and that when the keys were sent to the landlord he retained them, and subsequently repaired the house and rented it to another tenant, does not require a finding of acceptance by the landlord. Gerhart Realty Co. v. Brechte (1904) 109 Mo. App. 25, 84 S. W. 216. The lease to the new tenant extended beyond the period covered by the original lease, but the court makes no mention of this fact.

There has been held to be evidence to support a finding that the landlord had accepted the surrender, where the landlord improves the property so as to command a better rental, and asks an advanced rental of prospective tenants. Duffy v. Day (1890) 42 Mo. App. 638. The court, in this case, admits that the making of slight repairs in order to fit the premises for another tenant would afford no evidence that the landlord intended to take exclusive control of the premises, nor, it is held, is the fact that the plaintiff endeavored to secure another tenant of itself any evidence that the landlord intended to release the tenant from his obligation to pay rent while the house remained without a tenant; but the fact that he improved the property so as to command a better rental, and asks a higher rental, is held to be some evidence of an intent to rent on his own account. The court states that, if he intended to make the original tenant pay until another tenant could be secured, good faith required that the property should be offered on the same terms. In addition to facts above recited it appears that the landlord made no demand on the tenant for rent for some time, although the contract was for rent payable monthly in advance, and it was further shown that the institution of a suit grew out of the dispute between the parties as to another matter.

So, where the landlord consented to the affixing of a "To let" sign to the premises, and approved of another tenant secured by an agent, and received rent from such tenant, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the landlord had accepted the surrender. Sherman v. Engel (1896) 18 Misc. 484, 41 N. Y. Supp. 959.

In Dobbin v. McDonald (1895) 60 Minn. 380, 62 N. W. 437, there was held to be evidence sustaining the finding of facts made by the trial court that the landlord had accepted possession from a tenant who held over a few days beyond the expiration of his lease, so that he could not be regarded as holding over for another period equal to his original lease, where, a short time before the expiration of the lease, the tenant informed the lan lord that he would move out at the expiration, whereupon the premises were placed in the hands of the rental agent by the landlord, and a placard put upon the house announcing it for rent, and a few days before the expiration of the lease the tenant wrote the landlord a letter, saying that he would vacate at the expiration of the lease, or within a few days of the time, to which the landlord made no reply or objection, and the last of the tenant's goods were removed four days after the expiration of the lease, and the keys of the house sent to the landlord's office; thereafter the landlord addressed a letter to the tenant, demanding that he call and settle for damage done to the property, and, upon receiving a sum sufficient to pay the rent for the four days' occupation, returned it to the tenant, saying that he would not accept it, but did not intimate that there was anything due him for rent, nor ever make a claim that the tenant held over for another period, until almost two years later. A part of the time, the premises were rented to another tenant at a reduced figure. In White v. Berry (1902) 24 R. I. 74, 52 Atl. 682, there was held to be evidence supporting a finding of the surrender, where the landlord, upon being informed by the tenant prior to the removal that the tenant intended to remove, made no definite objection, but advertised the premises for rent without consulting the lessee about the advertising, and never told the tenant that he expected or intended to hold him for rent after he went out, showed the premises to prospective tenants without consulting the original tenant, and endeavored to let the premises in the same way as he would have done if the original tenant had never lived there; and, subsequent to the removal, went to the premises and put up "To let" signs, never sent any bill to the original tenant for the rent, and, according to the original tenant's testimony, the landlord gave him to understand that he was anxious to have him get out. In Palmer v. Myers (1898) 79 Ill. App. 409, a holding of the trial court that there had been an acceptance and surrender was sustained, where, before the abandonment, the landlord offered the premises to others, providing the tenant would get off, and where, shortly after the abandonment, the premises were actually leased to one who took possession thereof, and subsequently were leased to another tenant; and, further, that the landlord "seemed willing to have the appellee give up the farm so she could rent it to someone else." A finding of surrender is justified upon evidence that the receiver of the lessee directed a messenger to take the keys to the landlord, who, after telling the messenger to take the keys to his attorney, received them upon objection by the messenger that his orders were to leave the keys with the landlord, and retained the keys, entered upon possession of the property, had it cleaned and prepared for occupancy, and put it on the market for rent. Re Heilbron Bros. (1913) 226 Fed. 803.

The evidence may be such that a finding of acceptance is required. In Buckingham Apartment House Co. v. Dafoe (1899) 78 Minn. 268, 80 N. W. 974, there was held to be evidence requiring a finding of acceptance as a matter of law, where the tenant in an apartment house notified the manager, about two weeks before he vacated, that he was going out, and upon leaving, he paid the manager the rent due, and turned over the keys to the manager, who accepted and retained them without objections or conditions, and tried to re-rent the flat as soon as he received the keys, and had applications therefor, but did not succeed in re-renting while he remained in charge of the building; it further appeared that no demand was ever made upon the tenant for further rent until after there was a change in manager in the building.

The facts of the foregoing cases on which there was held to be an acceptance of the surrender are varied. In Williamson v. Crossett (1896) 62 Ark. 393, 36 S. W. 27, a letter written by the tenants of a farm to the landlord, stating that it would be impossible for them to furnish the seed to work the farm, that a part of it had been sublet, and that it would be possible for the landlord to rent to someone else and thereby lose nothing, is treated by the court as an offer to surrender, and it is held that the landlord accepted such offer by soon thereafter taking charge of the place and controlling it for the remainder of the year, accepting as a tenant the subtenant of the lessee, and renting a portion of the place to another, without any notice to the tenants that he was managing the place on their account, or that he expected them to make good any deficiency in the rent. There was held to be an acceptance of the surrender, where the lessor took possession of premises and offered them for rent to others, in Baker v. Eilers Music Co. (1915) 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 Pac. 1056. It is stated that a lessor who takes possession of property delivered to him by his tenant, and does so unqualifiedly, thereby releases his tenant. It is further stated that "he may accept possession of the property for the benefit of the tenant and relet the same; in the latter case, he has no action except one for damages for the difference between what he was able in good faith to let the property for, and the amount provided to be paid under the lease agreement." Where the landlord, after the tenant had left the leased premises, made no demand upon him or in any manner informed him as to the course which he would pursue, but took possession and made a new lease of the land for a period longer than that of the unexpired term, and at a rate of rental less than that provided for in the original lease, there was held to be an acceptance in Rehkopf v. Wirz (1916) 31 Cal. App. 596, 161 Pac. 285. The court states that an unqualified taking of possession by the lessor and reletting of the premises by him as owner to a new tenant is inconsistent with the continuing force of the original lease. So, a surrender is completed where, after the abandonment of the premises, the landlord, through his authorized agent, called on the tenant for the keys without explanation or qualification, and, upon the surrender of the keys, the agent retained them, and advertised the house for rent. Ledsinger v. Burke (1901) 113 Ga. 74, 38 S. E. 313. Likewise, there is a completed surrender where, upon the abandonment by the tenant, the landlord did not refuse to receive the property, nor notify the tenant that he would hold him liable, but took possession of at least a part of the land and relet it or had it cultivated on shares. Rucker v. Tabor (1906) 127 Ga. 101, 56 S. E. 124. In Hesseltine v. Seavey (1839) 16 Me. 212, it is stated by the court that if the lessors accept the key and put in another tenant, who remains to the end of the term, they may well be regarded as having so conducted that they cannot be permitted to deny that they have ousted the lessee, and in such case no rent is recoverable. The evidence in this case, however, showed a substitution of tenant by agreement of the original tenant, the second lessee, and the lessor. In Stein v. Hyman-Lewis Co. (1909) 95 Miss. 293, 48 So. 225, there was held to be an acceptance of the surrender of a parol lease, to begin at the expiration of the written lease under which the tenant was in possession, where, prior to the expiration of the written lease, the tenant notified the landlord that he would surrender the premises at the expiration of the then-existing lease, and the landlord made no objection to the proposed surrender, and failed to advise the tenant that he expected to hold him for the rent for the following year; but, on the contrary, made efforts to get other tenants for the building, and, upon the removal from the premises by the tenant, leased the premises to other persons for the year, and collected rent from them. A surrender was held to have taken place in Matthews v. Tobener (1866) 39 Mo. 115, where the tenant notified the landlord in writing that he would deliver and surrender the premises on or before a certain day, and, on his vacating the premises, sent the key to the landlord, who received it without objection and subsequently placed another tenant in possession, who continued in their use and occupation till after the time for which they were let to the original tenant. The court states, further, that there was no evidence to show that the second lessee took possession with privity, connivance, or consent of the original tenant, but, on the contrary, leased the premises from the landlord. There is an acceptance of the surrender where the landlord accepts from the receiver of the lessee corporation the keys to the premises, without objection, and enters upon the premises without consulting the receiver, and makes changes and alterations therein, which are not necessary for the preservation of the building, advertises the premises for rent, and rents the greater part of them for less than the balance of the demised term, and for less than the annual rent fixed by the lease, without authority from the receiver, and without consulting him. Fink v. Browe Co. (1917) — N. J. Eq. —, 99 Atl. 926. In Wood v. Walbridge (1854) 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 136, where the lessee was asserting a right to a lease, there was held to have been a surrender by operation of law, where, upon the destruction of a house on the premises by fire, the lessee abandoned the same, whereupon the lessor took possession, erected a new building, and leased the same to another. The court states that the lessee must be taken to have assented to this action. In Hegeman v. McArthur (1851) 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 147, where the landlord received the key from the tenant and did not declare any dissatisfaction, but entered into possession for the purpose of letting the same to another tenant, and placed upon the house the usual notice, "To let," and then delivered the key to an agent employed by him to let the same, there was held to be a surrender. In Krumdieck v. Ebbs (1903) 84 N. Y. Supp. 525, there was held to be a clear case of acceptance, where the lessee under a verbal lease from month to month removed all his property from the premises and surrendered the keys to the lessor's janitor, who gave them to the lessor, and where, prior to the delivery of the keys, the lessor had put a "To let" notice on the premises, and had entered into negotiations with other parties for the lease thereof, and allowed those parties to enter upon the premises, but without rent for the period for which a recovery from the original lessee was sought. A landlord's action was dismissed in Feust v. Craig (1908) 109 N. Y. Supp. 742, where the evidence showed that, prior to the abandonment, the tenant had written him of his intention to leave, to which letters no reply was made, and subsequently, upon leaving, the lessee left the keys with the janitor, stating that he had surrendered the place, to which the janitor replied, "All right;" and showed, further, that the landlord made effort to rent the premises and made no demand of the lessee for two months. The court stated that this silence, taken in connection with the efforts to rent the premises, ratified the janitor's action in accepting the surrender. The reletting by the lessor of a floor in a building after the abandonment thereof by the tenant, together with the lower floor controlled by the lessor solely, at a gross rental in which there is no apportionment of the amount applicable to the two floors, severally, in the lessor's own name, for a period extending one year beyond the term of the original tenant's lease, is conclusive evidence that the new lease was not made by the lessor as agent for the lessee, but that it constituted an acceptance of the surrender of the old lease. Friedlander v. Gitron (1911) 129 N. Y. Supp. 427. A reletting by the landlord after an abandonment of the premises, and his refusal to accept the same, the reletting not being subject to the rights of the original tenant or for his benefit, but in exclusion of such rights, have been held to be a termination of the lease. Meagher v. Eilers Music House (1915) 77 Or. 70, 150 Pac. 266. Upon what is apparently a second appeal of this case, it appeared that the reletting was expressly subject to the rights of the original tenant, and the court held that there was no surrender. (1917) 84 Or. 33, 164 Pac. 373. In Re Desmond & Co. (1912) 198 Fed. 581, affirmed in (1913) 122 C. C. A. 663, 204 Fed. 1006, there was held to be a surrender of the premises, where an agent of the landlord went with a purchaser of the lessee's goods to the rented premises and, upon a dispute arising as to the ownership of certain fixtures therein situated, consented to a request of the purchaser that the fixtures might remain upon the premises, rent free, until the dispute was settled.

In Reeve v. Bird (1834) 1 Crompt. M. & R. 31, 149 Eng. Reprint, 980, 4 Tyrw. 612, 3 L. J. Exch. N. S. 282, there was held to be a surrender of the term where, upon the lessee becoming embarrassed, it was agreed to assign the premises to another, and the lessor accepted rent up to the time of the assignment, and subsequently let part of the premises to new tenants. In Phené v. Popplewell (1862) 12 C. B. N. S. 334, 142 Eng. Reprint, 1171, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 235, 8 Jur. N. S. 1104, 6 L. T. N. S. 247, 10 Week. Rep. 523, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 518, there was held to be an acceptance of the surrender so as to result in a surrender by operation of law, where the key to the premises was left with the landlord, who at first refused to accept it, but subsequently showed the premises with a view to letting them, knowing that the original tenant was insolvent, and put up a board announcing that the premises were to let, and subsequently took actual possession. The court states that, putting all facts together, no other conclusion can be reached, and that the landlord exercised his option to accept the surrender.

In Welcome v. Hess (1891) 90 Cal. 507, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145, 27 Pac. 369, there was held to be an acceptance of the surrender by the landlord where, in taking possession, he did not announce his intention to continue to hold the tenants, but relet for a period longer than the remainder of their term without notifying the defendants that he should do so on their account. The court, it seems, in this case, tried not only the law, but the facts.

In other cases it has been held, apparently as a matter of law, that there was no acceptance of the surrender.

The facts under which there was held to be no completed surrender have been varied. Where, upon a demand by the landlord for the rent, the tenant replied that he was going to give up the premises, whereupon the landlord answered that he had not come to take possession of the property, but if the tenant was going to abandon the property he would take possession of the same to protect it, and did take possession, and a few days thereafter rented it to another. Respini v. Porta (Cal.) supra. The court states that it was properly held by the trial court that the abandonment of the premises to the landlord, and the taking possession by him against his wish, and the subsequent letting of the property to another tenant were not a surrender and termination of the lease under the circumstances. In Lamb v. Gorman (Ga.) supra, the action of the trial court in directing a verdict for the landlord, was sustained, where, after the surrender of the premises, an agent of the landlord made attempt to persuade the tenant to resume possession, suggesting a modification of the terms of the contract, but at no time consenting to the abandonment. The reletting in this case is not emphasized, further than to say that the lease provided that, upon an abandonment of the premises, the lessor might sublet as agent of the lessee. In Martin v.

Stearns (Iowa) supra, there was held to be no acceptance of the surrender of property by the acceptance of the keys and the leasing of the property to another tenant where, prior to the time of the alleged surrender, the landlord had brought an action to secure the payment of rent yet to accrue, and at the time of the surrender no word was said about dismissing the action or discharging the lessee from the claim made therein. This case is approved in Brown v. Cairns (Iowa) supra, where there was held to be no surrender of a farm where, immediately upon the announcement of the tenant's intention to abandon the premises, the landlord immediately notified him that he would hold him responsible for the rent accruing under the lease, and commenced an action for the rent and sued out a writ of attachment, but that thereafter, upon the actual abandonment, entered upon the premises and rerented the same for the purpose of protecting his reversionary interest and to reduce the damages which the tenant might otherwise be compelled to pay. In Oldewurtel v. Wiesenfeld (Md.) supra, evidence was held legally insufficient to show the acceptance of the surrender, which was to the effect that when the tenant left the keys to the leased premises at the lessor's office, the lessor wrote him a letter, notifying him of the refusal to accept the surrender, and a subsequent letter, stating that he would rent the premises for and on behalf of the tenant, and subsequently put a sign in the window of the premises that the property was for rent, and rented them from time to time. Where, upon the tender of key, the landlord expressly refused to receive it, except on the condition that the tenant be liable for the rent until he had opportunity of reletting the premises, there is no acceptance of the surrender. Nelson v. Thompson (1877) 23 Minn. 508. Reletting real estate at the best price obtainable, to a third person, after the death of the lessee before the expiration of the term, with notice to the latter's administrator who has abandoned the premises that he will be held for the rent and that the premises will be let on account of his intestate estate, does not constitute an annulment of the original lease nor release the administrator from his liability for the rent. Alsup v. Banks (1891) 68 Miss. 664, 13 L.R.A. 598, 24 Am. St. Rep. 294, 9 So. 895. In Buck v. Lewis (1891) 46 Mo. App. 227, where, upon the abandonment by the tenant, he delivered the keys to the landlord, who thereupon went upon the premises and put up in the windows notices, "For rent," and endeavored to rent the same to others, but was unsuccessful for a month, the court states that an instruction to the jury to find for the landlord might have been given. There was held to be no acceptance of the abandonment in Broadway Bldg. Co. v. Moore Filter Co. (1914) 85 Misc. 385, 147 N. Y. Supp. 438, where the reletting took place in accord with a provision in the lease, and after the landlord had expressly refused to accept the surrender. Evidence that the landlord took the key, advertised for a new tenant, and rented the premises to others does not show an acceptance of the surrender in the absence of evidence tending to show consent or acquiescence in the surrender on the part of the landlord. Bumiller v. Walker (1917) 95 Ohio St. 344, L.R.A. 1918B, 96, 116 N. E. 797. Mere acceptance of the keys by the lessor and reletting the premises on dissolution of a corporate lessee, and repudiation of the lease by the receiver, are not sufficient to show acceptance of a surrender, where the lease gives a right to re-enter for condition broken, if rent remains unpaid for ten days. Re Mullings Clothing Co. (1916) L.R.A. 1918A, 539, 151 C. C. A. 134, 238 Fed. 58, certiorari denied by the Supreme Court of United States in (1917) 243 U. S. 635, 61 L. ed. 941, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep.

399. Allowing a tenant to whom the premises had been relet to enter upon them three or four days in advance of his tenancy, make fires to remove the dampness, and render them fit for occupation at the beginning of his tenancy, and moving his furniture into the house during those days, does not prevent a recovery by the landlord for rent from the former tenant. Hard v. Jost (1894) 27 N. S. 243.

In the absence of any testimony of a surrender to the landlord himself, or of any acceptance of the premises by him or his authorized agent, proving an intent to consent to an abandonment by the tenant, the delivery of the keys to an agent, and their retention and a subsequent offer by him to rent, are not, without further evidence, sufficient to relieve the tenant of rent due under the lease, for such time as the premises are vacant. Blake v. Dick (1895) 15 Mont. 236, 48 Am. St. Rep. 671, 38 Pac. 1072.

In Stewart v. Sprague (1888) 71 Mich. 50, 38 N. W. 673, on second appeal in (1889) 76 Mich. 184, 42 N. W. 1088, the landlord, upon a tender of the keys by an assignee of the lessee, refused to accept them upon any other theory or condition than that the lessee should be holden under the lease, and the landlord should do the best he could to procure another tenant and hold the defendant liable for any deficiency, without discussion of these facts it is held in the case that there was no showing of an agreement by the landlord to accept the surrender.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas (Trieber, District Judge) to review a judgment convicting defendant of selling whisky in less quantities than 5 wine gallons without paying the retail liquor dealers' tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Sanborn, Hook and Smith, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Gardner K. Oliphint, James E. Hogue, Douglas Heard, and Edward B. Downie for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. H. Rector and W. H. Martin for the United States.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant below was indicted and convicted of selling whisky in less quantities than 5 wine gallons at the same time without paying a tax as a retail liquor dealer. Comp. Stat. §§ 5971 and 5973. He complains that the court refused to instruct the jury to return a verdict in his favor at the close of the evidence. The United States introduced testimony to the effect that the defendant received whisky in packages regularly up to November, 1915; that in that month he received two packages, one marked 24 pints, consigned to Jack McGee, and the other consigned to J. Burke; that these packages were delivered in an old outhouse where a German used to crate eggs; and that prior to the delivery of these packages the defendant had received other packages of like character, consigned to himself. The United States called as a witness one McDaniel, who testified that he purchased one bottle of whisky of the defendant in November, 1915, on a Saturday night; that he did not give him the money, but told him he would see him Tuesday; that on Tuesday he offered him his money, but the defendant said he was not selling whisky and refused to take it; and that meanwhile the defendant had been arrested.

Being asked how he got the whisky, this colloquy followed:

A. I saw him on a side street, and took it out of his pocket, and told him I would see him Tuesday.

Q. How come you to do that?

A. Well, I saw the whisky, and took it out of his pocket.

Q. What did you say about paying him?

A. I told him I would see him Tuesday. . . .

On cross-examination he testified, among other things, in this way:

Q. Now, did you not put your arms around him and pull it out of his pocket?

A. Yes; I did.

Q. You did not say anything to him about paying for it?

A. I did. I told him I would see him Tuesday.

There was no other testimony tending to show any sale of any whisky by the defendant, if, indeed, this so tends. The defendant testified that he never sold any whisky to McDaniel or to any other person; that one Saturday night he and McDaniel had been drinking earlier in the evening, and he met him again; that he had a little whisky in a bottle in his pocket; that McDaniel grabbed hold of him, took it out of his pocket, and commenced to drink it right on the sidewalk; that he persuaded him to go into the alley, where they both took a drink; that he asked McDaniel to give the bottle back to him, but that he put it in his pocket; and that nothing was ever said between them about paying for it. The defendant and Mr. Burke testified that the package of whisky consigned to Burke was Burke's, and was not the defendant's; that Burke bought it, and paid $12 for it; that the defendant did not contribute to the purchase of it, and had no interest in it; that Burke gave him an order for it, and told him to take it out and take care of it for him. The defendant testified that he never received the package of whisky consigned to McGee, and that he never had any interest in it. Mr. Ernest Cook testified that McGee was his brother-in-law; that he and McGee occasionally bought whisky together, and had it consigned, sometimes to one of them, and sometimes to the other; that the package addressed to McGee was Cook's; that he told the express driver to deliver it to the defendant, but that it was in fact delivered to him (Cook). Mr. Burke and Mr. Cook both testified that McDaniel told them that he never bought any whisky of the defendant. There was no other substantial evidence in this case, and upon the testimony which has been recited the jury and the court below have founded a judgment against the defendant, and a sentence against him of a fine of $100 and imprisonment for a year and a day.

But it is indispensable to the maintenance of this verdict and judgment that there should have been substantial evidence of a sale or of an offer to sell some of the whisky by the defendant.

"A sale is a contract for the transfer of property from one person to another for a valuable consideration." 7 Words & Phrases, "Sale," pp. 6291, 6292.

"To constitute such a sale, there must be the assent of the two parties; there must be a vendor and a vendee. But no words need be proved to have been spoken. A sale may be inferred from the acts of the parties, and no disguise which the parties attempt to throw over the transaction, with a view of evading the penalty of the law, can avail them, if in truth such sale is found to have taken place." Com. v. Thayer, 8 Met. 525, 526.

But one party cannot make a contract of sale. No such contract can be made without assent of the minds of two parties at the same time to the sale and to the terms of the sale, to the subject-matter and the consideration of the search for substantial evidence in this record that the defendant ever consented to sell any whisky to McDaniel has been in vain. The latter's testimony goes no further than this: That he saw the defendant on a side street on a Saturday night; that he put his arms around him and took a bottle of whisky out of the defendant's pocket; that he told him he would see him Tuesday; that he offered to pay him something on that day, and the defendant refused to take the money. The statements in his testimony that he bought the whisky and that he said something about paying for it, to wit, that he would see the defendant Tuesday, are nothing but his inferences from what he testified was said and done on that Saturday night, and they are immaterial. There is no evidence here that the defendant ever consented to the taking of the whisky by McDaniel; there is no evidence that he consented to receive any promise to pay any price or any consideration for the whisky; there is no evidence of the agreement of the minds of McDaniel and the defendant to the amount of the pretended price for it, or to any contract of any kind about it. Not only this, but the evidence is not only as consistent with the innocence of the defendant as with his guilt,—as consistent with the conclusion that he did not consent to make a contract to sell the whisky as that he did,—but it is more so. It is more consistent with the view that on that Saturday night McDaniel and the defendant were drinking together in a jovial mood; that such a thought as the selling of whisky to his companion never entered the mind of the defendant.

As there is no substantial evidence of the alleged sale, the judgment below must be reversed, and the case must be remanded to the court below, with directions to grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

I find myself unable to concur in the foregoing opinion.

The defendant was indicted for selling liquor at retail without having first paid the special tax therefor, as required by the United States statutes. The opinion says that "as the alleged contract here was illegal, and its making criminal, the legal presumption was that the defendant did not make it, and this presumption prevailed until he was proved to have done so beyond a reasonable doubt."

As I understand it, this case in no wise involved the legality of the sale, except coupled with the failure to pay the special tax as a retail liquor dealer, as required by the United States statutes. That the defendant at one time owned the liquor in question there can be no doubt. The witness McDaniel got the liquor from the possession of the defendant and consumed it. He either bought it or stole it. He testified that he purchased the bottle one Saturday night, and told the defendant he would see him Tuesday. Before Tuesday the defendant had been ar—rested. On Tuesday he was offered the money for the whisky, and then defendant said he was not selling whisky. The opinion says: "To constitute such a sale, there must be the assent of the two parties; there must be a vendor and a vendee. But no words need be proved to have been spoken. A sale may be inferred from the acts of the parties, and no disguise which the parties may attempt to throw over the transaction, with a view of evading the penalty of the law, can avail them, if in truth such sale is found to have taken place."

If this were a case against McDaniel, and he had been convicted of larceny of this liquor, I should unhesitatingly say that the conviction should be reversed; that, so far from there being any evidence of larceny, the evidence quite conclusively showed the acquiescence of Scoggins in the acquirement of the liquor by McDaniel; and, if that is the way I should feel about a conviction of larceny of McDaniel, I see no reason why I should not feel that a conviction of the defendant should be affirmed.

If the defendant acquiesced in the acquirement of this liquor by McDaniel, he was guilty of the offense charged, and this judgment should be affirmed. If he did not so acquiesce, McDaniel stole the liquor; and I think neither one of my associates would claim there was sufficient evidence of that fact. The whole question of how McDaniel acquired the liquor was submitted to the jury, and no exception was taken to any of the instructions, and the jury found that Scoggins sold the bottle of liquor to McDaniel.

Manifestly, from my viewpoint, this case ought to be affirmed upon the authorities and the reasoning of the opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Taking intoxicating liquor from person of defendant as a sale.

Although the question as to the evidence which will establish a sale of intoxicating liquor within the criminal statutes has been presented with reference to a wide variety of facts and circumstances, a diligent search has failed to disclose any cases other than the reported case (SCOGGINS v. UNITED STATES, ante, 1093) in which the liquor was taken from the person of the defendant, and, as he claims, without his consent. It has been held quite generally, however, that tricks or subterfuge will not be permitted to prevent the transaction being a sale. If the intent to pass title to the liquor for a consideration exists, the form which the transaction takes has not been regarded as material. Obviously, a slight variation in the evidence in the reported case would have made the question a proper one for the jury. The dissenter was of the opinion that the evidence as it stood was sufficient for the purpose.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Coryell County Court (Bell, J.) convicting him of negligent homicide. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. R. Mears, for appellant:

The statement of the court in the presence and hearing of the jury, that he would admit certain evidence because it would do so little harm, was error.

Where the state introduces evidence to the effect that the death of the deceased was caused by another person than the defendant, the court should charge that the burden rested on the state to disprove that the death or drowning was caused by another person than the defendant, and on failure to do so, the defendant should be acquitted.

Mr. E. B. Hendricks, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Lattimore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a misdemeanor case, and it appears from the record that appellant's bills of exceptions were filed more than twenty days after the adjournment of court. An order was made by the court, when overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, allowing him thirty days after adjournment of court in which to file statement of facts and bills of exceptions. The statement of facts and bills of exceptions were filed within thirty days after such adjournment.

The assistant attorney general has moved to strike out the bills of exceptions on file herein on the ground that they were not filed within twenty days after the adjournment of the county court, and consequently came too late, even though filed within thirty days after the said adjournment.

There has been much misapprehension among the courts and litigants as to the course to be pursued in regard to filing statements of facts and bills of exceptions in misdemeanor cases, and many cases have been dismissed in recent years when the parties at interest seemed to think themselves within what appeared to be the direction of the statute in these matters. In view of this fact, we wish to review some of the legislation and decisions bearing upon the question of the time for filing such matters in appeals from county courts, in the hope of arriving at some harmony of understanding.

The 30th legislature, Acts 1907, p. 446, granted to parties trying causes in both district and county courts, the right, by having an order to that effect entered on the docket twenty days after adjournment of the court within which to file statements of facts and bills of exceptions. The same legislature, later in the term, by an act which appears on page 509 of the acts of said legislature, passed a bill which was the re-enactment of what is commonly called the "Stenographers' Bill," a part of which bill provided that all statements of facts and bills of exceptions which were filed as provided in said act would be in time if filed within thirty days after the adjournment of the court. This session of the legislature adjourned April 12, 1907, and said bill took effect thirty days after adjournment. This court, in a number of cases arising during the latter part of 1907 and 1908, pointedly held that under the provisions of the act appearing on page 509, which is chapter 24 of the laws of said 30th legislature, statements of facts and bills of exceptions, in cases appealed from district courts, were properly filed within thirty days after adjournment, but that said act did not apply to appeals from county courts. The act in question did not, in express terms, repeal the act first passed by said legislature, allowing twenty days for filing such matters in both district and county courts; but this court seemed to construe that said law no longer had application to appeals from district courts, the inference being from said decisions that it appeared to the court that said Stenographer's Bill, by implication, at least, repealed said act giving twenty days after adjournment, in so far as it affected district court cases. As stated, these decisions frequently pointed out that in appeals from county courts no change had been made in the law on the point under consideration. See Howard v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 378, 111 S. W. 1038; Dobbs v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 579, 113 S. W. 921; Nichols v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 211, 115 S. W. 1196; Webb v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 117 S. W. 131.

Such was the situation when the legislature met in 1909 and passed a law on this subject. See Acts 1909 (1st Called Sess.) p. 374. Section 7 of this act reads as follows: "When an appeal is taken from the judgment rendered in any cause in any district court or county court, the parties to the suit shall be entitled to and they are hereby granted thirty days after the day of adjournment of court in which to prepare and file a statement of facts and bills of exception; and upon good cause shown the judge trying the cause may extend the time in which to file a statement of facts and bills of exception. Provided, that the court trying such cause shall have power in term, time or in vacation, upon the application of either party, for good cause, to extend the several times as hereinbefore provided for the preparation and filing of the statement of facts and bills of exception, but the same shall not be so extended so as to delay the filing of the statement of facts, together with the transcript of record, in the appellate court within the time prescribed by law, and when the parties fail to agree upon a statement of facts, and that duty devolves upon the court, the court shall have such time in which to do so, after the expiration of the thirty days as hereinbefore provided, as the court may deem necessary, but the court in such case, shall not postpone the preparation and filing of such statement of facts and bills of exception so as to delay the filing of same, together with a transcript of the record in the appellate court within the time prescribed by law. Provided, if the term of said court may by law continue more than eight weeks, said statement of facts and bills of exception shall be filed within thirty days after final judgment shall be rendered unless the court shall by order entered of record in said cause extend the time for filing such statement and bills of exception."

The language of this quoted enactment is plain and unambiguous. It says: "When an appeal is taken from the judgment . . . in any . . . county court, the parties . . . shall be entitled to . . . thirty days after the day of adjournment . . . in which to prepare and file statement of facts and bills of exception."

We cannot believe the legislature wrote county courts and county court procedure in this act carelessly or without purpose. They very well knew that such courts had no official stenographers, and if it be asserted that they only intended giving the right to file such statements and bills within thirty days after adjournment, to county courts in cases where stenographers were appointed, an adequate reply would be that such construction would be a contradiction of the plain words of the statute as written, and would be construing into the law that which the legislature could and would have so stated in a few words had it been their intention.

As we understand it, we need only look to rules of construction when the law is ambiguous and its language not clear, which is not the case in this act.

Appeal—time—construction of statute.

Statute—construction—rules.

The first misdemeanor appeal to come before this court after the taking effect of the Act of 1909, in which this question was involved, was Sanders v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 34, 129 S. W. 605, in which Judge McCord held the act to apply to statements of fact in an appeal from a county court of Erath county, in which he held that the court might consider a statement of facts filed more than thirty days after the adjournment of the term, where the court had made a proper order during the term, extending the time for such filing. In the Sewall Case, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 130 S. W. 1003, an aggravated assault conviction in 1910, Judge Ramsey says the statement of facts was filed more than thirty days after adjournment, and therefore was not filed in time. In Brunk v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 263, 131 S. W. 1125, appealed from the county court of Hamilton county, Judge Davidson says: "The court adjourned on the 23d of October. The statement of facts was filed on the 23d of November. This filing occurred one day too late. A statement of facts must be filed within thirty days . . . after adjournment of the term."

These cases are cited as showing what seems to have been their construction of the Act of 1909 prior to the rendition of the opinion in the Mueller Case, 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 544, 135 S. W. 571, in which the court struck out a statement of facts in a county court cause upon the ground that the statement, being filed more than twenty days after adjournment, came too late. The court in the Mueller Case uses the following language: "By many it seems to have been thought that chapter 39 of the act of the 31st legislature, p. 374, repealed chapter 7 of the act of the 30th legislature. By referring to that act it will be seen that it repeals only chapter 24 of the act of the 30th legislature (the Stenographers' Act), providing their appointment, etc. In the act of the 31st legislature, in § 1, it is provided that the terms of the latter law apply only in the event of the appointment of a court stenographer. In this law there is no provision for the appointment of a court stenographer in criminal cases tried in the county court. By its terms it only applies to and authorizes the appointment of stenographers in criminal cases in district courts."

We think the court is wrong in saying that the Act —repeal—scope. of 1909 repealed only chapter 24, Acts of the 30th Legislature. The repealing clause of chapter 39, Acts of the 31st Legislature, page 374, Acts 1909, is as follows: "That chapter 24, p. 509, Acts of the First Called Session of the Thirtieth Legislature of the State of Texas, providing for the appointment of court stenographers, prescribing their duties, and regulating their charges, and all other laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act, be and the same are hereby expressly repealed; provided, however, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent parties from preparing statements of facts on appeal independent of the transcript of the notes of the official shorthand reporter. Provided, the provisions of this act as to preparing and filing statements of facts and bills of exception shall apply only to cases hereafter tried; as to cases heretofore tried the law now in force shall govern."

From which it clearly appears that not only was chapter 24 repealed, but also all other laws in conflict therewith. We might observe, in this connection, that neither chapter 24 of the Acts of the 30th Legislature, nor chapter 39 of the Acts of the 31st Legislature, expressly repealed chapter 7 of the Acts of the 30th Legislature with reference to appeals from district courts; but it has apparently been conceded by this court, in all its opinions, that said chapter 7 has been repealed as to such district court procedure, because it was in necessary conflict with the later enactments.

The Mueller Case was followed by the Mosher Case, 62 Tex. Crim. Rep. 42, 136 S. W. 467, and by others subsequently; the effect of which decisions was to hold that a statement of facts and bills of exceptions filed more than twenty days after the adjournment of a county court came too late.

The latest statute on the subject seems to be the Act of 1911, chapter 119, § 7, p. 264 of the Acts of the Regular Session (Vernon's Sayles's Anno. Civ. Stat. 1914, art. 2073), which almost in terms re-enacted § 7 of the Act of 1909, quoted above, and said section is carried into our Code Criminal Procedure as article 845. An examination of said section and of article 845, Code Crim. Proc. discloses that the plain language directs the litigant how he may appeal his case as far as the time for filing statement of facts and bills of exception is concerned.

That much confusion has resulted from the efforts of litigants to get their cases before this court under the apparent direction of this article, which, under the Mueller and Mosher Cases cited, was held to have no application to appeals from county courts in criminal matters, is very evident from the number of those cases appealed since the decisions in the above-mentioned cases, and in which statements of facts and bills of exceptions filed well within the time fixed for such action in appeals from county courts under the provision of article 845 have been stricken out, upon motion, because not filed in time.

This, in the opinion of the writer, at least, is very unfortunate. The requisites of appeal in all matters of practice are not easily kept in mind, and most careful litigants go to the statutes to find the same, and our experience is that able lawyers representing them from time to time need to do the same, and we think it is very unfortunate both for the profession and for the appellants to find any lack of harmony between the plain language of the statute and the holdings of this court.

We are not sufficiently wedded to the doctrine of stare decisis, in matters of criminal procedure at least, to deny entrance and consideration here to one who has followed the plain road indicated by a statutory signboard in trying to get here with what he believes to be his wrongs suffered on a trial in the court below.

We overrule the motion of the assistant attorney general to strike from the record these bills of exceptions, and hope to bring about harmonious understanding of the rules by saying that the provisions of article 845 of our Code Crim. Proc. in the opinion of this court, govern appeals in misdemeanor cases as applied to filing of statements of facts and bills of exceptions.

Appellant was convicted in the county court of Coryell county of negligent homicide of the first degree, and his punishment fixed at one year's confinement in the county jail.

It is charged against appellant that he negligently and carelessly turned over a boat in which was a small boy, whose death by drowning was caused therefrom.

Appellant's first contention was that the indictment was defective, in that he claims that the charge of negligent homicide was of the second degree, and not of the first degree. To this we cannot agree. The act, if any, of appellant which caused the death of the boy, was the turning over of the boat, and this act is not a misdemeanor, nor, per se, would the same give just occasion Homicide—negligence—degree. for a civil action.

See Penal Code, art. 1124. Unless the causative act fall within one of these two classes named in the statute referred to, the negligent homicide would be of the first degree.

We think the evidence sought to be elicited from appellant's witness Harris, as set out in his second assignment of error, was clearly erroneous, and that the witness should not have been permitted to state that he considered appellant a cautious man. This was merely hearsay opinion of said witness and was not admissible. The remark of the court was erroneous; but, as the evidence was inadmissible in itself, such error on the part of the court was not reversible. The authorities cited by appellant correctly hold that comments of the court on matters material and admissible, where same are upon the weight of the evidence, and in the presence of the jury, are error.

The charge complained of in appellant's third assignment was substantially given by the court in his main charge, and the other special charge of appellant was on the weight of the testimony and erroneous.

We fail to see any error on the part of the trial court in telling the jury that appellant, who was indicted alone, but who was accompanied by another person who seemed to be

negligence—
co-operation.

acting with him, would be guilty if he, or he and his companion, acting together, committed the offense. This disposes of the fifth ground of complaint made by the appellant.

The remarks of the county attorney in closing the case for the state, as explained by the court in his qualification to the sixth bill of exceptions, seem to have been in response to the argument of counsel for the appellant.

We have carefully reviewed the evidence in this case. The testimony of the six or seven boys, who were in swimming when the appellant and his companion came up to where they were and stated they were going to turn over the boat in which the deceased was, seems to agree as to the main facts; that is, as to what appellant said when he came up, and further, that he was told by the deceased and several of the others that the deceased could not swim; and also to the fact that he did turn over the boat and that thereby deceased was drowned. Appellant denied all these substantial facts; said he did not turn over the boat, that, in fact, it was not turned over, and that he did not make the statements attributed to him by the boys. All these issues were fairly submitted to the jury and by them decided against appellant, and we see no sufficient reason to disturb their verdict.

The cause is affirmed.

A motion for rehearing having been granted, the following additional opinion was handed down on March 12, 1919:

In this case appellant has filed an able and well-prepared motion for rehearing, each ground of which has been carefully examined, and we are unable to sustain any of appellant's contentions, except that we believe we were in error in not upholding his first contention as set forth in his second bill of exceptions.

It therefore appears that, when appellant was introducing his evidence, he asked the witness Harris, in view of his knowledge of appellant, whether he would or would not say that appellant was a cautious, prudent man. To this the state objected for various reasons, and we think the question subject to objection. Thereupon the court made the following remark to state's counsel: "Well, you may be right, but it will do so little harm that I believe I will admit the testimony."

It will be observed that this remark of the trial court was in direct violation of article 787, Code Crim. Proc. which is as follows: "In ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, the judge shall not discuss or comment upon the weight of the same or its bearing in the case but shall simply decide whether or not it is admissible; nor shall he, at any stage of the proceedings previous to the return of a verdict, make any remark calculated to convey to the jury his opinion of the case."

Violations of the injunctions of this article have been the subject of much discussion by the courts, and have given rise to conflicting opinions as to whether this remark or the other, of the trial court, was calculated to convey to the jury the judge's opinion of the case on trial.

It is clear that the framers of our law recognized the strategic position occupied by the judge of a trial court and the weight which the jury attach to his words and acts; and in article 736, Code Crim. Proc., the judge is forbidden to discuss the facts or use any argument in his charge calculated to arouse the sympathy or excite the passion of the jury; and we also see in article 842, Code Crim. Proc., that a judge is forbidden to sum up, discuss, or comment on the evidence in granting or refusing a motion for a new trial. Article 787, supra, is plain, and it is to be regretted that departures from its provisions make difficult the question as to which are, and which are not, reversible errors.

In the McGee Case, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 668, 40 S. W. 967, this court held it was not reversible error for the trial court to say, in overruling the objection of the state: "It is not very material, but it may go to the jury." The trial courts were also, in that opinion, admonished of the danger of expressing an opinion in such matters; but the court held that if the offered testimony was immaterial, or slightly material, and could have had no appreciable effect on the jury, this court would not reverse for such comment.

See similar expressions in Huntley v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 34 S. W. 948. But in the Simmons Case, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 441, 117 S. W. 141, citing the Moore Case, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 306, 26 S. W. 403, and ruling on an objection made by defendant which was sustained, accompanied by the following comment of the trial court, "If there had been any objection made at the start, I might have sustained it on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant," Mr. Justice Ramsey, rendering the opinion, says: "The rule laid down in the first case quoted [Moore Case, supra] ought to be strictly and literally observed; that is, the court ought, without discussion or comment, to rule and either admit or reject proffered testimony. The fact that a statement of the court as to the importance or unimportance of testimony is stated from the bench would often make it no less hurtful than if contained in the written charge. The trial judge is to the jury the Lord's anointed; his language and his conduct have, to them, a special and peculiar weight. Literally, in such matters, his communications should be, yea, yea, and nay, nay."

In approving substantially the opinion of Judge Ramsey, we would not be understood as abrogating the well-settled rule, found in many cases, that remarks of trial courts, in particular comments on evidence, are not necessarily

ments on evidence—error.

reversible error; the rule being that they should not be so considered unless it reasonably appears that injury could have resulted therefrom.

In the instant case, upon more mature reflection upon the effect of the remarks of the court, we are convinced that we were in error in the original opinion in holding that no injury could have resulted from same.

The state had rested its case, and, as disclosed by the statement of facts, the witness Harris was placed upon the stand as appellant's first witness and was asked the question, as above set forth. As stated, the court overruled the state's objection with the statement that "it will do so little harm I believe I will admit the testimony." The average juror very well knows that the court will not admit testimony unless he thinks it to be material, and we think the very admission of this evidence would carry with it to the jury the impression that the court believed it material. Now, when the court says, "It can do no harm," or, "It can do so little harm," there seems to us serious danger that this, in the minds of the jury, would give rise to the belief that the court was of the opinion that the state's case was so strong, or so thoroughly made out, as that the material evidence of the appellant could do little harm. This is more than the expression of the court in the McGee Case or in the Huntley Case; we think it is more in line with the Simmons Case, supra, Chancey v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 56, 124 S. W. 426, Moore Case, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 306, 26 S. W. 403, and the Bradshaw Case, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 222, 70 S. W. 217, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 608. There can be no question but that it is a direct comment on the weight of the evidence, and we cannot say it was not calculated to convey to the jury the court's opinion of the merits of the case.

The motion for rehearing is therefore granted, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ANNOTATION.

Negligent homicide by overturning boat.

The reported case (GRIBBLE v. STATE, ante, 1096) is probably a case of first impression; and the books seem to afford no cases of "rocking the boat," which has caused so many drownings and added a proverbial phrase to the language.

Reference may be made in this connection to Rex v. Waters (1834) 6 Car. & P. (Eng.) 328, where the prisoner was a seaman on board a schooner lying in the river Thames, and the deceased was a person in the habit of going about in a boat among the ships, selling spirits, etc., and they had a dispute about paying for some spirits, both being intoxicated. After a good deal of rough joking between them, the deceased's boat being alongside the schooner, the prisoner pushed it with his foot to get rid of deceased, who, in endeavoring to prevent his boat from drifting away, lost his balance and fell overboard and was drowned. It was held that the facts shown did not amount to manslaughter.

Collisions and the accidental upsetting of one boat by another, or the upsetting of a boat through poor or careless management, are beyond the scope of this note. B. B. B.

Messrs. Turner, Nuzum, & Nuzum for respondent.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant on August 7, 1918, filed his complaint in the superior court against respondent, praying for a divorce, alleging two statutory grounds in two separate causes of action. August 27, 1918, respondent filed her answer, admitting the marriage, denying the grounds alleged for a divorce in toto and in detail, prayed for the dismissal of the action, and at the same time filed her motion, supported by affidavits, for temporary alimony, suit money, and attorneys' fees, to all of which appellant replied. This motion being heard by the court on August 28, 1918, on the pleadings, affidavits, and counter affidavits, the trial court made and entered an order allowing temporary alimony in the sum of $200 per month from August 1, 1918, the first month's instalment to be paid instanter and thereafter on the 1st day of each month; $1,500 suit money to be paid to respondent's attorneys or into the registry of the court, on September 3, 1918, and to be disbursed by them in preparing her defense; and the sum of $3,000 attorneys' fees to be paid into the registry of the court or to respondent's attorneys or their order, on September 3, 1918.

The court reserved the power to make other and further allowances for suit money and attorneys' fees, either pendente lite or at the final hearing, as justice might require.

From this order appellant forthwith appealed and gave his appeal and supersedeas bonds in the sum fixed by the court.

The cause pending here on appeal and a notice to dismiss the appeal were set to be heard on December 17, 1918. On December 9, 1918, respondent made her affidavit to the effect that she and her husband, the appellant, had voluntarily settled, compromised, and adjusted all their differences, resumed their marital relations, were again living together as man and wife, and that she had so notified her attorneys, Messrs. Turner, Nuzum & Nuzum, in writing, on December 9, 1918, and dismissed them as her attorneys and notified them not to appear further in her behalf; that she "is ready, able, and willing to settle with her attorneys for all compensation due them for services rendered her in said cause," etc. Appellant's attorneys presented their motion to vacate, set aside, and hold for naught the order of the lower court appealed from, upon the day of the hearing, and supported the same by the affidavit above mentioned of respondent, and affidavit of appellant to the effect that the parties had voluntarily and amicably settled, adjusted, and compromised all their differences involved in the action, and resumed the relations of husband and wife. A written consent signed by respondent was also filed at the same time, "consenting and stipulating that the motion of appellant to vacate and set aside the order appealed from may be granted" by this court, and counsel for appellant also suggest that the entire controversy is limited by the fact that this or the lower court has no jurisdiction further than to vacate and set aside the order complained of, although not abandoning the appeal on the merits. They also earnestly insist that the attorneys who represented respondent have been discharged and have no status before the court.

On December 5, 1918, prior to notice of discharge, Messrs. Turner, Nuzum, & Nuzum filed in the superior court, where the cause was brought, a written notice and claim of lien as attorneys, for their fees in the proceeding, upon all funds ordered to be paid into the registry of the court under the order of August 28th "by virtue of services rendered under special agreement with defendant, and whereby they were to receive as compensation from her as attorneys in the action all sums which the court should allow as attorneys' fees, either on the preliminary order or on final decree and which they were to accept as their compensation."

No part of the attorneys' fees or suit money has been paid to the attorneys who represented respondent, or into court for them.

The situation now is that both appellant and respondent are asking the reversal, or the annulment, of the order appealed from, without first satisfying respondent's attorneys of record, and respondent, in effect, asks that result through the attorneys for appellant. While she has made affidavit that she is "ready, able, and willing to pay all compensation due the attorneys" who represented her, she has not done so; and she, while they duly represented her under proper authority, invoked the jurisdiction of the court having the subject-matter in its jurisdiction, to compel the payment of her attorneys for their services pending the litigation in part, and for the expense of her defense, out of the property of the plaintiff, her husband. In so proceeding and in support of her application, she made affidavit that she had no money or means, but was penniless and wholly unable to provide suit money or attorneys' fees, while her husband was possessed of property of the value of a million dollars or more.

The allegations against respondent were very defamatory, and she made a very strong showing, in support of her application, that she was wholly innocent of the charges, that her husband was the dupe of business associates and of a conspiracy, of which she was being made the victim, that her defense was in good faith, that she desired no divorce but desired reconciliation with her husband and the resumption of the marriage relations, and that her proper defense would entail very great expense and the procuring of evidence over a vast stretch of territory in and out of this state, and that $10,000 would be a reasonable sum to allow her attorneys and for suit money, preliminarily. At the hearing on the application there were several affidavits and counter affidavits presented to the trial court, and upon the pleadings and the showing made we are quite convinced that there was no abuse of judicial discretion on the part of the trial court in making the preliminary order for allowances to respondent for temporary alimony, suit money, and attorneys' fees. We are obliged so to decide on the merits of the appeal in determining that alone. We are now confronted with the question whether the attorneys who represented respondent can now enforce that order. We are ever ready to encourage the amicable settlement of litigation, more especially of divorce suits. We believe it to be the duty both of trial with respect to reconciliation.~~

courts and appellate courts to lay no straw in the way of the reconciliation of estranged spouses, at any stage of the proceedings. But we do not believe that by such voluntary act of the estranged parties to a divorce suit they can so summarily and without consideration dispose of counsel who, in good faith, performed very valuable services and expended money in behalf of the wife, who is peculiarly protected in such cases by our law.

compensation of

It is asserted that our decision in Hillman v. Hillman, 42 Wash. 595, 114 Am. St. Rep. 135, 85 Pac. 61, is authority for the contention that the attorneys who represented respondent have now no standing as such in this proceeding to have their attorneys' fees settled, but that such fees must be adjusted in actions brought for that purpose. The situation in that case, however, differed from the situation here in that, while an application on behalf of the wife for suit money and attorneys' fees, preliminarily, was pending but no order made, the parties voluntarily composed their differences, and the wife, individually, stipulated to dismiss her action. When the stipulation was presented to the court for action, her attorneys appeared and opposed dismissal on the ground that they had an interest in the action to the extent of their attorneys' fees, and that the parties were powerless to dismiss the action without their consent. The trial court took their view of the matter and allowed them to intervene for their costs and fees, and ordered a hearing, which resulted in findings as to the amount and value of their expenses and services as attorneys and judgment therefor in their favor. True, it was observed in that case that "the measure and mode of compensation of attorneys are, under our statute [Bal. Code, 5165], a matter of private agreement between client and attorney," and that "actions for divorce . . . should not be kept alive merely to settle the claims of counsel for . . . fees."

In the present case the attorneys for the wife have not "intervened." They have already a valid order or judgment for the payment to them of their partial attorneys' fees and suit money. Appellant brought respondent into court at his suit, and she was compelled to employ attorneys for defense to clear her name of the charges brought against her, and to resist the granting of a divorce. The law encourages the thorough defense of all divorce actions. The statute —encouragement of defense. (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 988) empowers the trial court to make such preliminary order to "insure to the wife an efficient preparation of her case, and a fair and impartial trial thereof," which is no more than was ordered in this case. This statutory provision has many times been invoked and invariably sustained. True, as we held in Zent v. Sullivan, 47 Wash. 315, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, 91 Pac. 1088, 15 Ann. Cas. 19, and in Humphries v. Cooper, 55 Wash. 376, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1036, 104 Pac. 606, that "in view of the liberal provisions of this statute [supra], we see no possible reason why the wife is under a necessity to pledge her husband's credit for the expenses of prosecuting or defending an action for divorce in this state, or why she should have any implied power in that regard."

She did not pledge her husband's credit. The law was invoked to render him liable, and the court adjudged him liable. Here the liability of the husband is already fixed and the rights of the attorneys already, to that extent, fixed and acquired. Until reversed, that preliminary liability is final, and we held in State ex rel. Surry v. Superior Ct. 74 Wash. 689, 134 Pac. 178, that such an order for temporary alimony, suit money, and preliminary attorneys' fees is a final judgment, and appealable as such. This being true, and believing the order assailed was well within the discretion of the trial court under the issues and facts presented, we cannot allow the contention of appellant that the attorneys for respondent, upon the cessation of the controversy, have no right to enforce the payment of their attorneys' fees and suit money under the order. The sum awarded the wife in a divorce action as an attorneys' fee is not hers, but her attorneys'. The allowance was made to her for the use and benefit of her attorneys. While the judgment stands in her name she is a dry trustee without power to satisfy the judgment, until her attorneys have been satisfied. The allowance for suit money stands upon the same footing, by virtue of the terms of the order or judgment, but only to the extent of their actual necessary expenses in the "efficient preparation of her defense, in order to secure a fair and impartial trial."

(Zent v. Sullivan, supra), and are probably estopped therefrom by the force and effect of their affidavits in support of the motion for attorneys' fee pendente lite, and their notice of lien claim. But to the extent of the allowance fixed, the same is presumed to be earned, unless the court exceeded a just discretion in making the order, which we cannot find. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," even though an attorney.

The motion to vacate, set aside, and annul the order is denied; the order appealed from is affirmed.

It is probably proper to determine how the remainder of the allowance should be adjusted by the trial court in view of the present situation of the parties and status of the case.

The temporary alimony allowance will, of course, be remitted. Within ten days from the filing of the remittitur from this court in the superior court, the attorneys who represented respondent may file their verified cost bill of all necessary and proper expenditures paid out in preparing her case for trial, which may be moved against by appellant in the usual statutory manner. The lower court may then examine the cost bill and showing made resisting the same and make an order in the premises as the law and facts may dictate. A further order may then be made for the payment of such suit money as may be found due and payable, which, together with the allowance of attorneys' fees, shall be paid to the attorneys who represented respondent, or their order, and execution, or personal attachment, may be had therefor, as provided by § 988, Rem. & Bal. Code. Costs are allowed to respondent or the attorneys who represented her, according to who paid them, as may duly appear.

Main, Fullerton, Mount, and Parker, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Effect of reconciliation of parties to divorce suit on allowance of counsel fees previously made.

The reported case (YODER v. YODER, ante, 1104) holds that the reconciliation of the parties to a divorce suit terminates the action, and the allowance for temporary alimony falls therewith, as does the unexpended balance of the suit money, if any there be; but that an allowance for attorneys' fees, already fixed by the court, is presumed to have been earned, and is unaffected thereby.

In McMakin v. Wickliffe (1894) 16 Ky. L. Rep. 240 (abstract) which is apparently the only other case passing on the question, the court, in an action by a wife for a divorce, fixed the fee for the wife's attorney and ordered it to be taxed as costs against the husband. Subsequently, but before the trial, the parties became reconciled. It was held that the reconciliation and the dismissal of the action by the wife did not relieve the husband of his liability to pay the fee of his wife's attorney, since the husband was bound to pay the costs of both parties, including a reasonable compensation to the attorney of his wife, no matter by what cause the action had been terminated, unless the wife was in fault and had ample estate to pay the costs.

BOROUGH OF PLYMOUTH.

Highway — negligence in crossing — failure to use crossing.

1. One is negligent, as matter of law, in attempting to cross a street at a place other than at a regular crossing which is only 200 feet away and well lighted, in darkness so dense that the ground cannot be seen, and so encumbered with parcels that the arms are of little use in defending against possible accident, and he, therefore, cannot hold the municipality liable for injuries caused by a defect in the roadway.

— negligence in failing to use street crossing.

2. Although pedestrians are not restricted to established street crossings when attempting to pass from one side of a street to the other, when, without reasonable cause, they fail to use a regular crossing they assume the risk of danger arising out of municipal neglect that would have been avoided by using the crossing.

Trial — question for jury — crossing street.

3. Ordinarily the jury must decide whether or not the excuse advanced by a pedestrian, who attempts to cross a street at a place other than a regular crossing, is reasonable in case he is injured by so doing.

— question for court.

4. The court must rule that the attempt of a pedestrian to cross a street at a place other than at a regular crossing was negligence, where no reason for so doing is expressed and no conclusion is derivable from the facts and circumstances of the case except that the choice of the way was negligently made.

[See 13 R. C. L. 298.]

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Luzerne County refusing to take off a compulsory nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Paul J. Sherwood, for appellants:

The evidence clearly supports the allegation, to wit, the negligent condition of that street as to holes.

Kraut v. Frankford & S. P. City Pass. R. Co. 160 Pa. 327, 28 Atl. 783.

The burden was on plaintiff to show that the street had been negligently maintained, that the city either had constructive or actual notice of the defective condition in time to make repairs, and that the defective condition was the proximate cause of the injuries.

McDonald v. Philadelphia, 248 Pa. 147, 93 Atl. 959; Toglatti v. Carrick, 61 Pa. Super. Ct. 244; Cox v. Westchester Turnp. Road Co. 33 Barb. 419; Williams, Mun. Liability for Tort, p. 215; Brownlee v. Alexis, 39 Ill. App.

143; Weisenberg v. Appleton, 26 Wis. 56, 7 Am. Rep. 39; Sisson v. Philadelphia, 248 Pa. 140, 93 Atl. 936.

Ground to found the inference of constructive notice to defendant of the defect complained of was amply laid.

Hibberd v. Philadelphia, 245 Pa. 265, 91 Atl. 486; Von Steuben v. Central R. Co. 185 Pa. 293, 39 Atl. 1118; 2 Addison, Torts, Dudley & B. ed. pp. 1308, 1310.

Mrs. Watts was guilty of no negligence whatever.

v. Westchester Turnp. Road Co. 33 Barb. 414; Allen v. Willard, 57 Pa. 380; Ash. v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. 148 Pa. 133, 23 Atl. 898.

It is the duty of the court to draw not the most unfavorable, but the most favorable, inferences which the jury might, with the least degree of propriety, draw in favor of the plaintiffs.

Feay v. Decamp, 15 Serg. & R. 227; Fisher v. Monongahela C. R. Co. 131 Pa. 292, 18 Atl. 1016; Baker v. Westmoreland & C. Natural Gas Co. 157 Pa. 593, 27 Atl. 789; Cox v. Westchester Turnp. Road Co. 33 Barb. 414; Elston v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 196 Pa. 595, 46 Atl. 938, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 345; Davidson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 179 Pa. 227, 36 Atl. 291, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 182.

Messrs. J. Q. Creveling and Charles Kuschke, for appellee:

Plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and not entitled to recover.

Hentz v. Somerset, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 225; Buzby v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 126 Pa. 559, 12 Am. St. Rep. 919, 17 Atl. 895; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Cadow, 120 Pa. 559, 6 Am. St. Rep. 730, 14 Atl. 450; Tolan v. Philadelphia, 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 311; Burns v. Bradford, 137 Pa. 361, 11 L.R.A. 726, 20 Atl. 997; Haven v. Pittsburgh & A. Bridge Co. 151 Pa. 620, 25 Atl. 811.

Plaintiff under a general allegation cannot recover or prove damages for injuries and consequences which do not necessarily or immediately flow from the injury.

Clark v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 68 App. Div. 49, 74 N. Y. Supp. 267.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff received her injury while attempting to cross over the main street in the borough of Plymouth to a point alongside the track of an electric street railway occupying the middle of the street where she intended to board an approaching car. The point where she expected to take the car was not a scheduled stopping place, but, because of greater convenience it afforded to shoppers, cars were allowed to stop at that point, on signal, to receive passengers. The scheduled stopping place was but a short distance above, and there was there a public crossing. The accident occurred between 6 and 7 o'clock on the evening of the 9th of October, 1909. The plaintiff had been trading in one of the stores facing on this particular street, almost directly opposite the point where she expected to take the car. She left the store carrying three packages of merchandise in her right arm, and a pail containing other merchandise with her left hand. When she stepped from the store and reached the pavement, it was dark, too dark to permit of her seeing what was immediately about her, but, being entirely familiar with her surroundings from frequent visits to this store, and knowing well of the existence of a public crossing a short distance above, and observing from where she stood on the pavement that the crossing was lighted, for no apparent reason other than to avoid the necessity of following the pavement until she reached the crossing, encumbered as she was she stepped from the pavement into the street. She had proceeded but a little way when she stepped into a depression in the street and fell upon the pail she was carrying, thereby receiving the injury of which she complains. In the immediate neighborhood where she fell there were several depressions in the street, but into which one of these the plaintiff stepped is a fact not clearly disclosed. On cross-examination she admitted that she had often alighted from the car at its regular stopping place; that in going to and from the store on such occasions she had walked up and down the sidewalk leading to and from the store, and that it and the crossing together made a perfectly safe way for her to travel. At the conclusion of the evidence a nonsuit was granted, and the appeal is from the refusal of the court to take it off.

Pedestrians are not restricted to the use of established street crossings when they attempt to pass from one side of the street to the other. They have a right to cross at whatever point they elect. But, since it is matter of common knowledge that crossings, where they exist, have been constructed for their exclusive accommodation and use, and that the individual pedestrian is less exposed to accident in using the crossing than when he attempts to cross the street elsewhere, it is only reasonable to expect him to use the crossing, except as he has sufficient ground to reject it. When without reasonable excuse he does reject it and adopt another way, he takes upon himself the risk of every danger arising out of municipal neglect that would have been avoided had he used the established crossing. The rule of law governing in such case is thus stated by Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, 4th ed. § 1008: "Street crossings are constructed for the use of foot passengers; but if these happen to be obstructed or to be in such a dangerous condition as to deter an ordinarily prudent man from using them, then one may walk elsewhere. If he does so, however, without sufficient reason, and is injured, his injury cannot be imputed to the negligence of the city." Ordinarily it must be for the jury to decide whether an excuse advanced for rejecting a crossing is reasonable or otherwise; but cases arise, and this is one of them, where no reason at all is expressed, and no conclusion is derivable from the facts and circumstances of the case, except that the choice of way was inconsiderately and negligently made. When this appears, it is the duty of the court to so pronounce.

court.

The plaintiff charges culpable negligence on the part of the municipality in allowing the depression into which she stepped to exist. Let the negligence be conceded; yet this concession is so manifestly unfair to the defendant in the light of plaintiff's own testimony that we reluctantly make it, even for the purpose of argument, for she testified, notwithstanding several of her witnesses speak of a number of more or less serious depressions in the street at this particular point, that she was entirely familiar with the place, having repeatedly crossed the street at the same place, and had never noticed any depressions, and had no reason to believe any existed on the way she had adopted for her crossing. But let it be so. What she attempted to do was to cross over a public street at nighttime where there was no defined pathway, when it was so dark that she could not see the ground before her, and with her arms so encumbered that she could make little or no use of them in defending herself against possible accident.

negligence in crossing—failure
to use crossing.

She chose this way, knowing that by passing down the sidewalk a distance of 150 or 200 feet she could reach a public crossing which she was familiar with, well lighted, and which afforded, as she admits, a safe way. Even admitting that she did not know of the existence of the defect she encountered in the highway, there was more than enough in the circumstances under which she advanced upon the street to put her on guard, and charge her with voluntarily and unnecessarily undertaking to test the safety of a public street when she knew that the dangers such as she there encountered and which caused her injury would be avoided by adopting another and entirely convenient course which the municipality had provided for pedestrians. The nonsuit in the case was properly entered. The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Crossing street elsewhere than at regular crossing as contributory negligence precluding recovery for injury from defect or obstruction.

I. General rule.

It is generally held that it is not, as a matter of law, contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injuries received on account of a defect or obstruction in a street, to cross the street elsewhere than at a regular crossing.

Virginia. — Winchester v. Carroll (1901) 99 Va. 727, 40 S. E. 37.

"The use of the public streets between crossings is not limited solely to animals and vehicles, but may be used by footmen, due caution being exercised." Denver v. Sherret (Fed.) supra.

"The traveler has the right to use the street by passing across it at a point where there is no crosswalk, and in doing so he does assume a greater risk from passing vehicles and animals using the main thoroughfare than he does when passing over a crosswalk, but he does not in doing so assume any greater risk from obstructions other than those necessary for the use of some public utility, such as water plugs, telegraph and telephone poles, and the like." Augusta v. Tharpe (Ga.) supra.

"A person who attempted to cross a street at a place other than the crossing provided for that purpose is bound to use care proportionate to the known danger; but if he knows of no dangerous excavation or obstruction, he has a right to assume that all parts of the street intended for travel are reasonably fit for that purpose." Indianapolis v. Schoenig (Ind.) supra.

"A divergence or departure from the crosswalks is ordinarily not an evidence of want of care. Pedestrians have a right to cross a street at any point, and it is the common practice to do so." Olathe v. Mizee (Kan.) supra.

"The law does not require a pedestrian to confine himself to the sidewalks of a city. He may, through caprice or for pleasure, use the street as well." Junction City v. Blades (1898) 59 Kan. 774, 52 Pac. 444.

"The rule in this state is that a pedestrian may cross the street at any point without the imputation of negligence." Louisville v. Haugh (Ky.) supra.

"If a municipality provides suitable and convenient crossings, pedestrians cannot expect the whole of the thoroughfare to be kept as clean and smooth as the sidewalks; but unless he has notice of some defect, or by the use of due care could discover it, a person who crosses a street at a place other than a fixed crossing cannot be said to be thereby necessarily guilty of negligence." Magaha v. Hagerstown (Md.) supra.

"There is no law, or principle of law or of reason, which confines foot passengers to particular crossings. Such a restriction would be very inconvenient and annoying. The street should be kept in such condition that foot passengers may be able to cross with a reasonable degree of safety, using proper care themselves, at any and all places." Raymond v. Lowell (Mass.) supra.

"A person desiring to cross the street, either in the nighttime or in the daytime, is not confined to a crossing. He has a right to assume that all parts of the street intended for travel are reasonably safe; and if in the nighttime he desires to cross from one side to the other, and knows of no dangerous excavation in the street or other obstruction, he may cross at any point that suits his convenience, without being liable to the imputation of negligence." Brusso v. Buffalo (N. Y.) supra.

II. Application of rule.

In Denver v. Sherret (1898) 31 C. C. A. 499, 60 U. S. App. 104, 88 Fed. 226, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 520, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by the fall of an electric light pole, while crossing a street diagonally, and not at a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing at a point other than a regular crossing, as there was nothing to charge her with notice that she incurred greater danger in crossing diagonally. The mere fact of crossing a street diagonally, the court said, did not in itself amount to contributory negligence, as she had the right to cross at any point.

69, 50 So. 919, it was held that a pedestrian was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in crossing a street at a point other than a regular crossing and running into a "stump" of a telegraph pole. The question whether or not he used due care was held to be for the jury.

In District of Columbia v. Duryee (1907) 29 App. D. C. 327, 10 Ann. Cas. 675, it was held that the plaintiff had the right to cross a street at a place other than a regular crossing without the imputation of negligence, but was bound to use more care than would be necessary at a regular crossing, because of the probability of lawful obstructions being along the curb.

In Augusta v. Tharpe (1901) 113 Ga. 152, 38 S. E. 389, it appeared that a barbed wire had been stretched between two poles at the curb, and about 4 feet from the ground. The plaintiff, a boy about twelve years of age, in attempting to run across the street at this point, which was not a regular crossing, ran into the wire and was cut about the face. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

In Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Howell (1905) 124 Ga. 1050, 58 S. E. 577, 4 Ann. Cas. 707, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 35, it was held that it was not contributory negligence for a pedestrian to cross a street at a point where there was no crosswalk, and that he did not assume any greater risk from obstructions than if he used the crosswalk, although he might assume a greater risk from passing vehicles and animals using the main thoroughfare.

In Indianapolis v. Schoenig (1911) 48 Ind. App. 76, 95 N. E. 324, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street at a point other than a regular crossing, the court saying: "If a person in walking diagonally across a street which he knows to be paved with brick or asphalt were to be injured by falling into an excavation in said street, negligently left open and unguarded, he surely ought not to be held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, merely because he was not using the crossing. If he knew the dangerous condition of the street a different question would be presented."

In Princeton v. Gutheridge (1918) — Ind. App. —, 118 N. E. 584, it appeared that the plaintiff stepped into a hole in a public street, in crossing the street diagonally near a crossing. This hole was formed by the absence or removal of bricks which formed the pavement, and was filled with leaves. It was, therefore, not easily discoverable. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing the street diagonally.

In Bell v. Clarion (1902) 115 Iowa, 357, 88 N. W. 824, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate crossed a street at a point not a regular crossing, and was killed in attempting to reach the sidewalk, by the giving way of a board on which she was walking. It was held that she was not guilty of negligence per se in crossing where she did.

In Rea v. Sioux City (1905) 127 Iowa, 615, 103 N. W. 949, it was held that it was not negligence per se for the plaintiff to attempt to reach a sidewalk from a point in the street not a regular crossing point. The plaintiff tripped over a stake in the sidewalk, of which he had knowledge, but the exact location of which he did not remember. The court held that the question of his negligence was for the jury.

In Middleton v. Cedar Falls (1915) 173 Iowa, 619, 153 N. W. 1040, it was held that no negligence could be charged against the plaintiff in crossing a street diagonally instead of at a regular crossing, as a pedestrian may cross at any point, providing he uses ordinary care and caution in doing so.

But see O'Laughlin v. Dubuque (1876) 42 Iowa, 539, wherein it was held that a pedestrian must use the crosswalks in crossing a street unless they are obstructed or dangerous, and if without sufficient reason he crosses elsewhere he will be guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover. On a second appeal, however, (1879) 52 Iowa, 746, 3 N. W. 655, it was held that there was sufficient evidence to show that the crossing was dangerous, and that the plaintiff had the right to cross elsewhere.

In Olathe v. Mizze (1892) 48 Kan. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 308, 39 Pac. 754, it appeared that the plaintiff was crossing a street at a narrow crosswalk, and, in stepping aside to avoid persons coming toward her, fell into an excavation at the side of the crossing and was injured. It was held that she was not guilty of contributory negligence in diverging from the crosswalk, as she had the right to cross at any point without the imputation of negligence.

In Junction City v. Blades (1898) 59 Kan. 774, 52 Pac. 444, it was held that a pedestrian may use any part of a street and is not necessarily obliged to use the sidewalks, but he must use reasonable care to avoid such dangers as he knows or has reasonable ground to believe will beset him.

In Williams v. Parsons (1912) 87 Kan. 649, 125 Pac. 60, it appeared that the plaintiff tripped over a guy wire stretched from a telephone pole across or near to a path used by pedestrians, although there was no sidewalk. The court held that negligence could not be imputed to the plaintiff from the mere fact that she crossed the street where there was no crosswalk, although there was a crosswalk on the other side of the street.

In Louisville v. Johnson (1902) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 685, 69 S. W. 803, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by one end of a heavy iron plate falling on his foot. The plate had been raised by a wagon passing over the other end of it. This plate was used as a gutter cover, and was close to a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing over this iron plate instead of using the regular crossing, as pedestrians might cross at any point in the street.

In Glasgow v. Gillenwaters (1902) 113 Ky. 140, 67 S. W. 381, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in leaving the sidewalk and crossing a street at a point not a regular crossing, whereby he was injured by running into a barbed wire stretched across the roadway at a height of 5 feet from the ground. It did not appear that the plaintiff had knowledge of this obstruction, and as it was nighttime, he could not see it.

In Covington v. Whitney (1907) 30 Ky. L. Rep. 659, 99 S. W. 337, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by tripping over a plank which projected above the curb at a part of the street which was not a regular crossing. It was held that she was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing at this point, as she had the right to cross at any point which she believed safe, provided she used ordinary care in so doing.

In Louisville v. Haugh (1914) 157 Ky. 643, 163 S. W. 1101, 5 N. C. C. A. 213, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by stepping into a hole in a street, while attempting to cross the street at a place other than a regular crossing. It was held that no negligence could be imputed to the plaintiff from the fact that she attempted to cross at a point not a regular crossing, as persons might cross at any point in a street, the only question being whether they exercised ordinary care.

In Lorenz v. New Orleans (1905) 114 La. 802, 38 So. 566, it was held that a child nine years old could not be held guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street diagonally instead of at the regular crossing, it appearing that while so doing he was injured by reason of a rotten cover of a fire well giving way.

In Weber v. Union Development & Constr. Co. (1907) 118 La. 77, 42 So. 652, 12 Ann. Cas. 1012, it appeared that the plaintiff, while running diagonally across a street at night, in order to catch a street car on the far side of the street, fell over a barrier which had been thrown down and was lying on the ground. It was held that the plaintiff might cross at any point in the street without being guilty of contributory negligence, and was not confined to the regular crossing.

In Nessen v. New Orleans (1914) 134 La. 455, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, 64 So. 286, it was held that a person might run across a street to catch a car at any place along the street, and would not be guilty of contributory negligence in failing to use the regular crossing.

In Magaha v. Hagerstown (1902) 95 Md. 62, 93 Am. St. Rep. 317, 51 Atl. 832, it appeared that the plaintiff fell on a ridge of ice in the middle of a street while crossing at a point not a regular crosswalk. It was held that the plaintiff had the right to cross at any place without negligence being imputed to him, provided he did not know of the obstruction, and used ordinary care.

In Raymond v. Lowell (1850) 6 Cush. (Mass.) 524, 53 Am. Dec. 57, it was held that it is not negligence to attempt to cross a strip between the sidewalk and the street, but that the pedestrian must exercise a caution and prudence adapted to the nature of the case, and has no right to assume that such a space is smooth and even. Pedestrians, it was held, may cross a street at any and all places, and are not confined to particular crossings.

In Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. (1889) 149 Mass. 335, 4 L.R.A. 213, 14 Am. St. Rep. 427, 21 N. E. 482, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 80, it was held that a person was not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street at a point other than a regular crossing, but might cross at any point, provided he used due care; and a recovery was allowed against a railroad company which had torn up the street to lay rails.

In Slee v. Lawrence (1894) 162 Mass. 405, 38 N. E. 708, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by falling over a pile of rails which was in the street near the curb. The place where the rails were piled was dark and was not a regular crossing point. It was held that the plaintiff had the right to cross the street at the point where he did, and that the question of whether he used due care was for the jury.

In Keith v. Worcester & B. V. Street R. Co. (1907) 196 Mass. 478, 82 N. E. 680, it appeared that the plaintiff tripped over some rails as she was about to cross a street to board a street car. It was held that she was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street at a point other than a regular crossing, as she had a right to cross at any point, and was not bound to exercise any greater degree of care than in using a regular crossing.

In Lincoln v. Detroit (1894) 101 Mich. 245, 59 N. W. 617, it was held that the plaintiff was not negligent in crossing a street at a place other than a crosswalk, and in passing over a manhole, the cover of which was defective.

In Baker v. Grand Rapids (1897) 111 Mich. 447, 69 N. W. 740, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 90, it appeared that the plaintiff, in attempting to cross a street diagonally in the nighttime, fell into an excavation being made for a catch-basin, and was injured. It was held that he had the right to cross the street at any point, whether a regular crossing or not, and was not guilty of contributory negligence in so doing.

In Monje v. Grand Rapids (1900) 122 Mich. 645, 81 N. W. 574, it appeared that the plaintiff attempted to board a car by crossing a street diagonally, and fell into a trench near the car track. The court held that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

In Finch v. Bangor (1903) 133 Mich. 149, 94 N. W. 738, it was held that the plaintiff was not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street diagonally, 10 or 15 feet from a street corner. The accident occurred at night, and was caused by the plaintiff tripping over a board left by the village authorities in constructing a sidewalk.

In Collins v. Dodge (1887) 37 Minn. 503, 35 N. W. 368, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross a street at a point not a regular crossing, by reason whereof he fell into an excavation in the street and was injured.

In Heckman v. Evenson (1897) 7 N. D. 173, 73 N. W. 427, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in attempting to cross a street in the nighttime, at a point not a regular crossing; but that he had the right to cross at any point which might suit his convenience, and that in so doing he had the right to presume that the street was reasonably safe for its entire width, and free from dangers to travelers.

In Brusso v. Buffalo (1882) 90 N. Y. 679, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by falling into an excavation in a street while attempting to cross the street at a point not a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff had the right to cross at any point which suited his convenience, without being liable to the imputation of negligence, provided he did not know of the defect and used due care.

In Bennett v. Sing Sing (1891) 38 N. Y. S. R. 347, 14 N. Y. Supp. 463, it was held that the plaintiff had the right to cross a street at any point without being guilty of contributory negligence, as she had the right to assume that all parts of the street were reasonably safe.

In Crowther v. Yonkers (1891) 39 N. Y. S. R. 347, 15 N. Y. Supp. 588, affirmed without opinion in (1892) 133 N. Y. 602, 30 N. E. 1149, it appeared that the plaintiff had attempted to cross a street at a place other than a regular crossing, and fell into a trench 8 feet deep, which was unlighted and unguarded, and could not be seen in the darkness. It was held that she had the right to cross at other points than at the regular crossings, and that she was free from contributory negligence.

In Fox v. Manchester (1905) 183 N. Y. 141, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 474, 75 N. E. 1116, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 416, it was held that the plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, because he crossed the street at a point other than at a crosswalk, and in so doing came in contact with a live wire and was killed.

In Durbin v. Napoleon (1900) 21 Ohio C. C. 160, 11 Ohio C. D. 584, it appeared that the plaintiff fell into an excavation in a street while attempting to cross the street at a point not a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence per se in attempting to cross a street at a place not a regular crossing, and could recover if she used ordinary care, and did not know of the defect.

In Barnesville v. Ward (1911) 85 Ohio St. 1, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 94, 96 N. E. 937, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1234, it was held that it was not negligence per se to attempt to cross a street other than where there were passageways, over a parked space between the curb and the sidewalk. The plaintiff tripped over a wire attached to stakes, which was intended to keep people off the park strip, but of which the plaintiff had no notice. Compare Groveport v. Bradfield (1887) 2 Ohio C. C. 145, 1 Ohio C. D. 411, wherein it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in crossing a street in a diagonal direction, and not at a regular crossing, the court saying that a person in crossing a street must do so by using the most direct route, and that any deviation therefrom will be negligence per se.

In Dayton v. Taylor (1900) 62 Ohio St. 11, 56 N. E. 480, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 328, it appeared that the plaintiff crossed a street diagonally in the nighttime, and in some way slipped and fell into a catch-basin used to drain off surface water, which was off the traveled way of pedestrians. The court held that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and could not recover; saying that in departing from the crosswalks he assumed all of the risks which lay in the path which he chose for himself.

In Ft. Worth v. Johnson (1892) 84 Tex. 137, 19 S. W. 362, it appeared that the plaintiff fell into a ditch in the roadway of a street, while attempting to cross the street in the nighttime in a diagonal direction. It was held that no negligence could be imputed to the plaintiff from the mere fact that he crossed the street in this manner. He had the right to assume that the highway was safe, as he had no knowledge of the existence of the ditch.

In Dallas v. Webb (1899) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 54 S. W. 398, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by stepping on a grating over a drain pipe on a city street, at a point not a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in crossing at this point, but could cross the street at any point without negligence being imputed to her.

III. Rule in Missouri.

There is a conflict in the cases in Missouri. In Plummer v. Milan (1899) 79 Mo. App. 439, it was held that the plaintiff was not necessarily guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery, from the mere fact that she attempted to leave the sidewalk at a point other than a public crossing of the street. The court said: "We are not aware of any case in this state or elsewhere that has gone to the extent of holding it to be negligence per se in a pedestrian who is injured while passing from a sidewalk into a public street, with a view of crossing the same at a point other than at a public crossing. . . . The law does not pronounce plaintiff's act negligent, neither did it pronounce such act prudent."

In Holding v. St. Joseph (1902) 92 Mo. App. 143, it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross a street at a place not a regular crossing, which she had reached by crossing a vacant lot. It was held that she was not using the street in the usual and ordinary manner, and that she could not recover for the injury sustained. The earlier case of Plummer v. Milan, supra, was not referred to in deciding this case.

IV. Rule in Pennsylvania.

In Pennsylvania there is a conflict in the decisions. The earlier cases followed the general rule as heretofore stated, that it is not contributory negligence to cross a street elsewhere than at a regular crossing. Miller v. Lewistown Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. (1905) 212 Pa. 593, 62 Atl. 32; McIlhenney v. Philadelphia (1906) 214 Pa. 44, 63 Atl. 368.

In Miller v. Lewistown Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. supra, it appeared that the plaintiff came in contact with a live wire, and was killed.

The accident occurred at a point not a regular crossing, and the defendant claimed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in crossing at a point other than a regular crossing. It was held that the plaintiff was not necessarily negligent in crossing where he did, but it was for the jury to determine from all the facts of the case.

In McIlhenney v. Philadelphia, supra, it was held that the plaintiff, a pedestrian, could cross a street at any point to suit her convenience, and was not confined to the regular crossings at the intersections of streets, but in so doing she was bound to exercise care according to the circumstances, and as it appeared she did not look where she was going, and tripped over a curbstone, it was held she had been properly nonsuited.

But in the reported case (WATTS v. PLYMOUTH, ante, 1110), it is held that it is contributory negligence for a person to attempt to cross a street on a dark night at a place not a regular crossing, when there is a perfectly safe and well-lighted crossing a short distance away.

In Tolan v. Philadelphia (1908) 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 311, the fact that the plaintiff crossed the street diagonally was not emphasized, but she was held to be negligent because in so crossing she did not look where she was going, and stepped into a plainly visible hole in the pavement. See to the same effect, Easton v. Philadelphia (1904) 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 517.

V. Rule in Canada.

In Canada, the cases do not follow the general rule. In Belling v. Hamilton (1902) 3 Ont. L. Rep. 318, it appeared that the plaintiff fell into a slight depression in the asphalt paving of a street, while attempting to cross in a diagonal direction at a point 30 feet from a crossing. It was held that, as the roadway was not sufficiently out of repair to be at all dangerous to horses or vehicles, the plaintiff could not recover.

In Breen v. Toronto (1910) 2 Ont. Week. N. 87, 17 Ont. Week. Rep. 41, it appeared that the plaintiff attempted to cross a boulevard on which there were street car tracks, and which was being repaired, at a point which was not a regular crossing, and in so doing fell over some blocks of stone and broke her leg. It was held that, as there was a city ordinance prohibiting persons from crossing boulevards except at crossings, the plaintiff had no right to cross where she did, and therefore could not recover.

ASSERINA NEILLSON

v.

CITY OF WORCESTER.

(219 Mass. 88, 106 N. E. 579.)

Highway — depression in walk — defect — slippery condition.

1. A slight depression to carry water along the center of a sidewalk constructed on a grade is not a defect so as to render the municipality liable for injury to a pedestrian, caused by falling upon the walk when the depression was filled with ice, under a statute relieving the municipality from liability for injuries caused by the slippery condition of a walk if the place where the accident occurred was otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers.

— absence of railing along sidewalk — defect.

2. The removal by a municipality of a portion of a railing which it had erected along a sidewalk ascending a hill, to assist pedestrians up and down, is not a defect which will render the municipality liable for injuries caused by its absence, if it was not required by law to maintain it.

Proximate cause — depression in sidewalk — ice.

3. A slight depression in a sidewalk laid on a steep grade, to carry away surface water, is not the proximate cause of injury to a pedestrian falling upon ice which had filled the depression.

Highways — defective walk — projecting stone.

4. A city cannot be held liable for injuries caused by the fall of a pedestrian upon a sidewalk because there was a stone projecting from the surface of the walk in the vicinity of the accident, if there is nothing to show that it contributed in anyway to the accident.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County (Sanderson, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by a fall on a defective sidewalk, which resulted in a verdict for defendant. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Marvin M. Taylor, Marvin C. Taylor, and John H. Mathews, for plaintiff:

The hand rail upon George street, as erected in pursuance of the order of the city council, was a part of the structure of the street and sidewalk, which the city was bound to maintain in proper repair, and it is liable to the plaintiff for the injuries suffered by her as a result of its failure to do so.

Pinkham v. Topsfield, 104 Mass. 78; Fitzgerald v. Woburn, 109 Mass. 204; Hodges v. Waterloo, 109 Iowa, 444, 80

N. W. 523; Ford v. Des Moines, 106 Iowa, 94, 75 N. W. 630; 10 Cyc. 1155 et seq; Hoyt v. Danbury, 69 Conn. 341, 37 Atl. 1051, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 524; Miller v. Bradford, 186 Pa. 164, 40 Atl. 409; Coles v. Revere, 181 Mass. 175, 63 N. E. 430; Leonard v. Boston, 183 Mass. 68, 66 N. E. 596; Alger v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 402; Hinckley v. Somerset, 145 Mass. 326, 14 N. E. 166; Thompson v. Boston, 212 Mass. 211, 98 N. E. 700; Powers v. Boston, 154 Mass. 60, 27 N. E. 995; McMahon v. Harvard, 213 Mass. 20, 99 N. E. 458; Barron v. Watertown, 211 Mass. 46, 97 N. E. 622; Palmer v. Andover, 2 Cush. 600.

The city, by erecting the rail as an assistance in making the ascent or descent of the street in times of snow or ice, voluntarily assumed the duty of giving such assistance, and of maintaining the rail as constructed for that purpose, and it is a question for the jury whether the duty was performed and whether, if not, that was the cause of the plaintiff's injury.

Black v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 193 Mass. 448, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 79 N. E. 797, 9 Ann. Cas. 485; Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Cleveland v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 211 Mass. 75, 97 N. E. 623; Miller v. Bradford, 186 Pa. 164, 40 Atl. 409; Collins v. Greenfield, 172 Mass. 78, 51 N. E. 454; Dickinson v. Boston, 188 Mass. 595, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 664, 75 N. E. 68; Freeport v. Isbell, 83 Ill. 440, 25 Am. Rep. 407; Baltimore v. Beck, 96 Md. 183, 53 Atl. 976, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 313.

Crosby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 18, to recover for personal injuries received by the plaintiff by reason of falling upon a sidewalk on the northerly side of George street, a public way in the defendant city. George street runs westerly from Main street, and its grade rises from Main street over 3 feet in the first 25 feet, and 15 feet in the first 100 feet. The plaintiff fell upon the sidewalk at a point 8 or 10 feet from the intersection of George street with the west line of Main street, and nearly at the foot of the grade. The sidewalk was constructed with a slight depression in the center running up the hill, for the purpose of conveying away water which came upon the sidewalk.

There was evidence to show that from Main street for the first 10 feet the sidewalk was of concrete, and that in the surface of the walk cobblestones of different sizes were embedded, some of which had been worn smooth, and some projected a little way above the surface,—one of them a large cobblestone, standing up 1 inch above the surface of the walk.

The evidence further showed that an iron railing had been constructed along the outer edge of the walk; that it was erected in the year 1896, by order of the city council, "as an assistance in making the ascent or descent of that street in times of snow or ice." This railing, when originally erected, extended along the walk from the intersection of George street with Main street, but at the time of the accident the lower end of it, for a distance of 4 or 5 feet, had been removed. The plaintiff testified that she had hold of this railing as she descended the hill, and when she reached the end of the railing she started to cross to the northerly side of the walk, stepped upon an accumulation of ice, and fell, receiving the injuries complained of.

1. The city was under no legal obligation to erect the railing or to maintain it afterwards; and the fact that a portion of it had been removed did not create any liability on the part of the defendant. It was not such a railing as may be required under Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 18, but apparently was constructed for the convenience and assistance of travelers upon the street, and not in the performance of a legal duty. It is plain that the removal of a portion of it did not constitute a defect in the way.

absence of railing along sidewalk—defect.

2. The plaintiff contends that the sidewalk was defective by reason of the depression caused by the channel in the center.

The immediate cause of the plaintiff's fall was the presence of slippery ice upon the walk at the place where she attempted to cross over. Since the passage of Stat. 1896, chap. 540, now Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 19, a city or town is not liable for an injury received upon a way by reason of snow or ice thereon, "if the place at which the injury was sustained was, at the time of the accident, otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers."

One Thompson, a civil engineer, testified that he made measurements of the walk about three years after the accident, and that "the width of the sidewalk between the buttress and the south edge of the curb is close to 4 feet; then the path covered with concrete is 3 foot 6 inches, the curb being 6 inches wide." This witness also testified that the method adopted by him in making measurements for the purpose of ascertaining the depression in the walk was by laying a straight edge from the curb to the northerly line of the street; and that such measurement indicated a depression in the center of the walk, at the point where the plaintiff testified she fell, of from  $1\frac{1}{4}$  to  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inches.

When the steep grade upon this street is considered, we do not think that so slight a depression in the walk, made for the purpose of carrying away surface water, could be found to be a defect in the absence of snow or ice, and that the latter must be found to be the sole proximate cause of the accident. We are of opinion also that, if the depression could be found to be a defect, it was not operative as such at the time of the accident, and was not, either wholly or in part, the proximate cause of it. Further, the plaintiff is precluded from recovering by the law as stated in Newton v. Worcester, 174 Mass. 181, 54 N. E. 521, in which Hammond, J., used the following language (p. 187): "We think the proper and only reasonable interpretation of the statute is that, wherever ice or snow is the sole proximate cause of the accident, there shall be no liability; but where at the time of the accident there is any other defect, to which as a proximate cause the accident is in part attributable, there may be a liability notwithstanding the fact that it also may be attributable in part to ice or snow. This other defect, however, is not a proximate cause within the meaning of this rule, simply because it causes the accumulation of the ice or snow."

3. As to the contention that the ice upon the walk was caused by water which the city allowed to come from the adjoining building and discharge upon the walk, without considering other objections to this claim, there is no evidence to show that the ice upon which the plaintiff fell was caused by water which came from this building. The only testimony upon this matter came from the witness Thompson, who described the conditions as they existed three years after the accident.

4. The plaintiff further contends that the street was defective because of a large cobblestone which "stood up 1 inch above the surface of the walk" in the vicinity of the place where the plaintiff fell, and that it was rough and uneven. But there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff's fall was caused by this stone, or that it constituted a defect that contributed as a proximate cause, either in whole or in part, to the plaintiff's injury.

We do not think the jury would have been warranted in finding upon the evidence that this sidewalk, when bare, was not reasonably safe and convenient for travelers. Newton v. Worcester, 169 Mass. 516, 48 N. E. 274, 174 Mass. 181, 54 N. E. 521; Bailey v. Cambridge, 174 Mass. 188, 54 N. E. 523; Hadden v. Somerville, 197 Mass. 480, 83 N. E. 1105; Hitchcock v. Boston, 201 Mass. 299, 87 N. E. 470.

Highways—
defective walk—
projecting stone.

Proximate cause —depression in
sidewalk—ice.

—depression in
slippery condition.

The ruling of the judge of the Superior Court was correct.
Exceptions overruled.

NOTE.

The reported case (NEILLSON v. WORCESTER, ante, 1120) rests upon the ground that the slight depression in the sidewalk, in view of its purpose, the grade of the walk, and other circumstances, was not a defect in the walk, or, if so, was not a proximate cause of the accident, and hence did not deprive the municipality of the statutory immunity from liability for injuries by reason of snow or ice, if the place is otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers. The general subject of the liability of municipalities for injuries resulting from the slippery condition of walks, concurring with defects therein, is treated in the annotation beginning at page 1130, post. Other cases involving the construction and effect of the Massachusetts statute referred to in the reported case will be found at page 1143 of that note.

P. M. WREN, Respt.,
v.
CITY OF SEATTLE, Appt.

Highway — defect in sidewalk — contribution of ice.

1. The excusable existence of snow and ice on a sidewalk, operating merely as a contributing condition in causing an injury by some inherent defect in the walk, does not relieve the municipality from liability for injuries caused by the inherent defect.

2. A municipal corporation is not ordinarily liable for accidents occasioned by mere slipperiness caused by natural accumulations of snow or ice on its sidewalks not so prominent or rough as in themselves to constitute an obstruction, provided they have not been permitted to remain for an unreasonable length of time in view of all the circumstances.

Trial — requested instruction — refusal.

3. A requested instruction in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by a fall on a sidewalk, that there can be no recovery if the fall was caused by smooth ice or snow, is properly refused if it does not contain the qualification that the icy condition had not been permitted to remain for an unreasonable time in view of all the circumstances.

— comment on evidence.

4. A requested instruction is properly refused if it presents a comment on evidence and assumes a fact contrary to all the evidence.

Highway — icy sidewalk — assumption of risk.

5. One attempting to use a slippery sidewalk does not assume the risk of injury from a break or crack in the walk which is sufficient to admit and catch his foot in case he should slip.

Trial — instruction outside issues.

6. Requested instructions are properly refused if directed to matters wholly outside the issues as presented by the pleadings and made by the evidence.

Appeal — instruction outside issues.

7. An instruction as to the duty of a city to mark dangerous places in its sidewalks, which is outside the issues in an action to recover damages for injury caused by falling on the walk, is nonprejudicial error if the jury are expressly charged that plaintiff cannot recover unless he proves that the injury was caused as charged in the complaint.

Trial — motion for judgment non obstante — contrary to evidence.

8. A motion for judgment non obstante veredicto or for new trial cannot be maintained on grounds contrary to the decided preponderance of the evidence.

[See 20 R. C. L. 273.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained through a fall on a defective sidewalk maintained by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Hugh M. Caldwell and Frank S. Griffith, for appellant:

Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should have been granted.

Kieburz v. Seattle, 84 Wash. 196, 146 Pac. 400; Mattson v. Griffin Transfer Co. 90 Wash. 1, 155 Pac. 392; Roe v. Standard Furniture Co. 41 Wash. 546, 83 Pac. 1109; Spokane Grain Co. v. Great Northern Exp. Co. 55 Wash. 545, 104 Pac. 794.

Where the physical facts make the happening of an injury impossible as claimed, a court will not sustain a verdict although the jury may have returned one.

Lloyd v. Calhoun, 82 Wash. 35, 143 Pac. 458, adopting dissenting opinion of 78 Wash. 438, 139 Pac. 231; Allison v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 83 Wash. 591, 145 Pac. 608.

The city is not liable for accidents occasioned by the mere slipperiness caused by ice upon the walk.

Calder v. Walla Walla, 6 Wash. 377, 35 Pac. 1054; Bull v. Spokane, 46 Wash. 237, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1105, 89 Pac. 555.

It was error to refuse to give instructions covering the defense of ice and snow on the sidewalk.

Messrs. Griffin & Griffin for respondent.

Ellis, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff through a fall on a board sidewalk maintained by defendant. Plaintiff alleged, in substance, that the accident happened on the west side of Fourth avenue west, between West Smith and West Holliday streets, in the city of Seattle, while he was walking north thereon on February 8, 1916, between 5 and 5:30 o'clock P. M. The sole negligence charged was that the sidewalk was two boards wide; that a sufficient number of supports were not placed beneath these boards to maintain them in a reasonably safe manner; that the boards were not nailed to such supports as were there, and that one of the boards was, and long had been, broken and split, leaving a large crack between the boards and a large crack in the board which was broken, split, and splintered. It was alleged that plaintiff caught his right foot in this defective board and in the opening caused thereby, and fell with great force and violence, breaking his right leg above the ankle, breaking the third finger of his right hand, and necessitating the amputation of the leg, which amputation took place about April 1, 1916, all to his damage, for the permanent injury, physical and mental, pain and suffering, medicines, medical services, and hospital expenses, in the aggregate sum of $15,000. It was further alleged that plaintiff, within thirty days after the injury, but before the amputation, presented to the city council and filed with the city clerk his claim for the injuries as required by law. Defendant answered, denying the foregoing allegations, and pleading in general terms contributory negligence as an affirmative defense. This matter of defense was traversed by reply.

The evidence shows that the sidewalk in question ran north and south on the west side of the street and consisted of two boards, each 12 inches wide, 1½ inches thick, and 16 feet long, laid side by side and resting upon 3 x 12 inch crosspieces, one in the middle of the boards and one at each end. The west board was split from the inside corner of the north end for about 4 feet back, and diagonally across almost to the other side. It had been in this condition for several months. Plaintiff testified, in substance, that he had passed over the sidewalk in question but once or twice before, and had never noticed its condition; that, at the time of his fall, there had been a heavy snow which had been shoveled off the sidewalk, but that there remained thereon sufficient snow to conceal the condition of the broken board and the crack between the boards; that he stepped upon the broken board, which bent under his weight, causing his right foot to pass under the edge of the other board, so that the side of his foot was caught between the boards, causing him to fall heavily, breaking both bones of the right ankle, and that, in endeavoring to catch himself, he also broke the third finger of his right hand; that, in the fall and in releasing his foot, the snow was removed from the boards so that he then observed the condition of the broken board, and that it was loose, not being nailed to the crosspiece at the north end. No one else was present at the time of the accident, but several persons arrived soon afterwards. Four or five of these corroborated plaintiff as to the condition of the broken board, and that it was not nailed to the north crosspiece. Two or three of these testified that the split board would bend down 4 or 5 inches under a man's weight. A section about 8 inches long, of the north end of the walk, was in evidence as an exhibit. It shows both boards nailed to the crosspiece. No one testified that it was in the same condition as at the time of the accident, but the two men who procured it over a year after the accident testified that the boards were nailed to the crosspiece when they procured it, and the nails and nail holes were apparently old. These two men testified that, at that time, the split board would not bend under their weight more than "a scant ½ inch" below the other board, and that it then rested upon solid ground. Several witnesses testified that, in winter, the ground under the boards was soft and wet, so that, when the broken board was stepped upon, it would bend down and splash water upon the feet. One woman testified that in this way her own foot had been caught, throwing her down at the same place.

One of the men in charge of the ambulance which removed plaintiff to the city hospital about an hour after the fall testified that plaintiff told him he slipped upon "the icy sidewalk, that is, on the snow—on the ice." Plaintiff denied this, and there was no evidence that there was any ice. The evidence was conclusive that it had been raining since about four o'clock that day, and that the snow was soft and "slushy."

One bone of the same leg had been broken about 2 inches above the break here in question almost three years before this, but the evidence was uncontradicted that the break had completely healed, though plaintiff sometimes walked with a cane.

when in the city as a matter of caution, and was using a cane when he fell. For a considerable time prior to the injury here involved he had been doing the heaviest kind of work on ranches and in the woods. The leg was amputated below the knee on April 1, 1916, by a surgeon of plaintiff's own selection, but there is no evidence that the amputation could have been avoided or that the treatment throughout was not skillful and proper.

The court, after stating the issues as presented by the pleading, instructed the jury specifically that: "Before the plaintiff can recover against the defendant, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove the following things: (1) That he was injured by catching his foot in and falling upon a defective sidewalk as alleged in the complaint. (2) That said sidewalk was in such a defective condition as to make it dangerous to travelers using such sidewalk. (3) That said defective sidewalk was not marked by any light or beacon so as to warn persons approaching or using the same of the probable danger. (4) That the city had either actual or constructive notice of the defective condition of said sidewalk. (5) That the defective condition of the walk as complained of was the proximate cause of the injuries the plaintiff suffered. (6) That within thirty days after the accident the plaintiff filed a claim with the city of Seattle. (7) The nature and extent of the injuries."

These were elaborated, but not materially changed, by subsequent instructions. The jury was told that the city would only be liable in case of notice of the defect, either actual or through its existence for such length of time before the injury occurred as to give the city an opportunity to repair such defect, and was faultlessly instructed as to what would constitute constructive notice. As to proximate cause, the court instructed as follows: "I have instructed you that the plaintiff must show that some one or more of the acts of negligence complained of was the proximate cause of his injuries. By proximate cause we mean probable cause, direct cause, and a general test as to whether negligence is the proximate cause of an accident is whether or not it is such negligence as a person of ordinary intelligence, prudence, care, and caution should have foreseen that an accident was liable to be caused thereby. The proximate cause of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequences, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the injury would not occur."

Touching the burden of proof, the jury was told that: "The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in every case to satisfy you as to the truth of the material allegations of the complaint before plaintiff will be entitled to recover. . . . In order for the plaintiff to recover in this case he must satisfy you by a fair preponderance of the evidence, of the truth of the material allegations contained in his complaint."

The court then instructed faultlessly as to the rule of preponderance of evidence, told the jury that negligence is never presumed, and defined negligence, in substance, as the doing of something which an ordinarily prudent person would not do, or failing to do that which an ordinarily prudent person would do, and continued: "If, tried by this definition, you find that the defendant, the city of Seattle, was not guilty of negligence as alleged in the complaint, whereby the plaintiff, P. M. Wren, suffered the injury described in his complaint, then your verdict should be for the defendant. On the other hand, if, tried by the same definition, you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the manner alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident whereby plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff, unless you further find that the injuries to the plaintiff were caused by his own negligent acts to which he himself contributed."

The court gave correct instructions as to the law governing contributory negligence, and instructed that it is the duty of the city to keep its sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition, but that the city is not an insurer, and then told the jury: "You are further instructed that a municipal corporation, such as the defendant city of Seattle, is only liable for such defects in its streets as are in themselves dangerous, or such that a person exercising reasonable care and caution for his own safety cannot avoid danger in passing over them, and if you believe in this case that the sidewalk over which the plaintiff traveled was not in itself dangerous to the safety of persons using the same with reasonable care, and that the alleged injury claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff was the result of a mere accident or from want of reasonable care for his own safety on the plaintiff's part, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $7,500. Defendant moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and, in the alternative, for a new trial. Both motions were denied. Defendant appeals.

Appellant's main contention is that the court committed fatal error in refusing to give the following requested instructions which, for convenient reference, we number:

"(1) The city is not liable for accidents occasioned by mere slipperiness caused by ice and snow upon the sidewalk, and if you find from the evidence that plaintiff's accident was caused solely by the slippery condition of the sidewalk, then I instruct you that he cannot recover.

"(2) If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of the slippery condition of the sidewalk by reason of its being covered with a coating of smooth ice and snow, and that he was likely to slip and fall thereon, then I charge you that, by walking upon said sidewalk, he assumed all the risks, and cannot recover damages from the city for any resulting injury.

"(3) I charge you, as a matter of law, that a municipality is not liable for injuries resulting merely from the slippery condition of a sidewalk caused by smooth ice and snow, and if you find in this case that the sidewalk on which the plaintiff claims to have slipped and fallen was in a reasonably safe condition, but that it was covered by smooth ice or snow, and the plaintiff slipped and fell, the city would not be liable, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

It is undoubtedly the law that a municipality is not ordinarily liable for accidents occasioned solely by mere slipperiness caused by natural accumulations of snow or ice upon its sidewalks, not so prominent or rough as in themselves to constitute an obstruction, and provided they have not been permitted to remain for an unreasonable length of time in view of all the circumstances. Calder v. Walla Walla, 6 Wash. 377, 33 Pac. 1054; Bull v. Spokane, 46 Wash. 237, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1105, 89 Pac. 555. But, considered as mere legal abstractions, neither of the above requests was correct. None of them contained the qualifications requisite to immunity, that the jury should find that the ice or snow, though not so accumulated as to constitute an obstruction, had not been permitted to remain for an unreasonable length of time in view of all the circumstances. The request which we have numbered (2) presented a palpable comment upon the evidence. Even as a comment it assumed a fact contrary to all the evidence, viz., that the sidewalk was covered with "a smooth coating of ice and snow." Moreover, even assuming as a fact that the sidewalk was slippery from snow or ice, respondent did not, as a matter of law, assume the risk of a broken board or crack in the sidewalk itself sufficient to admit his foot should he slip, nor the risk of injury from any other defect inherent in the walk itself. In any view of the case, this second request was properly refused.

But, aside from the fact that these instructions incorrectly stated the law, they were properly refused. They were directed to matter wholly outside the issue as presented by pleadings and made by the evidence, and to which respondent's right to recover was strictly confined by the instructions which were given. Through these requests appellant was evidently trying to evade liability for an inherent defect in the sidewalk itself, which respondent alleged in his complaint and positively testified caused his injury, by magnifying the adventitious circumstance that the sidewalk was partly covered with snow or slush, more or less slippery, as a possible cause of the accident. See Waters v. Kansas City, 94 Mo. App. 413, 68 S. W. 366.

The case of Calder v. Walla Walla, supra, is cited as authority for these requests, but that case is readily distinguishable from this, both on pleadings and evidence. In that case, the city was charged with negligence in permitting snow and ice so to accumulate as to constitute a dangerous obstruction on the walk. That was the sole negligence charged. Though the instructions there given are not set out, the court had evidently instructed that for injury from such an obstruction the city would be liable. This court held that the instruction there requested should have been given in qualification of the instruction which was given, and as addressed to that sole issue. It did not hold that the existence of snow or ice, though so smooth and even and so recent of accumulation as not in itself to constitute negligence, is an excuse for defects inherent in the walk which, even through the aid of the snow or ice, caused an injury. No court, so far as we are advised, has ever held that the excusable existence of snow or ice, operating merely as a contributing condition in causing an injury by some defect inherent in the sidewalk itself, can be successfully asserted in absolution from liability for injuries caused by such inherent defect. The pertinent decisions are the other way. It is said by the supreme court of Kansas in a case closely analogous to this: "There is in this case the defective sidewalk, for which the city is responsible; there is, perhaps (at least that possibility is involved in the instruction), the slippery condition of the sidewalk, for which no one is responsible; and there is the passing over it of the plaintiff, for which she alone is responsible—unless, indeed, she was compelled by causes unknown, operating in endless succession upon each other, to walk over it. Indeed, she might have reached her destination by walking on another street. But in all these causes, proximate or remote, real or fancied, there was negligence in but one party, the plaintiff in error. Where the sufferer is in no fault, using ordinary care and diligence, and is injured by a defect in a public sidewalk, although the slippery state thereof may have combined with the defect to produce the accident, we cannot but hold that the city that constructs the walk, and invites people to walk upon it, and then permits it to remain in an unsafe and dangerous condition, is liable. So holding, the instruction was properly refused." Atchison v. King, 9 Kan. 550, 558, 559.

By the supreme court of Rhode Island it is said: "Where two causes combine to produce the injury, both in their nature proximate, the one being the defect in the highway, and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the corporation is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for the defect in the highway.' Dill. Mun. Corp. 1881, ed. § 1007. It seems to us that this doctrine, at least where the concurring cause is a natural cause, or a pure accident for which no person is responsible, is the more reasonable doctrine. Indeed, we think it is the duty of the town, in making and mending its highways, to consider the natural effects of rain and snow and ice as affecting the safety and convenience of travel thereon, except so far as the statute exonerates them from duty in that regard." Hampson v. Taylor, 15 R. I. 83, 85, 28 Atl. 732.

See also Lincoln v. Smith, 28 Neb. 762, 45 N. W. 41; Waters v. Kansas City, 94 Mo. App. 413, 68 S. W. 366; Hodges v. Waterloo, 109 Iowa, 444, 80 N. W. 523; Hill v. Fond du Lac, 56 Wis. 242, 14 N. W. 25; Stilling v. Thorp, 54 Wis. 528, 41 Am. Rep. 60, 11 N. W. 906; Salzer v. Milwaukee, 97 Wis. 471, 73 N. W. 20; Lyon v. Logansport, 9 Ind. App. 21, 35 N. E. 128; Ziegler v. Spokane, 25 Wash. 439, 65 Pac. 752.

If respondent was injured as he alleged in his complaint and as he testified, namely, by his foot passing between the boards of the walk, then the fact, if it be a fact, that this was facilitated or even caused by slippery snow or ice, would not absolve the city from liability. Any sidewalk is liable in winter to become slippery from snow or ice; anyone is liable to slip on such snow or ice; but no one's foot will catch in a properly constructed sidewalk even though he slip on snow or ice. These things are as well known to city officials as to other people. They should be anticipated. They augment, rather than diminish, the duty of the city to keep the sidewalk itself free from inherent defects which may make such slipping more likely to result in injury. Perkins

v. Fond du Lac, 34 Wis. 435; Hill v. Fond du Lac, 56 Wis. 242, 14 N. W. 25; Atchison v. King, supra, and Hodges v. Waterloo, 109 Iowa, 444, 80 N. W. 523. When, therefore, the trial judge instructed, as he did repeatedly, that respondent could only recover by proving that the city was negligent "as alleged in the complaint," and specifically that he could not recover unless he proved "that he was injured by catching his foot in and falling upon a defective sidewalk as alleged in the complaint," and finally, that the city "is only liable for such defects in its streets as are in themselves dangerous," it was not incumbent upon the court to further instruct that the city was not liable for accidents resulting from snow and ice alone, or resulting from any other specific causes neither alleged in the complaint nor attempted to be proved as negligence. Respondent, in his testimony, merely mentioned the snow as concealing the condition of the walk. He testified that he did not slip on the snow. There was no evidence that there was any ice. The complaint did not mention either snow or ice. In every view of the case, the requested instructions were properly refused.

Appellant also predicates a claim of fatal error upon the giving of the following instruction: "It is the duty of the city at all times to keep its sidewalks on its public streets in a reasonably safe condition for public use, and not to permit anything that will make the use of the sidewalk in the ordinary manner unsafe. To this end, it is the duty of the city to inspect its sidewalks in a reasonably careful and reasonably frequent manner, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not they are safe for public use. It is the duty of the city to mark dangerous places in its sidewalks upon the public streets, by warning signals or lights, and for any breach of this duty, proximately resulting in damages to persons using said sidewalks, the city is liable."

The last sentence of this instruction was outside the issues and should not have been given. But it could not have been prejudicial, in view of the fact that the jury was repeatedly told that respondent could not recover unless he proved that he was injured as alleged in his complaint, and, specifically, that he could not recover unless he had proved "that he was injured by catching his foot in and falling upon a defective sidewalk, as alleged in the complaint."

Finally, it is claimed that the court should have granted the motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, or, in any event, the motion for a new trial. It is argued that the evidence shows that respondent was injured solely by slipping upon snow or ice. The answer is that this theory is contrary to the decided preponderance of the evidence. It is next argued that the slippery condition of the sidewalk was a concurring cause of the accident, exonerating the city from liability. The answer is that this theory, even were it sustained by any evidence worthy of the name, is contrary to the law. The further argument that the notice of claim filed with the city was insufficient is without merit. We have examined the notice in the light of the evidence, and are satisfied that it fully meets the law and the facts.

Trial—motion for judgment non obstante—contrary to evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

I. General rule.

It is generally held that a municipality is not liable for injuries resulting from the mere temporary slipperiness of a walk, due to natural causes. See 13 R. C. L. title Highways, pp. 408 et seq. It also seems to be the rule, however, that when two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate,—the one being a culpable defect in the highway, and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible,—the municipality is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for the defect. Ring v. Cohoes (1879) 77 N. Y. 83, 33 Am. Rep. 574. Consequently, where an injury results from the slippery condition of a walk, together with a defect in the walk, the municipality is liable therefor, if the defect in the walk is a proximate cause of the injury.

Thus, in Atchison v. King (1872) 9 Kan. 550, the plaintiff brought an action against a city to recover damages for an injury to her leg, caused by stepping through a hole in the sidewalk. It appeared that the sidewalk was in a wet and slippery condition. An instruction to the effect that if the accident was partly caused by the wet and slippery condition of the sidewalk from the fall of rain, snow, or sleet, without the fault or negligence of the defendant, and partly from the defective sidewalk, then the plaintiff could not recover, was held properly refused. The court said: "The first impression on reading the instruction is that it is erroneous; for it lays down a principle that at a time when, from the condition of the sidewalks in a city by reason of a recent fall of rain, snow, or sleet, one most requires a good and safe walk, then is when the liability of a city for a defect in the sidewalk substantially ceases; for it is on such occasions that most accidents happen. . . . In such an injury as the one in this case there must always be two or more causes contributing to the injury, without any carelessness on the part of the sufferer. There is in this case the defective sidewalk, for which the city is responsible; there is, perhaps (at least, that possibility is involved in the instruction), the slippery condition of the sidewalk, for which no one is responsible; and there is the passing over it of the plaintiff, for which she alone is responsible; unless, indeed, she was compelled by causes unknown, operating in endless succession upon each other, to walk over it. Indeed, she might have reached her destination by walking on another street. But in all these causes, proximate or remote, real or fancied, there was negligence in but one party, the plaintiff in error. Where the sufferer is in no fault, using ordinary care and diligence, and is injured by a defect in a public sidewalk, although the slippery state thereof may have combined with the defect to produce the accident, we cannot but hold that the city that constructs the walk, and invites people to walk upon it, and then permits it to remain in an unsafe and dangerous condition, is liable. So holding, the instruction was properly refused."

In Chicago v. Chase (1889) 33 Ill. App. 551, the facts were stated by the court as follows: "Appellee recovered a judgment in this case against the city for the sum of $2,000 for an injury received by her, by her foot being caught in a hole in the sidewalk, which caused her to fall over and break her leg. . . . It is shown that appellee was walking along the sidewalk on the north side, east of Oakley street, in the nighttime. That snow covered the walk, and that a path was trodden wide enough for one person to walk on. That appellee, in walking along said trodden path, slipped, and stepped with one foot one side of said trodden path; that her foot went through a hole in the sidewalk, which hole was hidden from view by the snow which covered the walk. These facts were uncontradicted. The evidence tended to show that the sidewalk at the point where the accident occurred was old and out of repair, and for a period of from a month to half a year before the accident there were planks missing and holes and spaces in the sidewalk, caused by planks having been broken." It was held that the city was charged with notice of the dangerous condition of the sidewalk, and the verdict for the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Richmond v. Marseilles (1914) 190 Ill. App. 227, it appeared that there was a hole or broken place in a sidewalk and, as a pedestrian was stepping over it, he slipped because the walk was wet, and caught his toe in the hole and was thrown and injured. He brought an action against the city to recover damages for his injuries, alleging that the walk was unsafe and dangerous, and that the defendant knew of its condition, or in the exercise of ordinary care might have known of it. A recovery in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Columbus v. Neise (1901) 63 Kan. 885, 65 Pac. 643, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a defective sidewalk. The petition alleged that the principal cause of the injury was an opening in the sidewalk. It was held that a further allegation that the sidewalk became more dangerous because of its damp and slippery condition at the time the accident occurred did not relieve the city from responsibility for negligently leaving the opening in the walk, it appearing that the plaintiff was without fault.

In Covington v. Billiter (1907) 30 Ky. L. Rep. 650, 99 S. W. 318, it appeared that the plaintiff broke his leg by means of a fall caused by his stepping in a hole in a pavement. At the time of the accident there were snow and ice on the pavement. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injury, an instruction to the effect that if the plaintiff slipped on any ice or snow and fell into the hole, and was thereby thrown and injured, and the presence of the hole was a concurring and contributing cause of his injury, without which his injury would not have been sustained, the jury should find for him, was held not to be subject to any substantial objection.

In Burrell v. Greenville (1903) 133 Mich. 235, 94 N. W. 732, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 82, it appeared that the plaintiff stepped into a hole in a sidewalk and was injured. The sidewalk was old, rotten, and had several holes in it. The sidewalk was wet and slippery, because of which the plaintiff's foot slipped into a hole when she stepped on an adjacent plank. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injury, the defendant's negligence being conceded, it was held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that her slipping was not the proximate cause of the accident.

In Waters v. Kansas City (1902) 94 Mo. App. 413, 68 S. W. 866, it appeared that the plaintiff stepped in a hole in a wooden crosswalk, at a time when the defect was at least partially concealed by snow. In an action against the city to recover damages for injuries resulting from the misstep, an instruction assuming that the plaintiff "was caused to slip and fall" by the snow was held erroneous, because there was no evidence showing that she slipped and fell by reason of the snow except as it was connected with the defect in the walk.

In West v. Eau Claire (1894) 89 Wis. 31, 61 N. W. 818, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by a fall on a sidewalk. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff, as stated by the court, "tended to prove that at the place of the accident was a ridge of snow and ice along the track of the travel on the sidewalk, caused by the travel over the snow which had been allowed to remain and accumulate there; that such ridge was uneven and slippery; that beside and near the ridge was a hole in the plank of the sidewalk; that at the time of the accident the plaintiff's attention was momentarily diverted; that she slipped, her foot went through the hole, and was held there until she fell in such a way as to break her ankle; and that this hole had been there from the previous summer." It was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. It was also said: "Either the ridge or the hole might be so serious a defect as to sustain plaintiff's action. Both together, or the hole alone, might be sufficient cause to produce plaintiff's accident."

In Hampson v. Taylor (1885) 15 R. I. 88, 23 Atl. 782, an action was brought against a town to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by slipping and falling on a walk. It appeared that at the place of the accident there was a gully nearly a foot deep. There were some cobblestones left exposed in the gully, and it was one of these that caused the plaintiff to slip and fall. The entire walk and street were covered with a thin film of ice. The trial court instructed the jury as follows: "If the sidewalk where the accident happened was so defective as to render the town liable in case an accident had happened by reason of the defect, in the absence of the obstruction caused by the ice, and this accident happened by reason of such defect and would not have happened but for it, then the town is liable, even though the ice was one of the proximate causes of the accident." On appeal the instruction was held to be correct.

In Wertz v. Girardville (1905) 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 260, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by slipping and falling on a walk in the nighttime. At the place of the accident there was a hole in the walk caused by the removal of a paving stone when a telephone pole was set. The plaintiff stepped on a stone near the pole, when her foot slipped and went into the hole, resulting in a fracture of her ankle. The walk was covered with snow and the plaintiff had left the beaten track and was about to go on the street because she thought it was safer. In an action to recover damages for the injury, it was held that the questions as to the liability of the defendant and the plaintiff's negligence were for the jury, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Ziegler v. Spokane (1901) 25 Wash. 439, 65 Pac. 752, the facts were stated by the court as follows: "The evidence tended to show that the sidewalk upon which the respondent fell was old and worn out, full of holes, caused by the decay of the materials of which it was constructed, and in a generally unsafe condition for ordinary travel; that on the day preceding the accident a fall of snow occurred, which, owing to the temperature, was wet and slushy; that during the night it froze hard, leaving the walk at the time of the accident in a very slippery condition." It was held that it was for the jury to determine whether the mere slipperiness or the defective condition of the walk was the proximate cause of the accident, and it was not error on the part of the trial court to submit the question of the city's liability to them.

It is hardly reasonable to suppose that municipalities would be liable for every injury resulting from the slippery condition of inclined walks, inasmuch as their liability does not extend to injuries resulting from icy condition of walks alone, as hereinbefore stated; and in nearly all municipalities there are, of necessity, walks built at an incline. See infra, III. But where the incline is built at a greater angle than the necessities of the case require, or where, in addition to the grade made necessary by the grade of the adjoining street, there is an added unreasonable side slope, or where the walk is constructed of materials which are peculiarly subject to slipperiness under conditions which are likely at times to prevail, then the incline may become a defect, which, concurring with a slippery condition of the walk to cause an injury, will make the municipality liable therefor. Laughammer v. Manchester (1896) 99 Iowa, 295, 68 N. W. 688; Ford v. Des Moines (1898) 106 Iowa, 94, 75 N. W. 630, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 879; Shumway v. Burlington (1899) 108 Iowa, 424, 79 N. W. 123; Hodges v. Waterloo (1899) 109 Iowa, 444, 80 N. W. 523; Circleville v. Sohn (1900) 20 Ohio C. C. 368, 11 Ohio C. Dec. 193; Smith v. Yankton (1909) 23 S. D. 352, 121 N. W. 848; Perkins v. Fond du Lac (1874) 34 Wis. 435.

Thus, in Langhammer v. Manchester (Iowa) supra, an action was brought to recover damages resulting from an injury to the plaintiff, caused by a fall on a stone step leading from a sidewalk to a walk crossing a street in the defendant city. The following instruction was given: "You are instructed that if you find that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was produced by two causes, namely, the slant of the step in question, and a coating of ice thereon, the result of the storm of the night before, the latter being a cause for which no one was responsible, the plaintiff cannot recover, unless she has shown by a preponderance of the credible testimony that the slant of the step was the real cause of the injury, and but for which it would not have happened; neither can a recovery be had if it is equally as probable that the injury came from the one cause as from the other." The instruction was held to be correct, and to follow in effect the rule in New York, which was stated as follows: "When two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate, the one being a culpable defect in the highway, and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the municipality is liable, provided that the injury would not have been sustained but for such defect."

In Ford v. Des Moines (1898) 106 Iowa, 94, 75 N. W. 630, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 379, it appeared that by the authority of a municipality a temporary sidewalk 40 feet long was constructed. The slope was about 5 feet, and the planks constituting the walk were placed lengthwise, but no cleats were fastened on them, nor were hand rails placed at the sides. In attempting to pass down the walk the plaintiff slipped and fell, sustaining injuries. The evidence tended to show that the walk was made slippery by a snow which had fallen shortly before the accident. In an action against the municipality to recover damages for the injuries, it was held that whether the defendant was negligent in constructing the walk and whether it should have provided against the contingency of the walk becoming slippery by the fall of snow were questions for the jury, the rule that a municipality is not liable for injuries caused by fresh snow or ice on a prop-

In Shumway v. Burlington (1899) 108 Iowa, 424, 79 N. W. 123, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a fall on one of the defendant's sidewalks. It appeared that water accumulated on premises adjacent to the place of the accident, and was discharged through a hole in a fence over the walk. This condition had existed for several years. The walk was made of planks laid crosswise, and sloped towards the center of the street, the side next to the fence being 10 inches higher than the other. The evidence tended to show that there was ice on the walk at the time of the accident. An ordinance providing that no person should lay a sidewalk unless it conformed to the established grade of the street, and that "the outer edge of the walk so laid shall not be more than 6 inches above the top of the curbstone, and shall have a descent from the line of the lot towards the street of 3 inches, without obtaining permission from the city council," was offered in evidence and rejected on motion by the trial court, and a verdict for the defendant was directed. Both rulings were held erroneous. The court said: "The effect of a freezing temperature upon water flowing onto a sidewalk, and the dangers to be apprehended from ice on a sloping walk, were, it must be presumed, known to the defendant. Whether, under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, it was negligent in not anticipating the dangerous condition of the walk, and providing against it, was a question for the determination of the jury. . . . We are of the opinion that, if the ordinance rejected had been received in evidence, the jury would have been authorized to find for the plaintiff."

In Hodges v. Waterloo (1899) 109 Iowa, 444, 80 N. W. 523, it appeared that the specifications adopted by a city for grading, paving, and curbing provided that "the approaches connecting the streets or avenues and alleys shall be graded as directed by the engineer." At one of the alley crossings in the city the walk was 14 feet wide, and from the buildings towards the curb, for a distance of 9 feet, the fall was 2½ inches. From that point to the curb, a distance of about 5 feet, the descent was 7½ inches. The plaintiff at a time when the walk was covered with snow and ice slipped and fell on the outer incline of the walk, she having moved aside to permit other pedestrians to pass. She brought an action against the city to recover damages for injuries sustained by her fall, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant in constructing the walk with an abrupt declivity in its surface. It was held that there was no evidence that the walk was constructed in pursuance of a plan adopted by the city and prepared by a competent engineer, so as to relieve the city from liability, and that the case should have gone to the jury.

In Perkins v. Fond du Lac (1874) 34 Wis. 435, an action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of slipping and falling on an approach to a bridge. It appeared that the approach was constructed of planks running parallel with the street, and had a slope of about two feet and a half in twenty. Strips of wood about an inch square were nailed crosswise on the planks a foot apart. At the time of the accident the whole surface of the walk was covered with packed snow and ice, and was very smooth and slippery. It was dark at the time and the plaintiff fell while descending the slope, having just shortly before come from the other side of the street. The plaintiff was aware that the approach sloped. The walk of which the approach was a part was one of the principal ones of the city. The approach on the other side of the street was more nearly level. It was held that the questions as to negligence of the city in constructing the walk in a faulty and unsafe manner, which unnecessarily increased the dangers and perils to persons passing over when it was covered with ice, and the

In Smith v. Yankton (1909) 23 S. D. 352, 121 N. W. 848, an action was instituted against a city to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff in slipping and falling on a crosswalk. It appeared that the accident happened on a wooden approach to a stone crosswalk at a time when all the sidewalks were covered with smooth, slippery ice. There were no cleats or boards nailed across the approach. The plaintiff knew that the approach was slippery, but it did not appear that there was a safer route reasonably convenient. It was held that an instruction that the municipality would be liable if the slippery condition of the slope was one which should have been anticipated by the city, and that if the jury found the condition one that should have been anticipated, and this condition, taken in connection with the manner in which the walk was constructed, showed a negligence on the part of the city in constructing the approach, the municipality would be liable, was held correct. As to a contention of the defendant that if there was a defect in the approach, it was in the judgment of the members of the city council in adopting the plans for walks and grades, and that, therefore, it could not be held liable, it was noted that there was nothing in the evidence tending to show that any general plan for the grading of the streets and the construction of the walks had been adopted by the corporation and that the approach was constructed in accordance with such plan. It was also held that the question as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was one for the jury. A judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Circleville v. Sohn (1900) 20 Ohio C. C. 368, 11 Ohio C. Dec. 193, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for an injury which the plaintiff claimed to have received from a fall at an alley crossing, and resulting from the negligent and defective construction of the crossing, together with ice and snow that had accumulated thereon and made it slippery. In the trial court the following instruction was given: "If the alley crossing in question was negligently constructed by giving it too abrupt and steep a slope or grade, or if the alley crossing became defective in the respects charged, and the city negligently, that is, after reasonable notice, failed to remedy such defect, and those matters, or any of them, in connection with the slippery condition of the surface of the alley crossing, were the cause of the plaintiff's slipping and falling, and if she wouldn't have fallen had said alley crossing been carefully constructed, or kept in repair after construction, then her accident was chargeable to the negligence of the city, unless she was at fault herself." It was held that the instruction should have been qualified as follows: "If the jury also find that such accumulation of snow and ice might reasonably have been anticipated as the natural and probable result of such defective construction and lack of repair."

c. Other defects.

In Bloom v. Toledo (1903) 25 Ohio C. C. 235, the plaintiff brought an action against a city to recover damages for injuries received from slipping and falling on an icy spot in a walk. It appeared that the icy spot was in a depression wherein water would accumulate, and, in cold weather, freeze. The depression was caused by one end of a stone having sunk lower than the rest of the walk. The ice in the depression at the time of the accident had existed for some time. The direction of a verdict for the defendant was held to be erroneous, as it was a question for the jury whether the defect in the walk was dangerous.

In Kauffman v. Harrisburg (1902) 204 Pa. 26, 53 Atl. 521, it appeared that plaintiff's wife slipped and fell on some ice on a walk. The ice was formed from some water which had accumulated in a depression in the walk and had existed for a considerable time, and at the time of the accident was covered with a slight fall of snow. A telephone pole stood in the depression. In the action against the city to recover damages for the injury, there was evidence that "the plaintiff's wife fell just as she was starting around the outside of this pole." The plaintiff testified that "the pole stood in the sidewalk, with a space between it and the curb on the one side, and a space between it and the fence on the other; that the depression in the sidewalk began a foot or 10 inches from the outside of the pole, and extended to and around the pole, and from the pole to the fence; and that his wife attempted to pass around the pole on the lower side, and slipped in the depression in the sidewalk between the pole and the gutter." It was held that the case was one for the jury, and a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Dracass v. Chicago (1915) 193 Ill. App. 75, it was said in an abstract decision: "A city is charged with knowledge of the condition of a sidewalk in which, for a length of time, a depression has existed, and in which ice and snow have been allowed to accumulate. . . . Where an injury is caused by slipping on ice which has accumulated in a depression in the sidewalk, and had been covered that morning by a fall of snow, the proximate causes of the injury were the depression and the ice, and the city cannot relieve itself from liability on the ground that it did not know and could not have known of the presence of the snow."

In Gillrie v. Lockport (1890) 122 N. Y. 403, 25 N. E. 357, it appeared that the plaintiff, because of stepping on a mound of ice, slipped and fell, breaking her arm. The surrounding sidewalk was free from ice, and the mound of ice was due to the fact that a gutter, channeled in the sidewalk to carry away water drained into it from an adjacent building, had become somewhat clogged because of the breaking of one of the gutter stones, so that the water was thrown on the walk, where it froze. The drain pipe also discharged some of its water on the pavement because it had become disjointed. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injuries, it was held that a finding by the jury that the defendant was negligent was proper.

In Bucher v. Sunbury (1906) 216 Pa. 89, 64 Atl. 906, an action was brought against a borough to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a fall on a slippery sidewalk. The evidence tended to show that at the place of the accident there were irregular and rough places which had become filled with ice and snow to such an extent as to make the pavement unsafe, and that the borough had permitted this condition to continue for several weeks. The evidence showed that the walk was in general use on the day of the accident. It also appeared that there was a storm shortly before the accident, which aggravated the existing conditions. The liability of the defendant was held to be a question for the jury, as was the question whether the dangers were so obvious as to cause a prudent man to avoid them; and a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Hill v. Fond du Lac (1882) 56 Wis. 242, 14 N. W. 25, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff, suffered by reason of her falling on a slippery walk at a place where there was a sudden declivity. A judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed. The court said: "The question was not whether the mere sudden declivity in the sidewalk, in the absence of any storm or freezing, would have been dangerous, nor whether the mere storm and freezing weather, in the absence of the walk in question, and with a walk differently constructed, would have caused danger, but whether that walk, so constructed, with such ice and snow as would ordinarily accumulate upon it during such severe storms and freezing weather as ordinarily occurred at that season of the year, at the place of the injury, would be unsafe for travelers upon it. If in that condition and under such circumstances it was unsafe, then it was defective. It was clearly the province of the jury to determine that question."

Wash. 101, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018, 98 Pac. 91, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff by slipping and falling on the iron cover of a coal hole placed in the sidewalk. It appeared that the cover was very smooth and slippery, which condition had existed for several years, and that a number of persons had slipped and fallen there at different times. At the time of the accident the dangerous condition of the cover was aggravated because of its being wet with rain. It was held that the negligence of the defendant was for the jury, its liability not being affected by the fact that the cover was wet, and a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

In Conklin v. Elmira (1896) 11 App. Div. 402, 42 N. Y. Supp. 518, it appeared that the plaintiff, when she stepped on the top of an icy ridge in a sidewalk, slipped into a depression by the side of the ridge, causing her to fall and break her arm. The icy ridge was formed over the bricks of the walk, which had been upheaved by the roots of a tree. The ice had formed of melted and trodden snow, and was concealed by a thin layer of freshly fallen snow. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injury, it was held that the case was one for the jury, and a verdict for the plaintiff was affirmed. The court said: "The inequality in the walks made the ice the more dangerous,—a danger which was increased by the thin layer of freshly fallen snow which concealed it. It is not a case of uncertainty between two proximate causes, for one of which the city would be liable and not liable for the other; but it is a case where three causes concur, namely, the bad sidewalk, the snow, and the ice; and, as we should hold after verdict, without the bad walk the injury would not have happened. It is plain that each cause made the other worse. The real proximate cause, however, was the bad sidewalk, which, as should have been foreseen, had become more dangerous by its covering of ice, and still more dangerous by the light snow hiding the ice. It is unlike Taylor v. Yonkers

(1887) 105 N. Y. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 492, 11 N. E. 642, in that here the condition of the permanent walk was the proximate cause, or one of the concurring proximate causes. We think the case was one for the jury."

In Heether v. Huntsville (1906) 121 Mo. App. 495, 97 S. W. 239, it appeared that the plaintiff slipped and fell on a crosswalk covered with snow and ice. The walk was made of vitrified brick, was 3 feet wide and from 1½ to 3 inches higher in the center than at either edge. It was of a dangerous construction when covered with snow or ice. The snow and ice on the walk at the time of the accident had become uneven by reason of pedestrians walking over it. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injuries resulting from the fall, a recovery for the plaintiff was held proper. It was also held that the fact that the plaintiff did not use rubber overshoes did not show a lack of due care on her part, as a matter of law, that being a question for the jury.

A ridge or ball of ice on the sidewalk, caused by the overflow or leak from a down spout projecting from an adjoining building, concealed by a covering of snow, was held in Abbott v. Springfield (1919) — Mo. App. —, 210 S. W. 443, to constitute a condition rendering the municipality, which knew, or in the exercise of care ought to have known, of it, liable for an injury to a pedestrian proximately resulting therefrom.

A condition for which the municipality was responsible was held in Schmidt v. Newport (1919) 184 Ky. 342, 212 S. W. 113, to be presented by a declaration which alleged that the city had permitted an amusement company to take up a part of the concrete pavement in front of its entrance, and replace the same with tiling, having a slippery, smooth, glazed, and glossy surface which rendered the sidewalk unreasonably unsafe and dangerous for public travel by pedestrians, especially during and immediately after it had rained, or while the tiling sidewalk was wet. It was so held, notwithstanding the declared rule that a municipality is not responsible for injury to one falling upon a pavement unless the pavement was inherently dangerous, or was constructed and maintained according to a plan which was not reasonably safe, and which reasonably prudent persons would not have adopted or maintained.

In McDonnell v. Philadelphia (1891) 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 672, it is said in the headnote: "In an action for damages caused by slipping on a sidewalk, it appeared that the sidewalk had been in a bad condition for a long time, was uneven and some of the bricks sunken, that water, flowing from under a fence on the inside, formed a pool extending from the middle of the sidewalk to the curb and rendered all of the bricks slippery. Held, that a woman, who had never been along the street, and was using care, and who fell and was injured, could recover."

In Holbert v. Philadelphia (1908) 221 Pa. 266, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, 70 Atl. 746, the following rule was laid down: "It is the duty of a municipality to keep its streets, including its sidewalks, in a reasonably safe condition so that pedestrians using the sidewalks and exercising care may do so with safety. A sidewalk may be made defective or dangerous by the accumulation of ice or snow, as well as in other ways and by other means. The municipality, however, is not responsible unless the defective condition of the walk is attributable to its negligence. That is the general rule, and one which applies as well where the sidewalk is defective by reason of the slippery condition of the ice thereon as well as by reason of excavations or other obstructions in the walk." The question involved in that case was as to the liability of a municipality for an injury caused by the icy condition of an underground walk, resulting from the fact that water was negligently allowed to enter.

III. Limitations of rule.

A number of cases support the rule that where the defect in a sidewalk is so slight, as to be harmless in itself, the fact that it concurs with a slippery condition of the walk to produce an accident does not make the municipiality liable for any resulting injuries. Jenkins v. Wilmington (1915) 5 Boyce (Del.) 471, 94 Atl. 768; Free v. District of Columbia (1893) 21 D. C. 608; Safford v. Green Island (1893) 74 Hun, 306, 26 N. Y. Supp. 669; Hamilton v. Buffalo (1902) 173 N. Y. 72, 65 N. E. 944, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 173, reversing (1900) 55 App. Div. 423, 66 N. Y. Supp. 990; Beaton v. Milwaukee (1897) 97 Wis. 416, 73 N. W. 53; Koepke v. Milwaukee (1901) 112 Wis. 475, 88 N. W. 238.

Thus, in Free v. District of Columbia (1893) 21 D. C. 608, it appeared that a defect in a sidewalk was harmless in itself, and only became dangerous in combination with snow and ice, of which fact the authorities had no notice. An instruction that the municipality would be liable for injuries to a pedestrian simply because it had notice of the pre-existing defect in the sidewalk was held to be erroneous.

In Beaton v. Milwaukee (1897) 97 Wis. 416, 73 N. W. 53, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff because of a fall on a walk. The complaint contained the following allegations: "Plaintiff fell and was greatly injured by reason of the insufficiency and want of repair of said sidewalk; that said sidewalk was then and there insufficient, in this: that the same consisted of three boards or plank, 8 inches in width, laid upon the pavements of said street, and so narrow that two persons could not pass thereon, and was then unsafe and dangerous; and as the plaintiff, in the exercise of due and ordinary care, was walking thereon, and while passing or attempting to pass a lady, who was also on said walk, said walk and pavement at the time being in an icy and slippery condition, was caused to slip and fall." It was held that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court said: "While the sidewalk described by the complaint is not an ideal sidewalk, it cannot be said to be a dangerous one. Its condition did not make an accident imminent to a person walking upon it. Even one board laid upon a smooth pavement may very well be tolerated during temporary repairs of a sidewalk. The city was not responsible for the slippery condition of the street unless some defective condition of the street concurred with it to produce the accident."

In Jenkins v. Wilmington (1915) 5 Boyce (Del.) 471, 94 Atl. 768, it appeared that there was a defect in a street crossing, consisting of a depression about 1 inch deep and "somewhat larger than an ordinary writing tablet." Some water which had accumulated in the depression became frozen and was partially concealed by snow. A pedestrian was injured by slipping and falling on the ice, and brought an action against the city to recover damages. It was held that the depression was not sufficiently dangerous to charge the defendant with negligence for allowing it to remain under ordinary circumstances, and that, if the defect became dangerous because of the presence of ice, the defendant could not be held liable in the absence of actual or constructive notice of its dangerous character.

In Hamilton v. Buffalo (1902) 173 N. Y. 72, 65 N. E. 944, reversing (1900) 55 App. Div. 423, 66 N. Y. Supp. 990, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by falling on a crosswalk. The fall was caused by his foot slipping in a hole in the walk, when the latter was in a slippery condition. The hole was wedge-shaped, and was about 84 inches long, 12 inches wide, and 4 inches deep, with rounded edges, and was formed by the wheels of heavily laden trucks. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injuries, it was held that the defect was too slight to charge the city with responsibility for the accident.

In Koepke v. Milwaukee (1901) 112 Wis. 475, 88 N. W. 238, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by a fall on a walk covered with ice and snow. At the place of the accident there was a depression, the decline of which was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an inch to the foot one way, with a lateral pitch of  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an inch to the foot. The ice and snow were an ordinary accumulation and were somewhat rough and lumpy. It was held that the depression in the walk was not an actionable defect, and that the trial court would have been justified in taking the case from the jury.

In Safford v. Green Island (1893) 74 Hun, 306, 26 N. Y. Supp. 669, an action was brought against a village to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by a fall on an icy sidewalk. The facts were stated by the court as follows: "It appears in this case that a ridge had been formed across the sidewalk by excavating to put in a water pipe, and the earth afterwards filled in had not been sufficiently packed down, but formed a ridge from 4 to 6 inches in height. This ridge was covered with ice, and, in the language of the plaintiff's daughter, 'so that the ridge was slippery, glary, glassy. It was clear ice, glassy ice; shiny, like the surface of glass, and very slippery.' The thermometer had been below zero for some days prior to the accident in question, and the streets of the village were generally slippery." The grant of a nonsuit was held proper. The court said: "It is impossible to determine from the evidence whether the plaintiff would or would not have fallen, except for the ridge upon the sidewalk. The jury could have merely guessed whether it was the ridge or the ice, or both combined, that caused the accident. The defendant was not responsible for the slippery condition of the sidewalk, or for the ice upon the ridge; and such being the case, and the plaintiff not establishing that the accident would not have occurred but for the presence of the ridge, she was not entitled to recover, and the nonsuit was proper."

The mere fact that an accident results from the slippery condition of a walk, concurring with a slope therein, does not render the municipality liable for any resulting injuries. Beirness v. Missouri Valley (1913) 162 Iowa, 720, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 218, 144 N. W. 628; Gower v. Madisonville (1918) 182 Ky. 89, 206 S. W. 27; Wesley v. Detroit (1898) 117 Mich. 658, 76 N. W. 104, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 651; McCarty v. Lockport (1897) 13 App.

Div. 494, 43 N. Y. Supp. 693, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 497; Taylor v. Yonkers (1887) 105 N. Y. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 492, 11 N. E. 642; Ayres v. Hammondsport (1891) 130 N. Y. 665, 29 N. E. 265, reversing (1889) 26 N. Y. S. R. 634, 7 N. Y. Supp. 174; Grossenbach v. Milwaukee (1886) 65 Wis. 31, 56 Am. Rep. 614, 26 N. W. 182.

Thus, in Gower v. Madisonville (1918) 182 Ky. 89, 206 S. W. 27, the action was to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by slipping and falling on a pavement. The place of the accident was on a slope at a street crossing. The slope was about 4 feet long and the lower end about 7 inches below the top of the slope, and at the time was covered with ice and snow. It was held that the slope was not so steep as obviously to be dangerous in itself, and the fact that when it was covered with ice it became less safe for pedestrians did not make the city liable in damages for the injuries.

In Wesley v. Detroit (1898) 117 Mich. 658, 76 N. W. 104, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 651, the facts were stated in the dissenting opinion of Moore, J., as follows: "Perry street intersects Grand River avenue at right angles. Until the fall of 1892 the sidewalks on the two streets were on the same level. Late in the fall of 1892 the two streets were paved, and the crosswalks on both streets were lowered, as was the sidewalk on Grand River avenue. This left the walk on Perry street about 18 inches higher where it joined the sidewalk on Grand River avenue than the sidewalk on the last-named street. About 3 feet of the sidewalk on Perry street was cut off, leaving a drop from the top of the plank to the ground of about 6 inches. From the end of the walk as cut off to the walk on Grand River avenue the earth was left exposed, and the earth wore away, so it became inclined. The incline reached to the Grand River avenue walk. The drop in the earth was about 12 inches in the 3 feet. . . . This was a much traveled highway. This portion of the sidewalk became partially covered with snow and ice. In February, 1898, plaintiff attempted to pass over it. He slipped and fell, and sustained injuries for which this action was brought. The learned trial judge directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the city, upon the ground that the proximate cause of the injury was not the defect in the walk, but was the natural accumulation of ice and snow. The plaintiff brings the case here by writ of error." The action of the trial court was affirmed, the court saying: "All inclined sidewalks become dangerous for pedestrians when covered with ice. All the law requires is that the municipality shall keep them, otherwise, in a reasonably safe condition."

In Beirness v. Missouri Valley (1913) 162 Iowa, 720, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 218, 144 N. W. 628, it appeared that the plaintiff fell on a small spot of ice on the sidewalk, which had been covered by a light fall of snow. The grade of the sidewalk at the place of the accident was nearly 15 per cent, while the grade of the adjoining street was 18 per cent. An ordinance provided that the establishment of a grade for the center of the street operated to establish a grade for the adjoining sidewalks. It was held that the city was not negligent as a matter of law in failing to follow the established grade in constructing the sidewalk, and, there being no substantial proof that the increased slope of the sidewalk was a contributing cause to the injury, a direction of the verdict in favor of the defendant by the trial court was proper.

In Taylor v. Yonkers (1887) 105 N. Y. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 492, 11 N. E. 642, it appeared that the plaintiff fell on ice which had recently formed over an old accumulation of ice and snow, on a sidewalk, which the city had negligently allowed to have a slope of 8 inches from its inner to its outer edge. In an action against the city to recover damages for injuries resulting from the fall, the jury were instructed that the new ice furnished no ground of negligence on the part of the defendant, but that if the slope of the walk was a concurring cause of the fall, without which the accident would not have happened, the defendant was liable. A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed because the facts did not permit the jury to find the slope of the walk to have been a concurrent cause of the fall. The court said: "The plaintiff slipped upon the ice. That by itself was a sufficient, certain, and operating cause of the fall. No other explanation is needed to account for what happened. It is possible that the slope of the walk had something to do with it. It is equally possible that it did not. There is not a particle of proof that it did. To affirm it is a pure guess and an absolute speculation." In Ayres v. Hammondsport (1891) 130 N. Y. 665, 29 N. E. 265, reversing (1889) 26 N. Y. S. R. 634, 7 N. Y. Supp. 174, the facts were substantially similar to those of the preceding case, and the court followed the ruling of that case. And in McCarty v. Lockport (1897) 13 App. Div. 494, 43 N. Y. Supp. 693, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 651, the same rule was applied. It appeared that the plaintiff slipped and fell on a stone made slippery by snow, and which sloped about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches in 2 feet and 1 inch.

In Grossenbach v. Milwaukee (1885) 65 Wis. 31, 56 Am. Rep. 614, 26 N. W. 182, it appeared that the plaintiff fell on an icy apron connecting a crosswalk with a sidewalk. The apron was about 8 feet long and inclined to an extent of about 10 inches. The plaintiff testified that he fell backwards as he was ascending the apron. He also testified that his foot was caught as in a vise, but he gave no explanation as to the cause and there was no evidence from which it could be inferred. Melting snow and ice were passing over the crosswalk and apron at the time of the accident. There was no evidence of any deformity or want of conformity in the apron. The apron was alleged to be defective in that it was only about 4 feet wide and without any crosspieces on the surface to prevent people from slipping down. It was held that a verdict for the city was properly directed.

Mich. 445, 116 N. W. 362, it appeared that the sidewalk at the place where the accident occurred consisted of leveled cinders which were placed there as a foundation for a cement walk, work on which had been suspended because of the lateness of the season. It was held that the walk was not defective or dangerous, and that the city was not responsible for a fall on ice which had accumulated thereon.

IV. Effect of act or liability of abutting owner.

In Bucher v. Sunbury (1906) 216 Pa. 89, 64 Atl. 906, an action was brought against a borough to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a fall on a slippery sidewalk. The evidence tended to show that at the place of the accident there were irregular and rough places which had become filled with ice and snow to such an extent as to make the pavement unsafe, and that the borough had permitted this condition to continue for several weeks. The evidence showed that the walk was in general use on the day of the accident. It also appeared that there was a storm shortly before the accident, which aggravated the existing conditions. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff it was held that the liability of the defendant was not affected by the question of the nonliability of the abutting property owner.

In Hill v. Fond du Lac (1882) 56 Wis. 242, 14 N. W. 25, an action was brought against a city to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff suffered by reason of her falling and slipping on a slippery walk at a place where there was a sudden declivity. A judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed, and it was held that the liability of the city was not affected by the fact that the walk was constructed by an adjoining lot owner.

But in Ellingson v. Leeds (1918) — N. D. —, 169 N. W. 85, an action to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff occasioned by his falling on the steps in front of a postoffice building, it appeared that the steps were placed on the sidewalk, and that the plaintiff slipped and fell as she was ascending them. It was alleged that the accident occurred "on account of the dangerous condition of the steps, due to steepness and narrowness, and, further, on account of the accumulation of snow and ice thereon, making them slippery." It was held that the municipality was not liable.

V. Rule in Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts, it is provided by statute (Stat. 1896, chap. 540) as follows: "No city or town shall be liable for any injury . . . to person . . . hereafter received or suffered in or upon any part of a highway, town way, causeway, or bridge, by reason or in consequence of snow or ice thereon, if the place at which the injury or damage was received or suffered was at the time of the accident otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers." Under this statute the rule seems to obtain that a municipality is liable for injuries resulting from the slippery condition of a walk, where there is a defect in the walk to which, as a proximate cause, the accident is in part attributable. Newton v. Worcester (1897) 169 Mass. 516, 48 N. E. 274; Bailey v. Cambridge (1899) 174 Mass. 188, 54 N. E. 523; McCabe v. Whitman (1905) 187 Mass. 484, 73 N. E. 535. See also the dictum in Newton v. Worcester (1899) 174 Mass. 181, 54 N. E. 521; NEILLSON v. WORCESTER (reported herewith) ante, 1120.

In Newton v. Worcester (1897) 169 Mass. 516, 48 N. E. 274, the statute was construed as providing that a way should not be deemed unsafe by reason of snow or ice thereon, if it was otherwise reasonably safe and convenient for travelers. It was held that an instruction embodying this construction should have been given at the request of the defendant in an action against a city to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of a fall caused by ice in a small depression in a sidewalk.

In (1899) 174 Mass. 181, 54 N. E. 521, a second appeal of the same case, the statute hereinbefore set out was construed as follows: "We think the proper and only reasonable interpretation of the statute is that, wherever ice or snow is the sole proximate cause of the accident, there shall be no liability; but where, at the time of the accident, there is any other defect to which, as a proximate cause, the accident is in part attributable, there may be a liability notwithstanding the fact that it also may be attributable in part to ice or snow. This other defect, however, is not a proximate cause within the meaning of this rule, simply because it causes the accumulation of the ice or snow. In considering whether, 'at the time of the accident, the way is otherwise reasonably safe and convenient,' the attention is to be directed to the actual physical condition of the way, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is at that time any other danger to the steps of the traveler than that arising from the presence of ice or snow. If there be no other danger, then for the time being the way is 'otherwise reasonably safe and convenient.'" The evidence showed that the plaintiff fell on some ice which had formed. At the place where the plaintiff fell there were some depressions varying from  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch to 2 inches in depth, caused by some of the bricks being depressed and some being elevated. But there were no projections or sharp corners and the surface of the depression was smooth. It was held that the jury was not warranted in finding that the walk, when bare, was not reasonably safe and convenient for public travel.

In Barley v. Cambridge (1899) 174 Mass. 188, 54 N. E. 523, it appeared that the plaintiff fell on a crosswalk at a time when it was covered with ice. At the place of the accident there was a ridge of earth. In an action against the city to recover damages for the injuries resulting from the fall, it was held that the questions whether the way, when bare, was defective, and whether the accident was wholly or partly caused by this defect, were for the jury, and a verdict for the plaintiff was affirmed.

to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff, resulting from a fall into a depression in the sidewalk. It was contended by the defendant that it was entitled to a verdict as a matter of law because the depression was a part of the gutter outside of the walk across which the plaintiff was walking. The plaintiff testified that he fell into the depression when walking across the sidewalk. Another witness testified that "there was a depression that extended almost to the inside of the sidewalk." A third witness testified that the "gully was about 3 or 4 feet long on the center of the walk." The exceptions of the defendant were overruled.

In NEILLSON v. WORCESTER (reported herewith) ante, 1120, an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff by reason of falling on a sidewalk, it appeared that the plaintiff fell at the bottom of a long slope, her fall being caused by stepping on an accumulation of ice in a depression. The city had erected an iron railing along the outer edge of the walk to assist pedestrians in making the ascent or descent of the slope when there was snow or ice on the walk, but before the time of the accident the lower portion of it, for a space of 4 or 5 feet, had been removed. The depression was about 1½ inches deep, and near by, embedded in the walk, was a cobblestone which stood up 1 inch above the surface of the walk. The plaintiff was descending the slope, using the iron rail to assist her, and fell only after leaving the rail to cross the intervening portion of the slope. It was held that the removal of a portion of the iron railing did not constitute a defect in the way, nor did the depression in the walk, though it may have caused the accumulation of the ice or snow. And as to a contention that the way was defective because of the cobblestone, it was held that there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff's fall was caused in whole or in part by the stone.

In Hughes v. Lawrence (1894) 160 Mass. 474, 36 N. E. 485, which was decided before the passage of the statute hereinbefore referred to, the action was to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a fall on a sidewalk. At the place of the accident there was a gutter 14 inches wide and 1½ inches deep into which a water conductor from the roof of an adjoining building had formerly discharged. The water conductor discharged into a sewer, but at the time of the accident it had so become defective that it discharged some of the water on the sidewalk. The water froze and the resulting ice covered the gutter and part of the walk on either side. Some evidence showed that the plaintiff slipped on the ice in the gutter, and other evidence showed that she fell on the outer edge of the ice. In submitting the case to the jury the court instructed them that it was for them to determine where the plaintiff fell, and whether at that place the way was defective. A verdict for the plaintiff was rendered, which, on appeal, was affirmed, and the appellate court held that it was competent for the jury to find that the gutter constituted a defect in the way, and that its construction was such as to cause a special deposit of ice at that particular place.

In Adams v. Chicopee (1888) 147 Mass. 440, 18 N. E. 281, an instruction that "the freezing of smooth, level ice does not constitute a defect in any way, and the fact that there are such hollows or basins in the sidewalk as to make them fill with level water which cannot pass off, and that level water freezes, if it freezes into smooth, level ice, does not constitute a defect in the way," was held subject to a general exception.

In Crocker v. Springfield (1872) 110 Mass. 135, it appeared that the plaintiff slipped and fell on a spot of ice about 3 feet square, in a depression in a sidewalk. The ice was 2 or 3 inches thick. The adjoining land was so graded that water ran into this depression and stayed there in summer until it evaporated and in winter till it froze. On the day before the accident it rained and drizzled, and on the morning of that day an icy coat was over everything. In an action against the city to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, it was held that if the condition of the sidewalk at the time of the accident was such as to warrant the jury in finding it to have been defective, there was no evidence that the defect had existed for twenty-four hours, or that the city had notice thereof.

MARGARET TIDD, Respt.,

v.

C. B. SKINNER et al., Doing Business under the Name, Style, and Title of C. B. Skinner & Company, Appt.

(225 N. Y. 422, 122 N. E. 247.)

Parent and child — recovery for loss of services — habit-forming drug.

1. A father may recover for loss of services of his minor child due to the wrongful act of another, such as the sale of a habit-forming drug, and in case of the father's death the mother may recover.

Poison — heroin as.

2. Heroin, a derivative of morphine, is within the operation of a statute prohibiting the sale of morphine without affixing certain labels to the packages and recording the sale in a book kept for that purpose.

Appeal — extent of review.

3. So far as the facts are concerned the court of appeals can review only errors in the admission or rejection of evidence or in the charge to the jury, where, by the Constitution, the unanimous affirmance by an intermediate appellate court of a judgment entered upon a verdict conclusively establishes that the verdict is supported by the facts.

Evidence — pawning of articles from house.

4. In an action by a mother against a druggist for selling heroin to her minor son, evidence is admissible that he took articles from the house and pawned them to obtain the drug and also of other efforts to obtain money to purchase it, as showing the influence it had on him.

Trial — jury — extent of sales of heroin.

5. In an action by a mother against a druggist for selling heroin to her minor son, the jury may be permitted to consider the purpose and extent of the sales in determining whether or not the sales were lawful.

— knowledge of druggist.

6. In an action by a mother against a druggist for selling heroin to her minor son the jury may infer that defendant had knowledge of the drug and its consequences when sold in the quantity shown by the evidence.

— refusal to charge as to improper use.

7. Refusal to charge, in an action by a mother against a druggist for selling heroin to her minor son, that defendants were not liable for improper use of the drug by the purchaser, is not error where the court has charged that plaintiff cannot recover unless defendant sold the drug to the son, knowing that he was making an improper use of it, and that its use was injuriously affecting his health.

Appeal — considering refusal of instructions.

8. In considering exceptions to the court's refusal to give requested instructions, the requests must be regarded in connection with all that the court said in connection therewith, and with the facts necessarily found by the jury.

Parent and child — negligence of child — effect.

9. A parent's action for loss of services through wrongful injury to his minor child is defeated, if the child's negligence was the efficient cause of the injury.

— wilful injury — effect.

10. Contributory negligence of the child will not defeat the parent's action for loss of services through its injury, if defendant's conduct was so deliberate, persistent, and intentional as to be equivalent in law to positive and wilful injury.

Trial — jury — rule applicable.

11. The jury must determine whether or not an action by a parent for loss of services through injury to his minor child is within the rule that contributory negligence of the child defeats the action, or the rule that such negligence will not defeat a wilful injury unless the evidence is without conflict.

[See 20 R. C. L. 166 et seq.]

Master and servant — action for injury to servant — property rights.

12. The common-law action which a master or parent has for loss of services of a servant or minor child is based upon an injury to a property right.

Damages — punitive — selling heroin to child.

13. Punitive damages cannot be allowed in an action by a mother against a druggist for selling heroin to her minor son, by reason of which she lost the benefit of his services.

[See 8 R. C. L. 595; 20 R. C. L. 618.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Schenectady County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for loss of services of plaintiff's minor son because of the alleged unlawful sale to him by defendants, of a certain drug. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Christopher J. Heffernan, for appellants:

Plaintiff did not establish any cause of action against the defendants.

Elsev v. Metcalf, 1 Denio, 323; Miller v. King, 88 Hun, 181, 34 N. Y. Supp. 425; King v. MacKellar, 94 N. Y. 317; Rogers v. Murray, 3 Bosw. 357.

The trial judge clearly erred in his charge to the jury, in his refusal to charge defendants' requests, and erroneously instructed the jury on the question of damages.

Mr. Frank Cooper, with Mr. J. J. Barry, for respondent:

Plaintiff clearly established a substantial cause of action for the wrongful acts of the defendants.

The rulings of the trial judge on admissions of evidence were not erroneous nor prejudicial to the defendants.

People v. Marrin, 205 N. Y. 275, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 754, 98 N. E. 474.

There was no error committed in the trial court's charge to the jury, nor in his refusal to charge defendants' requests. The amount of compensatory damage was amply justified by the evidence, and punitive damages supported by authority.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by a widow to recover damages for loss of the services of her son, which she alleges was caused by the defendants as herein stated. The defendants at the times herein mentioned were druggists of experience, engaged in conducting retail drug stores, one of which was in the city of Amsterdam. The plaintiff at the times herein mentioned lived in the city of Schenectady. She had a son who at eighteen years of age was of good physique and fair ability. He lived with his mother, and was employed by others at remunerative wages. The mother, except for the aid of the son, was dependent upon her labor to maintain her household. The son was kind, helpful, and obedient to his mother, and brought to her all or a substantial part of his earnings. About that time, and within four or five weeks before January 1, 1912, he was given fifteen or twenty tablets, each containing from  $\frac{1}{16}$  to  $\frac{1}{8}$  of a grain of heroin, by a boy friend. During that time he used these tablets, and he testified: "I felt like I wanted it. I liked it."

Heroin is a derivative of morphine. It is a poison within the provisions of the Public Health Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 45) as it existed at the times herein mentioned (Public Health Law, § 236, as it existed prior to the amendment by <sup>Poison—</sup>heroin as. chapter 502 of the Laws of 1915). The statute referred to provided: "It shall be unlawful for any person to sell at retail or furnish any of the poisons named in the schedules hereinafter set forth, without affixing or causing to be affixed, to the bottle, box, vessel or package, a label containing the name of the article and the word 'poison' distinctly shown, with the name and place of business of the seller, all printed in red ink, together with the name of such poisons printed or written thereupon in plain, legible characters."

It also provided: "Every person who shall dispose of or sell at retail or furnish any poisons included under schedule A [thereinabove included] shall, before delivering the same, make or cause to be made an entry in a book kept for that purpose, stating the date of sale, the name and address of the purchaser, the name and the quantity of the poison, the purpose for which it is represented by the purchaser to be required. . . . He shall not deliver any of said poisons without satisfying himself that the purchaser is aware of its poisonous character and that the said poison is to be used for a legitimate purpose."

Any person who violates any of the provisions of the Public Health Law mentioned is guilty of a misdemeanor. Penal Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 40) § 1743.

The defendants at all the times mentioned knew of the existence of the statutes relating to the sale of poisons. The jury could have found from the evidence that about January 1, 1912, plaintiff's son went to Amsterdam from Schenectady and endeavored to purchase heroin of the defendants, but was asked if he had purchased it of them before, and, when he answered in the negative, was told that they could not sell it to him. Soon thereafter he went again to Amsterdam, and to the defendant's store. His boy friend was with him, and his friend said to one of the defendants that he (plaintiff's son) "was all right if he wanted to buy any heroin." Thereafter, and on the same day, plaintiff's son went alone to the defendants and purchased from them 200 tablets. From that time until he became twenty-one years of age, a period of between two and three years, he purchased of the defendants, except during the times when he was in a hospital or confined under criminal process, more than 300 tablets per week. One week he purchased of them 1,000 tablets. Each of the tablets so purchased contained either  $\frac{1}{2}$  or  $\frac{1}{3}$  of a grain of heroin. During a part of the time plaintiff's son personally pulverized and inhaled 75 to 100 tablets per day. He became a physical wreck. He not only abandoned his work, but he pawned his clothing and also carpets, rugs, and furnishings from his mother's home to obtain money to buy the drug. At the time of the trial he was brought as a witness from the county jail, where he was serving a term for petit larceny.

The defendants wholly failed to obey the statutes quoted, knowing that heroin, except as a medicine used in very small quantities and under the direction of a physician, is a poison dangerous to human life.

The jury could have found that one of the defendants stated to the plaintiff's son that he should be careful not to let anyone know that he was getting heroin at the defendants' store, as it might make trouble for them. They could also have found that the change in the habits and physical condition of plaintiff's son, and his consequent conduct and general incapacity, were the results of the use of heroin purchased of the defendants; that in selling it to him as stated they knew that he was making an improper use of it, and that its use was injuriously affecting his health, and that their conduct in the repeated sales to him, in the manner and to the extent as shown, was reckless and equivalent in law to wilful injury. Upon the facts necessarily found in this case, the sales were entirely different from those ordinarily made by a druggist at the request of a customer.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and an appeal was taken from the judgment entered upon their verdict to the appellate division, where the judgment was unanimously affirmed (171 App. Div. 98, 34 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 196, 156 N. Y. Supp. 885), the court expressly stating in its opinion that the verdict was not against the weight of evidence, and that "the proof does abundantly establish . . . that the defendants were wholly reckless of the rights of others." The judgment of the trial court entered upon the verdict of the jury having been unanimously affirmed by the appellate division, it is on this appeal incontrovertibly established that the facts presented at the trial sustain the verdict. Const. art. 6, § 9; Code Civ. Proc. § 191. The judgment must be sustained by this court unless error was committed in the rulings upon the admission or rejection of evidence, or in the charge by the court to the jury.

of review.

Numerous questions are presented to us by the appellants arising from rulings of the court upon objections to the receipt of evidence during the trial. The appellants claim that the court erred in receiving evidence to show that the plaintiff's son had taken carpets and rugs from the floor of her home and pawned them, and also to show his other efforts to obtain money to purchase heroin. We do not think that the court erred in the rulings mentioned. It was a part of the history of the son during the time mentioned, and tended to show the dominating influence that heroin had over his time and his thought as it affected his time, and the consequent loss of his services to his mother.

There were no exceptions taken to the main charge of the court except those relating to punitive or vindictive damages. The only exceptions taken by the defendants to their request to charge made at the close of the main charge, other than those relating to punitive or vindictive damages hereinafter referred to, were taken in connection with other statements and charges by the court, all of which we quote as follows:

Mr. Heffernan: I ask your Honor to charge that the defendants had a legal right to sell and offer for sale heroin between the 1st day of January, 1912, and the 1st day of July, 1914, without the direction or prescription of a physician on complying with the terms of the statute as to registering it and labeling it.

The Court: I will charge the jury that at the time of the sales in question, if there were such sales, there was no statute of the state which prohibited the sale by these defendants of the drug known as heroin without a doctor's prescription, and I also charge the jury that cases can arise where the sales are so excessive and made with such purpose that a civil action will lie for damages resulting from such sales, in which case the sales could not be termed rightful.

Mr. Heffernan: The defendants except to your Honor's modification. I ask your Honor to charge the jury that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that the defendants sold heroin to Rooney, knowing that Rooney was making an improper use of it, and that its use was injuriously affecting his health.

The Court: I so charge.

Mr. Heffernan: I ask your Honor to charge the jury that there is no evidence in this case upon which the jury can find that the defendant knew, or had reason to know, that Rooney's health was being injuriously affected by heroin.

The Court: I decline to charge that on the ground that the defendant was a pharmacist, and from his position as a pharmacist the jury might infer that he had knowledge of the drug heroin and of its consequences, and also from the size of the doses claimed to have been sold.

Mr. Heffernan: We except to your Honor's modification. I ask your Honor to charge that if the defendants, between January 1, 1912, and June, 1914, sold heroin in the ordinary course of business to Rooney or to others on their application, the defendants are not liable for the improper use of it made by the purchasers.

The Court: For improper use made by the purchasers?

Mr. Heffernan: Yes.

The Court: Refused.

Mr. Heffernan: I except to that. I ask your Honor to charge that there is no evidence in this case that the defendants knew or had reason to know that Rooney was not using heroin in a proper or lawful manner.

The Court: I will refuse to charge that on the ground that there is proof in this case to the effect that the use of 500 tablets of heroin a week is not known for medical purposes.

Mr. Heffernan: I except to your Honor's statement. I ask your Honor to charge that there is no evidence in this case that the defendants wrongfully, unlawfully, or by acts or words requested, solicited, or induced the plaintiff's son to enter their store or to purchase or use heroin.

The Court: I charge that there is no evidence of active inducement of the son of the plaintiff to enter the store of the defendants and acquire the drug habit.

Mr. Heffernan: Now I ask your honor to charge that there can be no recovery by the plaintiff here unless the defendants, or either of them, requested, solicited, or induced Rooney to enter their store, for the purpose of selling or giving to him heroin.

The Court: Refused.

Mr. Heffernan: Except. I ask your Honor to charge that if the jury find that Rooney had become addicted to the use of heroin before he claims he made his first purchase from the defendants, then the jury's verdict must be no cause of action.

The Court: I so charge.

It will be seen from the above quotation that the defendants took but five exceptions. The first exception followed a charge by the court in accordance with the defendant's request, in which the jury were told "that at the time of the sales in question, if there were such sales, there was no statute of the state which prohibited the sale by these defendants of the drug known as heroin without a doctor's prescription," but the court added: "Cases can arise where the sales are so excessive and made with such purpose that civil action will lie for damages resulting from such sales, in which case the sales could not be termed rightful."

It was not error to leave the jury to consider the purpose and extent of the sales. The purpose and extent of the sales were questions of fact. Heroin being a poison, the purpose and extent of the sales were proper subjects of consideration in the action.

The second exception was after the court had charged, at the defendants' request, that the jury must be satisfied that the defendants sold heroin to plaintiff's son, knowing that he was making an improper use of it, and that the use was injuriously affecting his health, and the defendants had made a further request that the court charge the jury "that there is no evidence in this case upon which the jury can find that the defendant knew or had reason to know that Rooney's health was being injuriously affected by heroin."

The modification by the court to which the exception was taken is in words as follows: "The defendant was a pharmacist, and from his position as a pharmacist the jury might infer that he had knowledge of the drug heroin and of its consequences, and also from the size of the doses claimed to have been sold."

The defendants' knowledge of the drug heroin was ~~knowledge of~~ established. The ~~druggist.~~ modification was not error.

The third exception was to the refusal of the court to charge "that if the defendants, between January 1, 1912, and June, 1914, sold heroin in the ordinary course of business to Rooney or to others on their application, the defendants are not liable for the improper use of it by the purchasers."

The charge so far as it relates to sales to others than Rooney was immaterial, and the sale to Rooney could not be disassociated from the facts and circumstances affecting such sales. The court had charged ~~refusal to~~ charge as to ~~improper use.~~ that in order to find a verdict the jury must be satisfied that defendants sold the heroin to Rooney, knowing that he was making an improper use of it, and that its use was injuriously affecting his health.

The fourth exception was to the refusal of the court to charge the jury "that there is no evidence in this case that the defendants knew or had reason to know that Rooney was not using heroin in a proper or lawful manner." The court did charge in connection with such refusal that his refusal was "on the ground that there is proof in this case to the effect that the use of 500 tablets of heroin a week is not known for medical purposes." This exception does not present a question of law.

The fifth exception was to the refusal to charge that "there can be no recovery by the plaintiff here unless the defendants, or either of them, requested, solicited, or induced Rooney to enter their store for the purpose of selling or giving to him heroin."

The court refused to charge as requested after saying: "I charge that there is no evidence of active inducement of the son of the plaintiff to enter the store of the defendant and acquire the drug habit."

The questions raised by exceptions, as we have shown, are few. In considering them they must be read with all that was said by the court in connection therewith, and with the facts necessarily found by the jury. As so read, no question of controlling importance is presented.

The right of a parent to recover for loss of services of a child has long been recognized at common law. Maxson v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co.

112 N. Y. 559, 20 N. E. 544; Lawyer v. Fritcher, 130 N. Y. 239, 14 L.R.A. 700, 27 Am. St. Rep. 521, 29 N. E. 267; King v. Viscoloid Co. 219 Mass. 420, 106 N. E. 988, 7 N. C. C. A. 254, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1170; Cowden v. Wright, 24 Wend. 429, 35 Am. Dec. 633.

Such an action is sustained when the loss of services has been caused by an assault and battery (Cowden v. Wright, supra), indecent assault (Whitney v. Hitchcock, 4 Denio, 461), negligence (Maxson v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra; Cum- ing v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 109 N. Y. 95, 16 N. E. 65), abduction (Lawyer v. Fritcher, supra), or other tort by which the parent's right to the services of the child is taken away in whole or in part. When the child's father is dead the mother can maintain the action. Gray v. Durland, 51 N. Y. 424.

It is an established general rule of law that where a parent sues for loss of services arising from an injury <sup>—negligence of child—effect.</sup> received by his infant child, damages will not be permitted if the evidence shows that the child's negligence was the efficient cause of the injury. Kennard v. Burton, 25 Me. 39, 43 Am. Dec. 249; Honegsberger v. Second Ave. R. Co. 2 Abb. App. Dec. 378; Dennis v. Clark, 2 Cush. 347, 354, 48 Am. Dec. 671; Kerr v. Forgue, 54 Ill. 482, 5 Am. Rep. 146; Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Harney, 28 Ind. 28, 92 Am. Dec. 282; Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 99 Pa. 301, 44 Am. Rep. 106; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Honey, 26 L.R.A. 42, 12 C. C. A. 190, 27 U. S. App. 196, 63 Fed. 39; Ainley v. Manhattan R. Co. 47 Hun, 206, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 599.

It is an equally well-established rule of law that if the conduct of the defendant in such a case was so deliber- <sup>—wilful injury—effect.</sup> ate, persistent, and intentional as to be equivalent in law to positive and wilful injury, the contributory negligence of the child is not a defense. Chapman v. Trial—jury—rule applicable. New Haven R. Co.

19 N. Y. 341, 75 Am. Dec. 344. Unless the evidence is without conflict it is always for the jury to determine whether the facts in a given case bring it within one rule or the other.

The question distinctly arises in this case whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover punitive or vindictive damages against the defendants. The court charged the jury that if they found the defendants "with evil heart desiring to ruin this boy, or not caring at all whether they ruined him or not, knowing that surely he was acquiring this habit, that his life would be more or less affected thereby, and that he would eventually become a useless citizen," and permitted "the sale of this poison to make money out of the miseries of this boy, and did it from a reckless disregard of any duty towards any human being and out of desire to injure, in such case and no other can you consider the question of so-called punitive or vindictive damages."

The defendants excepted to the charge, and the court directed the jury that in case they found a verdict for the plaintiff they should find separately as to the compensatory damages and as to the punitive damages. At the close of the charge the defendants asked the court to charge "that there is no evidence in this case upon which they may predicate or make an award of punitive damages."

The court declined to make this charge, and the defendants took an exception.

The common-law action which a master or parent has for loss of the services of a servant or minor child is based upon an injury to a property right. Compensation is allowed for loss of services to which the master or parent is entitled and for the expenses incurred by reason of such injury. Much has been written by the courts and by text-writers upon the question whether punitive, vindictive, exemplary, aggravated, or retributory damages should be allowed in any case without reaching a generally accepted conclusion. In some states of this country such damages are allowed by statute, and in others they are by statute prohibited. In most of the states, including this state, such damages are allowed to the person directly injured in cases of wrong committed with malice or reckless disregard of the rights of others. Such damages are allowed in this state in an action by a parent against a person who seduces his daughter. It was said in Cowden v. Wright, supra: "It is true that in the action for the seduction of a daughter, the jury in fixing upon the damages may regard the wounded feelings of the family; but that case has always been considered sui generis, and inconsistent with the fundamental principle of the action." 24 Wend. 430, 35 Am. Dec. 633.

We are of the opinion that such damages do not in this case come within the reason on which the common-law action in favor of a third person is sustained. The weight of reason and authority is in favor of confining the damages to be recovered in an action by a third party to compensation for the pecuniary injury actually sustained. Cowden v. Wright; Whitney v. Hitchcock, and Cuming v. Brooklyn City R. Co. supra; Barnes v. Keene, 132 N. Y. 13, 29 N. E. 1090. See also Covert v. Gray, 34 How. Pr. 450, and 20 R. C. L. pp. 614, 615, §§ 24, 25, and cases cited.

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and fixed the compensatory damages at $2,000, and the punitive damages at $1,000. Judgment was entered for $3,000 and costs.

The judgment should be modified by reducing the amount of the recovery to $2,000, being the amount found for compensatory damages, and, as thus modified, affirmed, without costs to either party in this court or in the Appellate Division.

ANNOTATION.

Right of action against one selling habit-forming drug to child or spouse.

It is generally held that a parent may maintain an action against one selling a habit-forming drug to a child, or a spouse for a like sale to the other spouse, where it appears that the person selling the drug knew or had good reason to know that it was not to be used for a medical purpose, but, on the contrary, was intended to satisfy the craving created by the habitual use thereof. Hoard v. Peck (1867) 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 202; Holleman v. Harward (1896) 119 N. C. 150, 34 L.R.A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, 25 S. E. 972; Flandermeyer v. Cooper (1912) 85 Ohio St. 327, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 360, 98 N. E. 102, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 983; Moberg v. Scott (1917) 38 S. D. 422, L.R.A. 1917D, 732, 161 N. W. 998. And see the reported case (TIDD v. SKINNER, ante, 1145).

In Hoard v. Peck (N. Y.) supra, it was held that a druggist was liable to a husband for selling laudanum to his wife to be used by her as a beverage, the sales extending over several months. As a result the wife became sick and emaciated, and her mind was affected so that she was unable to perform her duties as a wife. The court held that although the sale of laudanum was not prohibited by law, it did not, therefore, follow that every sale of it was lawful, saying that "its lawfulness or unlawfulness depends upon the circumstances of the sale, and the uses and purposes to which it is applied."

In Holleman v. Harward (1896) 119 N. C. 150, 34 L.R.A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, 25 S. E. 972, it was held that the defendant, a druggist, was liable to a husband for selling his wife laudanum, knowing that it was to be used as a beverage and not for medical purposes, and despite the warnings and protests of the husband against the sale, as a result of which the wife became a mental, moral, and physical wreck, causing the husband to lose her services and society. The court said: "Notwithstanding the claim of the defendants, we think this action rests upon a principle, a principle not new, but one sound and consistent. The principle is this: 'Whoever does an injury to another is liable in damages to the extent of that injury. It matters not whether the injury is to the property, or the rights, or the reputation of another.' . . . The defendants owed the plaintiff the legal duty not to sell to his wife opium in the form of large quantities of laudanum as a beverage, knowing that she was, by using them, destroying mind and body, and thereby causing loss to the husband."

In Flandermeyer v. Cooper (1912) 85 Ohio St. 327, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 360, 98 N. E. 102, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 983, it was held that a wife could recover for the loss of her husband's consortium, caused by the sale to him of morphine by the defendant, a druggist. It appeared that the plaintiff's husband had previously been a morphine fiend, but had been cured, and the plaintiff, knowing the danger of a recurrence of the habit, had warned the defendant repeatedly not to sell her husband the drug, but that he nevertheless persisted in so doing.

In Moberg v. Scott (S. D.) supra, it was held that a wife might maintain an action against one who sold her husband opium. As a result of the continued use of the drug the husband became an opium fiend, and the wife was thereby deprived of his aid, support, and consortium. It appeared that the wife repeatedly warned the defendant against selling the drug to her husband, so that he had actual knowledge that the drug was not being used for medical purposes.

In the reported case (TIDD v. SKINNER, ante, 1145), wherein it was held that a mother could recover damages against a druggist for the sale of heroin tablets to her son, by reason of which he gave up his position, his health was ruined, and he became a criminal, the court held that the defendant had notice of the improper use for which the drug was intended, by reason of the fact that larger amounts were sold at one time than were used for medical purposes.

UNION TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Respt.

(224 N. Y. 73, 120 N. E. 81.)

Landlord and tenant — covenant to pay taxes — construction — change in time of payment.

A tenant whose lease expires at noon on a specified date, and who has covenanted to pay and discharge all taxes as shall be imposed on the premises during the term as soon as they become due and payable, is liable for taxes which, by change of the due date, become payable on the day the lease expires.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County, dismissing the complaint in an action on a covenant to pay taxes contained in a lease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. K. Post and Henry W. Hayden, for appellants:

Annual taxes are imposed when the assessment rolls are delivered by the president of the board of aldermen to the receiver of taxes, with the warrant for their collection.

Ogden v. Getty, 100 App. Div. 430, 91 N. Y. Supp. 664; Re Sherwoods, 127 C. C. A. 304, 210 Fed. 754, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 940; Wilkinson v. Libbey, 1 Allen, 375; Amory v. Melvin, 112 Mass. 83; Richardson v. Gordon, 188 Mass. 279, 74 N. E. 344; Craig v. Summers, 47 Minn. 189, 15 L.R.A. 236, 49 N. W. 742; Blythe v. Gately, 51 Cal. 236; McManus v. Fair Shoe & Clothing Co. 60 Mo. App. 216.

Under the covenant in the lease to pay all taxes imposed upon the demised premises during the term, the defendant is obligated to pay all the taxes for 1914.

Ogden v. Getty, supra; New York v. Cashman, 10 Johns. 96; Bleecker v. Ballou, 3 Wend. 263; Post v. Kearney, 2 N. Y. 394, 51 Am. Dec. 303; Walker v. Whittemore, 112 Mass. 187.

The lessee, by its acts, has itself construed the covenant as covering taxes imposed in accordance with the amendment of 1911.

Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. ed. 594.

Messrs. Wolcott G. Lane and John B. B. Fiske, with Messrs. Miller, King, Lane, & Trafford, for respondent:

Leases are construed most strongly against the landlord; and a burden which is imposed by law upon the landlord can be shifted to the tenant only by the very clearest language.

24 Cyc. 915; Woodruff v. Oswego Starch Factory, 177 N. Y. 23, 68 N. E. 994; Herald Square Realty Co. v. Saks & Co. 215 N. Y. 427, 109 N. E. 545; Ayer v. Bonwit, 161 App. Div. 122, 146 N. Y. Supp. 301.

The language used in a lease (and especially words which relate to the shifting of a burden to the tenant) should not receive a narrow technical construction, but should be construed upon broad common-sense lines, so as to carry out the intention of the parties.

Gillet v. Bank of America, 160 N. Y. 549, 55 N. E. 292; Maloney v. Iroquois Brewing Co. 173 N. Y. 303, 66 N. E. 19; Williams v. Barkley, 165 N. Y. 48, 58 N. E. 765; Nellis v. Western L. Indemnity Co. 207 N. Y. 320, 100 N. E. 1119.

In construing leases as well as all other contracts the court should avoid, if possible, any construction which is unreasonable or inequitable; and in order to determine the real intention of the parties it will construe the language used in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, including contemporaneous regulations, customs, and long-established laws.

The words, "annual taxes," stipulated in this lease to be paid by the tenant, should be construed to mean five years' taxes—not six years' taxes—for the five years' term.

Even construing the words used in this lease in the narrowest possible sense, they must be held to mean a complete fixation of the taxes, including the establishment of a lien, so that the most that can be claimed is that the respondent became liable for the first half of the 1914 taxes.

This is an action upon an express covenant contained in a lease. The facts are admitted. So far as now material they are that the trustees under the will of Mary Mason Jones, deceased, executed, as lessors, to the Plaza Bank, as lessee, a written lease of premises on Fifth avenue, New York city, for a term of five years, commencing on the 1st day of May, 1909, at noon, and ending on the 1st day of May, 1914, at noon, at a rent to be paid as therein provided. The lease contained a covenant as follows: "Provided always and the lessee hereby covenants to pay said rent punctually, and to pay and discharge all annual taxes as shall during said term be imposed on said premises hereby demised, as soon as they become due and payable, and to pay the Croton and all other water charges as soon as the same shall become due, and to keep said demised premises free, clear, discharged and unencumbered from all such taxes and Croton and other water charges during said term, and to put and keep the said premises in good order and repair, and in all respects promptly comply with and execute all the laws, orders, and regulations of the state and municipal authorities applicable to said premises; except as hereinafter provided with respect to the widening of Fifth avenue."

The Plaza Bank occupied the premises described in the lease for sixteen years prior to the commencement of the term as therein provided, pursuant to two similar leases, one for ten years, commencing May 1, 1893, and the other for six years, commencing May 1, 1903, and it had paid the rent and taxes as provided during said terms. The bank continued in possession under the lease in controversy until December 22, 1911, when it merged under the State Banking Law with the Union Trust Company of New York, the defendant in this action. The bank paid the taxes for the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, pursuant to said covenant. The defendant trust company continued in possession of said lease from December 22, 1911, until May 1, 1914, at noon, and paid the taxes pursuant to said covenant for the years 1912 and 1913. It refused to pay any part of the taxes for the year 1914, and the plaintiff, subsequent to such refusal, and on June 3, 1914, paid the first half of the taxes on the demised premises for that year, amounting to $5,117.50, and on November 25, 1914, the second half thereof, amounting to $5,117.50. This action is brought to recover the taxes so paid by the plaintiffs for the year 1914. At the time the lease in controversy was executed and for many years prior thereto, the assessment rolls of the city of New York had, pursuant to the charter of said city, been delivered to the receiver of taxes of the city, with the warrant for the collection of taxes therein specified on or before the 15th day of September, and they were payable on the first Monday of October in each year.

By chapter 455 of the Laws of 1911, which became effective January 1, 1912, it was provided that the board of taxes and assessments should cause the assessment rolls to be prepared (§ 907), and that the board of aldermen should properly estimate and compute the "taxes annually imposed," and cause the same to be properly set down or extended in the several assessment rolls (§ 909), and that on or before the 28th day of March the board of aldermen should deliver the assessment roll of each borough, with the proper warrant annexed, to the receiver of taxes, to collect the same from the several persons named therein (§ 911). The charter as so amended provided that "all taxes upon personal property and one half of all taxes upon real estate shall be due and payable on the 1st day of May and the remaining and final one half of taxes on real estate shall be due and payable on the 1st day of November. All taxes shall be and become liens on the real estate affected thereby on the respective days when they become due and payable as hereinbefore provided and shall remain such liens until paid." Section 914.

The taxes became liens accordingly for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. The assessment rolls for the year 1914 were delivered to the receiver of taxes, together with the warrants for the collection thereof, on March 27, 1914, and contained a tax of $10,235 on the demised premises. One half of the amount of such tax for the year 1914 became due and payable on the day on which the term of the defendant's lease expired.

It is probably true that a change in the charter of the city of New York was not particularly considered by either of the parties to the lease prior to its execution. It is to be assumed that the parties thereto intended that the landlords would deliver the possession of the property to the tenant free from all general taxes that were due and unpaid, and that the tenant, pursuant to its covenant, would return them to the landlords at the end of the term, free from general taxes then due and unpaid. If that was not the intention of the contract and the obligation of the parties, then the landlords will receive their property burdened with an unpaid tax that cannot be charged to a new and subsequent tenant as current general taxes to become due and payable after the beginning of the new term. It becomes a question, therefore, whether the lessors or lessee must bear the burden of the general taxes which became a lien upon the demised premises at or prior to the expiration of the lease in controversy.

The question involved is not one of equity in view of subsequent events or otherwise, but of simple contract between the parties, interpreted in view of the circumstances and surroundings existing at the time the lease was executed, and in view of the possibility of changes in the time and manner of paying the general taxes of the city of New York. The fiscal year of the city of New York is coextensive with the calendar year. The term of the lease in controversy commenced within one fiscal year and ended in the sixth fiscal year thereafter, counting both the fiscal year in which the lease commenced and ended. The promise of the lessee was "to pay and discharge all annual taxes as shall during said term be imposed on said premises hereby demised, as soon as they become due and payable," and "keep said demised premises free, clear, discharged, and unencumbered from all such taxes . . . during said term." The words, "annual taxes," are used to describe the general taxes in the city of New York as distinguished from special assessments. It is descriptive of the kind of taxes to be paid by the tenant, and includes the aggregate or total of taxes for general purposes. Reading the covenant as a whole, the promise of the tenant includes the general taxes imposed and becoming due and payable within the term. The demised premises became encumbered with one half of the tax of 1914 on May 1, 1914. The lessee could not leave the demised premises free, clear, discharged, and unencumbered from taxes during said term if the taxes so actually due and payable on the date of the expiration of the lease were left unpaid. The payment of the tax comes precisely within the terms of the contract made by the lessee, and we can only consider and enforce it. By the

the lessee assumed the risk of changes in the charter of the city that might affect the interests of either. Not only is the meaning of the covenant reasonably clear, but the conclusion reached by us is sustained in principle by the authorities.

In Walker v. Whittemore, 112 Mass. 187, a lease included a covenant by the lessee to pay "all and singular the taxes, rates, charges, and assessments which shall or may from time to time, and at any time during said term, be levied, assessed, or made on the demised premises, or in respect of the same, for or on account of any matter or cause whatever." The court held that "these words are sufficient to cover, and must have been intended to cover, all possible forms of taxation."

The court further says: "They import that the lessors were to receive the stipulated rent absolutely, and subject to no deduction. Bleecker v. Ballou, 3 Wend. 263. It is a charge upon the owner by reason of his ownership, against which he

In Bleecker v. Ballou, 3 Wend. 263, 266, referred to in the Walker Case, the tenant covenanted to pay "all taxes, charges, and impositions which should be taxed, charged, imposed, or assessed upon the demised premises." During the term the premises were subjected to an assessment for paving a street under an act incorporating the village and authorizing such assessment, which was passed subsequent to the date of the lease. The court says: "Had there been no decisions of courts upon similar covenants, I should think it clear that the parties intended precisely what the language of their contract imports; that the lessee ran the risk of all taxes, charges, and impositions. . . . They import that the landlord was to receive his rent, and, during the term, was to be subject to no expense on account of the demised premises."

In Post v. Kearney, 2 N. Y. 394, 396, 51 Am. Dec. 303, the lessee covenanted to pay "all assessments for which the premises shall be liable." It was held that an assessment subsequently imposed for opening a street, although it was not authorized by law existing at the time the lease was executed, should be paid by the lessees. Judge Gardiner, speaking for the court, said: "It is insisted that the assessment in question is . . . not within the contemplation of the parties, or the law, as a part of the rent reserved; that no assessments but those authorized by the law existing at the execution of the lease are within its terms."

He further said: "The covenant is, we think, perfectly plain; and, unless there is some law that prohibited parties from making their own contracts, the defendant must abide by the one he has voluntarily assumed."

held that the covenant of a perpetual leaseholder with his municipal lessor to pay public taxes which shall become due on the land embraces municipal taxes whenever they can thereafter be lawfully assessed on the land, or the improvement which was part of the land, although when the lease was made the municipality had no power of taxation. A municipal corporation may lay taxes upon land which it has let at an annual rental for a term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, to one who covenants to pay in addition to the rent the public taxes levied on the property.

In New York v. Cashman, 10 Johns. 96, the covenant under consideration extended to all taxes, assessments, impositions, and payments payable out of and for the demised premises, and the charge under consideration (opening the street) was such an assessment. The court held that it could not enter into any equitable consideration when the covenant speaks for itself.

A covenant that the lessees shall pay all rates, taxes, and assessments for which the premises shall be liable includes not only such charges as may be imposed by laws then in force, but also such as may be authorized by laws afterward enacted. 16 R. C. L. § 310.

When the lease was executed the possibility of changes in the city charter affecting the amount and the time and manner of payment of the annual taxes was not so remote that it could be ignored. If the lessee desired to restrict its obligation to the payment of taxes for the five fiscal years ending January 1, 1914, it should have so stipulated in the lease. Its term extended into the sixth fiscal year, as we have seen, and the lease, as written, required the lessee to pay annual taxes becoming due and payable in that term.

In Welch v. Phillips, 224 Mass. 267, 112 N. E. 651, a lease was made for a term of twenty years from May 1, 1893. The lessee covenanted to pay "all taxes and water taxes and assessments whatsoever, except betterments, whether in the nature of taxes now in being or not, which may be assessed upon or payable for or in respect of the said premises or any part thereof during the said term." The lessee paid the taxes assessed as of May 1, 1893, and the taxes assessed for each succeeding year until the last year of the term which ended April 30, 1913, but refused to pay the tax assessed as of April 1, 1913, asserting that he already had paid the taxes for twenty years, and that Stat. 1909, chap. 440, which changed the day of assessment from May 1st to April 1st was not contemplated by the parties when the lease was made. Held, that the lessee must comply with the terms of the express covenant he had made, although the result was that he had to pay the taxes for twenty-one years under a twenty-year lease, it not being open to this court to modify the lease in accordance with the conjecture as to what agreement the parties would have made had they foreseen the likelihood of a change in the Tax Law.

The cases cited by the respondent do not aid it. In Ayer v. Bonwit, 161 App. Div. 122, 146 N. Y. Supp. 301, the suit was brought to recover for one third of the taxes for the year 1912. The lease under consideration expired May 1, 1912, and the suit presumably was for that part of the assessed taxes represented by the first four months of the year in which the lease expired. It appeared that the landlord had rented the property from May 1, 1912, and the new tenant had agreed to pay taxes falling due May 1, 1912, and on November 1, 1912. Upon such evidence the plaintiff's claim was dismissed.

In Morris v. Suerken, 88 Misc. 262, 151 N. Y. Supp. 817, the court held that the taxes did not become due and payable during the term. It also appeared in that case that the new tenant whose lease commenced May 1, 1914, had agreed to pay the annual tax for the year 1914.

In the Saks Case (Herald Square Realty Co. v. Saks & Co. 215 N. Y. 427, 432, 109 N. E. 545, 546) the alterations required by the municipal authorities were radical and structural, and the court held not within the intention of the parties. This court took occasion in that case to say that "taxes and assessments are not in the same category with the cost of making substantial changes in a commercial building."

The judgment of the Appellate Division and of the Special Term should be reversed, and judgment should be ordered for the plaintiffs for $5,117.50, with interest from June 8, 1914, with costs in all courts.

ANNOTATION.

Change in time for assessment or payment of taxes as affecting provision for payment of taxes during term of lease.

There seems to be but one other case in which the exact question here raised was squarely before the court (Welch v. Phillips (1916) 224 Mass. 267, 112 N. E. 651, infra), and the conclusion reached supports the holding in the reported case. (WARD v. UNION TRUST Co. ante, 1154) that a tenant who has covenanted to pay and discharge all taxes that shall be imposed on the premises during the term is liable for annual taxes which are so imposed, solely by reason of a change by the legislature in date of imposition, after the making of the lease, although he has paid an annual tax corresponding to each year of the term. As to the peculiar wording of the covenant and the possible effect thereof, see same case discussed infra.

The rule that a covenant, obligating the tenant to pay all rates, taxes, and assessments for which the leased premises may be liable, includes not only such charges as may be imposed by laws then in force, but also such as may be authorized by laws afterwards enacted, should be, according to some early English decisions and a few American cases, cited infra, somewhat qualified or limited in its application. That a case in which the legislature has merely changed the date of assessment or for payment of taxes so as to technically bring an assessment which came later at the date of the lease, within the term covered by the covenant, should be governed by this rule, is a doubtful proposition.

The court in Love v. Howard (1859) 6 R. L. 116, after a discussion of Davenant v. Bishop of Sarum (1672) 2 Lev. 68, 83 Eng. Reprint, 453; Hopwood v. Barefoot (1709) 11 Mod. 237, 88 Eng. Reprint, 1013; Brewster v. Kidgill (1698) 12 Mod. 166, 88 Eng. Reprint, 1239; Giles v. Hooper (1690) Carth. 135, 90 Eng. Reprint, 683; Bradbury v. Wright (1781) 2 Dougl. (K. B.) 624, 99 Eng. Reprint, 395; Brewster v. Kitchin (1698) 1 Ld. Raym. 317, 91 Eng. Reprint, 1108; said: "The rule recognized and adopted in these cases is that, if the tax or assessment be made under a law existing at the time of the covenant, it is within it; or, if there be no law existing at the time authorizing or requiring it, but it is afterwards enacted, still, if the assessment or tax be of the same kind with taxes or assessments made under former acts, it is presumed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, as a tax in viris, though not in esse. But if such tax or assessment be different in kind from such as have been theretofore in esse, it is not to be presumed that the parties contemplated any unusual exercise of power in the legislature, such as it had never before exercised. The land tax seems not to have been a continuing act; but these taxes were levied by act of Parliament, as the public exigencies from time to time required; but they had been used, in the language of Lord Holt; they were not of a foreign nature, but known to the law, and had always a virtual, though not an actual, existence; and, speaking of the covenant, he says: 'It does not provide against an unusual accident, but against a thing well known to our law as part of the Constitution.'"

The rule is not within the scope of the note and is not exhaustively annotated, but a number of cases are cited for the purpose of showing that it is not an absolute one, applicable under all circumstances.

The court, in the case of Bleecker v. Ballou (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 263, cited by the court in the reported case (WARD v. UNION TRUST Co. ante, 1154), recognized this limitation of the rule, but held that the "charges and impositions" mentioned in the covenant "may refer to such charges and impositions as are known to be made upon other property similarly situated." The court also said: "The premises in question were leased as a village lot, and, therefore, the parties may have anticipated that, within the term granted, some improvements might become necessary and proper, which would require charges and impositions."

In Post v. Kearney (1849) 2 N. Y. 394, 51 Am. Dec. 303, cited with quotation by the court in the reported case (WARD v. UNION TRUST Co.), the facts were such that there was no need to mention the exception to the rule. The court also said: "What the precise character or amount of the subsequent assessments would be could not be known, although the parties must have anticipated an increase during a term of forty years, and in a city rapidly growing in importance." The same may be said of the circumstance involved in Garner v. Hannah (1857) 6 Duer (N. Y.) 262, which case was decided upon the authority of Post v. Kearney.

And it is very clear that J. W. Perry Co. v. Norfolk (1911) 220 U. S. 472, 55 L. ed. 548, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465, affirming (1908) 108 Va. 28, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 128 Am. St. Rep. 940, 61 S. E. 867, could not fall within the exception. In that case the grant was made by the city for a term of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, at a very low annual rental, with a covenant that the "public taxes" be paid by the grantee and his successors in title. Although the courts held this to be a lease in the technical sense, they also held that "the value of property consists in its use, and he who owns the use forever, though it be on condition subsequent, is the true owner of the property for the time being." And since the city was the grantor, it was held that the grantee would be liable for city taxes,—city taxes were the disputed taxes,—even if there had been no covenant, since nonliability of the grantee would amount to an exemption of taxes on the property. On these facts, both courts affirm the rule as already stated, without mentioning any exceptions.

As already stated Welch v. Phillips (1916) 224 Mass. 267, 112 N. E. 651, supports the holding in the reported case (WARD v. UNION TRUST Co. ante, 1154). However, it will be observed that the wording of the covenant, "whether in the nature of taxes now in being or not," would seem to indicate that the parties had in mind taxes that might be held to fall within the exception already discussed, and that they meant to provide that the rule as to taxes imposed by later legislation should be enforced without exception. As the court said, "Presumably the change in the Tax Law which makes them liable for the 1913 tax was not contemplated by them;" yet, if they deliberately stipulated that the effect of future legislation should be borne by the party upon whom the burden falls, there might be reason for the enforcement of the covenant literally. This was not, however, the ground for the decision.

For the purposes of discussion, the grounds of the exception are the important matter, rather than the exception itself. The court in Love v. Howard, quoted supra, states the grounds thus: "It is not to be presumed that the parties contemplated any unusual exercise of the power of the legislature," etc. So, the grounds for this exception seem to correspond with the reasoning by which Page, J., sought to support the decision in the appellate division (172 App. Div. 569, 159 N. Y. Supp. 54), now reversed by the reported case (WARD v. UNION TRUST Co. 1154), where he said: "There can be no question as to the intention of the parties at the time the lease was executed, and that was that the annual tax for each year of the term was to be paid by the tenant. This tax had been assessed and was payable in the fall of each year. Under the first two leases, during the sixteen years of their terms, sixteen annual taxes had been paid by the tenant, and it was the expectation of both parties that during the five years of the lease, in the instant case, five annual taxes would be assessed in September and paid in October of each year. Neither party to the lease had any reason to anticipate that the law in regard to the time of assessment and payment of taxes in New York city, which had been fixed for more than fifty years, would be changed within the terms of the lease. When parties enter into a contract they are presumed to have in mind all the existing laws relating thereto, or to the subject-matter thereof."

In the class of cases within the scope of this note, it may be observed, the lessor would be in no worse position if he paid the tax than he would have been in had the new law not have been passed. This is not true of any other class of cases. The effect of the legislation, under the holding of the two cases within the scope of the note, is merely to relieve one party of taxes that he must have expected to pay, and place the burden upon the other party, who did not expect to pay them. This is not the effect in any other case in which the rule has been applied. J. W. M.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(170 Ky. 474, 186 S. W. 161.)

Arrest — overcoming resistance — use of force.

1. A police officer attempting to arrest one for a misdemeanor may use such force as seems necessary in the exercise of sound judgment to effect his purpose if the offender is armed and offers resistance or threatens the officer, and, in connection with such threat, assumes a menacing attitude towards the officer.

Criminal law — statement of plea — sufficiency.

2. A statutory provision requiring the clerk or district attorney to read to the jury the indictment in a criminal case and state the defendant's plea is sufficiently complied with if, after the reading of the indictment by the clerk, the defendant himself pleads not guilty in the presence of the jury.

3. An instruction on murder is justified in a case where one known to be a police officer by accused, who was attempting to steal a ride on a train, advanced towards accused, whom he directed to take his hand out of his pocket, where it rested upon a pistol, a portion of which was in sight, and was shortly afterwards found dead with bullet holes in his body, while accused fled and stated to others that he had had a difficulty with a railroad detective.

Homicide — murder — slaying policeman.

4. Where a police officer is killed while attempting to make an arrest by one who knew him to be an officer, it is not necessary, to constitute the crime murder, that the slayer should have had a particular malice.

[See 13 R. C. L. 866.]

Arrest — right to kill.

5. A police officer has no right wantonly to shoot and kill one only charged with a misdemeanor if the offender is merely trying to escape such arrest by flight.

Appeal — instruction — right to kill in effecting arrest.

6. Failure of the court to bring out the distinction between killing one accused of misdemeanor, who is merely attempting to escape, and one who, being armed, assumes a menacing attitude towards the officer, is not prejudicial if the evidence presents only the latter situation.

— refusal of requested instruction.

7. Failure to give a requested instruction is not reversible error if the subject-matter was adequately covered by the instructions given.

[See 14 R. C. L. 751.]

Criminal law — right to handcuff prisoner.

8. It is within the sound discretion of the sheriff, as the custodian of a prisoner on trial for murder, to take him between the jail and the court room handcuffed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Criminal, Common Law, and Equity Division of the Circuit Court for Kenton County, convicting them of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O. M. Rogers and R. S. Holmes for appellants.

Messrs. M. M. Logan, Attorney General, and D. O. Myatt, Assistant Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1915, Elmer C. Matthews was a railroad policeman in the employ of the C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. He had been appointed and commissioned under the provisions of § 779a, Kentucky Statutes, and as such officer was clothed with the power and authority of a sheriff upon the trains of the company or about its depots.

On the 18th day of August, early in the afternoon, there was made up in Cincinnati by the C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. a freight train which proceeded across the river on its south-bound journey; at Ludlow, immediately across the river from Cincinnati, this train was boarded by Matthews, the railroad policeman, and when the train got a short distance south of Ludlow he discovered in one of the gondola cars of the freight train, which was loaded with gas pipe, two negro men, afterwards identified as the appellants, Donehy and Prather.

The train at the time was going up a steep grade and running at the rate of only from 4 to 10 miles an hour; Fleming, the brakeman, was then on the same car that Donehy and Prather were riding in, and Matthews boarded the car at the northeast corner. As he did so, Donehy jumped up, whereupon Matthews asked where they were going, when one of them said they were going "down the road," and they were then informed by Matthews that they could not ride on that train; Donehy, as he got up, had his hand in his right coat pocket, on his pistol; Matthews asked him to take his hand out of his pocket and he refused, and Prather, at about that time, said: "Wait a minute, he is not going to put you off." Matthews then advanced toward Donehy with his pistol presented at him and demanded that he take his hand out of his pocket, and Donehy still refused, and when Matthews got up to where Donehy was, he grabbed hold of the hand which he had in his pocket on the pistol, and struck him with his pistol on the left side of the head, and Donehy, with his left hand, grabbed Matthews's right hand; Fleming started to go to the assistance of Matthews when Prather fired twice at him, whereupon Fleming, being unarmed, jumped off the car; just after he jumped off the car he heard seven, eight, or ten shots, ran along the side of the train and got on a car further forward, when he looked back and saw the two negroes leaving the train, going in a westerly direction. The body of Matthews was found in the car with four bullet holes in his back and two in his right side, having been instantly killed. Several months later the two appellants were arrested and indicted, charged with the murder of Matthews, and upon their joint trial were each found guilty and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for life, from which judgment they prosecute this appeal.

Their defense in the lower court was an alibi, they each claiming that they were not present in the car at the time, and that they were not the men who engaged in the difficulty with Matthews. It is sufficient to say on this subject that the plea was a complete failure; they were identified positively by Fleming, the brakeman; by a farmer, who saw them a short distance from the train, just after they had left it, and whom they told they had been fired upon by a detective; they were identified by the man who set them across the Ohio river that afternoon; and in addition to all of this there was the evidence of three or four witnesses showing certain admissions by one or both of them.

The appellants, however, are relying upon five grounds for reversal: First, because the attorney for the commonwealth, in his statement to the jury, failed to state what was the plea of the defendants; second, that there was no evidence authorizing an instruction on murder; third, that the instruction of self-defense was erroneous; fourth, because of the failure of the court to give the whole law of the case; and, fifth, because the sheriff and his deputies, during the trial, brought appellants into and took them from the court room handcuffed, in the presence of the jury.

1. On the first proposition the record shows that the defendants were arraigned by the clerk reading to them the indictment, after which they were each asked for their plea, and they each entered a plea of not guilty, whereupon the attorney for the commonwealth read the indictment to the jury, but failed to state to the jury that the defendants pleaded not guilty.

Section 219 of the Criminal Code of Practice requires the clerk or the attorney for the commonwealth to read to the jury the indictment and state the defendant's plea, and while this provision has been held to be mandatory, a substantial compliance with its provisions only is necessary. It is true that literally neither the clerk nor the attorney for the commonwealth stated the plea of the defendants to the jury, but they themselves, after the reading of the indictment by the clerk and before the statement of the commonwealth's attorney, entered in the presence of the jury their plea of not guilty.

The purpose of this Code provision is to inform the jury at the very inception of the trial the nature of the charge and the plea of the defendants, and when this has been done in the manner indicated, the Code provision, while not literally followed, has been sufficiently complied with. Criminal law—statement of plea—sufficiency. Combs v. Com. 31 Ky. L. Rep. 822, 104 S. W. 270; Meece v. Com. 78 Ky. 586; Howard v. Com. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 91, 67 S. W. 1003.

2. The second contention of appellants, that there was no evidence justifying the giving of an instruction on murder, is without merit. Matthews was an —instructions—murder. officer, and that appellants knew him to be such is apparent; he had on his badge, and they, immediately after the shooting, referred to him in their talk with the farmer whom they met as the detective, and in all the conversations showing admissions by them, detailed by several witnesses in the record, they referred to him as the detective or as the railroad detective. Knowing him to be a detective, when he notified them that they could not ride on that train, Donehy immediately assumed towards the officer a menacing attitude by placing his hand in his pocket on his pistol, the handle of which was showing, and declined more than once to take his hand out of his pocket. Prather, after the demand by the officer that Donehy should take his hand off of his pistol, said to Donehy in the presence of the officer: "He will not put you off," and drew his pistol and fired two shots at the brakeman who undertook to go to the relief of the officer. Thus it is seen that they each committed an offense in the presence of the officer; one the offense of carrying a concealed weapon which he had started to draw on the officer, and the other defying the authority of an officer by saying to him in substance that he could not put them off the train, and drawing his weapon to enforce that threat and to prevent another from aiding the officer.

It is true that there was no eyewitness to the actual killing, and the brakeman only saw the first two shots which were fired at him; but within a very few minutes the two men were seen to leave the car and run off through the fields, and immediately thereafter the dead body of Matthews was found in the car with four bullet holes in his back and two in his right side.

Even if there had been no other evidence except that of the brakeman and the finding of the body with six bullet holes in it, and their location, there would have been ample justification in submitting to the jury an instruction on murder; but, in addition to this evidence, there is that of some two or three other witnesses who testified to admissions made by the defendants at different times, showing that they shot the decedent with his own pistol after having taken it from him, and that he begged them not to kill him.

It is true there is no evidence that Matthews notified the defendants that he was an officer, or that he in terms said to them he intended to arrest them; but, as already stated, the evidence shows that they knew he was an officer, and the facts stated by Fleming unmistakably showed Matthews's intention to arrest them, and that they knew of such intention.

It has long been the rule in this state that where an officer is killed while attempting to make an arrest, by one knowing him to be an officer, it is not necessary, <sup>Homicide—murder—slaying policeman.</sup> to constitute the crime of murder, that the slayer should have had any particular malice. Dilger v. Com. 88 Ky. 550, 11 S. W. 651.

3. The first objection to the instruction on self-defense is that it tells the jury it was the duty of the appellants to submit to an arrest at the hands of Matthews if they knew he was an officer and was attempting to arrest them. It is argued that this was unauthorized because there was no evidence that they knew he was an officer, or that they knew he was undertaking to arrest them; but we have already seen from a statement of the facts that there was evidence that they knew he was an officer, and that the facts showed that he was attempting to arrest them.

Objection is also to the concluding paragraph of that instruction, which said to the jury in substance that the officer, in attempting to make the arrest, had the right to use such force as appeared to him to be reasonably necessary to accomplish such purpose, and that if the defendants, knowing he was an officer and attempting to arrest them, resisted arrest, and in doing so shot and killed him, or aided or abetted in such shooting and killing, then they could not be acquitted on the ground of self-defense.

The distinction has been frequently pointed out by this court between the rights, power, and authority of an officer attempting to make an arrest for a misdemeanor in cases where there is forcible resistance by the offender and in cases where there is only an effort to escape by fleeing. Manifestly an officer has no right to wantonly shoot or kill one only charged with a misdemeanor if the offender is merely trying to es-

Arrest—right to kill. cape such arrest by flight; but if the offender be armed and offers forcible resistance or threatens the officer, and, in connection with such threat, assumes a menacing attitude towards the officer, the officer then may use such force in the exercise of a sound judgment as is necessary to effect the arrest, not only for the —overcoming resistance—

use of force. purpose of bringing the offender to justice, but to protect himself from threatened danger. Com. v. Marcum, 135 Ky. 12, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1194, 122 S. W. 215; Stevens v. Com. 124 Ky. 32, 98 S. W. 284; Reed v. Com. 125 Ky. 126, 100 S. W. 856.

While the instruction in this case did not point out the distinction which has been taken in the cases referred to, it could not have been prejudicial in this case for the reason that all the evidence showed Appeal—instruction—right to kill in effecting arrest. that both of the appellants, at the time of the attempted arrest, were armed, that they resisted arrest, and in such resistance drew their pistols and in effect defied the officer.

4. It is complained by appellants that the court did not give the whole law of the case because of its failure to instruct the jury that the appellants had the right to resist the attempted arrest by Matthews if the jury believed from the evidence the arrest was undertaken in an illegal way.

—refusal of requested instruction. It is unnecessary to consider this contention at length, for whether such an instruction was authorized by the evidence or not, the idea contended for was embraced in one of the instructions given wherein the jury was told, in substance, that if they believed from the evidence that the defendants did know that Matthews was an officer and was attempting to arrest them, and did not forcibly resist such arrest, and that Matthews assaulted them or either of them with a pistol, and that they had reasonable grounds for believing from his conduct that they or either of them were in danger of death or great bodily harm, and that it was necessary or appeared to them, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary, in order to avert such danger, to shoot Matthews, then they would find such defendants not guilty on the ground of self-defense.

But, in any event, the statement of the evidence above given shows that there was no basis in the evidence for any such instruction.

5. Finally it is contended that because the sheriff and his deputies, during the progress of the trial, brought the two appellants into the court room and took them therefrom handcuffed, the judgment should be reversed, because such conduct strongly tended to prejudice the jury against them.

The sheriff, while conducting prisoners to and from court, was their proper custodian, and was responsible for their delivery to the court and back to the jail. Such officers have all kinds of criminals to deal with; they have not only the most dangerous and desperate criminals, charged with such crimes as would give them an incentive to take any desperate chance to escape, but they are also the custodians of the most harmless and inoffensive offenders, whose nature and disposition is such, or the charge against whom is such, that little inducement is offered them to undertake to escape or to do harm to others. Under such circumstances it would be most unreasonable to say that a public official charged with the responsibility of delivering prisoners to the court and returning them to jail should not be given the right to exercise some discretion in handling his prisoners. It would be unfair to the officer to say that he must treat a desperate and dangerous criminal in the same way and give him the same opportunity to escape or to do injury to others as he would an inoffensive prisoner charged with a less serious offense.

As said in Firestone v. Rice, 71 Mich. 377, 15 Am. St. Rep. 266, 38 N. W. 885, "some discretion must be reposed in an officer in making an arrest for felony as to the means taken to apprehend and safely keep the prisoner. In order to justify handcuffing a person arrested for felony it is not necessary that he should be unruly or attempt to escape, or do anything indicating a necessity for such restraint, nor, in the absence of these indications, that he should be of notoriously bad character." Also Edger v. Burke, 96 Md. 726, 54 Atl. 986.

We entertain no doubt that it is within the sound discretion of an officer in custody of criminals, taking into account the nature of the offense charged and the character and disposition of the offender, to place handcuffs on him when he is taken to the court from the jail for trial.

Criminal law—
right to handcuff prisoner.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The question as to the degree of force which may lawfully be employed in arresting one charged with a misdemeanor, which the court, in the reported case (DONEHY v. COM. ante, 1161), considered because of its bearing on the defendant's right of self-defense, is the subject of a note beginning at page 1170, post.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

I. W. DUNNING, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 98 S. E. 530.)

Arrest — use of necessary force — misdemeanor.

1. An officer having a right to arrest an offender may use such force as is necessary to effect his purpose, even to the extent of taking life.

Assault — deadly weapon — effecting arrest.

2. A police officer cannot be convicted of assault with a deadly weapon for using a pistol to effect an arrest under warrant of one charged with a misdemeanor.

— liability of officer.

3. A police officer is liable for the use of force in effecting an arrest only when excessive force is used maliciously, or to such a degree as amounts to wanton abuse of authority.

[See 2 R. C. L. 470.]

— justification of shooting.

4. A police officer having a warrant to arrest a man who for several hours has been drunk, committing breaches of the peace, and terrorizing the community, is justified in shooting him if, when advancing upon him to arrest him, after having notified him of his purpose, the person whose arrest is sought defies the officer, and attempts to cut him with an open knife, although the officer might have avoided injury by retreating.

Assault — duty of police officer to retreat.

5. An officer charged with the arrest of one committing a breach of the peace is not bound to retreat or retire to avoid injury, but must stand his ground and use such force as is necessary to effect the arrest.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Bertie County, convicting him of assault with a deadly weapon. New trial.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

This is an indictment for an unlawful assault with a deadly weapon on one C. T. White, while defendant, as constable and chief of police of the town of Aulander, was endeavoring to arrest the said prosecutor C. T. White for disorderly conduct in breach of the criminal law.

On the trial the defendant testified in his own behalf, and at the close of all the evidence the court charged the jury as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, if you believe the evidence of the defendant, I. W. Dunning, himself, I charge you that he is guilty, and, if you so believe it, you will say guilty for your verdict."

Verdict of guilty. Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Messrs. Winston & Matthews and Alex Lassiter for appellant.

Messrs. James M. Manning, Attorney General, Frank Nash, and Winborne & Winborne for the State.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was evidence on the part of the state tending to convict the defendant, but the same does not accompany the record, as no exception is made concerning it.

For the defense I. W. Dunning, a witness in his own behalf, testified as follows: "I am the defendant. I have lived near and in Aulander, Bertie county, all my life. I am now twenty-four years old. Some three years ago I moved to Aulander, to be near a physician for treatment. I went to Norfolk and underwent an operation and came back to Aulander. I have not been strong since then. The commissioners of the town of Aulander elected me constable and chief of police of the town. There was no other constable of the town nor any other policeman. I was the only one. I have known C. T. White all my life. He was then living in Aulander, and had been living there a number of years. His reputation was that when under the influence of liquor he was a desperate and violent man. I know that of my own knowledge, because I had frequently seen him in that condition. He had been indicted for repeated assaults and for cutting people, and had been convicted. At the May election of this year in Aulander I was re-elected constable by the people of the town. On the day in question, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, complaint was made to me that C. T. White was drunk on the street, violently noisy, and profane in the presence of the public and of ladies passing on the street. I went up the street and found him at the Main street crossing of the town, within a few yards of the postoffice, in the heart of the business section of the town and of the bank, and in the very center of the business part of the town. I went up to him. He had an open knife in his hand and was noisy and cursing. I ordered him to cease cursing and advised him to go home. I did not want to have to put him in the lockup, and thought I could get him quiet. He did quiet down for a few moments, and came up to me and said he wanted me to give him his liquor. He claimed that he had been to Kelford and brought back 2 quarts of liquor, and said I had taken it. I told him I had not done so. He demanded that I let him search me, and to satisfy him I did so. He felt in all my pockets until he came to the one in which I had my pistol, as I was then on duty. I told him he could not go in that pocket. Then he began to curse and abuse me, and called me a most foul and loathsome name (too foul for this record). I backed back from him. He had me by the hand and was attempting to cut me. I was trying to arrest him. This kept up for several minutes. Finally, the mayor came up and quieted him down. Later he went in the barber shop and commenced raising a row and cursing Mr. Early, who was in the barber shop. Early finally got him down on the floor.

I went to arrest him, and Early and his relatives said if I would let him alone they could get him to go home. He was quiet for but a moment, and came out in the street and commenced cursing Early and myself and threatened to kill us both. He had his open knife in his hand. I dodged about the town to keep out of his way. He completely terrorized the town. All the above occurred about three to four hours before I shot him. People came to me and complained, and finally about 10 o'clock Mr. A. T. Castellow, the mayor of the town, brought me a warrant charging disorderly conduct or a misdemeanor, for the arrest of C. T. White, and told me to go at once and arrest him and bring him before him. During the early part of the evening, and again after I got the warrant, I called on several persons to go with me to assist in making the arrest. They all declined because they said they knew his desperate and dangerous character when under the influence of liquor, and they did not propose to get cut. I finally got a man to go with me. Then White was passing down the street with one Cox, and going in the direction of the Cox place of business—his restaurant and poolroom. I heard him cursing and threatening to kill me and Early. He was violent; cursing and noisy. He went in the Cox place of business and took a seat by the stove. It was a store some 70 feet deep. In the back was a poolroom. Some young boys were there playing pool. The stove was in the middle of the house, between the counters, and about 20 feet from the door. I went in with my warrant in my hand. I then had my pistol in my pocket, and had not taken it out during the day or night. I had my hand on my pistol, which was in my hip pocket. I walked within 10 or 12 feet of White, and said: 'I have a warrant for you; consider yourself under arrest.' He got up with his open knife in his hand, and I said: 'Put up your knife and consider yourself under arrest.' He said: 'Damn you and your warrant, too; take your hand off your gun.' I again told him I had the warrant and to consider himself under arrest. He again replied: 'Damn you and your warrant both; take your hand off your gun.' He then advanced towards me about one step with his knife open in his hand, and drawn back in the attitude of striking. He did not get in striking distance of me; an open door opening on the street was behind me, and there was nothing to keep me from going out of it. If I had stepped out of this door he could not have hurt me, but I did not go out of the door because I did not want to run. The warrant I had for his arrest charged disorderly conduct, or a misdemeanor."

And on this evidence we are of opinion that there was error in holding the defendant guilty as a conclusion of law.

It is a principle very generally accepted that an officer, having the right to arrest an offender, may use such force as is necessary to effect his purpose, and to a great extent he is made the judge of the degree of force that may be properly exerted. Called on to deal with violators of the law, and not infrequently to act in the presence of conditions importing serious menace, his conduct in such circumstances is not to be harshly judged, and, if he is withstood, his authority and purpose being made known, he may use the force necessary to overcome resistance, and to the extent of taking life, if that is required for the proper and efficient performance of his duty. It is when excessive force has been used maliciously, or to such a degree as amounts to a wanton abuse of authority, that criminal liability will be imputed. The same rule prevails when an officer has a prisoner under lawful arrest, and the latter makes forcible effort to free himself; and, in this jurisdiction, the position holds whether the offense charged be a felony or a misdemeanor, the governing principle being based on the unwarranted resistance to lawful authority, and not dependent, therefore, on the grade of the offense.

These views are in accord with numerous decisions of our court in which the questions presented were directly considered, as in State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520; State v. McMahan, 103 N. C. 379, 9 S. E. 489; State v. Pugh, 101 N. C. 737, 9 Am. St. Rep. 44, 7 S. E. 757; State v. McNinch, 90 N. C. 695; State v. Garrett, 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 144, 84 Am. Dec. 359; State v. Stalcup, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 50. In State v. Sigman the principle is stated and approved as follows: "If an officer is resisted in making an arrest, he may use that degree of force which is necessary to the proper performance of his duty; and, after an accused person is arrested, the officer is justified in the use of such force as may be necessary, even to taking life, to prevent his escape, whether the offense charged is a felony or a misdemeanor."

In State v. McNinch: "A police officer, in arresting one for violating a city ordinance, was indicted for an assault. The prosecutor alleged that the force used was excessive, and the judge charged the jury if such was the case the defendant was guilty, but failed to call their attention to the good faith in which the officer claims to have acted. Held, error. The amount of force necessary to make the arrest is left to the judgment of the officer when acting within the scope of his general powers and actuated by no ill will or malice."

In State v. Garrett it was held, among other things, "that where a defendant, in a state's warrant charging a misdemeanor, put himself in armed resistance to the officer having such warrant, and the officer, in an attempt to take defendant, slew him, without resorting to unnecessary violence, it was held that he was justified."

In Sigman's Case the officer was convicted of an assault, but that was because, the offense being only a misdemeanor, the defendant was fleeing from the officer to avoid arrest, the distinction and principle applicable being stated as follows: "But where a person charged only with a misdemeanor flies from the officer to avoid arrest, the latter is not authorized to take life or shed blood in order to make the arrest. Under such circumstances, if he kills, he will at least be guilty of manslaughter, and he will be guilty of an assault if no actual injury is inflicted, if he uses such force as would have amounted to manslaughter had death ensued."

And a similar ruling was approved in Sossamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757, and in State v. Bryant, 65 N. C. 327. In none of these was the question of resistance presented.

Considering the facts in evidence as testified to by defendant, it appears that the prosecutor, C. T. White, shown to be a violent and dangerous man when drinking, had been drunk and disorderly in the town of Aulander for several hours, intimidating its citizens, committing various violations of the town ordinances, including several breaches of the peace; that when defendant, the constable and chief of police, approached the prosecutor to arrest him, having a warrant for the purpose duly issued, and of which the prosecutor was fully aware, the latter, in resistance, assaulted the officer with a drawn knife, making it necessary to shoot the offender in order to subdue him and execute the process and in view of the principles prevailing here, as stated, if this version of the occurrence is accepted by the jury, the action of the officer is fully justified. True, defendant testifies that he could have retired from the room and have avoided the difficulty, "but that he did not want to run." While this, at times, may be the rule as between individuals, under the circumstances presented he was not required to "withdraw or to run." Charged, in a special sense, with conserving the peace and quiet of the town, having, as stated, a warrant commanding him to arrest the prosecutor, it was both his legal right and official duty to proceed according to the exigency of his writ, and to exercise the force required to its efficient execution.

A proper concept of the officer's duty in the premises is very well stated in one of the defendant's prayers for instructions, as follows:

"The law does not require an officer with a warrant for an arrest for an offense to retreat or retire, but he must stand his ground and perform his duty; and it was not the duty of the defendant with the warrant for the arrest of the prosecutor, when the prosecutor advanced on him with the knife, if he did so, to back or retire, but it was his duty to stand and perform his duty and disarm the prosecutor, if it appeared to be necessary to do so, to effect the arrest."

On the record there was error to defendant's prejudice, and there must be a new trial of the cause.

Rep. —, 207 S. W. 96.

Where there are persons in sight whose aid can be procured, it is aggravated assault and battery for an officer to strike with a pistol a drunken man who refuses to go with him. Skidmore v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 93; Skidmore v. State (1877) 2 Tex. App. 20.

The officer cannot chastise the prisoner for insolence. Moody v. State (1904) 120 Ga. 868, 48 S. E. 340; Dixon v. State (1912) 12 Ga. App. 17, 76 S. E. 794. He may not unnecessarily brutally assault and beat him. Cash v. People (1889) 32 Ill. App. 250. He cannot strike and beat an unresisting prisoner after they have reached the guardhouse. Moody v. State (Ga.) supra.

In State v. Lane (Mo.) supra, where the prisoner died from a blow with a pistol, the court said: "Considering the inequality in the size of the officer and the prisoner, that the officer was sober and the prisoner drunk, that the officer had an assistant, that he was already in a room adjoining the calaboose, and had made no effort to escape when coming from the saloon to the prison, that the officer at no time requested Bohlack, his assistant, to aid him in putting the prisoner in the calaboose, but resorted to his pistol and knocked him down, we do not think we can, as a matter of law, say that he did not use excessive and unnecessary means to compel obedience to his authority."

It is murder gratuitously to shoot and kill a misdemeanor immediately on meeting him. Rex v. Smith (Eng.) supra.

The officer is also liable for criminal carelessness. York v. Com. (1884) 82 Ky. 360.

An officer who does not inform the accused that he has come to arrest him, and who carelessly and recklessly shoots into the room where the accused is, killing him, although there was no attempt to evade the arrest, cannot escape punishment. State v. Rollins (1909) 226 Mo. 524, 126 S. W. 478.

Clubs.

The officer may use his club if necessary. Patterson v. State (1890) 91 Ala. 58, 8 So. 756; Gillespie v. State (1901) 69 Ark. 573, 64 S. W. 947, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 123; State v. Pugh (1888) 101 N. C. 737, 9 Am. St. Rep. 44, 7 S. E. 757; Mesmer v. Com. (1875) 26 Gratt. (Va.) 976 (billy).

In a case where the officer used his club, the court said: "The jury ought not to weigh the conduct of the officer as against him in gold scales; the presumption is he acted in good faith." State v. Pugh (1888) 101 N. C. 737, 9 Am. St. Rep. 44, 7 S. E. 757.

An officer cannot be convicted of murder for killing a person whom he is attempting to arrest for misdemeanor by striking him on the head with a billy, if he uses no more force than is necessary in case of an ordinary person, although it proved fatal in the particular case because of the thinness of the prisoner's skull, of which the officer had no knowledge. State v. Phillips (1903) 119 Iowa, 652,

But the use of a club may be excessive. Golden v. State (1869) 1 S. C. 292.

Where there was little danger of escape, the court sustained a verdict of guilty against a policeman for assault and battery, where he struck the prisoner twice with his club, one of the blows knocking him down. Burns v. State (1888) 80 Ga. 544, 7 S. E. 88.

Unnecessary violence by an officer in clubbing an unresisting misdemeanor and in striking him with a pistol is assault and battery. Wallace v. State (1897) — Miss. —, 21 So. 662.

Handcuffs.

In British countries, there is a decided feeling against the gratuitous use of handcuffs.

Taking a misdemeanor through the streets handcuffed is not permissible where there is no resistance or indication thereof. Hamilton v. Massie (1889) 18 Ont. Rep. 585.

And in Leigh v. Cole (1853) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 329 (where, however, the jury exonerated the officer), it was said that there is no general rule justifying the handcuffing of a misdemeanor in taking him from the police station to the magistrate.

The use of handcuffs was sustained in Dehm v. Hinman (1888) 56 Conn. 320, 1 L.R.A. 374, 15 Atl. 741; McCullough v. Greenfield (1903) 133 Mich. 463, 62 L.R.A. 906, 95 N. W. 532, 1 Ann. Cas. 924; State v. Sigman (1890) 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520.

"An officer is not liable in damages for using handcuffs on a prisoner who is unknown to him, where he has a considerable distance to go after dark, and has another person under his charge, there being nothing to show wantonness or malice in his conduct." McCullough v. Greenfield (1903) 133 Mich. 463, 62 L.R.A. 906, 95 N. W. 532, 1 Ann. Cas. 924, supra.

"In the precautionary measure of securing a prisoner (who had shown himself so swift and slippery) by the use of handcuffs, he did not so abuse his power, according to the evidence, as to subject himself to indictment for an assault." State v. Sigman (N. C.) supra.

But the sheriff may be liable for the act of his deputy in putting irons and handcuffs upon a prisoner charged with criminal libel, in conducting him through a city's streets from a jail to a railway station. Shields v. Pfanz (1897) 101 Ky. 407, 41 S. W. 267.

III. Judging the amount of force.

It is, of course, the general rule that the jury is the arbiter of the amount of force.

It is enough if the force used appears necessary to the officer, if he has reasonable grounds for his belief. Gillespie v. State (1901) 69 Ark. 573, 64 S. W. 947, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 123; Cockrill v. Com. (1893) 95 Ky. 22, 23 S. W. 659; Doolin v. Com. (1893) 95 Ky. 29, 23 S. W. 663. Or if the force used reasonably appears necessary to the officer. State v. Rose (1897) 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329. It seems somewhat doubtful whether the court meant to follow this rule, or not, when it stated in a case where an officer, in arresting and disarming a drunken man who had a pistol in his hand and was threatening violence to one or more persons, struck him with his club, that if "it reasonably appeared to be necessary to inflict the blow to overcome Stephens, disarm him, and thus place it out of his power to injure or kill some other person, then the law, which only voices reason, authorized the officer to employ such force as was necessary to accomplish the end, even if in doing so he struck the defendant. In other words, if to a reasonable mind it appeared necessary to use violence in order to accomplish the object with safety to the arresting officer, then the officer violated no law in using the baton. On the other hand, if to a reasonable mind it did not appear necessary to the officer's discharge of this public duty with safety to himself, or some other person who might be aiding him, that he should strike Stephens, then the blow he struck was unauthorized, and he was guilty of an assault and battery. Whether, under these rules, the officer was justified in striking Stephens was a question for the jury." Patterson v. State (1890) 91 Ala. 58, 8 So. 756.

It has been held to be error to refuse to allow the officer to say that at the time he shot he believed he was in danger at the hands of the deceased. Williams v. Com. (1890) 90 Ky. 596, 14 S. W. 595.

On a trial of an officer for killing a misdemeanant it was held that, as it did not clearly appear that the deceased was shot while in flight, it was error to exclude his threats that he would not be arrested, and that he would kill any two men who came to arrest him. Harris v. State (1894) 72 Miss. 99, 16 So. 360.

In People v. O'Brien (1900) 48 App. Div. 66, 62 N. Y. Supp. 571, the court reversed a judgment convicting of assault a police officer in Union Square, who came up behind a peddler who had escaped from arrest, while he was running away pushing his cart, and struck him with his fist, knocking him down, on the ground that they could not say the peddler would not have escaped otherwise. (An appeal to the court of appeals was dismissed on the ground that it did not appear that the reversal was ordered for error of law only (1900) 164 N. Y. 57, 58 N. E. 117.)

It has been held, in North Carolina, that "the amount of force and the employment of the usual means in making the arrest and detention, when within the compass of the means ordinarily resorted to for securing one found committing a criminal act, must be left to the discretion and judgment of the officer, when, actuated by no ill will or malevolent impulse, he is engaged in discharging a public and official duty." State v. McNinch (1884) 90 N. C. 695, where the prisoner complained that the officer struck him with his fist.

In State v. Stalcup (1841) 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 50, where the nature of the prosecuted offense did not appear, the defendant was indicted for assault and battery in tying the prosecutor in taking him before a magistrate. It was held that the officer was the judge of the necessity, and that the jury could not supervise his judgment, and that they should be instructed that there was an abuse of authority, if the facts testified to convinced the jury that the officer did not act honestly in the performance of his duty, according to his sense of right, but, under the pretext of duty, was gratifying his malice, but if they were not so convinced, he did not abuse his authority.

It may be noted that it was held in State v. Rollins (1893) 113 N. C. 722, 18 S. E. 394, that the officer was entitled to an instruction to the effect that in an attempted rescue he, "in resisting such attempt, would be protected in the use of such force as a jury would ordinarily consider excessive, if" he "was acting in good faith and was free from malice."

IV. Checking flight.

An officer in attempting to arrest a person charged with a misdemeanor is not justified in shooting or killing him to stop his flight.

Alabama. — Handley v. State (1892) 96 Ala. 48, 38 Am. St. Rep. 81, 11 So. 322; Suell v. Derricott (1909) 161 Ala. 259, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 49 So. 895, 18 Ann. Cas. 676.

North Carolina. — Sossamon v. Cruse (1903) 133 N. C. 477, 45 S. E. 757.

Oklahoma. — Roberson v. United States (1910) 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 336, 111 Pac. 984; Sharp v. United States (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 350, 118 Pac. 675.

Pennsylvania. — Com. v. Max (1870) 8 Phila. 422; Com. v. Greer (1898) 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 535; Com. v. Rhoads (1903) 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 512.

Cas. N. S. 57, 4 Cox, C. C. 360.

The rule is also stated in Railway Mail Asso. v. Moseley (1914) 127 C. C. A. 427, 211 Fed. 1; Williams v. State (1870) 44 Ala. 41; Croom v. State (1890) 85 Ga. 718, 21 Am. St. Rep. 179, 11 S. E. 1035; Head v. Martin (1887) 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622 (bastardy); 2 Hale, P. C. 117; 1 East, P. C. 302.

"An officer charged with the duty of arresting a misdemeanor has no more authority to shoot him down to prevent an escape, than he would have the right to kill any indifferent person who was casually walking or running away from the place where the officer happened to be." Handley v. State (Ala.) supra.

"The officer is in no personal danger and the offender may be arrested another time." North Carolina v. Gosnell (Fed.) supra.

An officer "must not intentionally shoot a misdemeanor who is a fugitive, nor must he discharge a firearm while in pursuit in such a manner as to cause such fugitive injury." State use of Johnson v. Cunningham (Miss.) supra.

But it has been held that if he shoots to intimidate, and does not hit, it is not an assault. Mesmer v. Com. (1875) 26 Gratt. (Va.) 976.

It has been held that an officer may not kill to stop flight on suspicion of felony where only a misdemeanor has been committed. Petrie v. Cartwright (1902) 114 Ky. 103, 59 L.R.A. 720, 102 Am. St. Rep. 274, 70 S. W. 297, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 72.

It has also been held in one case that the officer may not shoot to stop flight, although a felony has been committed, when he has no reason to suspect more than a misdemeanor. Thus, where a constable, employed to guard a copse from which wood had been stolen, saw the prosecutor come out of the copse carrying wood, which he was stealing, and called to him to stop, the prosecutor ran away, and the constable fired and wounded him in the leg. Although the stealing of the wood amounted to a felony, the constable was found guilous bodily harm, as he did not know that a felony had been committed. Reg. v. Dadson (Eng.) supra.

Sometimes the above rule is prescribed by statute. See Caldwell v. State (1874) 41 Tex. 86; Tiner v. State (1875) 44 Tex. 128.

But if the officer kills, having good grounds for thinking his life in peril from the fleeing prisoner, he will be justified. Doolin v. Com. (1893) 95 Ky. 29, 23 S. W. 663.

And if a misdemeanor shoots at a posse advancing to arrest him, this is felony, and, if necessary to check his flight, they may shoot him. Reed v. Com. (1907) 125 Ky. 126, 100 S. W. 856 (cited in DONEHY v. COM. (reported herewith) ante, 1161).

Flight after arrest.

After the arrest has been made, if the misdemeanor breaks away and flees, the rule is the same as in case of flight before the arrest, that the officer may not shoot or kill to stop the flight.

Kentucky. — Head v. Martin (1887) 85 Ky. 480, 3 S. W. 622 (bastardy); Lewis v. Com. (1910) 140 Ky. 652, 131 S. W. 517.

Tennessee. — Reneau v. State (1879) 2 Lea, 720, 31 Am. Rep. 626 (escaping after conviction); 2 Hale, P. C. 117.

It is admitted by all the authorities that the officer need not retreat.

"But if A, either upon the attempt to arrest, or after the arrest, assault the minister that hath the warrant to arrest him, to the intent to make his escape from him, and the minister standing upon his guard kills him, this is no felony, for being by law authorized to arrest him, he is not bound to go back to the wall, as in common cases of se defendendo, for the law is his protection." 2 Hale, P. C. 117.

If a misdemeanor resists arrest the officer may use such force as is necessary to effect it, even to injuring or killing the offender. United States v. Jailer (1867) 2 Abb. (U. S.) 268, Fed. Cas. No. 15,463; North Carolina v. Gosnell (1896) 74 Fed. 734; Re Laing (1908) 127 Fed. 213; Birt v. State (1908) 156 Ala. 29, 46 So. 858; Holland v. State (1909) 162 Ala. 5, 50 So. 215; Tarwater v. State (1917) — Ala. App. —, 75 So. 816; Bowman v. Com. (1894) 96 Ky. 8, 27 S. W. 870; Com. v. Marcum (1909) 135 Ky. 1, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1194, 122 S. W. 215 (cited in DONEHY v. Com. (reported herewith) ante, 1161; State v. Fuller (1888) 96 Mo. 165, 9 S. W. 583; State v. Dierberger (1888) 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168; State v. Rose (1897) 142 Mo. 418, 44 S. W. 329; State v. Garrett (1863) 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 144, 84 Am. Dec. 359. The reported case (STATE v. DUNNING, ante, 1166); Com. v. Max (1870) 8 Phila. (Pa.) 422. For Robertson v. Territory (1910) 13 Ariz. 10, 108 Pac. 217, see infra, V. b (2).

It would seem clear that any other doctrine permits defiance, not only of the officer, but of the law.

In Foster's Crown Law, 270, it is said: "In the case of resistance in either case" (civil or criminal) "the person having authority to arrest or imprison may repel force by force, and if death ensueth in the struggle he will be justified. This is founded in reason and publick utility; for few men would quietly submit to an arrest, if in every case of resistance the party empowered to arrest was obliged to desist and leave the business undone."

"The defendant was entitled to a plain instruction to the effect that he had a right, in endeavoring to make the arrest, to use all the force that was necessary to overcome all resistance, even to the taking of life, and if he used no more force than was reasonably necessary to then and there accomplish the arrest, then he should be acquitted." State v. Dierberger (1888) 96 Mo. 666, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, 10 S. W. 168, supra.

"In making such arrest, such peace officer has the right to use such force as is reasonably necessary therefor, if the arrest be forcibly resisted, even to the taking of the life of the offender; but he has not the right to use unnecessary force or violence, nor to shoot or otherwise injure the offender unless such offender forcibly resists the arrest, and the arrest cannot be otherwise made, or it appears to the officer, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, that it cannot be otherwise made." Com. v. Marcum (1909) 135 Ky. 1, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1194, 122 S. W. 215, supra.

"If one charged with a misdemeanor resists arrest, the officer may use sufficient force to overcome resistance, and if the resistance is with a deadly or dangerous weapon the officer may resort to extreme measures to avoid serious injury and accomplish the arrest," even to shooting. "He is never required, under such circumstances, to afford the resisting offender the opportunities of a fair and equal struggle, but may avail himself of any advantages that arise in the conflict." North Carolina v. Gosnell (1896) 74 Fed. 734, supra.

"It is the right and duty of an officer who is resisted in attempting to make a lawful arrest, to use such force as may be necessary to compel submission and accomplish the arrest; and where a person taken in a criminal assault upon another defies the authority of the officer, and by threats of violence seeks to intimidate him, the officer is not bound to wait until he is actually assaulted before himself resorting to force." Ramsey v. State (1893) 92 Ga. 53, 17 S. E. 613.

In State v. Weston (1896) 98 Iowa, 125, 67 N. W. 84, it was held that "to excuse the taking of life in making an arrest, it must be shown that the killing was necessary to effect the object." But in State v. Phillips (1903) 119 Iowa, 652, 67 L.R.A. 292, 94 N. W. 229, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 325, it was held that proof of absolute necessity is not necessary to justify an officer in killing a person whom he is attempting to arrest for misdemeanor, where the statute requires him to employ no more force in effecting the arrest than to him, acting as an ordinarily prudent person, would, under the circumstances, seem reasonably and apparently necessary to effect the result.

The general rule applies where, after the arrest, the prisoner attempts to release himself. Thus, an officer, having arrested a misdemeanant, may use such force as is reasonably necessary to prevent an attempted escape, even to shooting and killing the pursuer. Stevens v. Com. (1906) 124 Ky. 32, 98 S. W. 284, where the court said: "Though he may not have had any reason to fear death or bodily harm at the hands of deceased, if the latter was attempting to release himself from arrest by forcibly overpowering appellant, the latter had the right to use such force as was reasonably necessary to overcome that being used by deceased to effect his release, even to the extent of shooting and killing the latter, if it reasonably appeared to appellant that that was the only way to prevent his release from his [appellant's] custody, though he would have had no right to shoot deceased if he had gotten away from him and was fleeing to escape." Quoted and followed in Ayers v. Com. (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1234, 108 S. W. 320. The Stevens Case was also cited in DONEHY v. COM. (reported herewith) ante, 1161.

Holland v. State (1909) 162 Ala. 5, 50 So. 215, supra, while deciding in accord with the general rule, has a contrary intimation in one part of the opinion. Murkison v. State (1914) 11

Ala. App. 105, 65 So. 684, while reversing the conviction of an officer, also lays down the contrary rule, citing as authority Handley v. State (1892) 96 Ala. 50, 38 Am. St. Rep. 81, 11 So. 322, which is misread. The early Alabama cases were not entirely clear as to how far they meant to go when they adopted the rule that "in all cases, whether civil or criminal, where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, and using the proper means, are resisted in so doing, they may repel force with force, and need not give back; and if the party making the resistance is unavoidably killed in the struggle, this homicide is justifiable." Clements v. State (1874) 50 Ala. 117; Hammond v. State (1906) 147 Ala. 79, 41 So. 761. But in Birt v. State (1908) 156 Ala. 29, 46 So. 858, it was said that "the doctrine of self-defense has no application in such cases, because it is the duty of the officer to effect the arrest or imprisonment of the offender, without the use of unnecessary or improper violence."

In Clements v. State (Ala.) supra, where "the evidence tended to prove, at most, that the deceased had cocked a pistol, and half drawn it," the court, while reversing the case on other grounds, approved a charge to the effect that a mere attitude of defiance or preparation to resist did not justify a killing by the officer; but in Hammond v. State (Ala.) supra, the court said: "If the defendant was in good faith attempting to arrest the deceased, and if deceased was armed with a pistol and, at the time of the attempted arrest, he manifested an intention to resist the arrest, and committed an overt act which manifested an intent to immediately use the pistol, under such circumstances as were sufficient to create in the mind of a reasonable man, and if they did create in the mind of the defendant, an honest belief that the deceased was going to draw the weapon and immediately fire on him in resistance of arrest, then the defendant was justified in firing first."

See also, in this connection, Ramsey v. State (1893) 92 Ga. 53, 17 S. E. 613, supra.

In some of the cases the right to kill is limited to self-defense. Forster's Case (1825) 1 Lewin, C. C. 187; Murkison v. State (1914) 11 Ala. App. 105, 65 So. 684; Smith v. State (1894) 59 Ark. 132, 43 Am. St. Rep. 20, 26 S. W. 712; Com. v. Greer (1898) 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 535 (obiter); Com. v. Rhoads (1903) 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 512 (obiter); Meldrum v. State (1914) 23 Wyo. 12, 146 Pac. 596.

Robertson v. Territory (1910) 13 Ariz. 10, 108 Pac. 217, is not definite. In that case, where the conviction of an officer for homicide was affirmed, portions of the charge to the jury, as stated in the report, are confused and contradictory as to the officer's duty, and the affirmation of the case,—(1911) 110 C. C. A. 489, 188 Fed. 783,—while not referring to the most confused portions of the charge, still leaves the matter in confusion.

In Meldrum v. State (Wyo.) supra, it was said: "It is the general rule that a peace officer is not permitted to kill or maim one who is resisting or who does not peaceably submit to the arrest. The degree of force used by the officer is not permitted to go to that extent unless the culprit assaults the officer, when the right of self-defense accrues to the officer."

In Smith v. State (1894) 59 Ark. 132, 43 Am. St. Rep. 20, 26 S. W. 712, supra, which seems a pure case of self-defense, the court, in reversing the conviction, said: "In making the arrest, or in preventing an escape after the arrest, the officer or person assisting him in obedience to a summons, when resisted by the offender, is not bound to retreat, but may use such physical force as is apparently 'necessary, on the one hand, to effect the arrest by overcoming the resistance he encounters, or, on the other, to subdue the efforts of the prisoner to escape; but he cannot in either case take the life of the accused, or even inflict upon him a great bodily harm, except to save his own life or to prevent a like harm to himself." Thomas v. Kinkade (1892) 55 Ark. 502, 15 L.R.A. 558, 29 Am. St. Rep. 68, 18 S. W. 854."

The same has been provided by statute. Thus, the Texas court said: "The law says that an officer or other person executing an order of arrest is required to use such force as is necessary in overcoming resistance to the execution of such order, 'but he shall not take the life of the person resisting arrest unless he has just grounds to fear that his own life will be taken, or that he will suffer great bodily injury in the execution of the order.'" Plasters v. State (1877) 1 Tex. App. 673. Applied, Giebel v. State (1889) 28 Tex. App. 151, 12 S. W. 591.

Probably we are to understand that the court was referring to the actual circumstances in State v. McClure (1914) 166 N. C. 321, 81 S. E. 458, where the officer was killed while pursuing the misdemeanor, and where it was said that "it is generally held that an officer cannot kill to effect an arrest or to prevent the escape of one charged with a misdemeanor."

It may be noted that it was held in State v. Towne (1916) 180 Iowa, 339, 160 N. W. 10, that a private citizen attempting to arrest a person for a present misdemeanor is not justified in using a deadly weapon in a deadly manner, although there is an attempt to flee or resistance to the arrest, unless acting in necessary self-defense.

Anything in the following cases that may limit the officer's right to cases of self-defense is no longer important, in view of the definite stand to the contrary later taken by the respective courts. Dilger v. Com. (1889) 88 Ky. 550, 11 S. W. 651; Stephens v. Com. (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 544, 47 S. W. 229; State v. McNally (1889) 87 Mo. 644.

WILLIAM C. SCRIBNER.

FRAMINGHAM ICE COMPANY.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Workmen's compensation — which employer makes compensation.

1. A driver who, with his team, is let by an ice to a coal company for the delivery of coal, and who receives his orders from the coal company, must, in case of injury while in the yards of the coal company, look to it for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, although he remains in the general employ of the ice company, which relies on him to look after its team.

— lent servant — who is master.

2. The rule that an employee lent to a special employer, and who assents to the change of employment, becomes the servant of the employer to whom he is lent, applies to cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[See 18 R. C. L. 493.]

APPEAL by the insurer from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County affirming an award to claimant, by the Industrial Accident Board, in a proceeding by him under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for injuries sustained while working for a coal company to which he is loaned by his employer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Walter I. Badger and Louis C. Doyle, for appellant:

At the time of his injury, Scribner was an employee of the Coal Company rather than of the Ice Company.

Cain v. Hugh Nawn Contracting Co. 202 Mass. 238, 88 N. E. 842; Hasty v. Sears, 157 Mass. 123, 34 Am. St. Rep. 267, 31 N. E. 759; Clancy's Case, 228 Mass. 318, 117 N. E. 347; Bowie v. Coffin Valve Co. 200 Mass. 578, 86 N. E. 914.

Mr. Edward L. McManus for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The employee, who was in the general employment of the Framingham Ice Company (hereinafter called the Ice Company) was injured while at work in the yard of the Framingham Coal Company (hereinafter called the Coal Company). Both companies were insured under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Industrial Accident Board awarded compensation against the insurer of the Ice Company. The only question before us on this appeal is whether Scribner, at the time of his injury, was an employee of the Ice Company within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The Ice Company let to the Coal Company a pair of horses, wagon, and driver. This happened frequently; and on one occasion, under this arrangement, Scribner worked for the Coal Company two or three months. He received his wages from the Ice Company. The proprietor of the Ice Company testified that he "looked to Scribner to take care of the horse and team which he owned," but "exercised no supervision with respect to his delivering coal. Scribner worked there the same as their man did [and] took his orders from the office of the Coal Company." The employee testified that Mr. Twitchell (one of the clerks employed by the Coal Company) told him where to deliver the material; that he took his directions from Twitchell; that he helped to load coal, brick, wood, lime, or cement; and that sometimes he had a helper when making deliveries.

"In determining whether, in a particular act, he is the servant of his original master or of the person to whom he has been furnished, the general test is whether the act is done in business of which the person is in control as a proprietor, so that he can at any time stop it or continue it, and determine the way in which it shall be done, not merely in reference to the result to be reached, but in reference to the method of reaching the result." Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 112, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 398. "The test is whether, in the particular service which he is engaged to perform, he continues liable to the direction and control of his master, or becomes subject to that of the party to whom he is lent or hired." Coughlan v. Cambridge, 166 Mass. 268, 277, 44 N. E. 219. Applying these tests, it is clear that Scribner at the time of the injury was an employee of the Coal Company; he was in that company's yard, engaged in its business and doing its work; and he was under its direction and subject to its orders. Whatever may have been the relation of Scribner to the Ice Company in the care and management of the horses, at the time of his injury he was engaged in work over which that company had no control. The business was that of the Coal Company and under its direction. The transaction between the two companies amounted only to a loan of the Ice Company's servant to the Coal Company, the servant became the employee of the latter for the time being, and on the evidence he must be found to have assented to this, although remaining in the general employment of the Ice Company. Ibid.; Hasty v. Sears, 157 Mass. 123, 84 Am. St. Rep. 267, 31 N. E. 759; Samuelian v. American Tool & Mach. Co. 168 Mass. 12, 46

N. E. 98, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 447, and cases cited.

Pigeon's Case, 216 Mass. 51, 102 N. E. 932, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 737, 4 N. C. C. A. 516, relied on by the employee, is distinguishable. In that case the driver was on his way to water the horse which was owned by Shaw, the general employer, who retained the general direction of the employee except so far as his control was surrendered to the city of Springfield. This relation of control included the care of the horses, to the extent, at least, of seeing that they were watered. When injured the employee was under the control of the original master and occupied in his work, and not engaged in the business of the city of Springfield, nor under its direction. See, in this connection, W. S. Quinby Co. v. Estey, 221 Mass. 56, 108 N. E. 908; Shepard v. Jacobs, supra; Delory v. Blodgett, 185 Mass. 126, 64 L.R.A. 114, 102 Am. St. Rep. 328, 69 N. E. 1078, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 581.

In Clancy's Case, 228 Mass. 316, 117 N. E. 347, the deceased was not in the service of the defendant city nor under its direction when injured; he was the servant of his employer, McGillicuddy, and engaged in his business.

The record shows that the Coal Company was a subscriber. The employee's remedy under the Workmen's Compensation Act was against the insurer of this company, by whom he was employed, and not against the insurer of the Ice Company.

which employer makes compensation.

This well-established principle of the common law which holds that an employee who is lent to a special employer as distinguished from his general employer, and who assents to the change of employment, becomes the servant of the employer to whom he is lent, applies as well to cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act as to those at common law. The

—lent servant—who is master.

English Workmen's Compensation Act, 6 Edw. VII. (1906) chap. 58, § 13, in defining the word "employer," enacts: "Where the services of a workman are temporarily lent or let on hire to another person by the person with whom the workman has entered into a contract of service, . . . the latter shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to continue to be the employer of the workman whilst he is working for that other person."

This statute was considered by the commission on compensation for industrial accidents, and in the "Report of the Massachusetts Commission on Compensation for Industrial Accidents," in its "Commentary on the Massachusetts Law" (pages 46-48, 52, 53), reference is made to the English act and to the English decisions, showing that these were called to the attention of the legislature; and see McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, 499, L.R.A.1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522. We must assume from the refusal of the legislature to adopt this particular section of the English statute that it intended the common-law principle should prevail when the services of an employee were transferred from the employment of his general employer to that of a special employer.

To decide, as we are now urged to do, that this rule has no application to proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, would in many cases deprive the injured employee of the benefits which the act was intended to give him, and which can be enforced only by reliance on the common-law rule.

In the first section of the Workmen's Compensation Act it is provided that, if the employer is not a subscriber, the injured employee can recover in an action at law by establishing the negligence of the employer. If such an employee, who is lent to an employer and is injured by reason of this employer's negligence, remains the employee of the general employer, it would be difficult if not impossible for him to avail himself of the right given him under this section; for, if injured while engaged in the business of the special employer, under ordinary circumstances, it could not be said that the negligence of the general employer caused his injury. His remedy under this section is against the person who is in fact his employer. To abandon the common-law rule would make this important section ineffective in many, if not all, of the cases where the employee is injured while temporarily in the employ of a special employer.

Under § 3, pt. II. of the Workmen's Compensation Act, if an employee is injured by the serious and wilful misconduct of a subscriber, or of any person regularly intrusted with and exercising the powers of superintendence, he can recover double compensation. The employee's rights under this section are based on the relation of master and servant, and he can recover only from his employer. If we should decide that an employee working for a special employer,—notwithstanding his consent to the change,—and injured while so employed, remained the servant of the general employer, then the employee could not recover the additional compensation provided for in this section unless it could be said that he was injured by the serious and wilful misconduct of the general employer.

In the case at bar, if Scribner was an employee of the Ice Company and was injured by the serious and wilful misconduct of the Coal Company, he could not claim the double compensation against the Ice Company if he was not injured by reason of that company's misconduct. And, if it were held he was not an employee of the Coal Company, but was in the employ of the Ice Company, he could have no relief against the Coal Company under this particular section, although injured by its serious and wilful misconduct. If the Ice Company was not a subscriber under the act, and the Coal Company was such a subscriber and he was injured by its serious and wilful misconduct, to recover the additional compensation under this section it would have to be decided that he was an employee of the Coal Company. Many other difficulties might be suggested where injustice would be done the employee if the common-law principle were abolished.

There might also be obstacles in the way of enforcing the penalty (pt. III. § 18) where the employer is required to report all injuries received by employees in the course of their employment, if it were held that an employee working for a special employer and engaged in his business, was not employed by him, but remained the employee of his general employer. In order to safeguard fully the rights of all parties, the well-recognized common-law rule should prevail in the application of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The one who is in fact the employer should be held for the consequences of his own neglect.

In Arnett v. Hayes Wheel Co. 201 Mich. 67, 166 N. W. 957, the facts were these: The Hayes Company, a manufacturer, and the Grand Rapids Blowpipe & Dust Arrester Company, a contractor, entered into an agreement whereby the latter was to install a dust-collecting system at the plant of the former, furnishing the skilled mechanics therefor, while the Hayes Company was to furnish labor to help. A laborer so furnished, working as a helper to a mechanic and under the direction of the contractor, but paid by the Hayes Company as his general employer, was injured; it was held that the general employer, the Hayes Company, was not liable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, but that the special employer, the Grand Rapids Company, was liable.

In Pigeon's Case and Clancy's Case, supra, the common-law rule appears to have been assumed. And see King's Case, 220 Mass. 290, 107 N. E. 959; Comerford's Case, 224 Mass. 571, 113 N. E. 460, s. c. 229 Mass. 573, 118 N. E. 900, where this rule was recognized. And in this connection see Humphrey's Case, 227 Mass. 166, 167, L.R.A.1918F, 193, 116 N. E. 412. The cases of Rongo v. R. Waddington & Sons, 87 N. J. L. 395, 94 Atl. 408, 9 N. C. C. A. 402, Dale v. Saunders Bros. 218 N. Y. 59, 112 N. E. 571, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 703, De Noyer v. Cavanaugh, 221 N. Y. 273, 116 N. E. 992, and Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, were decided under statutes which differ in material respects from the Workmen's Compensation Act of this commonwealth, and we do not consider them applicable.

It follows that the decree must be reversed, and a decree entered in favor of the insurer.

So ordered.

I. Introductory.

Under the Compensation Statutes, as at common law and under the Employers' Liability Act, the question frequently arises, Which of two employers is liable for injuries to one who is admittedly an employee of one or the other of the employers? Many of these decisions are controlled by the principles applicable in common-law cases, but the courts, generally, are more liberal in their construction of the Compensation Statutes than they are in construing the common-law principles, and there is apparently a tendency to permit the injured employee to recover compensation in any case in which that result may be obtained without working injustice to the other parties interested.

The cases passing upon this question arise on such varying states of facts that it is practically impossible to lay down any general rule which will control all cases of this character.

II. Teamster loaned to another.

This question most frequently arises where an employee of a company or person doing a general teaming business is loaned with his team to another person.

The rule adopted by the Massachusetts court is that the employee must look for compensation to the employer under whose direction, and subject to whose orders, he was at the time of the injury.

Thus, a driver who, with his team, is let by an ice company to a coal company for the delivery of coal, and who receives his orders from the coal company, must, in case of injury while in the yard of the coal company, look to it for compensation under the Massachusetts act, although he remains in the general employment of the ice company, which relies on him to look after its team. SCRIBNER'S CASE (reported herewith) ante, 1178.

But a teamster whose contract of employment was exclusively with the general employer, who alone was responsible for his wages, cannot recover compensation from the city, where the latter hired from the general employer, horses, cart, and driver to carry material from one place to another, as its officers might direct, the driver being left to deal with the horses in his own way. Clancy's Case (1917) 228 Mass. 316, 117 N. E. 347.

And a driver of a team hired out by the owner, his general employer, to perform work for another, remains in the employ of his general employer so far as concerns the management and care of his horses, and cannot look to the special employer for compensation for injuries received in the management of the horses. Centrello's Case (1919) — Mass. —, 122 N. E. 560.

So, too, where the owner of a horse and cart loaned them, together with a driver, to a city for use in cleaning sweepings from the streets, but retained control of the horse so far as feeding, watering, and care of it were concerned, the driver, while taking the horse to water during the noon hour, was in the employment of the owner of the horse, and not of the city. Pigeon's Case (1913) 216 Mass. 51, 102 N. E. 932, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 737, 4 N. C. C. A. 516.

Under the California statute, it has been held that one engaged in the business of contract teaming and hauling, who furnishes a driver and team to a third person, may be found to be the employer of such driver, who is injured while working for the third person.

Thus, in Kirkpatrick v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 31 Cal. App. 668, 161 Pac. 274, the court said: "The Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, in §§ 13 and 14 thereof, furnishes its own definition of the terms, 'employer' and 'employee.' The term 'employer' includes every person who has any person in service under any contract of hire, express or implied. The term 'employee' includes every person thus in the service of such employer. The decisions in negligence cases such as those above mentioned are not necessarily controlling in cases like the present; for the liability of the employer in this case arises not from any wrong done by him, but from the statute, which imposes such liability upon persons bearing toward each other the relation of employer and employee as defined in the statute."

So, a workman is not an employee of the foreman of the general employer, merely because, at the time that he was injured, he was driving a team which belonged to the foreman personally, where he received the same pay that he would have received had he been working without the team, and the foreman made no profit out of the workman's wages, and the workman was controlled and directed by the foreman precisely as were the other workmen, who were admittedly employees of the general employer. Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 35 Cal. App. 14, 168 Pac. 1146.

Under the New York statute, however, either the general employer, or the special employer to whom the employee's services had been contracted by the general employer, may be held liable for compensation for injuries received by the employee while working for the special employer.

Thus, where one is in the general employ of another, and is injured while he is working under the direction of a special employer, he may look, so far as the provisions of the Compensation Law are applicable, to the general employer, or to the special employer, or to both, for compensation for injuries due to occupational hazards. De Noyer v. Cavanaugh (1917) 221 N. Y. 273, 116 N. E. 992.

So, an employee who is loaned by his employer, together with a team and wagon, to the owner of a sand bank to draw sand, is, while engaged in the latter work, still in the employ of his original employer, who may be held responsible for any injuries received by the employee while so engaged. Dale v. Saunders Bros. (1916) 218 N. Y. 59, 112 N. E. 571, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 703, affirming (1916) 171 App. Div. 528, 157 N. Y. Supp. 1062. In the appellate division the court said: "The law of negligence, the rules relating to master and servant, the rule as to the inability to serve two masters, are of but little value here. The statute itself has removed these questions to quite an extent from our consideration. It names the hazardous employments; it defines an employee as a person engaged in such employment in the service of the employer, and defines the employer as a person employing workmen in such employment. When the statute defines the employer as one employing men in a hazardous employment, it does not necessarily mean that he is hiring a servant by a personal contract with him; but it means that he is using or engaging the man in a hazardous work. It is not a question of hiring, or of master and servant, but of using and putting the man in the hazardous employment, which the act has in view. The name of the act, 'Workmen's Compensation Law,' indicates that it is not to be limited to cases where the actual relation of master and servant exists, but to workmen and those employing or using them in the manner stated. When it appears that a person is carrying on such hazardous employment for profit, and that a person in his service, or whom he is employing or using therein, receives an injury, compensation follows."

And in Gimber v. T. P. Kane Co. (1916) — App. Div. —, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1109, and in Dale v. Hual Constr. Co. (1916) 175 App. Div. 284, 161 N. Y. Supp. 540, awards against the special employer were sustained.

So, an employee of one engaged in the general teaming business, who is injured while doing teaming for a third person, has a remedy, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, against such third person, so that an action for damages cannot be maintained, although there may be some doubt whether the injured employee was the servant of the said third person. Lee v. Cranford Co. (1918) 182 App. Div. 191, 169 N. Y. Supp. 370.

In Nolan v. Cranford Co. (1915) 171 App. Div. 959, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1128, affirmed in (1916) 219 N. Y. 581, 114 N. E. 1074, an award was upheld against a special employer, where the general employer had but one employee, and was himself an employee of the special employer, and was not carrying on the business of teaming, except in the sense that he furnished the truck and team of horses, with the driver, to the special employer.

Under the New Jersey statute, the employer who is liable for compensation is the person who makes the contract with the employee, whereby the latter engages to work for the former, and he, on his part, engages to pay the servant for such work.

Thus, a person who makes a contract with contracting teamsters for the supply of a team consisting of horses, wagon, and a driver, for which, as a team, he pays the teamsters, is not the "employer" of the driver within the meaning of the New Jersey act, where he had no direct dealings with the driver, and had nothing to say on the question of how much wages the driver should be paid. Rongo v. R. Waddington & Sons (1915) 87 N. J. L. 395, 94 Atl. 408, 9 N. C. C. A. 402.

III. Employee working for another in emergency.

In a few cases in which an employee of one employer went in an emergency to help another, and was injured while so engaged, it has been held that the employee could not hold his regular employer liable in compensation for such injury.

Thus, a section hand who was sent by his foreman to assist a farmer in extinguishing a fire which was spreading over his property is not, while he is so engaged, an employee of the railroad so as to make the latter liable for compensation for injuries received by the section hand while so engaged. London & L. Guarantee & Acci. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 642, 161 Pac. 2.

So, an employee of a lumber company who, while engaged with fellow laborers in constructing a railroad, was ordered by the fire warden to go with him and assist in extinguishing a forest fire, and, while so engaged, was struck by a falling tree and injured, cannot claim compensation for such injury from the lumber company, since, at the time of the injury, he was not engaged in its employment. Kennelly v. Stearns Salt & Lumber Co. (1916) 190 Mich. 628, 157 N. W. 378. The court further said that it was immaterial that he was paid his regular salary by his employer for the time spent in fighting fire.

A citizen who responds to a call of the village marshal to aid in suppressing a disturbance, as it is his duty to do under the laws of the state, is, while so engaged, an employee of the village, and if he is killed his dependents are entitled to compensation from the village. West Salem v. Industrial Commission (1916) 162 Wis. 57, L.R.A.1918C, 1077, 155 N. W. 929.

IV. Employee engaged in loading or unloading vessel.

In a number of cases arising under the English act, in which an employee engaged in loading a vessel was injured, it has been held that he may look to the owners of the vessel for compensation, although he had been hired to do the work by someone else.

Thus, shipowners may be found to be the employers of a workman employed to assist in mooring ships, although he was engaged and paid by a stevedore, where it appears that the owners gave the money to the stevedore instead of to the workman, as a matter of convenience. Pollard v. Goole & H. Steam Towing Co. (1910) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 360.

So, a coal trimmer, although employed by an agent of the harbor commissioners, is in the employment of a firm of shipping agents who act as managers of a vessel being loaded with coal for third persons, where the trimmers are directly under the control of the agents, and are paid from the freight, the balance of which, less charges, is sent by the agents to the owners of the vessel. Gorman v. Gibson & Co. [1910] S. C. 317, 47 Scot. L. R. 394.

And the mate of a vessel may be found to be in the employment of the owners, where, by the contract between them and the captain, the latter made all contracts for freight, and engaged the crew, and took the vessel where he wished, and the owners paid the wages of the crew if the freight was not sufficient therefor, and tonnage and pilotage expenses were deducted from the gross freights, and the captain took two thirds of the residue, paying thereout all other expenses. The Victoria v. Barlow [1912] 45 Ir. L. T. 260, 5 B. W. C. C. 570.

Where an agreement between the owners of a vessel and the skipper provided that the skipper was to work the vessel on the best-paying trade, receiving for his services two thirds of all the freight earned, out of which he was to pay all the wages for the crew, and all other expenses connected with the working of the vessel, re-mitting to the owner the remaining one third, and it further provided that, if he had cause to give up command of the vessel, he was to advise the owner, and, if requested, to bring the vessel to certain ports free of all charges to the owner, and further provided for his leaving the vessel at a loading port, a mate employed by the skipper, who would get his full wages whether the vessel earned any freight or not, may be found to be under a contract of service with the owners. Kelly v. The Miss Evans [1913] 2 Ir. R. 385, 47 Ir. L. T. 155, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 418, 6 B. W. C. C. 916.

A member of the gang engaged in unloading sulphur from a barge is not an employee of the owner of the sulphur, where he engaged one of the gang to supply the labor necessary, and that one engaged the others and supplied necessary tools, and the money received was divided equally among the gang, except that the leader received two pennies from each of the others, the owner merely directing where the sulphur should be placed. Bobbey v. W. M. Crosbie & Co. [1915] 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. (Eng.) 856, 112 L. T. N. S. 900, 8 B. W. C. C. 236.

In case a person engages an employee in behalf of another, but fails to disclose the principal, he may be held liable for compensation, in case the employee is injured.

Thus, a general contractor for the erection of a building, who, to enable a subcontractor to carry on his work, employs the workman in his own name without disclosing for whom the contract was made, may, if the workman elects, be treated as his employer, and subject to liability for compensation for injuries received by the workman. Scott v. O. A. Hankinson & Co. (1919) 205 Mich. 353, 171 N. W. 489.

So, where a mandatory hires workmen in his own name, without disclosing his principal, and pays them with his own money or check, he is liable for any compensation to which they may be entitled because of injuries received while in such employment:

A number of decisions passing upon the question as to which of two employers shall be held liable for compensation will be found below, but, as is suggested above, they do not yield themselves to any logical classification, because the facts presented are different in each case.

The owners of a threshing machine are the employers of a man engaged by them as a road man to go along the road ahead of the thresher, but who, when the machine is at work, acts as trusser, and is paid by the farmer, and was so at work when injured. Reed v. Smith [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 223.

A motorman must be held to be continuously in the employ of an interurban railway, although, for a portion of his time each day, he operates his car upon the lines of a street railway company, and the latter company pays his wages for such time, where he has made but one contract of employment, and the wages are paid by the street railway company by virtue of a contract between the two companies, to which the motorman is in no wise a party. Chicago & Interurban Traction Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 282 Ill. 230, 118 N. E. 464.

A man furnished to a street car company by a detective bureau, as a strikebreaker, who was injured while riding in the car as a guard, is an employee of the railway company rather than of the detective bureau, and, if injured, cannot maintain an action for damages, since his remedy is under the Compensation Act. Murray v. Union R. Co. (1918) 183 App. Div. 209, 170 N. Y. Supp. 601.

An employee engaged to operate a locomotive, by a firm engaged in grading a railroad, is entitled to compensation from the firm for injuries received while assisting the railroad in the work of laying rails, where the railroad was performing the work at the request of the contracting firm, the track being necessary for it to carry on the work which it had contracted to do. Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) — Cal. —, 170 Pac. 625.

A contractor engaged in installing a dust-arrester system in the plant of a manufacturing company, to whom an employee of the company was loaned for such work of installation, and who had full control of such laborer while so employed, is liable for compensation for injuries resulting in the laborer's death, where the company's sole connection with the laborer was its liability to pay him his wages. Arnett v. Hayes Wheel Co. (1918) — Mich. —, 166 N. W. 957. The court said that the fact that a person employed and paid a servant does not conclusively show that the latter was a servant of such person, where it is further shown that the employee was actually under the control of another person during the progress of the work.

But a machinist sent by a machine shop to repair machinery at the plant of a third party is not an employee of such third party. Texas Ref. Co. v. Alexander (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 202 S. W. 131.

In a case in which a partnership furnished a company with employees, but retained the power to hire and discharge, and paid employees with money furnished by the company, and the latter directed the men in their work, it may be found that both the general and special employers exert some measure of control over the employees, so that they both should be held liable in compensation for injuries received by an employee. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) — Cal. —, 177 Pac. 273.

The mere fact that a night watchman employed by defendant also acted as watchman for various other persons does not prevent him from being the employee of the defendant, so as to be entitled to compensation, within the California statute. Thus, several corporations, for each of which a workman acts as a night watchman, cannot be brought within any fair meaning of the term, "voluntary association," as used in the California statute, where each acts independently and without concert with the others. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury (1915) 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390.

So, a watchman at a crossing, who acts for both of two railway companies whose tracks are parallel at that point, is a servant of each of them within the meaning of the Compensation Act. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal R. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1919) — Cal. —, 179 Pac. 386.

A club, which, for the convenience of its members, provides caddies, who are hired and supervised by its own employee, is the employer of a caddy injured while in the performance of his duties, within the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Act, although the club member utilizing the services of a caddy directs his activities while so doing, and furnishes the compensation therefor. Claremont Country Club v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 174 Cal. 395, L.R.A. 1918F, 177, 163 Pac. 209.

A workman employed by the Public Service Commission in the work of constructing a subway for the city of New York is entitled to compensation from the city for injuries received in the course of his employment, since the city was, under the statute, engaged in the hazardous employment of subway construction; and the mere fact that the employee was engaged by state officials does not prevent the recovery of compensation, where such state officials were, by statute, made the agents of the city in regard to the work in question. Sexton v. Public Service Commission (1917) 180 App. Div. 111, 167 N. Y. Supp. 493.

VII. Function of court on appeal.

The court will not disturb a finding of the commission as to who was the employer of the injured employee, when there was some evidence to sustain the finding. Sullivan v. Preston (1917) 177 App. Div. 110, 163 N. Y. Supp. 692.

The court will not interfere with the decision of the county court judge at another pier several miles distant from the one chosen by Midland Company, and to that pier libellants under protest transported the cake, incurring therefor an expense of $1,287. These charges were for lighters and tugs, and arose necessarily before any cake went aboard The Saturnus, or came into the possession, custody, or control of any agent of the vessel.

No charter party of The Saturnus, either in the Baltimore form or otherwise, was ever made to libellant; that form relates solely to "heavy grain" cargoes, and is in many respects wholly unsuited to the present venture. It does contain provisions as to loading, and expressly provides for demurrage for delay in loading, but neither expressly nor by implication of words requires steamer to go to such safe pier at the loading port as might be chosen by shipper or charterer. The plain inference from the exhibits attached to the libel is that The Saturnus was under the complete control of the Dutch government, and, whether formally chartered or not, looked for remuneration to that sovereign. The bills of lading specifically called only for freight "according to agreement" between that government and owners of ship.

Peremptory exception was filed to a libel in rem, by claimant, a private corporation owning the steamship, as follows: "The breach of contract alleged does not give a maritime or other lien against The Saturnus"—which exception was sustained and libel dismissed. Libellants appeal.

Argued before Rogers and Hough, Circuit Judges, and Learned Hand, District Judge.

Mr. Herman S. Hertwig, for appellant:

Upon delivery of cargo to a vessel under a contract of affreightment, the vessel and cargo become mutually answerable for any violation of the agreement relating to the vessel and to the cargo delivered, whether such violation occurred before or after the delivery of cargo.

Messrs. Everett, Clarke, & Benedict also for appellant.

Messrs. Burlingham, Veeder, Masten, & Fearey and Chauncey I. Clark for appellee.

Hough, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is not an action for breach of charter, nor to enforce a maritime lien arising upon such breach, for these libellants never chartered. Benevolently reading the libel and exhibits, the most favorable statement of libellant's legal position is that The Saturnus was offered in fulfillment of a nonmaritime contract for the sale of oil cake, of which her owners presumptively had knowledge. By that contract Midland Company had agreed to furnish a cargo for a ship which turned out to be The Saturnus, and to furnish a cargo within the time limited in a well-known printed charter form, or pay demurrage after the there stipulated lay days, which would begin on tender of vessel for loading. Therefore, both ship and consignor had agreed to manage the lading according to the custom of the port unless varied by the charter form. That form contains no special provisions as to loading pier, but, by the custom, a ship at New York must go where ordered by shipper, if the place is safe. Libellant-shipper named such a place, shipmaster or agent refused

v. Buckingham, 18 How. at 188, 15 L. ed. 343). We must now assume that the freight lien of American admiralty is less than a privilege, because lost by unqualified delivery of possession, yet more than the possessory lien of common law, because creative of jus in re rather than jus ad rem. Why this is so has long been no more than a curiosity of legal literature.<sup>3</sup>

The affreightment contract before us presents more simply than would many modern charter parties, with their numerous incidental and ancillary provisions, this question: Is a maritime lien upon hull or cargo, as the case may be, the normal and lawful result of every legal claim of damage, due to any violation of the terms, express or implied, of a contract for carriage under which a carriage is ever actually begun? The inquiry must go this far, because no reason can be given for upholding the presently asserted lien that will not also support a multitude of other demands quite as close to the act of transport as is the one at bar, and all of them breaches of the maritime contract of affreightment.

It appears to us that: (1) The lien asserted is without historical basis in general maritime law; (2) it has been in substance rejected in America by a preponderance of authority; (3) is not in its nature beneficial to commerce, nor deserving of even statutory adoption—the only way it can obtain.

1. English law may be disregarded;

<sup>4</sup> Its present state as to the freight lien is well summarized in Scrutton on Charter Parties, §§ 101 and 105, while damages for detention or demurrage are by contract only. ed;<sup>5</sup> if it had been followed a century ago, no question such as this could have arisen, as is abundantly shown by the opinions of Justice Story and sufficiently recognized in the Supreme Court decisions above named.

Having gone beyond the common-law lien of England, but not accepted the privilege of Continental Europe (as we assert), yet derived what we have rather from Europe than Britain, it may safely be said that, if no privilege arose from a given state of facts, no lien (in our sense) based on such facts can be asserted to have historical foundation.

Before the codifications of the Empire, Pothier<sup>4</sup> set forth the accepted doctrine of privilege for freight, i. e., that cargo might be delivered and the privilege live for a fortnight unless during that time sale was made to a purchaser without notice. This passed into the Code de Commerce (§§ 191 et seq.) with the mutual privileges of carrier and shipper defined, i. e., the ship was privileged for freight and average (i. e., general), and the shipper for average and safe delivery, above all creditors,<sup>5</sup> and this allotment of privileges was and is restrictive.<sup>6</sup> But this limitation of rights in rem was not a creature of the legislature, for § 191 "a complété les dispositions de l'ordonnance de 1681 en adoptant le Commentaire de Valin, et les solutions données par la jurisprudence,"<sup>7</sup> and that the Ordonnance de la Marine United States [1885 ed.] p. 172), and it was so assumed in The Ripon City, supra.

One who agrees to load a full cargo and neglects to do it commits an especially plain breach of the affreightment contract, yet the carrier has no lien on what is laden, in respect of what is not. That a common-law or possessory lien could hardly exist on that which was not in possession is easily admitted,<sup>11</sup> but that no seaman or shipowner has (we believe) ever asserted such a maritime lien unsupported by charter party is the strongest evidence of the historic meaning of Cleirac's "clever phrase," i. e., that the mutual obligations of the personified ship and personified cargo begin when they are in charge of the same master, i. e., the captain, and cover only what occurs during that period of union. In the United States this union, in contemplation of law, begins when the ship is ready to receive cargo, and ends when a reasonable time has elapsed for putting it overside. And delay by the ship in discharging merely extends the charterer's or consignee's time wherein to receive; they have no cause of action (much less lien) against ship or owner for such delay (Milburn v. Federal Sugar Ref. Co. 88 C. C. A. 577, 161 Fed. 717; Empire Transp. Co. v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 35 L.R.A. 623, 23 C. C. A. 564, 40 U. S. App. 157, 77 Fed. 920), in the absence of special agreements to that effect. To hold that freight money or some substitute for it began a reasonable time after ship ready to receive cargo is now, whatever its original justification or lack of it, law; but the only reason ever given for the holding is no reason for granting a lien on a ship for refusing to go to a particular loading place.

We therefore think that the history of maritime jurisprudence affords no evidence that anywhere has the lien contended for been admitted.

2. Reported American decisions thought applicable are of two classes: (1) Those leaning for support on the maxim of The Freeman, supra, that the mutual rights (i. e., liens) of shipper and carrier do not arise until contract made and cargo shipped; and (2) those looking rather to the nature of the mutuality arising upon union of goods and ship, and deducing rights and liabilities therefrom. Cases of the first kind are germane to the contention that any breach of affreightment contract will support a proceeding in rem if and as soon as goods are laden; while the second class applies when libellant asserts his lien as the logical result of mutuality of remedy.

To make lien depend on its relation to a point of time, i. e., the date of delivery to ship, is perhaps fictional or mechanical rather than thoughtful; yet for lack of a better line of demarcation has long been well known in matters of statutory liens of mechanics and others.

In The Ask (D. C.) 196 Fed. 165, ship's alleged wrongful delay caused waiting cargo to spoil, and, after lading, a lien was asserted for antecedent damages. The delay was adjudged excusable, but McPherson, J., pointed out that any lien came into existence "at the time injury was done," the necessary inference being that, as nothing was laden at date of injury, there was nothing to which the lien could then attach, and there certainly cannot be a lien in nubibus waiting to descend.

In Guffey v. Alaska & P. S. S. Co. 64 C. C. A. 517, 130 Fed. 271, a shipper delivered his goods to a carrier and got a bill of lading for a particular vessel then at sea. That vessel never took the goods, but the delivery did not produce a lien. And the captain might retain the cargo until his claim for empty spaces was satisfied. This is a very different thing from the privileges preserved from older law by the Code de Commerce.

to the same effect, under different facts, The Garonne, 87 C. C. A. 651, 160 Fed. 847.

In The Priscilla, 52 C. C. A. 470, 114 Fed. 836, libellant took passage on a steamer, and some hours before embarking delivered his baggage to the shipowner but not on ship-board. Some baggage was lost, but before it came aboard, and the passenger was duly carried as per agreement with the rest of his luggage; but he was by this court denied a lien for what had been lost.

The Hiram (D. C.) 101 Fed. 139, is considered authority against the lien here asserted, and The Habil (D. C.) 100 Fed. 120, expresses the same view. Hoadley v. The Lizzie (C. C.) 39 Fed. 45, presented facts appropriate for opinion, and lien was awarded; apparently the point was conceded.

In the second class of decisions are two of Judge Morris of the Maryland district, which undoubtedly hold with libellant,—one a case of keeping cargo for a wrongfully delayed and chartered vessel, and the other of shutting out cargo. Decision goes on the nature of contract, as we read the opinion. The J. C. Stevenson (D. C.) 17 Fed. 540; The Alvah (D. C.) 59 Fed. 630, reversed on another point in 23 C. C. A. 181, 45 U. S. App. 210, 77 Fed. 315.

On the other hand, in The Eli Whitney, 1 Blatchf. 360, Fed. Cas. No. 4,345, Justice Nelson, affirming Judge Betts, summarily denied a lien asserted by a shipper against a ship whose capacity had been falsely misrepresented, to his injury as shipper. The point was necessarily involved, and, while the judgment is not reasoned, as authority there was nothing superior to the judges concerned at the date of decision.

The General Sheridan, 2 Ben. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 5,319, expresses on suggestive facts the opinion of Justice Blatchford that "any duty that may be violated by the owner or master before the cargo is put aboard is not a duty of the vessel, and therefore the vessel cannot be in default."

In the S. L. Watson, 55 C. C. A. 439, 118 Fed. at 952, there was considered a contract by a transportation line to carry full cargoes by several boats, and all cargoes by some boat of the line, which contract was partially executed, but any lien against any or all boats of the line was refused in respect of cargoes shut out, the court remarking that no lien arose "except in connection with some visible occurrence relating to vessel or cargo."

The reasons of Addison Brown, J., for finding a lien for damages by delay to the return cargo on a chartered round voyage, in The Giulio (D. C.) 34 Fed. at 911, are instructive, as is the discussion in The Ripon City, 42 C. C. A. 247, 102 Fed. 182, though in neither case was the present point involved. But in both decisions, had the contention of the libellant here been accepted, or even thought of, it would certainly have been considered.

The weight of whatever authority exists is against libellant; and, indeed, considering <sup>Shipping-lien for refusal to load.</sup> how often similar disagreements have occurred, the novelty of the present claim is a potent argument against it.

3. This litigation exemplifies a common tendency to regard any floating property used in the performance of contract, as in some sort a pledge or surety for satisfactory performance; such security to be enforced by asserted maritime lien. No such principle is known to the admiralty. The ancient and customary lien of the sea is not maintained, nor was it created (so far as history reveals its origin) for the convenience or assurance of parties, but for the encouragement of commerce and shipping as a presumed benefit to the public, in respect of an occupation hazardous and uncertain beyond most land ventures.

In respect of carriage of goods in particular, every public benefit has for centuries been deemed obtained when goods were liable for freight, and ship for safe and sound delivery of goods, the mutuality of relation thus growing out of the act of transport, not the making of a contract for transportation. Anything more than this<sup>12</sup> multiplies secret liens and hampers instead of advances ease and freedom of commerce. Merchant and mariner alike subject their property to the municipal law of every country into which their venture comes, but a maritime lien is as near an approach to jus gentium as can be found in private jurisprudence, and any extension thereof, not internationally well founded, is to be opposed as jealously as is a denial of its accepted extent.

The foregoing considerations lead to affirmance with costs of the decree below.

Petition for a writ of certiorari denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, June 10, 1918, 247 U. S. 521, 62 L. ed. 1247, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 583.

ANNOTATION.

Maritime lien for breach of executory contract of affreightment.

- I. Scope, 1194.
- II. In general, 1194.
- III. When contract ceases to be executory, 1198.
- IV. Effect of performance after breach, 1199.

I. Scope.

This note does not embrace the question whether there has been any breach of the contract or any fault of any kind on the part of the ship or its owner, but merely the question whether, assuming such breach, there is any lien on, or right of action in rem against, the ship.

II. In general.

Under the Maritime Law of the United States the vessel is bound to the cargo, and the cargo to the vessel, for the performance of the contract of affreightment. The Freeman v. Buckingham (1856) 18 How. (U. S.) 188, 15 L. ed. 343; Vandewater v. Mills (1857) 19 How. (U. S.) 82, 15 L. ed. 554 (see also Rose's Notes to these cases); 36 Cyc. 277.

It is now settled, however, that the lien does not arise for the breach of a contract of affreightment which has never advanced beyond the wholly executory stage.

The opposite view of this question was, however, taken in The Flash (1847) Abb. Adm. 67, Fed. Cas. No. 4,857; The Pacific (1850) 1 Blatchf. 569, Fed. Cas. No. 10,643; *Oakes v. In the Alaska case just cited, a contract was made with the master to transport a proposed shipment of goods. When the goods reached the shipping point the ship did not meet them, and it was necessary to forward them by another steamer. Judgment was rendered against the vessel for the damages from the breach of the contract, consisting of the difference in the freight charges. The court, after referring to the general rule that a maritime contract for transportation operates reciprocally as a pledge to the shipper for the conveyance and delivery of the goods, and of the goods to the ship, to secure the payment of the freight earned, said that the lien likewise arose in favor of the shipper for damages upon the refusal of the vessel to fulfil its contract. The only authority cited by the court for this last statement was The Flash (Fed.) supra. This case seems clearly in conflict with other late cases.

The conflict in the earlier cases, which continued even after the Supreme Court decisions cited, was doubtless due to the fact that the remarks of that court on this question were dicta. Thus, in The Freeman v. Buckingham (1856) 18 How. (U. S.) 188, 15 L. ed. 943, the question actually involved was whether the master could create liens on the vessel by issuing fictitious bills of lading for goods never delivered to the vessel. Vandewater v. Mills (1857) 19 How. (U. S.) 82, 15 L. ed. 554, involved a breach of an agreement to run between certain ports, carrying passengers and freight, so as to connect with the libellant's vessel. The Lady Franklin (1869) 8 Wall. (U. S.) 325, 19 L. ed. 455, involved the question whether there was any lien for nondelivery of goods described in a bill of lading given by mistake. In The Keokuk (1870) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 517, 19 L. ed. 744, the libellant, without notice to anyone connected with a steamer, took possession of a barge belonging to the steamer's owners and loaded it with wheat, and, before any contract had been made with the steamer to transport the wheat, the barge sunk at the dock.

But, as said in Scott v. The Ira Chaffee (1880) 2 Fed. 401, though the Supreme Court's remarks on this point were dicta, it showed no disposition to recede from the doctrine so announced, and such doctrine has been applied or recognized in all of the later cases in which the contract was wholly executory, with the exception of the Alaska case above cited.

Thus, it has been uniformly held that there is no lien for breach of an executory charter party by failing or refusing to proceed to the port of shipment, or to receive and transport the goods.

United States.—The Asa Eldridge (1881) 8 Fed. 720; The Monte A (1882) 12 Fed. 331; The J. F. Warner (1883) 22 Fed. 342; The Missouri (1887) 30 Fed. 384; The Universe

(1901) 108 Fed. 968; The Thomas P. Sheldon (1902) 113 Fed. 779, affirmed in (1902) 55 C. C. A. 439, 118 Fed. 945; The Margaretha (1909) 93 C. C. A. 184, 167 Fed. 794; Corsica Transit Co. v. W. S. Moore Grain Co. (1918) — C. C. A. —, 253 Fed. 689; The Panama (1846) Fed. Cas. No. 10,703; Hannah v. The Carrington (1860) Fed. Cas. No. 6,029; The Pauline (1863) 1 Biss. 390, Fed. Cas. No. 10,848; Salzobel v. The Rolling Wave (1863) Fed. Cas. No. 12,274; The General Sheridan (1868) 2 Ben. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 5,319; The William Fletcher (1876) 8 Ben. 537, Fed. Cas. No. 17,692.

In The General Sheridan (1868) 2 Ben. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 5,319, it was held that there was no lien for such a breach, though the charter party provided that the parties bound the vessel and the cargo, each to the other, for the performance of the covenants and agreements therein. The court said that, under the covenant, the duty of the vessel, to the performance of which the hypothecation bound her, was to deliver the cargo that might be put on board, at the time and place stipulated for such delivery; that any duty that might be violated by the owner or master before the cargo was put on board was not a duty of the vessel, or one for which a lien on the vessel was created or could be enforced; and that, under the covenant, if the cargo was not laden on board, it was not bound to the vessel, and therefore the vessel could not be in default, though the master or owner might be for the nondelivery of the cargo. But in The Asa Eldridge (1881) 8 Fed. 720, the court, in holding that there was no lien, apparently attached some weight to the fact that the charter contained no direct pledge of the vessel, but simply bound the parties themselves, each to the other.

In The Pauline (1863) 1 Biss. 390, Fed. Cas. No. 10,848, supra, the court said: "A maritime contract depends on its subject-matter, and the courts have jurisdiction of contracts which relate to the service or employment of a vessel. And contracts of affreight-ment entered into by the master or agent of the vessel in good faith, and within the scope of his apparent authority, bind the vessel to the merchandise. Under the Maritime Law of the United States, the vessel is bound to the cargo, and the cargo to the vessel, for the performance of a contract of affreightment; but the law creates no lien on a vessel as a security for the performance of a contract to transport a cargo until the cargo is shipped under it."

Nor does the fact that a ship has partly performed its contract, by transporting one of the cargoes covered by a charter party, give any lien for failure to transport the rest of the cargoes contracted for. The Thomas P. Sheldon (1902) 113 Fed. 779, affirmed in (1902) 55 C. C. A. 439, 118 Fed. 945.

So, there is no lien upon a vessel for a cargo for which bills of lading have been issued, but which is destroyed by fire while in the possession of the owner of the landing, before being placed on board or given into the control of the master, and before the arrival of the steamer at such landing (The Guiding Star (1893) 53 Fed. 936, affirmed in (1894) 10 C. C. A. 454, 22 U. S. App. 344, 62 Fed. 407); for breach of a contract to transport passengers between certain ports, with a specified amount of freight, where the steamer never received such passengers, or their baggage or freight, on board, or entered on the performance of the undertaking (The Eugene (1898) 31 C. C. A. 345, 59 U. S. App. 513, 87 Fed. 1001); for nonperformance of a contract of transportation made by the agent of the company operating the ship while the ship was on the high seas, though the goods were delivered on the company's docks, and a bill of lading issued (Guffey v. Alaska & P. S. S. Co. (1904) 64 C. C. A. 517, 130 Fed. 271); for refusing to receive and transport goods as previously agreed by the vessel's agent (Rynaude v. The Richard Cobden (1863) Fed. Cas. No. 12,191); for delay in delivery of a boiler which was never delivered to the vessel libeled, whose master contracted to transport it, but which was received by the master on behalf of another vessel, which attempted to transport it (Scott v. The Ira Chaffee (1880) 2 Fed. 401); for such part of the goods represented by a bill of lading as was never shipped (The Alice (1882) 12 Fed. 496); for failure to call for and receive goods for transportation as agreed (The City of Baton Rouge (1883) 19 Fed. 461); or for breach of a contract of shipment, under which the cargo has not been actually shipped (The Ask (1912) 196 Fed. 165).

And there is no lien in favor of the holder of a bill of lading issued fraudulently or by mistake, where the goods therein described were not in fact shipped. The Freeman v. Buckingham (1856) 18 How. (U. S.) 188, 15 L. ed. 343; The Lady Franklin (1869) 8 Wall. (U. S.) 325, 19 L. ed. 455 (see also Rose's Notes to these cases); Montell v. The William H. Rutan (1865) Fed. Cas. No. 9,724.

A master's misrepresentation or concealment of the facts as to the tonnage or capacity of his vessel, whereby the libellants were induced to enter into a charter party, gives them no lien for the refusal to receive a part of the cargo. The Eli Whitney (1848) 1 Blatchf. 360, Fed. Cas. No. 4,345.

But though there is no lien for the breach of an executory contract of affreightment, or an executory charter party, such a contract is maritime, and a state law may annex to it a lien upon the vessel for its breach; and where the state has done so the court of admiralty will enforce such lien. The J. F. Warner (1883) 22 Fed. 342; The Energia (1903) 124 Fed. 842. In the last-cited case it was held that the statute gave a lien for the breach of an executory contract for the transportation of a cargo from a point in the state, though the vessel was not a domestic, but a foreign, vessel, but the holding to this effect is expressly disapproved by the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, in Corsica Transit Co. v. W. S. Moore Grain Co. (1918) — C. C. A. —, 253 Fed. 689, in which it is held that a state has no power to grant a maritime lien against foreign vessels navigating waters not wholly within the state, for causes of action which have never been recognized as maritime, and that a state statute, giving a lien on a vessel for breach of an executory contract to transport property, is, therefore, not applicable to foreign vessels.

In Turner v. Lewis (1852) 2 Mich. 350, it was held that the statutes of that state, giving a lien on vessels for the nonperformance of any contract of affreightment, applied only to contracts made within the state, and not to contracts made in another state for the transportation of property to a point within the state.

In Guffey v. Alaska & P. S. S. Co. (Fed.) supra, it was held that a state law, giving a lien for nonperformance of a contract of transportation made by the owner, master, agent, or consignee, did not give a lien for nonperformance of a contract made by an agent of the charterer while the ship was on the high seas.

In Hendrik Hudson (1855) Fed. Cas. No. 6,358, where the master of a vessel agreed with a railroad company, from whom he received goods for transportation, to collect its freight charges and return them to such company, and it was shown that a custom existed to collect such charges for connecting carriers, it was held that the railroad company had a right to hold the ship liable for the nonperformance of the contract.

In England, no maritime lien in favor of a shipper is apparently recognized, but a statutory lien attaches when a ship is arrested in an action in rem for certain causes, including actions for damage to cargo imported into England or Wales, when the owner is not domiciled in those countries. 26 Laws of England (Halsbury) pp. 618, 621. The questions discussed in this note do not seem to have arisen, if they could arise, under this state of the law; but in The Maggie Hammond (1870) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 449, 19 L. ed. 777, where a ship on a voyage between foreign ports, after being damaged in a storm, unloaded its cargo at an English port, the Supreme Court expressed the opinion that there was a lien under the English law; but held right to sue the ship, the damages could be recovered in this country by a suit in rem.

III. When contract ceases to be executory.

While it is settled that there is no lien while the contract remains wholly executory, some difficulty has been encountered in determining when the contract ceases to be wholly executory. In The Freeman v. Buckingham (1856) 18 How. (U. S.) 188, 15 L. ed. 343, it was said that there was no lien until some lawful contract of affreightment was made, "and the cargo shipped under it." And in Vandewater v. Mills (1857) 19 How. (U. S.) 82, 15 L. ed. 554, the court said that if the cargo was not placed on board it was not bound to the vessel, and the vessel could not be in default for nondelivery in good order of goods never received, and that, consequently, if the master or owner refused to perform the contract, or for any other reason the ship did not receive the cargo and depart on her voyage according to contract, the charterer had no privilege or maritime lien on the ship. But in Bulkley v. Naumkeag Steam Cotton Co. (1860) 24 How. (U. S.) 386, 16 L. ed. 599, affirming (1859) 1 Cliff. 322, Fed. Cas. No. 4,301, which affirmed (1859) 1 Sprague, 477, Fed. Cas. No. 4,300, which involved the loss of goods while on a lighter from which they were to be loaded on the ship, it was held that a physical connection between the cargo and the ship was not essential to the lien. In The Lady Franklin (1869) 8 Wall. (U. S.) 325, 19 L. ed. 455, it was said that the lien does not attach until the cargo is on board or in the custody of the master. And in The Keokuk (1870) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 517, 19 L. ed. 744, the lien was said not to arise until the cargo was delivered to the custody of the master, or someone authorized to receive it.

In The R. G. Winslow (1860) 4 Biss. 13, Fed. Cas. No. 11,736, a vessel was held liable for wheat lost while being loaded on the vessel from a warehouse by means of a pipe. The court pointed out that the duty of the master, as transportation, and said that the delivery was complete when the wheat was discharged into the pipe, and that the case was different from a contract merely executory, where there had been no delivery of the goods to the master, nor change of possession, nor offer to deliver.

And where the agent of an ocean steamer employed a river boat to take freight and passengers down the river and transfer them to the steamer, it was held that a delivery of freight to the purser of the river boat was such a delivery to the ocean steamer as bound it, and that, even if this was not a sufficient delivery, the steamer was bound, where, upon meeting, both steamers proceeded to a wharf, where the river boat unloaded its cargo for transfer to the ocean steamer. The Oregon (1866) Deady, 179, Fed. Cas. No. 10,553.

And where goods were received by a carrier too late for shipment on a particular voyage, and were stored in its warehouse, where they were damaged by a flood, it was held that the owner had a lien on the vessel for the damages. Pearce v. The Thomas Newton (1889) 41 Fed. 106. The court said that the lien depended upon the receipt of the goods for shipment, though they had not been placed on board the vessel.

In The Gutenfels (1908) 166 Fed. 989, affirmed in (1909) 91 C. C. A. 97, 170 Fed. 937, a maritime lien for damages from delay was upheld by the district court, where the owner of the vessel receipted for merchandise lying ready to be loaded aboard the vessel, but a part of the merchandise was not taken for lack of room; but was forwarded by another ship of the same owner. The district court said that the contract could not be regarded as an executory one, but as one duly executed as far as delivery of possession was concerned. The circuit court of appeals affirmed the judgment, without passing on the question of lien.

(1859) 1 Sprague, 477, Fed. Cas. No. 4,300, it was held that where delivery of cotton was to be made at the wharf, and the ship employed a lighter whose boiler exploded, throwing part of the goods into the water, the shipper had a lien for their loss. The court said that the cargo was delivered in pursuance of the contract, and the goods were in the custody of the master and subject to his lien for freight as effectually as if they had been upon the deck of the ship, and that, unless the shipper was entitled to his lien upon the vessel, he was deprived of one of the privileges of the contract, when, at the same time, the owner was in the full enjoyment of all the privileges belonging to his side of it (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

Liens have also been upheld where the goods were lost while in a lighter, preparatory to being loaded on the vessel, in The Coldillera (1867) 5 Blatchf. 518, Fed. Cas. No. 3,229a; Campbell v. The Sunlight (1877) 2 Hughes, 9, Fed. Cas. No. 2,368; The City of Alexandria (1886) 28 Fed. 202; Petersburg, N. & N. S. B. Line v. Norfolk-Virginia Peanut Co. (1909) 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 569, 96 C. C. A. 383, 172 Fed. 321, affirming (1908) 161 Fed. 383.

Where cargo, after being loaded, was unloaded by direction of the owners of the vessel in order that they might attach it for a debt alleged to be due from the charterers, a lien against a vessel for the damages from the breach was enforced, in The Tribune (1837) 3 Sumn. 144, Fed. Cas. No. 14,171.

In Dill v. The Bertram (1857) Fed. Cas. No. 3,910, it was apparently held that a delivery of goods on the wharf, where they were taken in charge by the vessel's officers, and a part taken on board, was not a sufficient delivery of the part not loaded to give a lien on the ship for its loss by fire.

In The Bella (1899) 91 Fed. 540, the charterer contracted with the libellant to carry a party of passengers with a quantity of freight by a vessel not named, and then chartered the vessel libeled to carry out the contract. The members of the party delivered the freight at a warehouse, and selected their sleeping berths. Thereafter the vessel was seized under process in another suit, and, while in the custody of the marshal, the purser and freight clerk had the freight moved from the warehouse to a place on the dock, ready to be taken aboard; but it was not loaded. The charterer abandoned the voyage. It was held that the libellant had no lien on the vessel. This holding, though based in part on the ground that the charterer, under the circumstances, had no authority to create a lien, was also based on the ground that no lien could be asserted on the freight and baggage by the handling of the goods by the purser and freight clerk while the vessel was in the hands of the marshal, and that, as the lien is reciprocal, a lien on the ship for safe carriage and delivery of the freight did not attach until the lien for freight had attached to the cargo.

In The Phebe (1834) 1 Ware, 265, Fed. Cas. No. 11,064, the right to a lien was upheld where the ship became leaky, and the goods were transhipped by another boat, and not delivered; and in The Maggie Hammond (1870) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 499, 19 L. ed. 777, a lien was enforced where the ship, after being damaged in a storm, unloaded the cargo, and subsequently refused to transport it.

IV. Effect of performance after breach.

It will be noted that none of the questions so far discussed quite cover the point involved in the reported case (MIDLAND LINSEED PRODUCTS CO. v. THE SATURNUS, ante, 1187). In that case it was not claimed that there was any lien for the breach of contract while the contract remained wholly executory, nor was it claimed that the contract in question had advanced beyond the wholly executory stage at the time of the breach. The contention apparently was that, while there was no lien for the breach at the time it occurred, yet, when the ship subsequently entered upon the performance of the contract, the lien which then arose in favor of the shipper reached back and covered the prior breach. This contention, which the court rejected, was apparently supported by the only other case which has been found (aside from the decision of the district court, under review in the reported case), in which the opinion contains evidence that the court had directly in mind the question whether the subsequent performance of the contract would entitle the shipper to a lien (The J. C. Stevenson (1888) 17 Fed. 540); but there are a number of other cases decided in the district courts in which this question would seem to have been necessarily involved.

In The J. C. Stevenson (Fed.) supra, decided by the district court for the district of Maryland, a vessel which had contracted to carry cattle and to sail about a certain date was about a month late in sailing. It was held that the shipper was entitled to a lien for the cost of keeping the cattle during the delay, and the increase in insurance premium by reason of the lateness of the shipment. The court said that the question was not free from doubt; but that as the cattle were actually loaded on board under the contract, and reference was specially made to the contract in the bill of lading, and the ship obtained the benefit of the contract, it seemed to be within the spirit of the decisions to hold her liable for the delay.

In The Giulio (1888) 34 Fed. 909, a ship was held liable in rem for storage and other expenses during a delay on her part in proceeding to the port to which she was ordered by the charterer, for the purpose of taking a cargo, and also for the amount of a fall in the market price of the cargo during the period the cargo was thus delayed in reaching its destination. This case is apparently distinguished in the reported case (MIDLAND LINSEED PRODUCTS CO. v. THE SATURNUS, ante, 1187) on the ground that the delay was in taking a return cargo on a chartered round voyage. The delay, however, apparently occurred when the ship had no cargo on board, or in the possession, or under the control, of the ship's officers.

315, the suit was in rem for breach of a contract to transport a certain number of cattle, the alleged breach consisting in failure to provide ventilation so that the ship could carry the agreed number. It was contended that the contract was not a maritime contract, but a contract preliminary to a maritime contract, which did not bind the ship, and that it was made without authority. After disposing of the contention as to the agent's authority, the court said: "After the performance of the contract had begun, the ship became bound to its performance, and the libellant can recover in admiralty against the ship for a violation thereof." The ship had received and transported all the cattle the shipper was willing to ship with the ventilation provided, and the decision was reversed on the ground that it did not appear that there had been any breach of contract.

In The Habil (1900) 100 Fed. 120, the libel was by a charterer for damages to a shipment of bananas from delay in reaching the shipping point, and in loading and transporting the bananas. The libellant was a commission merchant, and it was held that he had suffered no damage. The court, though not conceding that he could sue as consignee or agent of the shipper, apparently proceeded to consider what the ship's liability would be if he could so sue, and said: "Damages for any loss or injury to the bananas after they had been placed on board the vessel, and on the voyage to Mobile would be recoverable by the banana company, if such loss or injury was occasioned by a breach of its contract of shipment, or by any neglect of duty to the cargo on the part of the vessel. Such is not the case made by the pleadings and proof here. This suit is based on a breach of the covenants of the charter party, and the principal damage complained of is that which occurred to the bananas before they were taken on board the vessel, and which were sustained, as is alleged, by reason of the delay of the vessel in reaching the loading berth at Bocas del Toro, and her delay in loading after reaching there." The libel was dismissed (and, so far as it is implied that there could be no recovery against the vessel for the damages accruing before loading, the case is in harmony with the reported case (MIDLAND LINSEED PRODUCTS Co. v. THE SATURNUS)).

The Hiram (1900) 101 Fed. 138, was a suit in rem against a ship for damages due to delay in taking the cargo on board, and in proceeding on the voyage after it was laden. The court held that the ship could not be held liable for any delay accruing prior to the delivery of the cargo to the vessel, though it would be liable for any unreasonable delay thereafter. The contract of affreightment was made between the libellant and a charterer, and the court appears to attach some weight to this fact, but also holds that no duty that may be violated by the owner or master before the cargo is put on board the vessel is a duty of the vessel, or one for the breach of which a lien on the vessel is created or can be enforced. STANLEY PRIESTLY, Appt.,

STATE OF ARIZONA.

Criminal law — impartial jury — sitting in similar case.

1. One charged with unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor is not afforded a fair trial where he is compelled to submit to the presence on the jury of men who found a verdict of guilty in another case, depending on the evidence of the same witnesses, who were hired detectives, whose testimony was attacked as incredible.

Jury — impartial — discretion.

2. Whether or not the state of mind of a juror is such as will prevent his acting with entire impartiality is ordinarily a matter that must be left largely to the discretion of the trial court.

[See 16 R. C. L. 261, 262.]

Appeal — impartiality of juror — interference.

3. The appellate court must interfere when the exercise of discretion by the trial judge as to the impartiality of a juror is clearly erroneous.

[See 2 R. C. L. 211 et seq., 217.]

Jury — duty of judge.

4. The trial judge must see that an unbiased, unprejudiced, and impartial jury is provided in every case.

[See 16 R. C. L. 262.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yavapai County (Smith, J.) convicting him of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert E. Morrison and Allen Hill, for appellant:

Defendant was denied his constitutional right to trial by an impartial jury as the jurors were incompetent.

Messrs. Wiley E. Jones, Attorney General, R. William Kramer and George W. Harben, Assistant Attorneys General, for the State:

It was not error to allow the five jurors who sat in the Duff Case to sit in the case against defendant.

Eames, 4 Ill. 76, 36 Am. Dec. 515.

Franklin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Stanley Priestly was adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and appeals. He was charged with selling intoxicating liquor to one C. J. Cooper, and asks a reversal of the judgment of conviction mainly upon the ground that he was not accorded a fair and impartial trial in the superior court.

The panel from which a jury was to be selected to try his case contained five men who, a day or two previously, had sat as jurors and rendered a verdict of guilty against the defendant in the case of State v. Duff, in which case the defendant was charged with selling intoxicating liquor to one R. H. Bryant. These men, Cooper and Bryant, are detectives, and, together with one S. E. Terry, were employed by Yavapai county to obtain evidence against those suspected of violating the Liquor Law. In this business Cooper, Bryant, and Terry were working together. It was on the testimony of these three detectives that the state relied for a conviction in each case. In the case of State v. Duff, the testimony of the prosecuting witness Bryant was corroborated by the testimony of Cooper and Terry, and, in the case of State v. Priestly, the testimony of the prosecuting witness Cooper was corroborated by the testimony of Bryant and Terry. The main, if not the sole, defensive matter in both of these cases was the incredibility of the testimony of these three detectives, Bryant, Cooper, and Terry, and the credibility of the impeaching witnesses for the defendant. Except the names of the defendant, the evidence in each case was substantially the same and from the mouths of practically the same witnesses. According to the testimony, both Duff and Priestly were working as bartenders for Bob Birch in his place of business on Montezuma street in the city of Prescott. The character of Birch's establishment became an important issue in each case, and was the subject of a mass of testimony pro and con. The testimony for the prosecution discloses that each of the defendants sold intoxicating liquor disguised in ginger ale; that it was the plan or scheme of Birch and these defendants, concocted by them to evade the law, to dispose of intoxicating liquor in this kind of a disguise. The character of the place in which these defendants were thus employed, the kind of persons who frequented there and patronized it, and the conduct of the employees and such persons thereabouts, all this was gone into by the prosecution with much detail of circumstance. In each case, to throw light upon the particular charge being tried, and to corroborate the testimony given to prove the specific sale for which a conviction was asked at the hands of the jury, other sales of a similar nature were testified to by the three detectives. So connected and mingled were these offenses and the circumstances related by the witnesses that the trial of the case of Duff was practically a trial of the case of Priestly. Substantially the only difference in the two cases was the application of practically the same testimony by practically the same witnesses to different defendants. The conflict in the testimony for the state and that for the defendant in each case was sharp. The defensive matter in both cases was almost wholly upon the weight and credibility to be given by the jury to the testimony of the respective witnesses. Timely exception was made to the disqualification of these five jurors to be upon the panel, and they were each challenged for cause. Counsel for defendant put upon the record before the trial court with clearness and in detail the similarity of the case of State v. Duff, which these jurors had tried, with the case of State v. Priestly, the trial of which they were entering upon. These jurors, however, notwithstanding the similarity of the cases and their conviction in the Duff Case upon practically the same evidence from the mouths of the same witnesses, were each emphatically of the opinion, in answer to questions put to them, that their knowledge of the Duff Case, together with their verdict under oath, would not influence them against Priestly, but that each could give Priestly a fair and impartial trial relieved from any conviction they may have entertained in the Duff Case. The challenges for cause were each overruled, and, after exhausting his peremptory challenges, appellant Priestly was forced to accept on the panel for the trial of his case a portion of the jury who had theretofore sat upon the previous case against Duff.

The Declaration of Rights in the Constitution of Arizona, art. 2, § 24, provides: "In criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right . . . to have a speedy trial by an impartial jury."

This constitutional guaranty to persons accused of crime, that they shall have a fair trial by an impartial jury, inures to the benefit of every accused, irrespective of his guilt or condition in life. Whether the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror is such as will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality is ordinarily a matter that must be left largely to the wise discretion of the trial court. But when the exercise of such discretion in a given cause appears to be clearly erroneous under well-settled principles of law, the appellate court is bound to interfere.

The first admonition found in our Constitution, art. 2, § 1, is that "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is essential to the security of individual rights and the perpetuity of free government."

The benign policy of the law that causes shall be submitted to tribunals indifferent as between the parties must not be frittered away in exposition, nor the operation of so just and fundamental a principle be nullified in the practical administration of justice, however happy the breach in its observance may appear to those in any particular instance wherein a conviction would appear justifiable to such, though this fundamental right had been invaded. The right of trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. Our fathers brought the right to this country. They knew that men accused of crimes had been broken upon the wheel after being tortured into a confession at the rack. They and their forbears had experienced the practices of the Star Chamber and verdicts of guilty at the "bloody assizes" by a packed jury, with the brutal and odious Jeffreys upon the bench to serve, not justice, but a monarch ambitious for autocratic power. With these horrors fresh in mind, or not in a remote historical sequence, it is not to be wondered at that the basic principle sounded in the Great Charter as the "bulwark of English liberties" has become the very warp and woof of our institutions. That as a people we have watched with jealousy and deep concern any tendency to encroach upon or impair any of the essential elements of the trial by jury, viz., number, impartiality, unanimity. We know the blood and treasure it has cost to get and keep this birthright of

Of the suffering and ignominy that has been endured for the want of it; of the evils tyranny and the lust of power have visited upon the weak and helpless who were without its protecting ægis. Upon occasion, as individuals, we may feel some of that indifference to the sacredness of this institution which a long-continued possession and use are not unlikely to beget, and in such a mood speak half mockingly of the endearing words, "bulwark," "palladium," etc., with which this great humane right has been enshrined in our language, to look upon such as mere ebullitions fitted for a Fourth of July oration. But, after all, each realizes the great importance of the trial by jury, and the necessity for preserving it in its purity and dignity with none of its substantive attributes impaired.

I shall advert to the case of State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 749, 751, 47 Am. Rep. 546, for some observations of eminent men upon the subject. Said Merrimon, J.:

"Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, thus points out its great purpose and the ends it subserves: § 1780. 'The great object of a trial by jury in criminal cases is to guard against a spirit of oppression and tyranny on the part of rulers, and against a spirit of violence and vindictiveness on the part of the people. Indeed, it is often more important to guard against the latter than the former. The sympathies of all mankind are enlisted against the revenge and fury of a single despot, and every attempt will be made to screen his victims. But how difficult is it to escape from the vengeance of an indignant people, roused to hatred by unfounded calumnies, or stimulated to cruelty by bitter political enmities, or unmeasured jealousies! The appeal for safety can, under such circumstances, scarcely be made by innocence in any other manner than by the severe control of courts of justice, and by the firm and impartial verdict of a jury sworn to do dence and a sense of duty. In such a course there is a double security against the prejudices of judges who may partake of the wishes and opinions of the government, and against the passions of the multitude who may demand this victim with their clamorous precipitancy. So long, indeed, as this palladium remains sacred and inviolable, the liberties of a free government cannot wholly fail. But to give it real efficiency, it must be preserved in its purity and dignity, and not, with a view to slight inconveniences or imaginary burthens, be put into the hands of those who are incapable of estimating its worth, or are too inert, or too ignorant, or too imbecile to wield its potent arm.'

"It is scarcely to be supposed that in this country any serious danger could arise to the citizen or to the country generally from an open or flagrant violation of the fundamental right in question. Occasional instances have occurred in times of public danger and trouble wherein the citizen was deprived of his right to a trial by jury, and his life was unlawfully sacrificed, but such cases have been few, and have met with very general condemnation. A greater danger arises from practices and precedents that insidiously gain a foothold and power in courts of justice, by inadvertence and lack of due consideration. The great importance of trial by jury is sometimes lost sight of, even in courts of justice, in the disposition of petty misdemeanors, cases of no great moment, and what are called 'plain cases.' In the economy of time, the hurry of business, lack of attention, hasty consideration, irregular and unwarranted methods of trial are adopted, allowed, tolerated, and thus vicious practices spring up, creating sources of danger to constitutional right. It is the province and the duty of the courts to keep strict watch over and protect fundamental rights, in all matters that come before them. Those who administer the law should never forget that decided cases make precedents, precedents oftentimes of little moment in themselves, but which, in their accumulated power, may, in some emergency, overturn principle and subvert the rights of many people.

"Mr. Justice Blackstone, in commenting upon the great excellence of trial by jury, thus points out the evil to which we advert: 'So that the liberties of England cannot but subsist so long as this palladium remains sacred and inviolable, not only from all open attacks (which none will be so hardy as to make), but also from all secret machinations, which may sap and undermine it by introducing new arbitrary methods of trial by justices of the peace, commissioners of the revenue, and courts of conscience. And however convenient these may appear at first (as doubtless all arbitrary powers, well executed, are the most convenient), yet, let it be again remembered that delays and little inconveniences in the form of justice are the price that all free nations must pay for their liberty in more substantial matters; that these inroads upon the sacred bulwark of the nation are fundamentally opposite to the spirit of our Constitution, and that, though begun in trifles, the precedents may gradually increase and spread, to the utter disuse of juries, in questions of the most momentous concern.'"

The tendency of legislation is to increase the dignity of the jury and lessen the power of the courts to influence or control their verdicts. It is indispensable, therefore, to the due administration of the law that this important right be carefully guarded. No higher duty rests upon the trial judge than to see that an unbiased, unprejudiced, and impartial jury should in every case be provided. If jurors objectionable in the particulars here stated are permitted to serve, this case must become a precedent for others sure to follow, and thus the impairment of the right will insidiously gain such a foothold that the right itself would in time become the mere echo of a voice, a shadow, not substance, and as "idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean." These objectionable jurors are no doubt good men and representative citizens, perfectly conscientious in the belief they expressed of an ability to be indifferent between the state and the defendant, notwithstanding the knowledge they had obtained of the facts and witnesses in a court of justice where they had sat as jurors and given their verdict. So, too, the action of the learned trial judge, we are persuaded, was dictated by a proper sense of propriety and decorum. But the weakness and error in the ruling lay in the trial judge having that confidence in the ability of the jurors to be entirely impartial under the circumstances, which confidence the jurors had expressed, each in himself. Having passed upon the credibility of witnesses in a similar case, upon substantially the same testimony, and having theretofore rendered a verdict on their oaths, it is not to be believed that they could sit upon this case with such an opinion previously formed without it influencing their action.

Criminal law—
impartial jury—sitting in similar case.

"Answers by these jurors to categorical questions, though doubtless intended to be truthful, are less convincing than the known nature and tendency of the human mind." State v. Hammon, 84 Kan. 137, 140, 113 Pac. 419.

We quote from the syllabus to the case of Edgar v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 488, 129 S. W. 140: "In a prosecution for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, where the principal matter of defense was an attack on the credibility of the prosecuting witness, it was error to compel defendant to select a jury from a panel including six jurors who had previously sat in a similar case, in which almost the sole defensive matter was the credibility of the same prosecuting witness."

State*, 4 Ga. App. 378, 61 S. E. 497; 24 Cyc. 278, 279.

Other questions are raised which have been determined in the cases of Duff v. State, 19 Ariz. 361, 171 Pac. 133, and Birch v. State, 19 Ariz. 366, 171 Pac. 135, just decided, and therefore require no particular discussion.

Appellant Priestly was not accorded his right to a trial by an impartial jury within the constitutional provision. The case must be reversed, with direction to grant a new trial. It is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Service on jury in prosecution for selling intoxicating liquor as disqualification as juror in similar case.

- I. Prosecution based on same sale, 1206.
- II. Prosecution based on different sale:

- a. Generally, 1206.
- b. Prosecution depending on testimony of same witness, 1207.

I. Prosecution based on same sale.

A person who had served as a juror on a trial for selling intoxicating liquor is not qualified to sit as a juror in another prosecution based on the same sale. Smith v. State (1915) 16 Ga. App. 299, 85 S. E. 207; Gilmore v. State (1897) 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 81, 38 S. W. 787.

In Smith v. State (Ga.) supra, it was said in an official syllabus: "Upon a showing, made on a principal challenge for cause, that certain named jurors had served at the same term of the court on other juries, which had convicted other defendants of the same offense, in cases involving the same transaction, and where it appeared from the testimony of state's counsel that the intoxicating quality of the liquor alleged to have been sold by the accused would be established by the expert witness upon whose credibility the jurors challenged had already passed, it was error to overrule the challenge. And this is true although the challenged jurors qualified by their answers to the usual questions propounded."

liquor, it appeared that on the trial of another person a witness testified that the appellant sold liquor to him. A juror who sat in that case testified that from that testimony he believed that the sale was made. It was held that he was incompetent, the prosecution being based on the sale in question. The court said: "An inspection of this record will show that but one issue was before the jury; that is, whether appellant sold the whisky to Beard or not. The minds of the jury were fixed upon this fact. They stated that they heard Beard swear in the first trial that he had sold whisky to him, and that they believed what he said to be true, and at that time believed it. This was not rumor or newspaper account; but the source of information was from the sworn testimony of a witness to the main fact in the case."

a. Generally.

Service as a juror in a prosecution for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor does not ordinarily disqualify a person from sitting as a juror on the trial of the same person for a similar offense, if the transaction on which the prosecution was based was different and distinct. Com. v. Hill (1862) 4 Allen (Mass.) 591; Dew v. McDivitt (1876) 31 Ohio St. 139;

West v. State (1895) 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 48, 30 S. W. 1069; Arnold v. State (1897) 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 1, 40 S. W. 734; Ross v. State (1908) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 275, 118 S. W. 1034; Edgar v. State (1910) 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 252, 127 S. W. 1053; Engman v. State (1915) 78 Tex. Crim. Rep. 94, 180 S. W. 235.

In Arnold v. State (1897) 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 1, 40 S. W. 734, it was held that a juror was not disqualified by the fact that he had served as a juror on a previous prosecution of the accused for another violation of the Local Option Law, the court saying: "The fact that the defendant may have been guilty of violating the Local Option Law on the 28th of March, 1895, if tried by the same jury, would be no cause for challenge in a case where he is charged with violating the same law on the 6th of June, 1895. These are different transactions, and in no way related to each other."

In Com. v. Hill (1862) 4 Allen (Mass.) 591, it was held that a person who served as juror on a trial for maintaining a building as a liquor nuisance between certain dates was competent on a trial of the same person for so maintaining the same building between two later dates. The court said: "The offenses charged in the two indictments against the defendant, although of the same nature, were entirely separate and distinct. They had no connection with each other. Nor would the same evidence be competent in support of the second indictment, which had been offered at the previous trial to sustain the first indictment. It was only on proof of a new state of facts, or series of facts, covering the time alleged in the present indictment, and having no relation to or connection with those on which the previous conviction was founded, that the government could maintain the charge on which the jury were to pass in the trial of the present case. It cannot, therefore, be assumed that the jurors who had served during the first trial of the defendant, had in any degree prejudged the present case, or were under any bias or want of impartiality which would prevent them from giving hearing to the new case which were called on to try and deter

In West v. State (1895) 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 48, 30 S. W. 1069, a prosecution of a physician for giving lawfully a prescription for intoxicating liquors, it was held that a person who had served as jurors on previous prosecutions of the same defendant based on prescriptions given to persons, were not thereby disqualified.

In Ross v. State (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 275, 118 S. W. 1034, it was held that jurors who had previously convicted the accused of an offense were not disqualified. See to the same effect Edgar v. State (1910) 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 252, 127 S. W. 1053; Engman v. State (1915) 78 Tex. Crim. Rep. 94, 180 S. W. 235.

In Dew v. McDivitt (1876) 3 St. 139, it was held that persons who had sat as jurors on the trial of an accused by a wife under the Civil Damage Act were competent on the trial of the same accused by her against other liquorers.

In Quinlan v. State (1913) App. 669, 79 S. E. 768, it was held that the question whether jurors who had served on previous prosecutions could be raised by challenge to the pool was not by challenge to the array.

A juror who has served on the trial of a prosecution for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors is disqualified to serve on a subsequent prosecution for a similar offense, though the offenses are distinct, if the testimony of the same witness is relied on to sustain the prosecution in each case. Roberts v. State (1908) 4 Ga. 378, 61 S. E. 497; Drye v. State (1908) 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 125, 49 S. W. 1069; Holmes v. State (1908) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 353, 106 S. W. 1160; Griffin v. State (1908) 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 422, 135 S. W. 144. See the reported case (PRIEST v. STATE, ante, 1201). Compare F

State (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 275, 118 S. W. 1034; Ausbrook v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 289, 156 S. W. 1177; Fletcher v. Com. (1907) 106 Va. 840, 56 S. E. 149.

In Roberts v. State (Ga.) supra, it appeared that a person was engaged in procuring evidence of violations of the Local Option Act. In a prosecution based on a sale to him, it appeared that convictions had been had in two similar cases, against third persons, based on his testimony. It was held that the accused should have been allowed to interrogate jurymen as to whether they had served on either of the previous trials, the court saying: "Whether this sole witness to the criminal act charged against the defendant was worthy of credit was vital to the defense of the accused. If the jurors believed this witness, they would convict the accused; if they did not believe him, they would acquit. If they had believed him notwithstanding the attack made upon his credit in the two former cases, it is certainly reasonable to presume that they would also believe him when a similar attack was made upon his credit by the defendant in the present case. At least, the jury who had tried the other two cases would come to the consideration of the present case, entertaining an opinion that the sole witness against the defendant was worthy of credit. The defendant would, therefore, have the burden of combating a preconceived judgment or opinion formed by the jurors as to a most material fact in the case. It is, therefore, clear to our minds that the court should have allowed this showing to be made, and, if the facts were proved as established, should have sustained the defendant's challenge to the polls, and should have given to him a panel of jurors entirely free from any preconceived opinion as to the credibility of the witness against him."

In Drye v. State (1898) 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 125, 49 S. W. 83, the court stated the facts and its conclusion as follows: "The facts further show that the witness Medford was employed by the sheriff of Grayson county to work up violations of the Local Option Law at Van Alstyne and elsewhere, and he seems to have been a very effective detective, and the main witness in these prosecutions. It is further shown by the bill that on his testimony convictions were obtained. In the Hunter Case he had testified positively to the fact that he had purchased whisky from appellant. Now, if appellant had been on trial instead of Hunter, there would have been no question of the fact that the jurors who heard him testify would have been disqualified, because they would have been jurors in appellant's case, and heard the very testimony upon which the state was seeking the conviction; and this record discloses that it was upon the testimony of this witness Medford that this conviction was obtained. Now, we are unable to see any real practical difference in the effect it would produce upon the juror's mind, whether the witness swore in appellant's own case as to his guilt, or to the same facts in another case; the jurors having heard the testimony of said witness. Where the conclusion of defendant's guilt is arrived at in the juror's mind from newspaper accounts, hearsay, rumors, or other sources of that character, the juror may reach a conclusion which, upon being acquainted with the real facts, might be removed. It is true, there is a possibility that a conviction established in the mind of the juror might be overcome, even where he had heard the testimony in the particular case, but that is rather a speculative possibility."

In Holmes v. State (1908) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 353, 106 S. W. 1160, jurors who had found the accused guilty in a previous prosecution for violation of the Local Option Law, on the testimony of the same witness who was the principal support of the instant prosecution, were held to be incompetent, the court saying: "We cannot believe that this jury could sit and listen to the trial of a local option case against appellant, with practically the same testimony in another case, and not have an opinion previously formed, which opinion would influence they believed appellant guilty in the first instance, there is no rational basis for concluding that they would not believe him guilty in the second instance. If the witness swore appellant sold him whisky once, and they believed that fact, we know of no process of reasoning by which they could discard the fact and disbelieve the statement when the witness swore appellant sold him (witness) whisky the second time. It follows, therefore, that the court erred in not setting the jurors aside, and awarding appellant another jury." The foregoing decision was followed, on similar facts, in Green v. State (1908) 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 3, 111 S. W. 933, Edgar v. State (1910) 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 488, 129 S. W. 140, and Hardgraves v. State (1911) 61 Tex. Crim. Rep. 422, 135 S. W. 144.

But in Ross v. State (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 275, 118 S. W. 1034, the jurors who had previously convicted the accused of illegal sales of liquor to other persons were held to be competent, though in those cases the accused testified that he did not make the sales in question, and his testimony was discredited by the jury.

In Ausbrook v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 289, 156 S. W. 1177, so much of the opinion as bears on the point under consideration reads as follows: "The appellant made a motion to discharge the regular jury of the week at the time on the ground that this jury had already tried two other defendants and convicted them on the same character of offense, and on the testimony of two certain witnesses, who would be the only witnesses against appellant in this case. The court properly overruled this motion, qualifying appellant's bill presenting it by stating: 'There was an additional witness, Jim Peck, in this case. The defendant, Jess Howell, and Jacob Bush' (the parties against whom two verdicts of guilty had already been rendered) 'were convicted of running entirely different places. They did not have anything to do with each other and were in different parts of the city of Dallas, Texas.' Besides, neither the bill nor the record shows that either of the jurors who tried the defendants in other cases mentioned were on the jury that tried this case."

In Fletcher v. Com. (1907) 106 Va. 840, 56 S. E. 149, it was held that where there is nothing to show that the jury was not impartial, the fact that members of the panel "had, at the same term of court, tried similar cases, proved by the same witness," is not error. J. C. L.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

THOMAS P. COYNE et al.

Evidence — burglary — possession of unidentified valuables.

1. Failure to identify valuables found on one arrested for burglary, as part of the property stolen, does not render inadmissible, upon his trial for that offense, evidence of the fact that such property was in his possession at the time of arrest.

Appeal — conduct of trial — review.

2. The conduct of the trial and the order of the introduction of the evidence are largely within the discretion of the trial judge.

[See 2 R. C. L. 215.]

Evidence — lapse of time — remoteness.

3. The lapse of two months between a burglary and an arrest does not render too remote evidence that at the time of arrest accused had in his possession jewelry of large value.

[See 4 R. C. L. 440.]

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County made during the trial of an indictment charging them with breaking and entering a dwelling house. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Daniel J. McNerney, M. Fred O'Connell, and James W. Hoy, for defendants:

Defendants were not called upon to explain where they got the money, mileage books, and jewelry, under the penalty of having an inference drawn against them that they stole the Wallace jewelry and disposed of it, receiving money with which they bought mileage books and jewelry.

Williams v. United States, 168 U. S. 382, 42 L. ed. 509, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92; Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Allen, 548, 83 Am. Dec. 712; Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1056, 76 N. E. 127; Com. v. O'Neil, 169 Mass. 394, 48 N. E. 134; Com. v. Williams, 171 Mass. 461, 50 N. E. 1035; State v. Carter, 72 N. C. 99, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 444; Turner v. State, 124 Ala. 59, 27 So. 272.

Defendants suffered prejudicial error by the instructions of the court, submitting to the jury for its determination the issue whether the money and jewelry found upon the defendants when arrested were the proceeds or part of the proceeds of the Wallace jewelry.

Mark v. Stuart-Howland Co. 226 Mass. 35, 2 A.L.R. 678, 115 N. E. 42; Wylie v. Blake & K. Steam Pump Works, 221 Mass. 489, 109 N. E. 396; Kerr v. Shurtleff, 218 Mass. 167, 105 N. E. 871.

Evidence of other and independent crimes committed by the defendants is not admissible to show that they were bad characters.

Jordan v. Osgood, 109 Mass. 457, 12 Am. Rep. 731; Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 16.

If the jury had been told to disregard the evidence entirely the defendants still were prejudiced.

Selkirk v. Cobb, 13 Gray, 313; Allen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 212 Mass. 191, 98 N. E. 618; Farnum v. Farnum, 13 Gray, 508; Com. v. Edgerly, 10 Allen, 184.

Messrs. Edward T. Esty and George R. Stobbs, for the Commonwealth:

The testimony of inspector Flaherty was rightly admitted.

W. 516; Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 22 So. 564; State v. Burns, 19 Wash. 52, 52 Pac. 316; Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, 49 N. E. 91; State v. Thompson, 87 Iowa, 670, 54 N. W. 1077.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were indicted jointly for breaking and entering the dwelling house of one Wallace in the nighttime with the intent to commit larceny, and for the larceny therein of divers articles of jewelry and precious stones, of an aggregate value of about $5,000. There was evidence tending to show that the defendants committed the crime.

After the defendants had introduced some evidence the presiding judge, at the request of the district attorney, permitted him to reopen the case and introduce further evidence in support of the charge in the indictment. The conduct of the trial and the order of the introduction of evidence, ordinarily, are within the discretion of the trial judge. There is nothing to indicate an abuse of such discretion.

The evidence thus introduced out of order was to the effect that, when arrested, the defendant Coyne had in his possession $350 in money; "one New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Company 500-mile ticket, containing 156 miles, stamped, 'Bridgeport, Conn., Oct. 20, 1916,' one platinum ring set with three diamonds, stated by the defendant to be worth $1,000, but he declined to tell where he got it; one diamond stick pin set in platinum, stated by the defendant to be worth $500; one gold-handled knife attached to a 14" gold and platinum link chain, stated by him to be worth, together, $45; one gold stud button set with a diamond, stated by him to be worth $20; one gold collar button, stated by him to be worth $10; one small gold stick pin set with a diamond, stated by him to be worth $20; one gold locket set with a diamond, attached to a gold chain, both stated by him to be worth $20; one pearl-handled knife, stated by him to be worth $4; one open-faced gold Elgin watch with the monogram 'T. P. C.' on the case, stated by him to be worth $40; one pair gold cuff links, stated by him to be worth $20; one black leather traveling bag containing various articles of clothing; . . . that Farrell had in his possession money amounting to about $117; one New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Company 500-mile ticket, containing 3 miles, stamped, 'Stamford, Conn., Oct. 9, 1916; one Elgin gold watch, stated by the defendant Farrell to be worth $28; one gold ring set with a diamond, stated by him to be worth $425; one platinum watch chain, 14" long, stated by him to be worth $50; one crown stick pin set with diamonds and sapphire, stated by him to be worth $65; one pair pearl cuff links with diamond, stated by him to be worth $15; one gold stud with diamond, stated by him to be worth $20; one gold-handled knife set with two small diamonds, with the initials 'M. F.' engraved on handle, stated by him to be worth $10; and one black leather traveling bag containing a pair of shoes, clothing, and other articles. It was admitted by the Commonwealth that none of the specific articles taken from the Wallace residence were found in the possession of the defendants, or of anyone else connected with the defendants."

evidence unless it could be shown that these articles "had some connection with, or relation to, the breaking and entering of and larceny in the Wallace residence, or could be identified as property stolen from the Wallace residence."

No other ground of objection appears then to have been suggested. It is manifest that this ground of objection is not sound. The possession of property of considerable value, whether jewels or money, although not identified as a part of the property stolen, is nevertheless a circumstance proper for the consideration of the jury as tending to show property in the hands of the defendants subsequent to the alleged larceny. Such evidence is competent in the case at bar. Its weight may be trivial or cogent according to other conditions shown. It might be slight against a person of affluence and of extravagant habits. It might be of importance against one of small estate or of no visible means of support. There was evidence tending to show that neither of the defendants had worked for a year, and that, when arrested, they declined to tell where they were on the date of the crime alleged. As to Coyne, it appeared that when arrested he said in substance that once he had been an inmate of Concord reformatory, and was an engraver by occupation; that a witness called by him testified that he had known Coyne for many years, that he did not know what his business was, and that he knew he had worked in a rope factory about eight years before, and had been employed in a bakery three or four years before for a few weeks. As to Farrell, it appeared that his sister testified that he had made his home with her for some years, that she saw him at her house every two or three weeks, that she never inquired as to his business and did not know what it was or whether he had any, that she understood he was a traveling salesman, and that she knew he had traveled for a varnish house. This state of evidence does not indicate commonly such a state of financial resourcefulness as accompanies the ownership of the kind and amount of jewelry and diamonds found in the possession of these defendants. The ordinary law-abiding man, whether artisan or of other occupation, who has not worked for a year and whose friends or family do not know his business, does not commonly carry about with him for personal use and adornment diamonds and other jewelry of $1,600 value, as did one of these defendants, or even of $600 value, as did the other defendant. Of course, this evidence, standing alone, does not prove criminal conduct. But there were strong accompanying circumstances of guilt of an independent character. As was said by Mr. Justice Holmes in Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, at pages 110, 111, 49 N. E. 94: "It is not necessary that every piece of evidence admitted should be sufficient by itself to prove the crime. Evidence which may be colorless if it stood alone may get a new complexion from other facts which are proved, and in turn may corroborate the conclusion which would be drawn from the other facts. . . . It is possible that" these defendants "may have had an independent fortune from which" these jewels were purchased, "but that was open to" them to prove if they "saw fit, and was not the probability with regard" to persons in their general situation.

Upon the authority of that decision and of Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Met. 534, 45 Am. Dec. 227, this evidence was admissible. If there is anything inconsistent with this conclusion in Williams v. United States, 168 U. S. 382, 396, 42 L. ed. 509, 514, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, it is equally inconsistent with our law as declared in the authorities just cited. Indeed, the soundness of the Federal decision has been doubted. See 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 154, p. 213.

The evidence was not too remote in time. It can hardly be said as matter of law that an interval of about two months had broken the reasonable probability of connection between the amount of booty secured by the burglary charged in the indictment and the possession of the jewels found upon the defendants at the time of their arrest.

It was not equivalent to the admission of evidence of another crime. That was not the ground on which it was received. The jury were not permitted to consider it in that connection. But the jury were instructed carefully to disregard this evidence upon the question of breaking and entering, and to consider it only if the breaking and entering were found to be proved by independent evidence, and even then only if it was found that the defendants "had no other source of income to account for the possession of the property found in their possession; and if they also found that the money and jewelry were the proceeds, or a part of the proceeds, of the property stolen from the Wallace residence, they might consider this evidence in so far as this property accounts for the defendants not having the specific articles stolen in their possession when arrested; that otherwise they were to disregard the evidence entirely."

No exception was taken to the charge. But the defendants have no just ground for complaint in the particulars which have been argued.

Exceptions overruled.

ANNOTATION.

Admissibility of evidence that one charged with burglary, larceny, or robbery was in possession of property not identified as part of that stolen.

- I. In general, 1213.
- II. To identify defendant, 1215.
- III. Where the other property is found in close connection with the property involved in the crime charged, 1219.
- IV. To show intent or system, 1220.

This note is confined to cases involving, as did the reported case (COM. v. COYNE, ante, 1209), evidence of the possession by defendant of specific chattels or items of personal property not identified as part of the property stolen, as distinguished from evidence which merely tends to show defendant's pecuniary condition before and after the crime charged, or the possession of money not earmarked or otherwise identified.

It may be observed at this point that in most of the cases involving possession of specific chattels the question of the admissibility of evidence has turned upon the admissibility of the general rule which excludes evidence of other crimes, or of the various exceptions to that rule. In the reported case (COM. v. COYNE, ante, 1209), however, the admission of the evidence is sustained, not upon the ground that it came within any of those exceptions, but apparently upon the principle which admits evidence of the financial or pecuniary condition of the defendant. Considering the number and variety of the articles of jewelry enumerated in the statement of facts, it would seem that the inference from their possession by defendant that they were acquired by other burglaries or larcenies would be at least as natural as that they were acquired with the proceeds of the property stolen at the time of the offense under prosecution. If so, there was danger, from a practical point of view at least, of prejudice.

Where evidence of possession by defendant of property other than that involved in the crime with which he is charged has no proper tendency to connect him with the crime charged, its only effect being to discredit defendant by showing or tending to show that he had been guilty of other crimes, such evidence should not be admitted.

Conversely, evidence of the possession of other property may be admitted where the circumstances are such that such evidence tends to prove the crime with which defendant was charged. Oxier v. United States (1896) 1 Ind. Terr. 85, 38 S. W. 331; State v. Castor (1887) 93 Mo. 242, 5 S. W. 906; State v. Prunty (1918) — Mo. —, 208 S. W. 91; Watters v. State (1906) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 94 S. W. 1038; State v. Norris (1902) 27 Wash. 453, 67 Pac. 983, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 197.

In Parker v. United States (1898) 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858, the court discusses the admission of testimony of the possession of property by a defendant other than that charged to have been stolen, and says that such testimony is admissible for either of four purposes: "(1) To prove felonious intent; (2) to prove that the alleged theft was a part of a continuous transaction or scheme of larceny; (3) to identify the defendant; (4) to identify the stolen property. In all of these cases, however, it must not only be shown that the defendant was found in possession of the property, and that it was stolen, but in addition thereto it must appear from the proof that there was some connection between it and the property charged in the indictment to have been stolen. If nothing be shown but that it was in the defendant's possession, then it is inadmissible in every case, because it tends to prove nothing but another and a separate and independent larceny. If, in addition to the fact that the stolen property was found in the possession of the defendant recently after the alleged larceny, it be shown that it had been stolen at or about the same time and place as that charged to have been stolen, then it is admissible in all of the cases, because, under the circumstances of each case, it tends to prove the matter in controversy. Cases arising under the first proposition are usually those where the taking by the accused of the alleged stolen property is admitted or clearly established, and the defense is interposed that it was taken under some claim of right or color of title, or through some mistake or misapprehension. In such case, for the purpose of proving the intent, the prosecution, in rebuttal, may show that at the time the defendant was found with the property in question he was in possession of other property stolen about the same time and place. Under the second proposition, it may be shown that the alleged stolen property was found in the possession of the defendant, together with a number of other stolen articles taken at different times and places not too remote from the time and place of the alleged larceny, not for the purpose of showing that the defendant is a common thief or of proving an independent crime against him, but as tending to show that the alleged taking was a part of a continuous transaction or scheme of larceny, and thus shedding light on the transaction in controversy. Cases arising under the third proposition are generally those where the larceny is admitted or established, and the defendant has been seen with the alleged stolen property, but under such circumstances as that he was not recognized by the witness; as, if he were a stranger to him, or was in disguise, or seen in the nighttime; or it may occur in cases where no one has seen the defendant in possession of the property alleged to have been stolen, but the circumstances point to his guilt without clearly identifying him. In such case, proof of other stolen property having been found in his possession shortly after the theft, taken about the same time and place, is admissible for the purpose of identifying him. . . . Cases arising under the fourth proposition usually occur when the alleged stolen property found in the possession of the defendant is similar to others of that class, but without marks of identification whereby it may be distinguished, or the brands and marks may have been destroyed, or the property so mutilated as to leave it without means of identification. In such cases proof that the defendant, recently after the larceny, was in possession of other stolen property taken about the same time and place, is admissible for the purpose of identifying that which is in controversy and found in his possession. If the property named in the indictment be shown to have been stolen, but the identity of that found in the possession of the defendant, claimed to be the stolen property, is in doubt, then the fact that he is found with other stolen property which had been taken from or about the same place and at the same time would so connect the two articles as that the identification of one would tend to identify the others; but if not taken from or about the same place, although it may have been taken at the same time, and found in the possession of the defendant, it would have no such tendency, and therefore for that purpose the proof of it would be inadmissible."

The applications of the exceptions above outlined will be shown in subsequent subdivisions of the note. In the meantime illustrations are given of the applications of the general rule itself.

II. To identify defendant.

In Tinney v. State (1895) 111 Ala. 74, 20 So. 597, it was held that, in a trial for the larceny of two hogs, it was error to show that the defendant had in his possession, along with the two hogs alleged to have been stolen, six others, some of which were without earmarks and others of which had marks differing from those involved in the case, as such evidence had no legitimate tendency to prove that defendant feloniously took and carried away the two hogs in question.

In State v. Brundige (1902) 118 Iowa, 92, 91 N. W. 920, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 164, a prosecution for the larceny of tobacco from a railroad car, it was held error to admit evidence that, when the sheriff searched defendant's house and found the tobacco, there were found in a private drawer belonging to defendant, two boxes, one of patent medicine and the other of candy, such articles not being with the tobacco. The court said: "It is true there was no evidence that the goods referred to were stolen, but it is perfectly clear that the testimony was offered for the purpose of having the jury infer that such was their character, and thereby strengthen the unfavorable inference arising from the presence of the tobacco in defendant's house. The incompetency, not to say unfairness, of such testimony is too manifest for argument."

In Hall v. People (1868) 6 Park. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 671, a prosecution for burglary, it was held erroneous to admit evidence that with the property taken at the burglary charged, which was found in defendant's possession, was found other property which had been stolen from other parties two or three weeks prior to the burglary in question, the court saying: "This proof had no direct tendency to show that the prisoner stole the property referred to in this indictment. It did not prove that the one who had stolen that had necessarily stolen this property. It showed, or tended to show, that the prisoner was a thief, and therefore more likely to have stolen this property than if he had been honest. If that proof were proper then the prosecution might, in the first instance, prove the bad character of a prisoner and thus show him more likely to have committed the crime charged. This, however, would not be contended for; yet the one kind of evidence is just as admissible as the other."

In People v. Friedman (1912) 149 App. Div. 873, 134 N. Y. Supp. 153, a prosecution for burglary and larceny of horses and harness, it was held to be error to admit evidence that several days after the crime charged an officer found upon defendant's farm a gray mare, not one charged in the indictment to have been stolen, and that he took possession of it and notified the chief of police, and as the result of a telegram a certain man came and took the horse away with him, it not appearing that there was the slightest relation between this incident and the crime charged in the indictment, which would bring it within any exception to the rule against the testimony of other crimes.

In Nixon v. State (1892) 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 205, 20 S. W. 364, a prosecution for the theft of a horse, it was held error to permit the state to prove that defendant was in the possession of and had sold other stolen horses about three weeks prior to the date of the theft charged in the indictment, the court saying: "This testimony did not tend to identify any fact or circumstance which could aid in developing the res gestæ, nor did it tend to prove system between the offense on trial and that introduced, nor did it develop a criminative fact or circumstance against defendant in relation to the case then on trial, nor did it explain a relative or competent fact or circumstance pertaining to the theft of the horses charged in the indictment."

In Marshall v. State (1893) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 22 S. W. 878, a prosecution for burglary, it was held error to permit the state to prove that one week before the burglary charged another burglary had been committed, and various articles taken, and that subsequent to defendant's arrest and incarceration the property taken in the other burglary was found in a trunk in his house, as such evidence in no way tended to connect defendant with the burglary charged.

In Wilson v. State (1899) 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 115, 51 S. W. 916, a prosecution for the theft of cattle, it was held to be error to permit a witness to testify that he had been employed by defendant to butcher a cow, and was requested by defendant to put the hide in some high weeds near the butcher-pen fence, where there was no evidence that the cow whose hide was hid by the witness was the one charged in the indictment to have been stolen, the court saying: "The fact that appellant may have stolen another cow, or any circumstance indicating that he had done so, unless it was contemporaneous with the taking of this one, on the question of intent, certainly would not be admissible on the trial of appellant in this case."

In McAnally v. State (1903) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 73 S. W. 404, a prosecution for burglary, evidence that when defendant was arrested certain articles were found in his possession which had been taken at a burglary on the preceding night, of a store in another town, was inadmissible, as such evidence tended to show an extraneous crime, and did not show in-

In Caddell v. State (1905) 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 133, 122 Am. St. Rep. 806, 90 S. W. 1013, a prosecution for the burglary of a store from which certain brands of tobacco were taken, it was held error to admit testimony that some ten days after the alleged burglary, several pounds of tobacco were found in defendant's bed between the mattresses, there being nothing in the testimony to show that the tobacco found in the bed belonged to any of the brands taken from the burglarized store, and nothing which in any way tended to connect this tobacco with that which was stolen.

In Gonzales v. State (1907) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 105 S. W. 196, it was held, in a prosecution for the burglarizing of a store and stealing of coffee, that it was error to permit an officer to specify that, when he searched the house where defendant resided, he failed to find any evidence of the stolen coffee, but that he found some shoes and other items, where there was no connection shown between the shoes and the property taken from the store in question, and such testimony did not tend to throw any light upon the transaction alleged in the indictment.

In Alford v. State (1908) 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 621, 108 S. W. 364, a prosecution for theft, where it was not claimed or contended that the articles stolen had been taken from a box car, it was error to admit evidence that when defendants were arrested they were trying to open a box car, and that, upon searching the premises, property was found which had apparently been taken from railroad cars.

In Pitts v. State (1910) 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 524, 132 S. W. 801, a prosecution for burglary, it was held that evidence showing a commission of a burglary some few days before the one charged, and that articles taken in the prior burglary were traced to the possession of a codefendant, had no relation to the pending case, and was inadmissible.

cow which defendant was accused of stealing was found in his possession and put in evidence, the putting in evidence of the hides of other cattle found in defendant's possession was erroneous, as having no relevancy to the crime charged, where defendant was a ranchman and cattleman, and the finding of hides on his premises was in itself not an unusual or suspicious circumstance, and the hide of the cow charged to have been stolen could have been put in evidence and all the circumstances of its possession by defendant shown, without showing a possession of or putting in evidence the other hide; and no evidence was adduced and no claim made that such other hides, or the animals from which they had been taken, had been stolen, or that defendant had wrongfully obtained possession of them, or that his taking or receiving them had anything to do or was in any wise connected with, or was a part of, the transaction charged.

And in State v. Humason (1893) 5 Wash. 499, 32 Pac. 111, where defendant was charged with participating in a larceny of certain cattle which he had slaughtered and entirely disposed of, it was error to permit the sheriff to show that a sack containing the marked ears of other cattle was in defendant's slaughterhouse, and that, upon its being discovered, defendant attempted to dispose of it, where such other cattle and carcasses of cattle had not been commingled with the cattle charged in the indictment to have been stolen, and there was no testimony that they were stolen cattle.

And in order to make admissible the testimony that defendant had in his possession property taken in the commission of a crime other than the one charged, the two offenses should be closely connected in time and place. Parker v. United States (1898) 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858; Webb v. State (1880) 8 Tex. App. 115; Denton v. State (1901) 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 427, 50 S. W. 670; Ivey v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 425.

So in Parker v. United States (1898) 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858, it appeared that two cattle other than those charged to have been stolen had been taken from other parties at about the same time as those of the prosecuting witness, and were found in the possession of the defendant with the cattle charged to have been stolen, but the court held that the evidence as to such other cattle was inadmissible, because there was no evidence that they were taken from or about the same place.

In Webb v. State (1880) 8 Tex. App. 115, it was held error to admit testimony that defendant had in his possession stolen animals other than the one taken at the larceny for which he was being prosecuted, where the two transactions were entirely separate.

In Denton v. State (1901) 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 427, 50 S. W. 670, a prosecution for burglary, where the court permitted introduction of testimony that two and one half months after the prosecuting witness had missed articles from the house charged to have been burglarized, other articles were taken from his butcher's shed, and that on the day the defendant was arrested witness saw articles which he believed to be the ones taken at that time, the court said: "This testimony was clearly inadmissible, since it is never permissible to introduce independent extraneous crimes against defendant unless independent extraneous crimes are contemporaneous with the commission of the theft for which he is then being tried; and even then, before they are admissible, it must be shown with a reasonable degree of certainty that defendant was guilty of the independent crimes."

And in Ivey v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 425, it was held that, in a prosecution for the theft of a steer, it was error to permit the state to prove that other stolen stock taken from the same neighborhood was found in the possession of defendants, as, to make such evidence admissible, it must be shown that the stolen stock and the steer in question were taken at the same time, and formed but one transaction.

tion for the robbery of a bank messenger, in which the court said that evidence that certain articles consisting of rings and a clock, which apparently had been stolen and were found in the room of one of the defendants, should not have been introduced, but it was held that, under the circumstances, their admission was not reversible error, where the testimony was apparently volunteered by a police officer who was testifying, and was admitted without objection.

And in Bright v. State (1903) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 74 S. W. 912, it was held that evidence that while one burglary was being investigated, property found in defendant's possession and taken at that burglary was found commingled with property taken at another burglary, and which defendant claimed to own, was properly admitted because, although ordinarily evidence of extraneous crimes is not admissible, it may be admitted when it tends to develop the res gestæ, show the intent of the party, or connect or tend to connect him with the crime under investigation.

In harmony with the exception which takes out of the general rule excluding evidence of other crimes, evidence which tends to aid in identifying the accused as the person who committed the particular crime under investigation, it is held that evidence of the possession by defendant of property other than that involved in the particular crime with which he is charged may be admitted, although it tends to show the commission of an independent crime, when the circumstances are such that its admission will tend to identify defendant with the crime charged. Yarborough v. State (1868) 41 Ala. 405; Reed v. State (1891) 54 Ark. 621, 16 S. W. 819; State v. Harris (1912) 153 Iowa, 592, 133 N. W. 1078; State v. Williams (1916) — Mo. —, 183 S. W. 308.

Thus, in Yarborough v. State (1868) 41 Ala. 405, a prosecution for the larceny of a horse and buggy, it was held proper to admit evidence that a mule which had been stolen from other parties on the same night was found in the possession of defendant, along with the property charged in the indictment, for the purpose of showing the identity of defendant, the court saying: "The evidence objected to by the prisoner was clearly admissible for the purpose we have stated; and we cannot place the court in error by making the intendment that it was admitted for any other than the legal purpose."

And in a prosecution for the larceny of a saddle it was held proper, for the purpose of identifying defendant as the party who stole the saddle, to admit evidence tending to show that other articles found attached to the saddle were stolen at another time, the court saying: "If these articles had been received by appellant lawfully, and found, as they were afterwards found, attached to the saddle in the possession of the appellant, these facts would have been circumstances tending to show that appellant was the person who took the saddle. If the evidence was competent for this purpose, it would not have been incompetent because it might have tended to show that appellant stole the saddle, pockets, stirrups, and girth." Reed v. State (1891) 54 Ark. 621, 16 S. W. 819.

In State v. Williams (1916) — Mo. —, 183 S. W. 308, a prosecution for robbery, it was held that testimony of a witness that the clothing worn by defendant when arrested belonged to him, and had been stolen from him the night of the robbery, was admissible because, when considered with other facts and circumstances in the case, it constituted evidence to show the presence of the defendant at or near the scene of the robbery a short time before its commission, and thus tended to establish the identity of the robber.

And in State v. Harris (1912) 153 Iowa, 592, 133 N. W. 1078, a prosecution for burglary, where an article stolen during such burglary was found under defendant's control, with other articles taken during burglaries both prior and subsequent to the one charged, it was held proper to admit testimony of one of the other parties who had been burglarized that defendant was the party who committed that burglary, such evidence being admissible for the purpose of indentifying accused as the person who committed the burglary charged in the indictment. It will be noted, however, that the objection here was to the admission of the direct evidence of the other burglary, rather than to the possession of the property stolen at that time.

And in State v. Norris (1902) 27 Wash. 453, 67 Pac. 983, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 197, a prosecution for burglary, where the state relied upon circumstantial evidence, and property taken from the place alleged to have been burglarized was found in the railroad car where defendants were found when arrested, and two of the defendants had already entered a plea of guilty, and the state sought to show that all the defendants had participated in the burglary, and therefore sought to trace the whereabouts of the men from the time of the burglary until the time of their arrest, it was competent for the state to show that the men were in the immediate vicinity of the crime charged, as bearing upon the possibility that they could have engaged in it; and therefore it was proper to admit evidence of other parties, whose house had been burglarized on the same night, that several men participated in the other burglary, and that property taken at that time was found in the car with the property taken at the burglary charged in the indictment.

III. Where the other property is found in close connection with the property involved in the crime charged.

Evidence of the possession of other property by defendant may be admissible because it is found in such close connection with the property involved in the crime charged that evidence regarding it is inseparable from evidence of possession of the property charged in the indictment; or because the fact appears incidentally and naturally in showing the whole transaction concerning the property involved in the prosecution. Ray v. State (1899) 126 Ala. 9, 28 So. 634; People v. Nicolosi (1893) 4 Cal. Unrep. 341, 34 Pac. 824; State v. Schaffer (1886)

70 Iowa, 371, 30 N. W. 639; State v. Robinson (1892) 35 S. C. 340, 14 S. E. 766; Hamilton v. State (1893) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 24 S. W. 32; Willingham v. State (1894) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 26 S. W. 834; Thornton v. State (1916) 80 Tex. Crim. Rep. 64, 188 S. W. 749.

Thus, in Ray v. State (1899) 126 Ala. 9, 28 So. 634, a trial for burglary in which a witness was produced by the state who had purchased the harness from defendant, which was alleged to have been taken at the time of the burglary, it was held that the witness was properly allowed to testify that defendant had two sets of harness, both of which he took out of a closet in a back room of his house and offered to sell either of them, the witness buying the one involved in the prosecution; as the conduct of defendant in dealing with the other harness was so inseparably connected with and interwoven into the transaction involving the negotiation, sale, and delivery of the said purchase that a reference to it and the set sold could hardly be avoided,—in fact, could not be avoided unless the witness only testified to a part of the transaction, and not to the whole of it.

In People v. Nicolosi (1893) 4 Cal. Unrep. 341, 34 Pac. 824, a prosecution for the larceny of a trunk which was found in defendant's possession, it was held that evidence of another trunk found with the one said to have been stolen was properly admitted, as against an objection that the evidence was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent and had a tendency to prove a commission of another crime, there being no evidence tending to prove that the other trunk had been stolen, it being merely described as one of the things discovered in close proximity to the stolen trunk, as were articles of clothing with which the trunks were covered.

In State v. Schaffer (1886) 70 Iowa, 371, 30 N. W. 639, a prosecution for larceny of a set of harness, it was held proper to admit evidence that some wire had been stolen from another person, and that the officers were searching defendant's premises for it under a search warrant when they discovered the harness and the wire hidden together, where the state, in making out a case, made no attempt to prove that the wire found in the building was the identical wire which had been stolen, but the evidence was offered as merely explanatory of the action of the officers in going upon the premises and making the search which resulted in finding the harness, such facts being incidental merely to the main facts which the state was seeking to establish, namely, the possession by the defendant of the stolen property described in the indictment.

In State v. Robinson (1892) 35 S. C. 340, 14 S. E. 766, a prosecution against several defendants for burglary, it was proper to admit as evidence goods proved to have been taken during another burglary, where such goods were found secreted in the same box with the goods taken at the burglary in question, as such property was inseparably connected with the transaction in question.

In Hamilton v. State (1893) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 24 S. W. 32, a prosecution for burglary, where it appeared that defendant and another went one night on a general stealing expedition among their neighbors, it was held proper to admit testimony that property other than that taken during the burglary charged was found in his possession and in the possession of his partner in crime.

In Willingham v. State (1894) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 26 S. W. 834, a prosecution for the theft of a horse, it was held proper to admit testimony tending to show that appellant was in the possession of about twenty other stolen horses, where the court properly charged the law applicable to the possession of the other stolen horses and limited the effect of the evidence by instructions.

In Thornton v. State (1916) 80 Tex. Crim. Rep. 64, 188 S. W. 749, a prosecution for burglary, it was held proper to admit evidence that, with the property taken at the time of the burglary as charged, other property was found belonging to other persons, which had been stolen, some on the same night and some on the night before the burglary charged.

In Watters v. State (1906) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 94 S. W. 1038, in answer to an objection against the admission of testimony showing the possession by defendant of other hides than those of the cattle charged to have been stolen, the court said: "This is a case depending on circumstantial evidence, and it was a circumstance against appellant to show that other hides than those of the animals alleged to have been stolen were found buried or concealed in appellant's little field of 18 or 20 acres. The more hides so found buried and concealed, the more cogent would the circumstances be against him in that respect."

In State v. Prunty (1918) — Mo. —, 208 S. W. 91, a prosecution for burglary, it was held to be proper to show that an automobile used in committing the burglary had been stolen, such evidence being competent to prove preparation beforehand by means of which the contemplated crime was committed and escape made, though such evidence tended to prove the commission of another independent crime, and, further, the possession by defendant of the stolen automobile together with the possession of the money stolen at the time of the burglary charged, and the carrying it away in the automobile so connected the two crimes and so related them that proof of one tended to prove the commission of the other by the same parties.

IV. To show intent or system.

Evidence of the possession of other property than that involved in the prosecution is frequently admitted for the purpose of showing the intent of defendant in doing the particular act charged against him as a crime, or as tending to show that such crime was part of a system of criminal acts. Myers v. People (1918) — Colo. —, 177 Pac. 145; Martin v. State (1912) 10 Ga. App. 795, 74 S. E. 304; People v. Clement (1918) 285 Ill. 614, 121 N. E. 213; State v. Balch (1896) 136 Mo. 103, 37 S. W. 808; State v. Franke

In Oxier v. United States (1896) 1 Ind. Terr. 85, 38 S. W. 331, the court said: "It is true that the possession of other stolen property by a defendant is competent in evidence against him upon a trial for larceny, when it connects him with the transaction of which he stands accused, not as tending to prove another offense, but that one; but before such testimony is admissible it must be shown that the property in his possession was stolen property."

So in Myers v. People (1918) — Colo. —, 177 Pac. 145, a prosecution for the larceny of a bicycle frame, it was held proper to admit testimony that other bicycle frames were found with the one charged to have been stolen, which were identified by various witnesses as frames which had been stolen in the same city at about the same time as the one charged in the information, notwithstanding the fact that the testimony tended to prove other offenses, it being admissible for the purpose of showing system, or motive, or intent to commit the crime charged in the indictment.

In Martin v. State (1912) 10 Ga. App. 795, 74 S. E. 304, a prosecution for the larceny of a harness in which reliance for conviction of the larceny was placed upon the fact of the harness stolen being found in defendant's possession, and accused claimed to be a bona fide purchaser thereof, it was held proper to admit evidence that twenty-two other sets of harness, many of which were also stolen at about the same time as those involved in the indictment, were found in the possession of defendant, as such evidence not only illustrated but illuminated the transaction at issue.

In People v. Clement (1918) 285 Ill. 614, 121 N. E. 213, a prosecution for larceny from the person, it was proper to admit in evidence the fact that defendant, upon being arrested, attempted to dispose of another pocketbook besides the one said to have been stolen, as it was a fair inference that the other pocketbook had also been stolen, and that defendant was engaged in picking pockets.

In State v. Balch (1896) 136 Mo. 103, 37 S. W. 808, a prosecution for robbery, it was held proper to admit evidence that when arrested defendant had in his possession property taken at the time of another robbery, this circumstance being corroborative of the inference of guilty possession of the particular property which he was charged with taking at the robbery for which he was under indictment.

In State v. Castor (1887) 93 Mo. 242, 5 S. W. 906, the court, in discussing the evidence against the defendant who was charged with larceny of articles which were found in his trunk, said: "Relative to other articles found in the possession of the defendant, if it had been established that they had been stolen, this fact would doubtless have greatly helped the case of the state . . . but no such proof was offered." And see State v. Flynn (1894) 124 Mo. 480, 27 S. W. 1105.

In State v. Franke (1900) 159 Mo. 535, 60 S. W. 1053, a prosecution for burglary and larceny, it was held proper to admit evidence that a gun which had been stolen from a house not far from that of defendant was found secreted in defendant's house such evidence being admissible as showing the guilty intent of defendant.

In Territory v. Caldwell (1908) 14 N. M. 535, 98 Pac. 167, a prosecution for the larceny of a calf, it was held proper to admit upon the question of intent, evidence that on the day the calf in question was found, and the day defendants were arrested, and the day following, the officers rounded up near the home of defendants about a dozen other calves, branded with defendants' brand, some of which were recognized as belonging to other people.

Crim. Rep. 337, 131 Pac. 1100, where defendant was charged with a larceny in which he was associated with another, the stolen property being found in the possession of the two, it was held proper also to prove that other stolen property was found in their possession, as such evidence strongly tended to show that a partnership in crime, of which the larceny of the property in question was a part, existed between the two.

In State v. Morris (1918) — Or. —, 175 Pac. 668, a prosecution for the larceny of horses in which the evidence tended to show that defendant rebranded the animals in such a manner as to alter the original brand, it was proper to show that other animals owned by other parties were also found in his possession or claimed by him, which exhibited evidence of having upon them worked-over brands similar to that used upon the animal in question, such evidence tending to show the commission of a system of crimes by unusual methods, as a single instance of rebranding might be attributed to a mistake as to the ownership, or to accident, or carelessness in branding in the first instance.

Likewise, in Cannon v. State (1919) —Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 208 S. W. 339, where defendant was charged with stealing a cow upon which it appeared that the brand had been changed, where the defense was that he took the cow and changed the brand under the belief of ownership, evidence of possession by him of another animal with the brand changed was held by a majority of the court to be admissible.

Such testimony is particularly appropriate where the defendant has testified and the testimony is offered in rebuttal. Perry v. People (1906) 38 Colo. 23, 87 Pac. 796; State v. Ditton (1878) 48 Iowa, 677; Davis v. State (1912) 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 322, 123 Pac. 560.

Thus, in Perry v. People (1906) 38 Colo. 23, 87 Pac. 796, where it appeared that a gun was found in the possession of defendant, along with articles charged in the indictment to have been stolen, and defendant testified that he had owned the gun for four years, it was proper to permit a witness to testify that his store was burglarized a few weeks previously and the gun was taken from the store at that time, such testimony being competent and relevant in rebuttal although it did tend to prove another larceny.

In State v. Ditton (1878) 48 Iowa, 677, where defendant was charged with the larceny of a horse and buggy, and claimed that he had found them and was in pursuit of the thief when arrested, evidence that other articles which had been taken the same night from a store a short distance from the barn from which the horse and buggy had been taken were found in the buggy when it was discovered, and that a box of cigars taken from the same store was found in the sleeve of a coat, which defendant admitted to be his, and which he had left at another place, as such testimony would establish the untruthfulness of a statement touching the pursuit of the thief, and connect him with the larceny.

And in a prosecution for the larceny of certain cattle where defendant's evidence tended to explain his possession of the cattle by purchase from others than the owner, it was competent in rebuttal to show his contemporaneous possession of other stolen cattle. Davis v. State (1912) 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 322, 123 Pac. 560.

But in People v. Vertrees (1866) 169 Cal. 404, 146 Pac. 890, a prosecution for burglary for the purpose of stealing papers which were to be used before a grand jury, it was held to be error to show that defendant had in his possession a forged check, the prosecution claiming that the testimony tended to exhibit the motive of defendant for the commission of the alleged burglary, as, there being no showing that there was any connection between the check and the crime for which defendant was on trial, and no showing that the check was given for any particular purpose, and as the alleged existence of the check was attributed to a time long after the disappearance of the papers involved in the burglary, such testimony had no relevancy as showing motive or for any other purpose.

And where, in a prosecution for the larceny of a horse, hearsay evidence of the theft of a saddle at about the same time and place that the theft of the horse occurred was admitted, but excluded upon motion of defendant, and thereafter evidence was admitted identifying, as belonging to another party, a saddle found in the possession of defendant at the same time that he was found in possession of the alleged stolen horse, it was error for the court to instruct the jury that such evidence should not be considered unless it tended to show the identity of the transaction of the theft of the horse or explain the intent of defendant, as such evidence was liable to prejudice defendant, especially when the attention of the jury was directed to it by the charge of the court. Neeley v. State (1889) 27 Tex. App. 315, 11 S. W. 376.

In Hunt v. State (1901) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 60 S. W. 965, a prosecution for burglary, it was held error to permit a witness to testify that he missed some property which he found in the house of defendant's mother where defendant and his two brothers lived, as such evidence tended to show the theft of other articles of property from other and different sources, and at no specific time, and was not admissible for the purpose of showing intent or for the purpose of showing a system of crimes, or as a part of the res gestæ, the court saying: "The fact that a crime was committed on the same evening that the schoolhouse was burglarized would not of itself authorize the admission of this testimony. There must be some evidence showing it illustrates the intent with which appellant acted in the commission of the offense on trial. A party may commit two separate and distinct offenses the same day, both of which would be thefts or burglary, yet if they were separate, distinct, and independent crimes, in no way connected with or illustrative of the intent of appellant, the mere fact of their being contemporaneous would not of itself make them admissible. In other words, if appellant introduced any evidence showing a lack of criminal intent in the case on trial, then, if contemporaneous thefts were committed that would demonstrate the intent with which appellant acted in the case on trial, then the contemporaneous theft would be admissible. But clearly, if it has no connection, dependence upon, or does not illustrate the offense on trial, it would not be admissible."

In Johnson v. State (1906) 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 116, 96 S. W. 45, a prosecution for burglary, it was held error to permit evidence that when defendant was arrested he had in his possession other articles taken at other times, inasmuch as they had no bearing on the case then being tried, either as a part of the res gestæ or to show intent or system.

And where the intent with which a burglary was committed was not disputed by the evidence, it was held error to admit evidence of the possession by some of the defendants of property taken at the burglary of another house. It would be otherwise, if there had been any evidence in the case that the parties entered the house they were charged with burglarizing accidentally or inadvertently, for then the fact that they had, contemporaneously with the entry of said house, feloniously burglarized another house, would be admissible on a question of intent. Herndon v. State (1907) 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 552, 99 S. W. 558.

The number and nature of the articles found in the possession of the defendant in the reported case (COM. v. COYNE, ante, 1209) were such that it would seem that the inference that they were the fruits of other burglaries would be as natural and reasonable as that they were the fruits of the burglaries in question, and, if so, the admission of the evidence would involve some danger of prejudice to the defendant which would not have obtained if the evidence had merely tended to show the defendant's financial condition or the possession of considerable sums of money by him after the offense charged. The trial court, however, apparently guarded as far as possible against the use of the evidence as a basis of an inference of the commission of other crimes by the defendant, strengthening the probability of his guilt of the offense charged, by instructing the jury in effect that they were not to consider the evidence in that connection, but only as the basis of an inference that the articles were acquired by the fruits of the property taken at the time of the offense charged.

GRAND COUNTY, Appt.

Tax — mothers' pensions — public purpose.

1. The court cannot declare that a tax levied for the purpose of pensioning mothers, that they may surround their young children with home influences, is not for a public purpose.

Constitutional law — duty of courts.

2. It is the duty of courts, in determining the constitutionality of an act, to resolve every doubt in favor of its constitutionality.

Tax — amount — limitation.

3. A legislature which has limited a county's taxing power to the levy of 5 mills on the dollar of valuation, for general county purposes, and 1 mill additional for poor relief, authorizes an additional levy by enacting a statute permitting a tax for mothers' pensions.

Courts — power over legislative discretion.

4. The wisdom or desirability of providing pensions for dependent mothers is peculiarly within the power of the legislature, with which the courts are not at liberty to interfere.

[See 7 R. C. L. 1049.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Grand County (Christensen, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to have been unlawfully collected by defendant, under an act known as the Dependent Mothers' Act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Knox Patterson, for appellant:

The county commissioners under the statute had authority to make the levy, which was for a public purpose.

Messrs. Van Cott, Allison & Riter, B. R. Howell, and W. Q. Van Cott, for respondent:

Levying a tax pursuant to the De-

about the 16th day of November, 1914, respondent paid the dependent mothers' tax under written protest to the county treasurer of Grand county, together with $100.64 accrued interest on the same, and $2.75 costs of advertisement, sale, and redemption certificate.

Conclusions of law were made from the foregoing agreed facts that Grand county was without authority to levy such dependent mothers' tax, and that the tax was illegal and void; that the officers of the county, charged with the duty to enter tax levies and collect the same, were without power or authority to enter such levy on the assessment rolls, or to assess respondent's property with such tax, or to collect taxes from respondent based on such levy. Judgment was entered in favor of respondent for the amount paid, together with the accumulated interest and costs of the action. From that judgment Grand county appeals to this court.

"Section 1. It shall be the duty of the county commissioners of each county in this state, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to provide funds in an amount sufficient to meet the purposes of this law, but not exceeding in any one year the sum of ten thousand dollars, such funds to be expended for the partial support of mothers who are dependent upon their own efforts for the maintenance of their children.

"Sec. 2. The allowance to each of such mothers shall not exceed ten dollars a month when she has but one child under the age of fifteen years, and if she has more than one child under the age of fifteen years it shall not exceed the sum of ten dollars a month for the first child and five dollars a month for each of the other children under the age of fifteen years.

"Sec. 3. Such allowance shall be made by the county commissioners, except in counties having a population of one hundred and twenty-five thousand or more. The authority, power, and duty of determining upon allowance to be made under the provisions of this act shall devolve upon and be exercised by the juvenile judge of the district in and for such counties. Such allowance shall be made only upon the following conditions: (1) The child or children for whose benefit the allowance is made must be living with the mother of such child or children. (2) The allowance shall be made only when in the absence of such allowance a mother would be required to work regularly away from her home and children, and when by means of such allowance she will be able to remain at home with her children. (3) The mother must, in the judgment [judgment] of the county commissioners or juvenile court, be a proper person morally, physically and mentally, for the bringing up of her children. (4) Such allowance shall, in the judgment [judgment] of the county commissioners or juvenile court, be necessary to save the child or children from neglect. (5) No persons [person] shall receive the benefit of this act who shall not have been a resident of the county in which such application is made for at least two years next before the making of such application of such allowance.

"Sec. 4. Whenever any child shall reach the age of fifteen years, any allowance made the mother of such child for the benefit of such child shall cease. The county commissioners or juvenile court may, in their discretion, at any time before such child reaches the age of fifteen years, discontinue or modify the allowance to any mother and for any child.

"Sec. 5. Should the fund herein authorized be sufficient to permit an allowance to only a part of the persons coming within the provisions of this law, the county commissioners of juvenile court shall select those cases in most urgent need of such allowance."

Respondent contends that such statute, authorizing the assessment, levy, and collection of a dependent mothers' tax, is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it takes private property for other than a public purpose; that the act is discriminatory and favors a class, and is, therefore, in violation of article 14, § 1, of the Federal Constitution, and of article 1, § 7, of the Utah Constitution. Respondent also contends that the tax is illegal and without authority, as being in excess of the taxing limit fixed by Comp. Laws 1907, § 2593.

We shall consider these contentions in the order named.

By article 6, § 1, of the Constitution, the legislative power of the state is vested in the legislature thereof. It is provided by article 13, § 3, of the Constitution, that the legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment, and shall prescribe by general law such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, etc. Section 5 of the same article gives to counties, cities, towns, and other municipal corporations the power to assess and collect taxes for all purposes of such corporations, and is in the following language: "The legislature shall not impose taxes for the purpose of any county, city, town or other municipal corporation, but may by law vest in the corporate authorities thereof, respectively, the power to assess and collect taxes for all purposes of such corporation."

It is conceded that the phrase, "for all purposes of such corporation," includes every object or purpose for which a tax may be legally levied. In other words, the expression is synonymous with the phrase generally used by text-writers and courts,—"public purposes." We have, then, to determine in this case whether the object for which the tax in question was levied, as set out in the act, can be upheld as for a "public purpose."

The determination of that question is not without difficulty. The authorities on such or like questions are not in harmony. What may or may not be termed a "public purpose" is not easily defined and no definition has as yet been framed that will fit all conditions or provisions of legislation. That the objects of the act now under consideration were beneficent, and, in the judgment of the lawmakers, to the best interests of the state, will not be questioned; and yet the determination of the legality or constitutionality of the act must be based upon some recognized rule of construction that would authorize the legislature to appropriate the public funds for the purposes mentioned in the act. We are not prepared to hold that the legislature might not provide for the appropriation of public funds for the purposes stated. To do so would be to hold that the legislature has exceeded its authority, as that authority is limited by the common acceptance of the meaning of the phrase, "public purpose." It will be conceded, we take it, that the proper rearing and bringing up of children, their education, their moral welfare, can all be subserved better by giving to such children the companionship, control, and management of their mothers than by any other system devised by human ingenuity. The object of the act is to provide means whereby mothers who are otherwise unable may be enabled to give such attention and care to their children of tender years as their health, education, and comfort require. The act further provides that no such money shall be appropriated or given unless the mother is a fit person, morally and physically, to be intrusted with the rearing of young children, and that only during the years when the children are unable to determine right from wrong, or to earn a livelihood. The act having for its object the better care and training, mental and physical, of children who are to become the citizens of the state, would at least, leave the constitutionality of such act doubtful, and it is the duty of courts, in determining the constitutionality of any act, to resolve every doubt in favor of its constitutionality.

We are not prepared to hold that the act, in effect, does not define and declare a policy of the state, nor that it is not within the province of the legislature to so define and declare a state policy. Having in mind the public welfare by assisting in surrounding children of tender years with home associations, with the care and nurture of their natural protector, the mother, the legislature, by this act, has determined that to be a policy of the state. Such being the object of the act this court would not be justified in declaring the act invalid, and that the funds so used are not used for a public purpose.

The principle or rule that should guide the court in determining the constitutionality of any legislative act is lucidly and well stated by the supreme court of Missouri in Ex parte Loving, 178 Mo. at page 203, 77 S. W. at page 509, quoting from other decisions of that court in the following language: "It is the duty of the courts to uphold a legislative act unless it plainly and clearly violates the Constitution, and, if its language is susceptible of a meaning that will remove the objections to its validity, such interpretation should be adopted. 'A legislative intent to violate the Constitution is never to be assumed, if the language of the statute can be satisfied by a contrary construction.' Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 178. It is our duty to uphold the act unless it plainly and clearly violates the fundamental law of the state, and, if its language is susceptible of a meaning that will remove the objections to its validity, such interpretation should be adopted."

In Booth v. Woodbury, 32 Conn. 118, it is said: "In the first place, if it be conceded that it is not competent for the legislative power to make a gift of the common property, or of a sum of money to be raised by taxation, where no possible benefit, direct or indirect, can be derived therefrom, such exercise of the legislative power must be of an extraordinary character to justify the interference of the judiciary; and this is not that case. Second, if there be the least possibility that making the gift will be promotive in any degree of the public welfare, it becomes a question of policy, and not of natural justice, and the determination of the legislature is conclusive. And such is this case. Such gifts to unfortunate classes of society, as the indigent blind, . . . colleges or schools, or grants of pensions, swords, or other mementoes for past services, involving the general good indirectly and in slight degree, are frequently made and never questioned."

In Broadhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 624, 88 Am. Dec. 711, the supreme court of that state said: "To justify the court in arresting the proceedings and declaring the tax void, the absence of all possible public interest in the purposes for which the funds are raised must be clear and palpable,—so clear and palpable as to be perceptible by every mind at the first blush."

To the same effect is the decision of this court in the recent case of Rio Grande Lumber Co. v. Drake, — Utah, —, L.R.A.1918A, 1193, 167 Pac. 241, wherein Mr. Justice Thurman, speaking for the court, says: "It is a fundamental rule in construing a statute, when its validity is challenged on constitutional grounds, that the courts will not consider mere questions of policy or expediency. These are matters of legislation, and belong to the legislative department of government. . . . For the judiciary to dictate in matters of policy and expediency, and seek to nullify acts of the law-making body because it conceives that such acts are impolitic or unnecessary, would be just as flagrant a violation of the Constitution as would be an act of the legislature which would deprive a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

the power to levy taxes for the purposes mentioned in this act is removing practically every limitation upon the taxing power of the legislature. That does not necessarily follow: but should the time ever come when the electors, through ignorance or want of sufficient interest in their public officers, fail to check any extravagance or waste of the public funds through acts of their chosen representatives in the legislature, then any limitation that the court might attempt to throw around the right of the taxing power would prove abortive and be easily evaded. The chief safeguard against extravagance or marked delinquency of any system must be found in the knowledge and rectitude of the people, and in the honesty and intelligence of their representatives.

We must, therefore, while admitting the question is not free from doubt, resolve that doubt in favor of the power of the legislature to authorize the expenditure as provided in the act in question.

What has been said above answers the second objection urged by respondent against the validity of the tax in question.

The further contention that the tax is excessive, as being in excess of the maximum allowed by Comp. Laws 1907, § 2593, cannot be sustained. That section, which has been in force in this state practically since statehood, reads: "The board of county commissioners of each county must, between the first Monday in July and the second Monday in August in each year, fix the rate of county taxes, and designate the number of mills on each dollar of valuation of property for each fund, and must levy taxes upon the taxable property of the county not exceeding five mills on the dollar for general county purposes, and may levy a tax not exceeding one mill on the dollar additional for the care, maintenance, and relief of the indigent sick and otherwise dependent poor, and not exceeding four

It is a matter of common knowledge, and one that the legislature must have known and had in mind when it enacted the law complained of, in 1913, that every county in the state needed and had been levying taxes for the purposes mentioned in § 2593, supra, up to the full limit permitted thereby. Therefore, it must have been the intention of the legislature, when it enacted the law directing the county commissioners of each county to provide funds, etc., that such commissioners should provide such funds by

within their power, namely, levying an additional tax on the property in such county. If any other view be taken, then we must assume that the legislature intended the act in question to be stillborn, and of no effect. That we may not do. The only way, therefore, it may be given effect is to treat it as the last expression of the legislature upon the subject treated in § 2593, supra. Instead of expressing the limitation in mills, or in fractions thereof, the amount that can be raised by taxation for the purposes mentioned in the act is specifically limited. There is, therefore, a limitation beyond which the county commissioners may not go, precisely as contemplated in § 2593, supra.

We are not to be understood as holding that any act of the legislature, authorizing the expenditure of public funds for every purpose, could or should be permitted by the courts. We are simply determining in this case that the question is so close, and not free from difficulty of determination, that we are resolving that doubt in favor of the policy established by the legislature, and we are not expressing any opinion as to the wisdom or desirability of such policy. That is peculiarly within <sup>Courts — power</sup> the province of the <sup>over legislative</sup> legislature, and any error of law that leads to extravagance, or fraud, or imposition upon the public can be easily corrected by the people themselves through their representatives.

We are not unmindful that many courts of the highest authority, and whose judgments are entitled to great weight and respect, have stated rules or elucidated principles which might, by analogy, seem to hold contrary to the views herein expressed; but considering the purposes of the act, and the safeguards thrown around the appropriation of the funds, we do not feel justified in holding it beyond the power of the legislature.

It follows from the foregoing that the case should be reversed and remanded to the District Court, with directions to make conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and enter judgment dismissing the complaint. Such is the order. Appellant to recover costs.

NOTE.

The decision in the reported case (DENVER & R. G. R. Co. v. GRAND COUNTY, ante, 1224), is of especial interest in connection with the annotation following RE SNYDER, post, 1233, in that it points out in apt terms the object of Mothers' Pension Acts, and declares that such an act outlines the policy of the state. For other cases which discuss the principles upon which such acts are based, see I. a, in the annotation referred to.

DENVER & R. G. R. Co. v. GRAND COUNTY is also of interest for its holding that a provision in a Mothers' Pension Act for the levying of a tax is not violative of a general Tax Limit Act, although it increases the total tax to an amount in excess of the limit fixed thereby. This question is also treated in I. e, of the annotation beginning post, 1233.

RE PETITION OF MRS. ROSE SNYDER, Appt.

Constitutional law — validity of mothers' pensions — inequality.

1. Granting pensions to widowed mothers and those whose husbands are confined in institutions, or unable because of total disability to support their families, and withholding them from mothers who have been abandoned by their husbands, does not unconstitutionally grant any unequal privileges and immunities or deny the equal protection of the laws.

Pension — vested right.

2. A mother has no vested right in a pension granted her by the state which will prevent its withdrawal at the pleasure of the public authorities.

[See 21 R. C. L. 242, 243.]

APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Superior Court for King County denying her a mother's pension. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. Wright Arnold for appellant.
Messrs. Alfred H. Lundin, Frank P. Helsell, W. F. Meier, and Joseph A. Barto, amici curiæ:

No person has a vested legal right to a pension, which is merely a bounty which the government may give, withhold, distribute, or recall at its direction.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Act of March 24, 1913 (Laws 1913, p. 644), commonly known as the Mothers' Pension Act, provided for an allowance out of the county treasury to certain destitute mothers whose husbands were dead, or were inmates of penal institutions, or who had been abandoned by their husbands and such abandonment had continued for a period of more than one year. In 1915 (Laws 1915, p. 364) the act was repealed and a new act passed, which provided for allowances only in cases where the husband is dead, or confined in a penal institution or insane hospital, or whose husband through total disability is unable to support his family, making no provision for a case of abandonment.

While the Act of 1913 was in force the petitioner, Rose Snyder, made application to the proper authorities of King county for an allowance, basing her claim upon the fact that she had been abandoned by her husband, which abandonment had continued for more than one year. Her claim was allowed, and she was paid a fixed allowance until the repeal of the statute by the going into effect of the Act of 1915. After that time she applied by petition to the juvenile court for a renewal of the allowance, again basing her claim upon the ground that she had been abandoned by her husband. The petition was disallowed, and a judgment rendered dismissing the application. This appeal is prosecuted therefrom.

The appellant attacks the law of 1915 on the ground of constitutionality. She argues that it contravenes § 12 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that no law shall be passed granting to any citizen or class of citizens, or corporations other than municipal, privileges and immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations, and also that part of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall make or enforce laws which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The specific objection is that the law makes an arbitrary selection of its beneficiaries, since it includes indigent mothers whose husbands are dead, or incarcerated in penal or insane institutions, or whose husbands are unable because of total disability to support their families, but excludes mothers whose husbands have abandoned them.

In support of the objections her attorney presents an able brief on the principles to be applied by the courts in determining whether or not an act of the legislature falls under the constitutional ban of class legislation. But while we agree with his presentation in the abstract we cannot think the principles contended for have application here. In the first place the Act of 1913 did not provide pensions for all classes of indigent mothers, and is, in consequence, as susceptible to the constitutional objection of class legislation as is the Act of 1915. Any rule of law, therefore, which would destroy the Act of 1915 on this ground would destroy all previous legislation on the subject, thus leaving the applicant utterly without remedy in any event.

In the second place, the state may care for its indigent and poor in any manner it pleases. What scheme will be adopted is wholly within the discretion of the legislature. That body may provide, without violating any provision of the Constitution, that certain classes shall be cared for by regular allowances from the county treasury, while others may receive intermittent allowances, or be cared for at almshouses or poor farms maintained for the purpose. No individual or class of individuals can acquire a vested right to be cared for in any particular manner. Indeed, the state is under no legal obligation to care for its poor at all. While it undoubtedly has a moral obligation to do so, there is no such obligation as can be enforced in law. Such relief as it does provide is legally in the nature of a largess or bounty, which may be discontinued at the legislative will.

vested right.

In the case before us the legislature probably discontinued pensions to indigent mothers whose husbands had abandoned them because it concluded that to grant such pensions was not in accord with sound public policy. But whatever may have been its motive, there is no question as to its right and power to discontinue such pensions, and no former beneficiary can legally complain.

The judgment is affirmed.

Morris, Ch. J., and Mount and Ellis, JJ., concur.

Chadwick, J., concurring:

The suggestion that the act of the legislature amending the Mothers' Pension Bill violates article 1, § 12, of the state Constitution, and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, will not bear discussion. Those sections of our Constitution apply only to rights sounding in contract, or which become vested rights under some rule of the common law or a statute which partakes of the nature of a contract.

" . . . Vested rights never grow out of gratuitous favor. Only those who can ground their claims in some contract, express or implied, or upon some right guaranteed by the common law, are heard to assert such rights. Neither element exists in this case." Whitaker v. Clausen, 57 Wash. 268-271, 106 Pac. 745.

"No pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension. Pensions are the bounties of the government, which Congress has the right to give, withhold, distribute, or recall, at its discretion." United States v. Teller, 107 U. S. 64-68, 27 L. ed. 352-354, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39.

"The right of recovery being dependent upon the statute, it is within the power of the legislature to limit the amount of the recovery to any sum it sees fit." Longfellow v. Seattle, 76 Wash. 509-514, 136 Pac. 855.

And we may add, to any person it sees fit, for, as said in Frisbie v. United States, 157 U. S. 160-166, 39 L. ed. 657-659, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586: "Congress, being at liberty to give or withhold a pension, may prescribe who shall receive it, and determine all the circumstances and conditions under which any application therefor shall be prosecuted. No man has a legal right to a pension. . . . The whole control of that matter is within the domain of congressional power. United States v. Hall, 98 U. S. 343, 25 L. ed. 180."

The supreme court of Illinois refused to give a similar statute the character of a remedial statute in the absence of clear and apt language, notwithstanding the contention that in construing an act that may have been intended to be retrospective in its application, the courts will resolve the doubt in favor of the individual, resorting to contemas though it were a matter of contract or vested right, while, in fact, it is a mere matter of largess or bounty. A pension is a bounty springing from the graciousness and appreciation of sovereignty. It may be given or withheld at the pleasure of a sovereign power. Because one is placed upon a pension and the pension cease." Eddy v. Morgan, 216 Ill. 437-449, 75 N. E. 174.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, December 9, 1918, in (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1918-19, p. 171) 248 U. S. 539, 63 L. ed. —, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67.

"Mothers' " Pension Acts.

I. Constitutionality:

- a. In general, 1233.
- b. Sufficiency of title, 1233.
- c. Class legislation, 1234.
- d. Limitation of jurisdiction, 1234.

I. Constitutionality.

a. In general.

In Cass County v. Nixon (1917) 35 N. D. 601, L.R.A.1917C, 897, 161 N. W. 204, in discussing the general question of proof and constitutionality of Mothers' Pension Acts, the court said that such laws are "founded upon sound, most progressive, and scientific principles of public policy," that they are "in the deepest interests of the public good and welfare," and the "protection and perpetuity of the state itself," and that the "public policy" of such laws is "the protection of the public health and the elimination of an environment which has a tendency to weaken the moral fiber of those of tender years."

And again in DENVER & R. G. R. Co. v. GRAND COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 1224, it was held that the Utah Dependent Mothers' Act (Laws 1913, chap. 90), since it had for its object the better care and training, mentally and physically, of the dependent children of indigent mothers, in effect declared the policy of the state as regards the public welfare of such children.

II. Construction and application:

which provides for the payment of pensions to certain mothers of dependent children, regardless of their financial condition, has been held invalid on the ground that it violates the theory upon which pension systems of the character under consideration must be sustained, namely, that the state owes a duty to take care of its unfortunates who are unable to care for themselves, and that the taxpayers are not required to help pay pensions to those fully capable of maintaining themselves, but who happen to be mothers with dependent children. State v. Buckstegge (1916) 18 Ariz. 277, 158 Pac. 837.

b. Sufficiency of title.

An act entitled, "An Act Providing for an Old Age and Mothers' Pension and Making Appropriation Therefor," and which provided for the establishment, both of an old age and mothers' pension and for the abolishment of the system of almshouses and poor farms, has been held to violate a constitutional provision requiring that the subject of an act shall be expressed in its title, it being maintained that the title was not as broad as the legislation in that it did not disclose the important subject of abolishment of the system of caring for the poor and substitution therefor of a system which would include, because of its limitation as to persons included in its benefits, only a small part of the persons dependent upon the counties for assistance. State v. Buckstegge (1916) 18 Ariz. 277, 158 Pac. 837.

In Re Rumsey (1918) — Neb. —, 167 N. W. 66, however, the objections that the provisions of the Constitution that no bill shall contain more than one subject and that the same shall be entirely expressed in its title were violated, because the title provided for pensions for "mothers and guardians," whereas, it was contended, the body of the act provided a pension for the parent of any child or children; because the title provided a pension for dependent and neglected children, whereas the act itself provided a pension for dependent or neglected children; and because the act provided a pension for those who are liable to become dependent or neglected, and not those who are already dependent or neglected,—were held not to be well taken. The court said that the provisions of the act referred to in these objections are found in the first section, which only regulates the substance of the petition that must be filed in order to obtain the action of the court; and that it is the second section that provides for the relief, and the provision there is that if the court finds "that the petitioner is poor and unable to properly care for such child or children, but otherwise is a proper guardian, and that it is for the welfare of the child or children to remain at home under the guardianship of their mother or guardian, the court may make an order finding such facts and fixing the amount of money necessary to enable the petitioner to properly care for such child or children." The court further observed that as the application was made by the mother it was unnecessary to determine under what circumstances the father of the children might be entitled to a pension; and that if he is "the proper guardian" he comes within the provisions of § 2.

c. Class legislation.

In RE SNYDER (reported herewith) ante, 1230, it was held that Washington Laws 1915, p. 364, which amended Laws 1913, p. 644, by withholding pensions from abandoned mothers, did not thereby grant any unequal privileges and immunities or deny the equal protection of the law, the court maintaining that the relief granted under such laws is in the nature of a largess or bounty, which may be discontinued at the pleasure of the legislature.

d. Limitation of jurisdiction.

In Cass County v. Nixon (1917) 35 N. D. 601, L.R.A.1917C, 897, 161 N. W. 204, it was contended that the North Carolina Mothers' Pension Act, which confers jurisdiction upon the county court, is unconstitutional because it attempts to confer upon that court powers not granted by § 111 of the Constitution, which declares that "the county court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in probate and testamentary matters, the appointment of administrators and guardians, the settlement of the accounts of executors and administrators and guardians, the sale of lands by executors, administrators, and guardians, and such other probate jurisdictions as may be conferred by law." The court, however, held that the contention was not well founded, and observed in this connection that the persons to be protected and benefited by the act are minors of tender years, whose natural guardians are unable to furnish them the absolute necessities of life; and that such minors and their estates are proper subjects of guardianship. It was also held that the act does not violate the constitutional provision relating to the separation of judicial and administrative functions, since the powers so conferred, while they partake in no small degree of the nature of administrative duties, are in fact judicial in their nature. The Chief Justice, in a concurring opinion, said that in his opinion the word "probate," as used in the clause, "such other probate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law," does not merely apply to proof of wills, but is much more comprehensive in its terms, and is intended to include such powers as are usually exercised by probate and county courts. Christianson, J., who concurred specially, was not entirely satisfied that the duties imposed upon the county court by the act fall within the "probate jurisdiction" conferred upon those courts by § 111; and it seemed to him that the duties imposed are neither wholly administrative nor wholly judicial, but rather that they are of such a nature as to permit the legislature to choose such instrumentality as it deems best to carry out its will.

c. Tax provisions.

It has been held that a Mothers' and Guardians' Pension Law does not violate a constitutional provision which limits the aggregate amount of taxes which county authorities may assess, where there is nothing in the Pension Law which warrants the assumption that the allowance of pensions thereunder will necessarily cause the tax assessors to exceed the constitutional limit. Re Rumsey (1918) — Neb. —, 167 N. W. 66.

And in DENVER & R. G. R. Co. v. GRAND COUNTY (reported herewith) ante, 1224, it was held that the Utah Dependent Mothers' Act of 1913 was not illegal as violative of a statutory provision fixing a tax limit on counties, even though it must be assumed that the legislature, in enacting the same, knew that the levying of the tax provided therein would increase the total taxes to an amount in excess of the limit fixed by the General Tax Limit Act.

So, it has been held that the levying of taxes for pensions for indigent mothers having dependent children of tender years is for a public purpose, within the meaning of a constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property for other than a public purpose. DENVER & R. G. R. Co. v. GRAND COUNTY.

And that a tax for a mothers' pension fund is a tax for ordinary county purposes, and, while not subject to reduction, is one which must be considered when taxes for other county purposes are being scaled to come within the legal limit, or certified for extension of such limit, see People ex rel. Stuckart v. Chicago, L. S. & E. R. Co. (1915) 270 Ill. 477, 110 N. E. 720; People ex rel. Stuckart v. New Jersey Sandberg Co. (1918) 282 Ill. 245, 118 N. E. 469; and People ex rel. Stuckart v. Klee (1918) 282 Ill. 440, 118 N. E. 754.

f. Relation to Poor Laws.

The objection that the Nebraska Mothers' and Guardians' Pension Law is in conflict with the constitutional requirement that when statutes are amended the section amended shall be repealed, which was predicated upon the idea that the act is an amendment of the Nebraska Poor Law, was answered by the court in Re Rumsey (1918) — Neb. —, 167 N. W. 66, by the statement that the Poor Laws neither cover nor attempt to cover the idea of assisting a worthy and competent mother to properly care for herself and children, and that the subject of the act is entirely distinct from the subjects of the various statutes for supporting the poor.

Nor does the general statutory system of Minnesota, which provides for the poor, itself either curtail the legislature in enacting, or prevent the enforcement of, a law providing for the granting of pensions to mothers. State ex rel. Stearns County v. Klasen (1913) 123 Minn. 382, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 597, 143 N. W. 984.

But an Old Age and Mothers' Pension Act which abolishes almshouses and substitutes a pension system, if it includes state institutions, is violative of a constitutional provision providing for the establishment and support by the state of institutions for the benefit of the insane, etc., "and such other public institutions as the public good may require." State v. Buckstegge (1916) 18 Ariz. 277, 158 Pac. 837.

a. In general.

Where a Mothers' Pension Act affords relief to dependent children of a mother to whom the act is applicable, it has been held that there is no error or impropriety in entertaining a joint application for relief in behalf of such children. State ex rel. Stearns County v. Klasen (1913) 123 Minn. 382, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 597, 143 N. W. 984.

And it has been held that the relief provided by the Minnesota Mothers' Pension Law of 1913 is not a matter of purely local municipal concern, but applies to all counties, towns, and cities, including counties wherein the town system of caring for the poor prevails, as well as cities which maintain their own pauper systems. Ibid.

A child dependent upon the public for support is a dependent child within the meaning of the Minnesota Mothers' Pension Law of 1913, though the sole reason for such dependency is the financial inability of its parents to support it, and though there is neither delinquency upon the part of the child nor other unfitness upon the part of the parent. State ex rel. Stearns County v. Klasen (1913) 123 Minn. 382, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 597, 142 N. W. 984. In this case it was said that the state as parens patriæ has the power to assume or provide for the custody and control of a child upon the sole ground of the financial inability of the parent to support it, whenever the breach of parental trust thus involved constitutes a menace to the fundamental welfare of the child, and consequently that delinquency or unfitness upon the part of the child itself is not essential.

But where a Mothers' Pension Act provides that it shall not apply to a child having property of its own sufficient for its support, and the statutes provide for the sale of a minor's real estate when necessary for his or her support, and real estate has been left to children subject to the widow's dower interest, she can claim no pension under the act until such land is disposed of according to law and the proceeds exhausted in caring for such children. Buster v. Marion County (1917) 84 Or. 624, 165 Pac. 1168.

And a mother is not entitled to an allowance for the support of herself and children under an act entitling every widow who has children under the age of sixteen years to such an allowance where they are dependent wholly upon her labor for support, if her application shows that the husband left an estate consisting partly of life insurance, and it does not appear that either of the children were necessarily dependent upon her labor for support. Badura v. Multnomah County (1918) 87 Or. 446, 170 Pac. 938.

A divorced woman, the mother of dependent children, whose father is living, has been held not to be a "widow" within the meaning of an Iowa Pension Act, providing that if the mother of dependent children is a widow and unable to properly care for them, certain financial allowances should be made to her, especially where the statute provides that certain classes of women whose husbands are living shall be regarded as widows, but does not mention divorced women. Debrot v. Marion County (1914) 164 Iowa, 208, 145 N. W. 467.

And a Mothers' Pension Act which makes provision for indigent women having children under sixteen years of age, and "whose husbands are dead," has been held to apply only to women whose husbands are "actually dead, and not merely presumably so" because of seven years' unexplained absence. Com. ex rel. Mothers' Assistance Fund v. Powell (1917) 256 Pa. 470, L.R.A.1917E, 1150, 100 Atl. 964.

But under Oregon Laws 1913, p. 75, § 1, providing for a mother's pension for the support of herself and children, and § 2, providing that it is the intent of the act to keep the children together under the control of their mother, who shall make a home for them, a mother does not forfeit her right to a pension by working away from the family residence at some hours of the day, where such labor is necessary to contribute to their subsistence. Finley v. Marion County (1916) 81 Or. 294, 159 Pac. 557; Wolfe v. Marion County (1916) 81 Or. 297, 159 Pac. 558.

A supervising power to whom authority is granted by a Mothers' Pension Act can grant no other relief than that provided for in the act. Finley v. Marion County (1916) 81 Or. 294, 159 Pac. 557; Wolfe v. Marion County (1916) 81 Or. 297, 159 Pac. 558.

Under the Oregon Mothers' Pension Act of 1913 an applicant's right to pension accrues from the date of a proper application. Finley v. Marion County and Wolfe v. Marion County (Or.) supra.

And where an application is made under one act, the amount of recovery is governed thereby, although such act is subsequently amended, if none of the provisions of the first act regarding amount of recovery are repealed, and notwithstanding action was not taken on the application until after such amendatory act went into effect. Ibid.

But where a Mothers' Pension Act is so amended as to disqualify a mother entitled to a pension under the original act, the pension cannot be continued after the amendatory act goes into effect, since such acts confer no vested rights. Ibid.; RE SNYDER (reported herewith) ante, 1230.

Where a Mothers' Pension Act provides for a pension in a certain amount where all of the children are "wholly" dependent on the mother's labor for support, and that if they are but "partly" dependent upon her labor she shall receive such a sum as, added to her other income other than that derived from her labor, shall be equal to the amount specified in case of children dependent "wholly" upon her labor, a declaration of partial dependency with deductions from the full amount is proper, it appearing that she has a home and a small area of land to cultivate. Re Sharp (1918) 88 Or. 594, 171 Pac. 586. (79 W. Va. 502, 92 S. E. 567.)

Executor and administrator — failure to account — unadministrated asset.

1. If, where a man was executor of an estate in which his wife was interested as a donee of money, the wife preceded the husband in death and he qualified as her administrator, and, as such, failed to reimburse her estate, and his administration was terminated by his death, the amount due from him as executor of the first estate is an unadminis-trated asset of the wife's estate, and may be recovered by her administrator de bonis non. But, as to the estate to which the fund originally belonged, it is an administered asset, and cannot be recovered by the administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of the first estate.

Husband and wife — gift by wife — inference.

2. A gift or relinquishment by a married woman to her husband, of a general or residuary money legacy, given to her from an estate by the will of a deceased person, and held by her husband as executor of the will, cannot be inferred from her mere forbearance to demand and enforce payment thereof from her husband acting as executor, and her silence and failure so to do, with knowledge of his appropriation to his own use of the assets of the estate, including her legacy.

3. The duty imposed by law upon a husband acting as the executor of an estate in which the wife is interested as the donee of money vests in her a right of even higher dignity and character than the obligation imposed upon him by his mere promise or agreement to repay money borrowed from her separate estate; and he cannot relieve himself of the sacred and solemn duty so imposed by his own misconduct, silently submitted to by the wife.

— enforcement of trust — rights of creditors.

4. In such case, the wife is not precluded, in the interest of the husband's general creditors, from assertion against his estate, after his death, of her claim for an accounting and settlement as to what was due her from the estate upon which he administered, by the doctrine of estoppel.

5. By virtue of § 25 of chap. 85 of the Code, such a debt is entitled to preference over the general debts of the deceased personal representative, in the distribution of the proceeds of such estate of his as is not required for the discharge of liens acquired in the modes prescribed by law, and of his interest in any partnership property after the payment of the social debts.

6. The inaction or forbearance of the wife to assert her right against her husband acting as executor of the estate in which she is so interested, with knowledge of his conversion of the executorial estate to his own use, does not deprive her estate of the benefit of the preference so given.

Corporation — transfer of shares — wife to husband — gift.

7. Shares of the capital stock of a bank, belonging to an estate of which the husband is executor, transferred on the books of the bank to the wife and then assigned by her to her husband, and transferred to him on the books of the bank, and subsequently treated as his own, with her knowledge, are deemed, in the absence of clear proof to the contrary, to have been a gift from her to him.

— indebtedness of stockholder — refusal of transfer of stock.

8. A bank organized under a law which impliedly sanctions loans by it on shares of its own capital stock as collateral security, by providing that such loans shall not exceed 50 per cent of such capital stock, can make and enforce a by-law providing that no stockholder will be permitted to sell, transfer, or assign his or her stock while indebted to the bank, and loans made by it to one of its stockholders holding certificates of stock reciting such by-law are valid liens on the shares held by him.

Bank — forbidding loan on shares — retroactive effect.

9. A statute subsequently passed, prohibiting banks from making loans on shares of their capital stock as collateral security, does not invalidate a lien on shares, so previously acquired.

[See 3 R. C. L. 435.]

Husband and wife — title to property — possession by husband.

10. Under statutes rendering property coming to a married woman by will immune from the control of her husband, she acquires a good, sound, and substantial title which is not af-fectured by the fact that the property is reduced to possession by her husband as executor of the will under which she acquires it.

Evidence — presumption of gift.

11. If a married woman places property which is in her hands and subject to her absolute control in the hands of her husband, and permits him to take charge of and use it as his own, a presumption of gift arises in favor of creditors, which can only be overcome by proof of a relation of debtor and creditor between her and her husband.

— gift to husband.

12. If the relation of debtor and creditor is established between husband and wife, her acquiescence in his use of her money or property as his own cannot be regarded as a transfer of her right by gift.

13. Statutory separate estates may be disposed of by a married woman as readily as equitable separate estates.

Estoppel — married woman.

14. As to her personal property, a married woman is subject to the operation of the doctrine of estoppel in pais.

[See 10 R. C. L. 742-743; 13 R. C. L. 1165.]

APPEAL by defendant Farmer, administrator, from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wetzel County in favor of complainant Morris, in a suit, consolidated with others, brought to subject real estate of complainant's decedent to the payment of his debts, and to settle up his estate. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. C. Chapman and McCam-ing the whole indebtedness of C. G. ic & Clarke, for appellant:

The claims asserted by Farmer in his representative capacity are debts "due as personal representative."

Craddock v. Turner, 6 Leigh, 116; Lomax, Exrs. & Admsrs. 886; Black v. Scott, 2 Brock. 327, Fed. Cas. No. 1,464; Turnstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh, 35; Shearman v. Christian, 6 Rand. (Va.) 49; Bridgman v. Bridgman, 138 Mass. 58; Williams v. S. M. Smith Ins. Agency, 75 W. Va. 494, 84 S. E. 237, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 813.

The Wetzel County Bank had no legal right as against the appellant to pass a by-law. "No stockholder will be permitted to sell, transfer, or assign his or her stock while indebted to this bank,"—and it was error for the circuit court to overrule the commissioner's report in this respect.

Messrs. Hall & Hall, for appellee First National Bank:

A person claiming under one bound by an estoppel is himself bound by the same estoppel.

Summerfield v. White, 54 W. Va. 311, 46 S. E. 154.

Mr. Edwin O. Keifer, for appellee Wetzel County Bank:

The court below was right in decreeing the whole indebtedness of C. G. Westerman to the Wetzel County Bank as a lien first in order of priority against the twenty-one shares of the capital stock of said bank owned by him.

Bank of North America, 8 Serg. & R. 73, 11 Am. Dec. 575.

The amount allowed the bank as a first lien against the proceeds derived from the sale of the Ruttencutter leasehold in the hands of M. H. Willis, special receiver, is the balance due said bank on the last renewal of the note secured by deed of trust.

The estate of deceased was not indebted to appellant.

Coleman v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. (Va.) 51; Hinton v. Bland, 81 Va. 588.

Mr. M. H. Willis, for appellee Morris:

From 1903 to her death in 1910, Beulah Westerman consented to the use of her money by her husband and did not require him to render any accounting to her for the same; hence a gift to him.

Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 226, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341; Steadman v. Wilbur, 7 R. I. 481; Kana-wha Valley Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 25 Am. St. Rep. 806, 9 S. E. 175; Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, § 55, and note.

Messrs. M. R. Morris and H. H. Rose, for appellee Supply Company et al.:

If a sum of money or property held by one person for another is, with the authority, or with the full knowledge and consent, or with the ratification, of the person entitled thereto, used or otherwise disposed of by the person so holding the same, the claim of the beneficiary is validly discharged, and his personal representative is barred from recovering the same.

A valid claim, although not legally discharged, may be unenforceable as against creditors of the debtor, by reason of the acts, or the failure to act, of the claimant, which amount to an estoppel.

Roberts v. Tavenner, 48 W. Va. 632, 37 S. E. 576; McConnell v. Rowland, 48 W. Va. 276, 37 S. E. 586; Mann v. Peck, 45 W. Va. 18, 30 S. E. 206; 16 Cyc. 773-777.

As against creditors of a stockholder, a corporation cannot, by secret by-laws, create a lien in its favor against the stock represented by a certificate issued by it.

Bank of Atchison County v. Durfee. 118 Mo. 481, 40 Am. St. Rep. 396, 24 S. W. 133.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal complaint against the decree appealed from is its denial of the claim of title to the major portion of the subject-matter of the main suit, Morris, Admr. v. Westerman et al., set up by Farmer, the administrator de bonis non of Beulah Westerman, the deceased wife of plaintiff's decedent, on the ground that it was a residuary legacy belonging to her, in the hands of said decedent at the time of his death, as the executor of her father's will. Farmer asserted this claim in a second capacity also, viz., administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of W. S. Wiley, deceased, the father of the deceased wife. The suit was brought against the heirs and creditors of Westerman, to subject his real estate to the payment of his debts, the personal property being insufficient to pay them, and to settle up his estate. Farmer, administrator, was admitted on his petition, as a defendant claiming the property to be unadministered assets of the Wiley estate and of the estate of Westerman's deceased wife. For hearing and determination, three other suits involving property and relations in which Westerman had been interested were consolidated with the suit brought by Morris, administrator, the evidence taken once for all of them and one final decree entered. Two of the other suits were brought to settle the business of a partnership between Westerman and W. P. Simmons, and the third to obtain advice and instructions from the court as to the distribution of a trust fund in which Westerman had held an interest.

There is no controversy of any consequence, as to the facts. On January 22, 1903, C. G. Westerman qualified as the executor of the will of W. S. Wiley, without bond, agreeably to a provision of the will, naming him as the executor. Wiley had left a considerable estate, all of which, except some specific devises and legacies, went to his daughter, Beulah Wiley, who was then the wife of C. G. Westerman or soon afterward became his wife. He made no inventory of the estate, caused no appraisement to be made, never made any settlement thereof, and never delivered or set over to his wife the property and bonds now in controversy. He resided in the home of Wiley, at the time of the death of the latter, and continued to reside there until the time of his death. Of that property, he made no disposition. He caused to be transferred to his wife a portion of the bank stock her father owned. She died intestate, late in 1909, or early in 1910, and her husband qualified as her administrator, but he did not charge himself with any of the property in controversy, as such. Property of hers, including the bank stock transferred to her, was appraised at $16,452.50, the bank stock being the principal item. He died intestate February 8, 1912, leaving five children ranging in age from two to twelve years, and property was appraised, as belonging to his estate, at the sum of $49,085.94.

At the time of the death of Wiley, Westerman had no property. It has been shown, on a reference to a commissioner, that he received from the estate of Wiley, at various times, in addition to the bank stock he transferred to Mrs. Westerman, amounts aggregating $51,383.65, and disbursed for repairs on the residence, satisfaction of small bequests made by the will, debts due from the estate, funeral expenses, taxes, insurance, and medical and hospital bills of the widow sums amounting to $9,128.33, leaving $42,255.32. For a time he kept two bank accounts, one executorial and the other individual, but in making his deposits he did not regard the sources from which the money had been derived. In numerous instances, he divided funds of the estate between the two accounts and made deposits in both, and drew checks on them indiscriminately. He engaged extensively in oil and gas production, trading and speculation and other business, using for such purposes the estate that had come into his hands, as executor of Wiley's will, for the benefit of his wife as residuary legatee. He created large indebtedness in these enterprises, occasioning the execution to banks and individuals of many notes, some of which the wife indorsed. She must have known he had not fully accounted to her for her interest in the estate, and that he was making use of the same as if it were his own, for he had commenced these operations without means of his own.

The commissioner to whom the cause was referred reported indebtedness of the estate of C. G. Westerman to the estate of Beulah Westerman, in the sum of $28,433.40, two thirds of the amount traced into his hands and undisbursed, the other third being deducted as having vested in him as a distributee of his wife's estate. Sustaining numerous exceptions to this finding, filed by creditors and Morris, administrator, the court held there was no such liability, and decreed that the property in question belongs to the estate of C. G. Westerman and is liable for his debts. Farmer, administrator, also excepted to the allowance of a distributive share to the husband's estate, on the ground that the wife never became legally possessed of the property in her lifetime. Though this exception became unimportant, for the purposes of the decree, in consequence of the disposition of the others, the court overruled it.

But for the statute making the legacy of Mrs. Westerman her sole and separate property and rendering it immune from the control of her husband and liability for his debts, Code, chap. 66 (§§ 3669-3683), his acts and conduct respecting the same, after it came into his hands as executor, might have been sufficient to make it his own, by reduction thereof into possession, on common-law principles. Linn v. Patton, 10 W. Va. 187; Clarke v. King, 34 W. Va. 631, 12 S. E. 775; Harcum v. Hudnall, 14 Gratt. 369; Yerby v. Lynch, 3 Gratt. 460; Blakey v. Newby, 6 Munf. 64; Wallace v. Taliaferro, 2 Call (Va.) 447. That statute, however, has cut up this old common-law doctrine by the roots. It makes all real and personal property of any female, which she shall own at the time of her marriage, and all property she may, after marriage, acquire by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, as thoroughly immune and secure from her husband's control and from liability for his debts as an equitable separate estate, if not more so. Under it, her property cannot become the property of her husband, otherwise than by her voluntary sale, barter, or gift thereof to him. The equitable separate estate of a married woman, the creation and possession of which were permissible, before the passage of this statute, was a thing of substance, not of mere form. As to it, a married woman was regarded as a feme sole, and had right to dispose of all her separate personal estate, and the rents, issues, and profits of her real estate, in the same manner as if she had been a feme sole, unless the power of alienation was restrained by the instrument creating such estate. Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 572. One of the effects of the statute was enlargement of the rights and powers of married women so as to enable them to take separate legal estates in real and personal property. Ibid.; Patton v. Merchant's Bank, 12 W. Va. 587. The policy of this statute passed in 1868 has been greatly enlarged and extended by later acts conferring upon the married woman, among other things, right to maintain in her own name all suits and proceedings necessary for the protection and vindication of her property rights. Her powers respecting her statutory separate estate are therefore much more extensive than were those pertaining to her separate equitable estate. Hence the property bequeathed to Mrs.

Westerman by her father became hers by a good, sound, and substantial title. Her relation to the executor did not limit or qualify it in the slightest degree.

Husband and wife—title to property—possession by husband.

During the period of six or seven years intervening between the death of W. S. Wiley and the death of Mrs. Westerman, the latter merely acquiesced in the acts and conduct of her husband, the executor, and did no positive act indicating intention to part with her title or relinquish her right. If she was cognizant of his use of the property belonging to her for his own purposes and in his own business, the most that can be claimed is that she remained passive, made no protest, and did not endeavor to bring him to a settlement and payment of what was due her. There is no evidence of any affirmative act of gift. Her property was in her husband's hands as executor. It came to him in due course of law, not by any act of hers. Though, with her knowledge, he used it in a manner not in conformity with law and in violation of her legal right, there is no evidence that by any act of hers the status or character of the property was ever changed. If it had once been in her hands and subject to her absolute control, and she had then placed it in the hands of her husband or permitted him to take charge of it and use it as his own, there would be a presumption of a gift on her part, in favor of his creditors, which it would be necessary for her to overcome with proof of the relation of debtor and creditor between herself and her husband, in order to prevail over them. Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50 W. Va. 226, 88 Am. St. Rep. 859, 40 S. E. 341; Kanawha Valley Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. 175. But, inasmuch as her property and funds went into his hands, in his capacity as executor, and did not come from her hands at all or by any act of hers, this presumption cannot consistently be indulged. She never delivered or relinquished her property to him, for it was never in her possession. It came to him in the character of executor, and he, instead of performing his duty as such and delivering it over to her, converted it to his own use. Of course, she could have demanded an accounting from him, but her failure to do so does not necessarily signify intention willingly to acquiesce in such use or to relinquish her right. If she had not been his wife, such acquiescence would not have the slightest tendency to prove a relinquishment or abandonment of right. The delicate relation subsisting between the parties may have constituted the reason for an unwilling acquiescence, unaccompanied by even the slightest intention to make a gift of the property. If she had had the property in her possession or the title in her name and within her control and delivered or conveyed it to him, or permitted him to take possession of it, without any understanding or agreement for return thereof, there would have been a presumption of a gift. McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29, 64, 65. But if, under such circumstances, he had contemporaneously given her his note or other obligation for the money or the value of the property, or even verbally promised to pay or return it, no such presumption would have arisen. The transaction would have created the relation of debtor and creditor. In most instances, however, if not all of them, the verbal agreement is rejected, for want of sufficient proof, or inconsistency with conduct. McGinnis v. Curry; Crumrine v. Crumrine; and Kanawha Valley Bank v. Atkinson, cited, supra. But, if the relation of debtor and creditor is established, the wife's acquiescence in the husband's use of the money or property as his own cannot consistently be regarded, deemed, or treated as a transfer of her right by gift. She cannot be both donor and creditor at the same time. The two relations are logically and legally incompatible. If the wife's separate estate or the profits thereof go into her husband's hands, upon such an assurance or promise, it is a debt against his estate. Roper v. Wren, 6 Leigh, 38; McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29, 68; Grabill v. Moyer, 45 Pa. 530; Kaufman v. Whitney, 50 Miss. 103. A conveyance made to a wife by the husband, in the absence of fraud and for a valuable consideration, such as money of her separate estate or her inchoate right of dower in land, is everywhere upheld against creditors as well as between themselves, though such a conveyance in consideration of antecedent indebtedness would obviously be voidable under the statute, at the suit of creditors, to the extent of the preference created in her favor. Though the wife's mere acquiescence in the husband's possession and use of her pin money and profits arising from her equitable separate estate, or her mere failure to demand payment thereof, when entitled to them, precluded right of recovery thereof from his estate (Moore v. Ferguson, 2 Munf. 421; Ridout v. Lewis, 1 Atk. 269, 26 Eng. Reprint, 171; Warwick v. Edwards, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 140, 21 Eng. Reprint, 942; Peacock v. Monk, 2 Ves. Sr. 190, 28 Eng. Reprint, 123; Townsend v. Windham, 2 Ves. Sr. 1, 7, 28 Eng. Reprint, 1; Parker v. Brooke, 9 Ves. Jr. 583, 32 Eng. Reprint, 729), such conduct seems not to have precluded assertion of her right to the principal sum constituting her separate estate. This distinction is perfectly clear, if the separate estate is regarded as having been intended as a mere provision for her comfort and support, which she was deemed to have demanded as she needed it, and not to have demanded at all, if her requirements were satisfied by her husband or from some other source, although her strict right to demand them as such in full could not be denied. In Parker v. Brooke, cited, supra, a purchaser of a wife's separate estate from the husband, with notice of her title, was required to account for it in full, the court declining to apply the rule applicable to arrears of pin money or profits arising from the separate estate. In a similar manner, the distinction was made in Powell v. Hankey, 2 P. Wms. 82, 24 Eng. Reprint, 649, and in Towers v. Hagner, 3 Whart. 48.

These illustrations afforded by the decisions reveal the substantial character of the wife's separate estate and the intricacy of questions arising out of transactions between her and her husband concerning it. The statutory separate estate and the equitable separate estate differ principally in respect of the nature of the title, the mode of creation, and the remedies incident thereto. Hence statutory separate estate may be disposed of by gift as readily as estate, and any circumstance sufficient to rebut the presumption of a gift in the one instance suffices in the other. As mere acquiescence in the husband's possession and use of equitable separate estate was not deemed a gift thereof, though it might be so regarded as to the profits arising from its use, it cannot consistently be so regarded in the case of statutory separate estate. Since a promise or agreement to repay money of the equitable estate, borrowed, creates the relation of debtor and creditor, and precludes the possibility of a gift, it must do so in the case of a loan of money belonging to a statutory separate estate. In view of the ease with which the presumption of gift may be rebutted or avoided, it cannot be deemed to have

for and pay over the estate to the wife is manifestly as high in dignity as his promise to reimburse her for money or property obtained from her on such promise. Indeed, it is higher. He is a fiduciary held by law to a strict and drastic accounting. As to his liability to her on his receipt of assets, there can be no question. It arises independently of any agreement or understanding between them. He neither receives nor holds it in his individual capacity. Even at common law, it remained hers, until he reduced it into possession, by exercise of dominion over it in his individual capacity. Now, he cannot elect so to hold it. By withholding it or making a wrongful disposition of it, he can only violate his duty. Her silence, with knowledge of such wrong, is not a decisive nor a clear index to her intention. By no affirmative act does it pass to him either the title or the possession. She merely acquiesces in a wrongful use, for some reason not expressed. The same thing might occur in the case of a fully proved loan. The money might be long past due and she fully armed with remedies for its recovery. Would she be denied her right merely because credit has been extended to him by others in ignorance of the debt? Our decisions and uniform authority in other jurisdictions impliedly answer in the negative. They go to the inception of the transaction, and at that point determine its character, and, if it is shown then to have been a loan, the wife's right is admitted, notwithstanding her indulgence of her husband as her debtor, and her subsequent conduct is ignored, however prejudicial it may have been to other creditors, by reason of the secrecy of the loan. Mere indulgence of a debtor has never been deemed a gift, although actual delivery of money or property is not essential to a gift. Miller v. Neff (Miller v. McMechen) 33 W. Va. 197, 6 L.R.A.

515, 10 S. E. 378. In that case, it was held that, if the subject of the gift is in the possession of the donee as agent of the donor, proof of a declaration of the gift by the donor and subsequent dominion and use of the subject were sufficient to pass the title. But the property in question here was not held by the agent of the wife, nor is there any evidence of a declaration of gift. No doubt a gift may be inferred from the conduct of the parties (M'Donald v. Crockett, 7 S. C. Eq. (2 M'Cord) 130; 20 Cyc. 1194), but the circumstances must be such as to put the question of intention beyond reasonable doubt. In New York, it has been held that, in the case of a gift from a wife to her husband, the burden of proof is on the latter to show it by clear evidence. Boyd v. De La Montagnie, 73 N. Y. 498, 29 Am. Rep. 197. In Pennsylvania, the husband's mere possession of the wife's property is not evidence of a gift. He is presumed to hold it as her debtor or trustee. Grabill v. Moyer, 45 Pa. 530; Wormley's Estate, 137 Pa. 101, 20 Atl. 621. Upon these principles and conclusions, we are of the opinion that a gift of Mrs. Westerman's estate to her husband has not been established, and the inquiry next in order is whether she is estopped by her conduct from assertion of her right.

As to her personal property, a married woman is subject to the operation of the doctrine of estoppel in pais. Williamson v.

married woman.

Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 578, 38 L.R.A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 27 S. E. 411, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 19; Smilie's Estate, 22 Pa. 134. In the numerous cases in which the courts assert, generally, that by permitting her husband to use and manage her separate property and thus conferring on him indicia of ownership, inducing third persons to extend credit to him on the faith of his ownership, a married woman may be estopped to claim the property as her separate estate, against the husband's creditors (13 R. C. L. p. 1165); but the facts and circumstances disclosed here do not bring this case within the classes to which the doctrine has been applied. Most of them are similar in their facts to McGinnis v. Curry and Crumrine v. Crumrine, to which reference has been made. Others involved false representations of the wife, acted upon by third persons, to their prejudice, not mere acquiescence. Here, there is no effort to resist the claims of creditors against any specific tangible property, real or personal, formerly owned by the husband and fraudulently conveyed to the wife. The cross-bill answer asserts a debt due in a fiduciary capacity. Mrs. Westerman never had legal title to the property of the estate of her father, not accounted for or paid to her. The will gave her fifty shares of the stock of the Wetzel County Bank and some of the testator's personal effects. Some of the real estate was given to two nephews. Six additional shares of bank stock were specially disposed of. The executor was required to sell all of the other property and distribute the proceeds to designated legatees. Hence, strictly speaking, the wife never placed any of her property in the executor's hands, nor permitted him to use it, in such manner or under such circumstances as would induce any person to believe it was his. Technically, the property belonged to Wiley's estate, not to the wife, but there was a liability upon the executor in her favor respecting it which she never released, and there is no proof of a representation to any creditor or anyone else that she had released it.

The statute (Code, chap. 85, § 25 [§ 4013]) gives this debt preference over the general indebtedness of the deceased executor, and thus works serious disadvantages to general creditors. If the residuary legatee had been a stranger to the executor and had forborne suit to compel a settlement and enforce payment, the result would have been the same.

Had the executor contracted, in his individual capacity, enormous simple debts, and so burdened his estate that it would pay only a few cents on the dollar, his creditors would have been hurt in a similar manner. In that case, their complaint that the debts were secret and unknown to them would have availed nothing. To inflict upon a wife loss of money due her from a personal representative, for her failure to sue for it, on the ground that her husband has used it to the detriment of creditors, would subject her to a rule of law not applied to other persons. To estop her because undue credit has been extended to her husband, in ignorance of the debt due her, would be a plain and flagrant discrimination against her, founded upon nothing except her marital relation, since the secrecy of debts due other people has no such effect. Moreover, if the laws requiring recordation of deeds, liens, etc., are intended for the benefit of traders and dealers on mere personal credit, as some courts seem to hold, the county records disclosed enough to put any prudent man upon inquiry, and hence this debt was not a secret one. They disclosed the will, the appointment, and the lack of an inventory, appraisal, and settlement, and hence an undischarged liability of high character. Such records are not constructive notice to general creditors (Gilbert v. Peppers, 65 W. Va. 355, 364, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1181, 64 S. E. 361), binding upon them as matter of law, but they are available sources of information. As to this debt, persons dealing with the executor and extending individual credit to him were under the duty and assumed the risk that attend their dealings with other persons, on mere personal credit. In all such cases, they are aware of the danger, and know the law has made no provision for their protection. They may, under some circumstances, avail themselves of the doctrine of estoppel when they have extended credit, relying upon the debtor's known possession of property as evidence of title, but almost daily experience tells them it is unsafe to deal with a man on the assumption that he owes no debts. There is no legal presumption that he owes none. No law requires him or his creditors to record them.

This asset of the wife's estate belongs to the administrator de bonis non. Its status remains wholly unaltered. His predecessor never collected it, nor disturbed its condition in any respect. It never came into his hands as administrator. He owed it to her estate as executor of Wiley, at the time of his qualification as her administrator, and, not having collected it nor altered its status, he left it an unadministered asset of her estate. As an asset of the estate of Wiley, it was administered. The executor improperly disposed of the property, and was liable directly to the legatee for a devastavit. For this reason, the administrator of Wiley de bonis non, with the will annexed, is not entitled to sue for it. Brown v. Brown, 72 W. Va. 648, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 995, 78 S. E. 1040. As administrator of his wife, Westerman should have collected the wife's claim against himself. It was a debt he owed, not property in his hands, and he neither paid it nor in any way discharged it. Hence it is necessarily an unadministered asset of her estate.

Though the action of the court in sustaining the commissioner's allowance to the husband's estate, of his distributive share of the amount recoverable from his estate, on the ground of his liability as executor of the will of Wiley, is made the ground of an assignment of error, nothing is said in the brief in support of the assignment, wherefore it may well be deemed to have been waived. However, it may be said, with safety, that he became entitled to one third of that claim on the death of his wife, for the statute gives to the husband, without exception, one third of the wife's personal property, in case of her death leaving children. Code, chap. 78, § 9, (§ 3909).

In this decree, the court rightly proceeded upon the theory that the preference given by the statute does not extend to or override liens acquired on the property of the decedent, in his lifetime, by mortgage, deed of trust, judgment, execution, and the like. Being general in its terms, it must be read in connection with, and in subordination to, the laws permitting acquisition of such liens. Reeves v. Ross, 62 W. Va. 7, 57 S. E. 284. No preference under it over such liens is claimed. Nor is there any claim that the preference extends to the debts of a partnership of which the decedent was a member. The assets of the copartnership would necessarily be first liable for the debts of the firm, on the principle above stated. But it is insisted that a certain piece of property, known as the Ruttencutter lease, was not partnership property, and that the court erred in treating it as such, by making the proceeds thereof liable for partnership debts. The existence of the partnership for limited purposes, namely, ownership and operation of oil and gas properties, is admitted, but it is insisted that there is no lien on the Ruttencutter lease. However, Westerman executed or joined in a deed of trust on that particular lease, to secure a partnership debt which was not recorded until after his death, and it is said that by reason of his death before the recordation of the deed of trust, the liability of the estate, on the executorial account, became a lien upon the lease. In this conclusion we are unable to concur. The statute gives no lien upon the property of the decedent. It simply determines the rights of creditors as to portions of the estate on which no liens exist.

Under a by-law of the Wetzel

County Bank, a creditor of Westerman's estate, in large amount, inhibiting the sale, transfer, or assignment of any of its stock by a stockholder, while indebted to the bank, the trial court accorded it a lien on twenty-one shares of such stock, standing on its books in the name of Westerman, at the time of his death. This stock had belonged to Wiley. Westerman had transferred it to his wife, and she had then transferred it back to him. The certificate for sixteen shares thereof bears date August 17, 1903, and the certificate for the other five shares is dated October 10, 1904. The part of the decree allowing this lien is challenged on the ground of alleged invalidity of the by-law, and this contention is founded largely, if not altogether, on a provision of the statute, inhibiting state banks from making loans on the security of shares of their own capital stock. Code 1913, chap. 54, § 79 (§ 3040). At the time of the adoption of the by-law, issuance of the certificates and incurrence of the indebtedness, this provision of the statute was not in force. It was enacted in 1913. Prior to the date of its effectiveness, ninety days from February 18, 1913, such banks were impliedly, if not expressly, authorized to make loans on the shares of their capital stock as security, and to say this by-law is invalid as to transactions perfected under it, before the passage of the act, would give the statute retroactive effect. In those instances in which the legislature has acknowledged power to make laws operate retrospectively, the intention to make them do so will not be inferred. To give a statute such an effect, it must contain terms clearly importing the intention. Harrison v. Harman, 76 W. Va. 412, 85 S. E. 646. As to whether the subject-matter of the by-law may be so dealt with by the legislature, there is no occasion to inquire. The act is impliedly authorized banks to make loans on the security of shares of their capital stock,

Two notes for $3,000 each, executed by the Anita Oil Company, secured by a deed of trust and assigned by Westerman and Simmons to the First National Bank of New Martinsville, as collateral security for a note held by it, constituting the subject-matter of certain provisions of the decree, are rather elaborately discussed in the briefs filed for Morris, administrator, and the First National Bank of New Martinsville; but the attitudes of these parties to said provisions are not very definitely stated. It seems that, pending the suit, the bank sold the notes, under a power of sale conferred by the assignment thereof, and bought them itself, at the price of $1,800. They are perfectly good for $6,000, since a trustee holds the proceeds of the property upon which they were secured, and they are the only notes assigned out of several secured by the deed of trust, wherefore they constitute the first lien on that fund. Counsel for the bank seem to contend that the bank's title by purchase is valid, and this claim is resisted by counsel for the administrator. Neither brief, however, seems to complain of the decree, which obviously treats these two notes as having been held by the bank as collateral. It recites that they are so held, and then directs the trustee to pay to the bank the sum of $6,000, with interest from November 16, 1911, in discharge of the two notes, and directs such payment to be "credited pro rata upon the liabilities joint and sole of C. G. Westerman" to the bank. Regarding the argument in the briefs as being directed not at the decree, nor made in support of any complaint against it, but as pertaining to a matter shown by the record, but not embodied in the decree, our inference is that the parties are satisfied with what the court has actually done respecting the matter, wherefore we enter upon no inquiry as to the propriety of the court's action.

Certain items have been classed as partnership assets by the decree, which the evidence tends very strongly to prove are individual assets. These are included in an aggregate sum of $3,118.71, described as a fund in the hands of M. H. Willis, special receiver. As to this fund, the decree will be reversed, to the end that the status of the several items thereof may be reconsidered.

In so far as the decree sustains exceptions to that part of the commissioner's report which finds indebtedness against the estate of Westerman in favor of C. S. Farmer, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Beulah Westerman, deceased, and makes it a debt first in order of payment against the whole of Westerman's estate, except funds in the hands of Lemon, trustee, and the proceeds of the Ruttencutter lease in the hands of Morris, administrator, and disallows that claim and the preference accorded it by law, and makes "all debts of C. G. Westerman liens of equal dignity and first in priority against the general fund in the hands of M. H. Willis, special receiver, and against all other assets of the personal estate of C. G. Westerman, save the Wetzel County Bank stock," and holds the sum of $3,118.71 in the hands of M. H. Willis, special receiver, to be a partnership asset, it will be reversed, set aside, and annulled; and it will be here adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the estate of C. G. Westerman, deceased, is indebted to C. S. Farmer, administrator de bonis non of Beulah Westerman, deceased, in the sum of $28,433.40, exclusive of interest, and that said administrator de bonis non is entitled to have said sum, with interest thereon according to law, paid out of the estate of the said C. G. Westerman, in so far as the same is not subject to liens, debts due to the United States, and taxes and levies assessed against the said Westerman, prior to his death, to the exclusion of, so far as is necessary, and in preference to, the unsecured general debts due from the estate of the said Westerman. In all other respects, the decree will be affirmed, and the cause will be remanded to the Circuit Court of Wetzel county for ascertainment in conformity with law, of the entire amount due and owing said Farmer, administrator de bonis non, from the estate of said Westerman, including interest, and for a decree for the full amount thereof, when so ascertained. Costs in this court will be decreed to C. S. Farmer, administrator as aforesaid, against the creditors of the estate of C. G. Westerman, deceased, named in the decree complained of.

Reversed in part. Affirmed in part. Remanded.

NOTE.

It will be seen that in the reported case (MORRIS v. WESTERMAN, ante, 1237) it is held that an administrator de bonis non cannot recover of his predecessor the proceeds of converted assets, but that the right to recovery therefor is in the person interested in the estate. For a discussion of the right of an administrator de bonis non to recover proceeds of personal property of the estate converted by his predecessor, see annotation beginning on page 1252.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henderson County sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a petition filed for the settlement of the accounts of defendants as former administrators of the estate of W. L. Yancy, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Vance & Heilbronner, for appellant:

The appraisement and inventory returned to and approved by the court is prima facie evidence of the amount of estate which came to the hand of said administrators.

Messrs. Yeaman & Yeaman, for appellee:

An administrator de bonis non cannot maintain an action for the recovery of the proceeds or the value of such of the estate of the deceased as had been sold or wasted by the preceding administrator of the deceased. He can only maintain an action for such of the property as remains in specie.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

This suit was brought by the Farmers' Bank & Trust Company, as administrator de bonis non of W. L. Yancy, deceased, against Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy, former administrators of W. L. Yancy, deceased, and their surety, the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, to require Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy to answer and say what money and other property of the estate of W. L. Yancy came to their hands as such administrators, and to account for and pay over same to plaintiff, and for judgment against all of the defendants for the sum of $980.37, with interest and costs. The petition was twice amended, and the demurrer of the Fidelity & Deposit Company was sustained to the petition as amended, and the petition dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

The original petition alleged the following facts: W. L. Yancy died intestate and a resident of Henderson county, in the month of February, 1915. The defendants Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy were duly appointed and qualified as administrators of his estate, and executed bond as required by statute, with the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland as surety. As shown by the inventory and appraisement filed by the defendants as administrators aforesaid, there came into their hands personal property of the value of $980.37. The defendants Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy, as administrators, sold and disposed of the entire property which came into their hands and received the proceeds thereof, and refused to account for, or to pay out, the money which came into their hands, to persons entitled thereto, or to make a settlement of their accounts. On September 25, 1917, a rule was issued by the Henderson county court against the defendants Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy, administrators, to show cause why they should not be compelled to make a settlement of their accounts, and a copy of the order was served on the defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. The motion for the rule was heard on November 5, 1917, and, it appearing that Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy had failed for more than two years to settle their accounts, it was ordered that they be removed from the office and that the Farmers' Bank & Trust Company be appointed administrator de bonis non of the estate. A copy of this order was served on the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. Plaintiff demanded a settlement of said Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy, administrators, and the payment of any money that they might owe as such administrators, and the possession of such personal property as might be in their hands; but they refused to make any settlement with plaintiff, or to pay plaintiff any money, or to turn over to it any property belonging to the estate of W. L. Yancy. A copy of the inventory and appraisement was filed with the petition, and it shows that when the inventory was filed there were then in the hands of the administrators $402 in money and $578.37 in notes and other personal property.

To the foregoing petition the Fidelity & Deposit Company interposed a demurrer. Before the demurrer was acted on, plaintiff filed an amended petition, alleging in substance that the allegation of the original petition that the administrators had sold and disposed of the personal property and received the proceeds was made through oversight and mistake of fact, and that the only knowledge or information plaintiff had in regard to the property was the inventory filed by the administrators; that plaintiff did not know and was not advised as to what disposition the administrators made of the personal property. It was further alleged that the insertion of the words, "de bonis non," in the order appointing plaintiff administrator, was a clerical mispension, and that the county court had, by order, stricken out these words, and that, by the correction of that error, plaintiff was the only administrator of the estate of W. L. Yancy, deceased. The prayer was the same as in the original petition. The demurrer to the original petition was made to apply to the petition as amended and was sustained. Thereupon a second amended petition was filed, which set out with greater detail the facts stated in the original and first amended petition, and concludes with the following prayer: "That said defendants Y. L. Yancy and J. W. Yancy be required to answer and say what money or other property of the estate of W. L. Yancy came into their hands as such administrators, as well as the money of said estate now in their hands as administrators, and to account for and turn over to this plaintiff all of said money and other property, and for judgment against all of the defendants for the said money and other property, including the property inventoried and appraised at $980.37, and, if any of said property cannot be had, for judgment for the value thereof, with interest at 6 per cent per annum from February 15, 1917, until paid, and its costs herein."

The action of the county court in striking out the words, "de bonis non," from the order appointing plaintiff administrator, did not affect the relation which plaintiff sustained to the estate of the intestate. When the first administrators were removed, and plaintiff was appointed administrator in their stead, it thereby became administrator de bonis non, whether the words, "de bonis non," were employed in the order of appointment or not. Hence plaintiff's right to recover must be determined in the light of the fact that it is an administrator de bonis non.

Executor and administrator—de bonis non—who is.

The common-law rule prevails in this state, and under that rule an administrator de bonis non can recover from his predecessor or his personal representative only such estate of the decedent as remained in specie, and cannot recover the proceeds of such as had been converted into money, unless such proceeds were kept separate and were susceptible of identification. For assets wasted by the first administrator, the right of action is not in the administrator de bonis non, but in the distributees, heirs, or creditors. 11 R. C. L. § 512, p. 420, and § 523, p. 426; Graves v. Downey, 3 T. B. Mon. 356; Lawrence v. Lawrence, Litt. Sel. Cas. 123; Warfield v. Brand, 13 Bush, 77; Felts v. Brown, 7 J. J. Marsh. 147; Karn v. - IV. Miscellaneous, 1259.

I. Introductory.

The powers of an administrator de bonis non are now usually prescribed by statute; and they are usually broad enough to cover all assets of the estate, including claims against his predecessor.

As will be seen, the great weight of American opinion, however, is that at common law an administrator de bonis non could not recover of his predecessor or his representatives for assets converted by such predecessor. In a few jurisdictions, however, a different view has been taken.

II. General rule.

In the absence of statute an administrator de bonis non cannot recover from his predecessor or his representatives, either at law or in equity, the proceeds of personal property of the estate converted by such predecessor.

Any contrary holding or views in Mulford v. Mulford (1885) 40 N. J. Eq. 163, and in Lindsley v. Personette (1882) 35 N. J. Eq. 355, are of no moment in view of the latter settled opinion of the New Jersey court.

The decision to the contrary in Welman v. Armour (1811) R. M. Charlt. (Ga.) 6, seems to have been overlooked in Thomas v. Hardwick (1846) 1 Ga. 78, supra.

"An administrator de bonis non derives his title from the deceased, and not from the former executor or administrator. To him is committed only the administration of the goods, chattels, and credits of the deceased which have not been administered. He is entitled to all the goods and personal estate which remain in specie." United States v. Walker (1883) 109 U. S. 258, 27 L. ed. 927, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, supra.

"The collection of the testator's or intestate's debts, or a sale of his goods by the executor or administrator, is such an administration of them as to preclude the administrator de bonis non from claiming or exercising any power or authority over them or the proceeds of them. They are not embraced within his commission, which is for the administration of the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the testator or the intestate at the time of his death, and remain unadministered. For unless they remain in specie, it cannot be said that they were of the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which belonged to the deceased at the time of his death." Potts v. Smith (1832) 3 Rawle (Pa.) 368, 24 Am. Dec. 359, supra.

In Potts v. Smith (1832) 3 Rawle (Pa.) 360, supra, the court referred to "the Statute 30 Car. II. chap. 7, explained and made perpetual by 4 & 5 Wm. & M. chap. 24, § 12, which makes the executor, or administrators of any executor or administrator, whether rightful or of his own wrong, who shall waste or convert to his own use the estate of his testator or intestate, liable and chargeable in the same manner as their testator or intestate would have been if they had been living;" and said: "Now to whom would their testator or intestate have been liable if living? To the creditors, or the legatees or distributors [distributees] if you please, but certainly not to the administrator de bonis non, because there was no such person in being. . . . Again, if the collection of debts owing to the deceased, or the sale of his goods, by the executor or administrator, had not been such an administration as to put these things beyond the reach and control of the administrator de bonis non, there was but little, if any, occasion, for the Statutes of 30 Car. II. and 4 & 5 Wm. & M., already mentioned, because the administrator de bonis non could have maintained his action, as it certainly would have been his duty to have done; so, if he had the right and the authority for the recovery of all the moneys received as well in payment of debts due to the deceased, as upon sales made of his goods, by the executor or administrator, against the personal representatives of such executor or administrator, and, when recovered, have paid the creditors, legatees, and distributees, the enactment of that statute would have been useless. The provisions, however, of these statutes prove conclusively to my mind that such right and authority were never supposed to have existed on the part of the administrator de bonis non."

It will be observed that in MORRIS v. WESTERMAN (reported herewith), ante, 1237, a man died leaving part of his estate to his daughter, and appointing her husband executor, and she died before her husband, who qualified as her administrator and never accounted as executor or administrator, having converted the property before the wife's death; and that it was held that the amount due from him as executor of the first estate was an unadministered asset of the wife's estate, and might be recovered by her administrator de bonis non. But as to the estate to which the fund originally belonged, it was an administered asset, and could not be recovered by the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, of the first estate.

It must be admitted that the old law has very little directly on the point. In Packman's Case (1597) 6 Coke, 18b, 77 Eng. Reprint, 281, it was said: "If an administrator waste the goods, and afterwards administration is committed to another, yet any debtee shall charge him in debt." In Wankford v. Wankford (1699) 1 Salk. 306, 91 Eng. Reprint, 269, Holt, Ch. J., said: "If the goods of the testator remain in specie, they shall go to his administrator de bonis non, because in that case it is notorious which were the goods of the testator, and they are distinguishable." And there are a number of cases stating that the administrator de bonis non is entitled to the goods which remain in specie, or are unconverted. An unsatisfactory analogy is claimed from the cases holding that the administrator de bonis non shall not take assets whose form has been changed. But, as has been seen, the great weight of American opinion renders the question no longer open. Probably the most learned opinions on the question are those in Potts v. Smith (1832) 3 Rawle (Pa.) 361, and in Coleman v. M'Murdo (1827) 5 Rand. (Va.) 51. The opinion in Thomas v. Riegel (1835) 5 Rawle (Pa.) 265, is also of value in this connection.

It may be noted that at common law, and prior to the Statute of Charles II., a devastavit was considered as a personal tort, dying with the person. Tucke's Case (1590) Leon, pt. 3, p. 241, 74 Eng. Reprint, 659; Brown v. Collins (1674) 2 Lev. 110, 83 Eng. Reprint, 473.

In Ormes v. Brown (1899) 22 Ind. App. 569, 52 N. E. 1005, the court said: "As the only right of action given by statute to an administrator de bonis non for a conversion of any part of the personal assets of the estate of his predecessor is upon his official bond, and as an action will not lie in his favor for a tort of his predecessor, as such tort dies with him, it follows that, as the complaint proceeds upon the latter theory, it was wholly insufficient."

Money.

"Also it is holden, that if an executor receives money in right of the testator, and lays it up by himself, and dies intestate, that this money shall go to the administrator de bonis non, being easily distinguished to be part of the testator's effects, as goods in specie." Bacon, Abr. "Executors & Administrators" (B) 2, p. 24. This view was held in Hackney v. Steadman (1853) 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 207. See also in Re Hall (1827) 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. (Eng.) 139, infra, III. An administrator de bonis non "is entitled to all the goods and personal estate which remain in specie. Money received by the former executor or administrator in his character as such, and kept by itself, will be so regarded." Beall v. New Mexico (1872) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 535, 21 L. ed. 292; United States use of Wilson v. Walker (1883) 109 U. S. 258, 27 L. ed. 927, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277 (see also Rose's notes to this case).

While the question of the right of an administrator de bonis non to proceed against third parties is beyond the scope of this note, it may be observed in this connection that it has been held in Kentucky (although the general rule there applies) that money deposited in a bank by an executor to his credit as executor might be reached by an administrator de bonis non. Thus, in Clark v. Farmer's Nat. Bank (1907) 124 Ky. 563, 99 S. W. 674, it was held that an administrator de bonis non could recover of the bank for money deposited there by his predecessor to his credit as executor, and paid out to the executor's administrator before the appointment of the plaintiff, on the ground that it was assets of the decedent. On the other hand, in Pennsylvania, where the common-law rule has been changed by statute, it was held in Slaymaker v. Farmer's Nat. Bank (1883) 103 Pa. 616, where an administrator de bonis non had drawn the money deposited by his predecessor as administrator, that the depositary was liable to the executor of such predecessor, on the ground that even under the statute the administrator de bonis non would only be entitled to a balance after a settlement of his predecessor's account. So, in Sibbs v. Philadelphia

Sav. Fund Soc. (1893) 153 Pa. 345, 25 Atl. 1119, it was held that an administrator de bonis non could not recover from the depositary money deposited by the decedent and transferred by the plaintiff's predecessor to his name as administrator, and drawn out by such predecessor's administrator. But in Stair v. York Nat. Bank (1867) 55 Pa. 364, 93 Am. Dec. 759, where an administrator of an executor had settled such executor's account, showing a balance, it was held that an administrator de bonis non of the first testator might recover of the depositary money deposited by the executor, being a part of such balance and never drawn out.

III. Contrary doctrine.

Support of opposition to the general rule has been claimed in the authorities holding that an administrator durante minore etate is liable to the executor. See, for example of such authorities, Fotherby v. Pate (1747) 3 Atk. 603, 26 Eng. Reprint, 1148; Bacon, Abr. "Executors & Administrators" (B) 2, p. 18; Vaughan, Ch. J., in Brookings v. Jennings (1674) 1 Mod. 174, 86 Eng. Reprint, 809. But it was said in Fotherby v. Pate (Eng.) supra, that such an administrator is "little more than a person appointed ad colligendum bona."

In Phelps v. Sproule (1831) 4 Sim. 318, 58 Eng. Reprint, 119, Shadwell, V. C., said that the right to call for an account fell upon the administrator de bonis non.

In Hall's Goods (1827) 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. (Eng.) 139, an action being brought in the King's bench by the administrator de bonis non against the executors of his predecessor, who left a considerable balance of the estate in the hands of his bankers, the prerogative court granted a motion that the bond be produced before the King's bench. But this case is commented on in Beall v. New Mexico (1872) 16 Wall. (U. S.) 535, 21 L. ed. 292, as undoubtedly founded on the theory that there was undistributed money in bank, which was a part of the original intestate's estate in specie.

For Welman v. Armour (1811) R. M. Charl. (Ga.) 6, see supra, II.

New Hampshire.

The New Hampshire cases seem to take it for granted that the common-law rule is not in force there, whether they were decided before or after the statute, providing that if administration becomes vacant the judge of probate may grant administration on the estate not already administered, to such person as he may think proper, and that no person shall act as administrator until he shall have given bonds to the probate judge to pay and deliver the residue of the estate which shall be found remaining upon the account of such executor or administrator, unto such person as said judge by his decree shall limit and appoint.

An administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo was held entitled to prosecute in the name of the judge of probate an action upon the bond of his predecessor, to recover a balance found remaining in his hands on a settlement of his final account of administration, as, where the balance remained in the hands of a deceased executor unadministered, it was peculiarly and legitimately within the province of the new administrator, as part, or the whole, of the estate of the deceased testator, of which it was his express and positive duty to take charge. Judge of Probate v. Claggett (1858) 36 N. H. 381, 72 Am. Dec. 314.

An administrator de bonis non was held to be the official successor in the trust, and entitled to receive whatever remained of the estate in his predecessor's hands, on the settlement of the account; and, in default of payment, was the proper person to maintain an action by a suit on the probate bond. Prescott v. Farmer (1879) 59 N. H. 90.

Where an executor in New Hampshire sold lands in Vermont as administrator with the will annexed, and the settlement in Vermont showed a large sum in his hands with which he was charged, and the court in Vermont ordered him to pay the same to such persons as the probate court in New Hampshire should direct, it was held that the administrator de bonis non of the estate in New Hampshire was entitled to recover on the executor's bond for the balance in the hands of such executor. Judge of Probate v. Heydock (1837) 8 N. H. 491.

North Carolina.

In Cannon v. Jenkins (1830) 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 422, it was held that an account of the proceeds of slaves demanded by legatees involved a general account of the deceased administrator's administration,—“an account to which the next of kin have no primary right, but only the administrator de bonis non of the testator.”

In Conrad v. Dalton (1831) 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 251, the court said: “Where the goods have actually been wasted by the first executor or administrator, I am at a loss to say what is to be done. For a devastavit is in tort which dies with the person. Perhaps our acts of assembly, reviving all causes of action where property is the subject of controversy,—that is, all which are not merely vindictive,—will enable the administrator de bonis non to sustain an action, even where there has been an actual devastavit.”

In Badger v. Jones (1872) 66 N. C. 305, it was said that “for any devastavit on the part of the previous administrator, the administrator de bonis non ought to recover the value or the goods and effects wasted, by an action on the bond of his predecessor.”

In Thompson v. Badham (1874) 70 N. C. 141, it was said that an administrator de bonis non “alone, to the exclusion of creditors and distributees, can recover from the representative of a deceased administrator, not only the property remaining in specie (which is the general law), but also the value of the assets which the administrator has wasted or misapplied.”

And it is now established in North Carolina that converting assets is not administering them and that the administrator has recourse on his predecessor's bond. Lansdell v. Winstead (1877) 76 N. C. 366, where the court said: “Wasting an estate is not administering it. An administration can be affected only by collecting the assets, paying the debts, and making a final distribution of the surplus among the next of kin. If an administrator dies before this is done, an administrator de bonis non must be appointed, and so on ad infinitum, until a final settlement and distribution of the estate are made. The assets which were wasted by Dillihay were unadministered, and can be administered after his death only through an administrator de bonis non, in whose name only can they, when recovered, be subjected to the demands of creditors and the claims of the next of kin.”

An administrator de bonis non may recover on his removed predecessor's bond for a devastavit. Badger v. Jones (1872) 66 N. C. 305 (stating the rule); Latham v. Bell (1873) 69 N. C. 135; Carlton v. Byers (1874) 70 N. C. 691. In Tulburt v. Hollar (1889) 102 N. C. 406, 9 S. E. 430, where the administrator had resigned, it was held that an action on his bond should be brought by an administrator de bonis non under North Carolina Code, § 1517, providing that whenever the letters of an executor, administrator, or collector are revoked his bond may be prosecuted by the person or persons succeeding to the administration of the estate. It was said: “However it may be elsewhere, under the section of the Code and decisions referred to, it is different in this state, and it is well settled that such an action cannot be maintained by the next of kin, distributees, or creditors.”

A balance in the account of the administrator is to be recovered on his bond by the administrator de bonis non. Ham v. Kornegay (1881) 85 N. C. 119; University of North Carolina v. Hughes (1884) 90 N. C. 537 (cited in Merrill v. Merrill (1885) 92 N. C. 657 and in Hardy v. Miles (1884) 91 N. C. 131); Jones v. Wooten (1905) 137 N. C. 421, 49 S. E. 915. It was so held in an action for undistributed moneys. Gilliam v. Watkins (1899) 104 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 183.

It is the duty of an administrator de bonis non to collect in all sums due the estate, whether by the former administrator or others. Mann v. Baker (1906) 142 N. C. 235, 55 S. E. 102.

So, in Wilson v. Pearson (1889)

102 N. C. 290, 9 S. E. 707, it was said that an action for a devastavit committed by an administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo, who had died, should be brought in the name of the succeeding administrator de bonis non, and that this was well settled in North Carolina, although a different rule prevailed elsewhere.

South Carolina.

In Foster v. Brown (1829) 1 Bail. L. 221, 19 Am. Dec. 672, it was said that an executor of the will of decedent could have compelled a preceding administrator to account. In Easterling v. Thompson (1838) Rice, L. 346, the court said that upon the death of an administrator his administrator was not accountable to the creditors of the first intestate. Their remedy was against the administrator de bonis non, whose duty it was to have an account from the administrator of the first administrator. In Davis v. Wright (1835) 2 Hill, L. 560, it was held that an administrator of an administrator was not liable for interest until an administrator de bonis non was appointed, inasmuch as, before his appointment, there was no person legally authorized to receive the money and give a discharge. In Villard v. Robert (1847) 1 Strobb. Eq. 393, it was held that an administrator de bonis non was competent to demand and compel an account from his predecessor, the court apparently considering as dictum the contrary view taken in Smith v. Carrere (1843) 1 Rich. Eq. 123, where it was held that the distributee might sue the representative of a deceased administrator without the appointment of an administrator de bonis non, the court taking the view that an administrator de bonis non could not recover of his predecessor for converted assets. The opinions in the Villard Case, supra, contain a review of a number of English cases, and do not admit that the general rule aforesaid was ever the common law.

The Villard Case was approved on principle in Rhame v. Lewis (1867) 13 Rich. Eq. 318, and in Redfearn v. Craig (1900) 57 S. C. 534, 35 S. E. 1024, where the court said: "It is contended that the authorities in this state support the view that it is only unadministered assets of an intestate that pass to his administrator de bonis non, on the death of the first administrator. As long as Smith v. Carrere, supra, was allowed to remain as authority in this state, there was something in defendant W. D. Craig's contention; but when Chancellor Job Johnson, by his clear reasoning, with the authorities supporting his position, in Villard v. Robert, supra, furnished a review of Chancellor Harper's decree in Smith v. Carrere, supra, there was nothing left in it but its name; its authority was blasted forever. . . . The later case of Rhame v. Lewis (1867) 13 Rich. Eq. 269, went further, if anything, than did Villard v. Robert, supra."

Tennessee.

In Tennessee, the cases, while at first inclining to the general rule, later took the contrary view.

In Thompson v. Childress (1873) 1 Tenn. Ch. 369, it was said: "The nearest analogy in the law to the case before us is that of an administrator de bonis non and his right to sue his predecessor. Upon this subject, the decisions of our supreme court are not quite as clear and consistent as an inferior tribunal would like to find them. In Shackleford v. Runyan (1846) 7 Humph. 141, it was held that an administrator de bonis non might call his predecessor in the administration to account in a court of chancery; while in Stott v. Alexander (1855) 2 Sneed, 654, there is a dictum to the contrary. On the other hand, in Thomas v. Stanley (1857) 4 Sneed, 411, it was held that an administrator de bonis non could not maintain covenant on the administration bond of his predecessor, which decision is referred to and recognized in Reeves v. Steele (1859) 2 Head, 647. The latest decisions and the weight of authority are against the power to sue, at any rate upon the bond of the predecessor; and it is a suit upon the bond that is now before us."

In Stott v. Alexander (1855) 2 Sneed, 650, it was held that the administrator de bonis non could not maintain an action of trover against the representative of the former administrator for money of the plaintiff's intestate, collected by the former administrator, where the same could not be specifically distinguished and identified.

In Thomas v. Stanley, supra, it was held that an administrator de bonis non could not maintain an action on the bond of his predecessor for money received by him, which he had failed to pay over to the heirs and distributees, as the duty of administrators de bonis non only applies to such property and effects not administered as remained in specie.

In Cheek v. Wheatley (1856) 3 Sneed, 484, the court said that an administrator de bonis non "is to administer such assets of the estate as remain in specie at the death of the former administrator. To this extent merely, in the absence of statutory regulations, is he the representative of the estate. . . . He is not responsible for the maladministration or devastavit of his predecessor. He cannot inquire into or impeach the validity of his acts."

But in Shackelford v. Runyan (1846) 7 Humph. 141, it was held that an administrator de bonis non could call to account the personal representative of the first administrator. The court said: "However it may be in England, or elsewhere, an administrator de bonis non in our state is clothed with the full powers, and subject to all the duties, of the first personal representative, and is embraced and described in our statutes by the general description of administrator, whether by such statutes powers are given or duties imposed."

And where an administrator de bonis non and the heirs and distributees brought a bill against the executors and sureties of the administrator, seeking to collect the balance found due on the last settlement and to correct all errors therein, it was held that such an action could be maintained. Whitaker v. Whitaker (1883) 12 Lea, 393. The court distinguished the cases of Thomas v. Stanley, Stott v. Alexander, and Cheek v. Wheatley, supra, on the ground that these cases were all actions at law, and "they necessarily, in their investigation, would have ordered a review of the accounts of the former administrator, for which the machinery of a law court is insufficient."

IV. Miscellaneous.

A judgment in personam for a devastavit, rendered against an executor and in favor of an administrator de bonis non by a probate court, will be assumed to have been within its powers until the state supreme court decides otherwise, in view of statutes which provide for charging an executor in his account with all the goods of the deceased that come to his possession, and with waste in case of neglect to pay over the money in his hands, or of loss to the persons interested, with liability on the bond as an alternative, and of decisions of the highest state court that money received by an administrator, and unjustifiably paid out, is still in his hands in contemplation of law, and that parties interested may surcharge or falsify his account, and that the assets of an estate are not regarded as administered until they have been collected and applied as required by law or by the will, until which time the jurisdiction of the probate court remains. Michigan Trust Co. v. Ferry (1912) 228 U. S. 346, 57 L. ed. 867, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550, reversing (1910) 99 C. C. A. 221, 235, 175 Fed. 667, 681.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Appts.

v.

BEAKES DAIRY COMPANY, Respt.

(222 N. Y. 416, 119 N. E. 115.)

License — condition — bond to pay debts.

1. A corporation may be required to give bond to pay for purchases made, or to satisfy a state commissioner of its solvency, as a condition to securing a license to engage in the business of purchasing milk and cream.

Statutes — amendment — existing penalties.

2. The insertion in an agricultural law of a provision requiring a license with bond to pay for purchases made before engaging in the business of buying milk makes the insertion subject to existing provisions of the law providing penalties to be collected in a civil action for violation of the statute.

Pleading — separate counts — penalties — what considered.

3. In an action to recover a series of penalties for purchasing milk without a license, each purchase being the subject of a separate count, each count must be read separately as though it was the only one, in determining whether or not a violation of the statutory provision is charged.

License — purchasing milk — business.

4. Carrying on the business of purchasing milk within the meaning of a statute requiring a license for such business implies continuity of conduct,—a continuous course of dealing, not an isolated transaction.

Pleading — failure to state cause of action.

5. A complaint seeking penalties for a large number of separate acts of buying milk without license, without charging the carrying on of the business of buying milk for which the statute requires a license to be taken out, does not state a cause of action.

Constitutional law — holding statute unconstitutional.

6. To hold a statute unconstitutional is a grave thing.

— prohibiting lawful business.

7. The state may not prohibit the business of purchasing milk and cream.

[See 6 R. C. L. 266–268.]

8. The legislature may regulate a business, however lawful in itself, if it may become a medium of fraud.

[See 6 R. C. L. 267, 268.]

9. One not affected by the unconstitutionality of a statute cannot raise the question of such unconstitutionality.

— class legislation.

10. A statute requiring a license of persons engaged in the business of buying milk and cream is not invalid as class legislation.

11. There is no constitutional prohibition against class legislation as such, if the classification is based on some reasonable grounds and is not essentially arbitrary.

12. Power vested in a state commissioner to waive a provision of a statute requiring the giving of a bond conditioned to pay debts in order to secure a license to purchase milk and cream in case of persons of recognized financial ability is not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

13. A corporation has no natural right to engage in the business of purchasing milk without obtaining a license on such terms as the legislature may provide.

[See 17 R. C. L. 489.]

Corporation — right to impair charter.

14. The legislature may not, under the guise of an amendment to a corporate charter, defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, but it may qualify it by reasonable restrictions.

[See 7 R. C. L. 121.]

APPEAL by the people from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for Saratoga County (Kellogg, J.) denying defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, and dismissing the complaint, in an action brought to recover penalties for purchasing milk without a license in violation of statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles M. Stern, and C. T. Dawes, with Mr. Merton E. Lewis, Attorney General, for appellants:

In so far as defendant is concerned, the Milk-gathering Statute can be sustained as an exercise of the reserved power of the state to amend the corporate charter of one of its own corporations.

A statute cannot be proved unconstitutional by thinking up other instances to which it might with equal propriety have been made to apply.

Southwestern Oil Co. v. Texas, 217 U. S. 114, 121, 54 L. ed. 688, 692, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 496; Keokee Consol. Coke Co. v. Taylor, 234 U. S. 224, 227, 58 L. ed. 1288, 1289, 34 Sup. Ct. There has been no unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The statute does not vest in the commissioner of agriculture power to arbitrarily excuse one person from the giving of a bond, and require it of another.

Pound, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover judgment against defendant for 298 penalties of $100 each for buying milk or cream within the state from certain producers for the purpose of shipping the same to New York city for consumption or manufacture, without having been duly licensed as provided by §§ 55 and following of the Agricultural Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 1), added thereto by chapter 408 of the Laws of 1913, as amended by chapter 651 of the Laws of 1915. The principal provisions of the statute are as follows:

"Sec. 55. Licensing of milk-gathering stations where milk is bought. —On and after September first, nineteen hundred and thirteen, no person, firm, association or corporation, shall buy milk or cream within the state from producers for the purpose of shipping the same to any city for consumption or for manufacture, unless such business be regularly transacted at an office or station within the state and unless such person, firm, association or corporation be duly licensed as provided in this and the ensuing sections of this article. Every such person, firm, association or corporation before engaging or continuing in the business of buying milk or cream for the purposes aforesaid, shall, annually, on or before August first, file an application with the commissioner of agriculture for a license to transact such business. The application shall state the nature of the business, as hereinabove set forth, the full name of the person or corporation applying for the license, and, if the applicant be a firm or association, the full name of each member of such firm, or association, the city, town or village and street number at which the business is to be conducted, and such other facts as the commissioner of agriculture shall prescribe. The applicant shall further satisfy the commissioner of his or its character, financial responsibility and good faith in seeking to carry on such business. The commissioner shall thereupon issue to such applicant, on payment of ten dollars, a license entitling the applicant to conduct the business of buying milk and cream from producers for the purpose aforesaid at an office or station at the place named in the application until the first day of September next following. . . .

"A license shall not be issued as provided in this section, on and after the taking effect of this section, unless the applicant for such license shall file with the application a good and sufficient surety bond, executed by a surety company, duly authorized to transact business in this state, in a sum not less than five thousand dollars, or shall be relieved from such requirement as provided herein. Such bond shall be approved as to its form and sufficiency by the commissioner of agriculture.

"Such applicant may in lieu of such bond deposit with the commissioner of agriculture money or securities in which the trustees of a savings bank may invest the moneys deposited therein, as provided in the banking law, in an amount equal to the sum secured by the bond required to be filed as herein provided.

"The bond required to be filed hereunder shall be given to the commissioner of agriculture in his official capacity and shall be conditioned for the faithful compliance by the licensee with the provisions of this chapter, as hereby amended, and for the payment of all amounts due to persons who have sold milk or cream to such licensee, during the period that the license is in force.

"Upon default by the licensee in the payment of any money due for the purchase of milk or cream, which payment is secured by a bond or the deposit of money or securities as hereinbefore provided for, the creditor may file with the commissioner of agriculture, upon a form prescribed by him, a verified statement of his claim. If such creditor shall have reduced such claim to judgment or shall thereafter and before the commencement of the action by the commissioner of agriculture, as hereinafter provided for, reduce such claim to judgment, a transcript of such judgment shall also be filed with such commissioner.

"After the expiration of ninety days from the termination of any license period the commissioner of agriculture shall, by proper action wherein all such creditors and any surety upon any bond given as hereinbefore provided for and the licensee shall be parties, proceed to determine the amount due each such creditor, and the judgment rendered in such action shall be enforced ratably for such creditors against the surety on the bond, if one there be, or against the moneys or securities deposited as hereinbefore provided for. . . .

"A person or corporation licensed hereunder shall make a verified statement of his or its disbursements during a period to be prescribed by the commissioner of agriculture, containing the names of the persons from whom such products were purchased, and the amount due to the vendors thereof. Such statement shall be submitted to the commissioner of agriculture when requested by him and shall be in the form prescribed by such commissioner. If it appears from such statement or other facts ascertained by the commissioner of agriculture, upon inspection or investigation of the books and papers of such licensee as authorized by section fifty-six of this chapter, that the security afforded to persons selling milk and cream to such licensee by the bond executed or deposit made by such licensee as herein provided does not adequately protect such vendors, the commissioner of agriculture may require such licensee to give an additional bond or to deposit additional moneys or securities, to be executed or deposited as above provided, in a sum to be determined by the commissioner, but not exceeding by more than twenty-five per centum the maximum amount paid out by such licensee to sellers of milk in any one month; provided, however, that the maximum amount of the bond or deposit required from any applicant under the provisions of this section shall be one hundred thousand dollars; and that any applicant filing a bond or deposition money or securities in such maximum amount shall be exempted from filing either the statements of milk purchased, or the statements of disbursements in this section provided for.

"If the applicant for a license under this section be a person or domestic corporation, the commissioner of agriculture may, notwithstanding the provisions of this section, if satisfied from an investigation of the financial condition of such person or domestic corporation that such person or corporation is solvent and possessed of sufficient assets to reasonably assure compensation to probable creditors, by an order filed in the department of agriculture, relieve such person or corporation from the provisions of this section requiring the filing of a bond.

"The term 'station' or 'milk-gathering station' as used in this and the ensuing sections of this article, shall include an established office where the business of buying milk or cream as herein provided, is carried on, without a place or premises in connection therewith for the physical handling of milk or cream."

To summarize the principal features of the enactment:

1. No person, firm, association, or corporation shall, as a business, buy milk or cream within the state from producers for the purpose of shipping the same to any city for consumption or manufacture without having (a) an established office within the state, and (b) a license.

2. No such person, firm, association, or corporation may obtain a license without (a) satisfying the commissioner of agriculture of his character and financial responsibility; (b) either by giving a surety company bond of not less than five thousand dollars or more than one hundred thousand dollars, or making a deposit of money or securities, or (c) if an individual or a domestic corporation, satisfying the commissioner that he "is solvent and possessed of sufficient assets to reasonably assure compensation to probable creditors."

3. On default of payment by a licensee of money due for the purchase of milk and cream the commissioner shall apply the security to the extinguishment of the claims of creditors filed with him.

Defendant is a domestic corporation. It demurred to each of the 298 causes of action set forth in the complaint, on the ground that the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action, and moved for judgment on the pleadings. At the special term the motion was denied, but the appellate division reversed the order denying the motion, and dismissed the complaint, one justice dissenting and one not voting, on the ground "that the purpose of the statute is to secure payment for the purchase price of merchandise, and is class legislation and not a valid exercise of the police power."

Does an action lie to recover a penalty for violation of § 55 of the Agricultural Law? Section 61 provides that "any person who . . . not being licensed, shall conduct the business of buying milk for shipment as provided in § 55, . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

But the Agricultural Law (§ 52) also provides for penalties to be collected in a civil action. "Every person violating any of the provisions of this chapter, shall forfeit to the people of the state of New York the sum of not less than fifty dollars nor more than one hundred dollars for the first violation." When §§ 55 to 61 became a part of "this chapter" (Laws 1909, chap. 9, being chapter 1 of the Consolidated Laws, known as the Agricultural Law), the provisions of § 52 applied automatically to violations thereof, except where obvious inconsistencies arose. Far from being an inconsistency, it is in entire harmony with the general purpose of the Agricultural Law to provide both criminal and civil liability for violations of its provisions.

Is a violation of the provisions of § 55 charged in the complaint? The grievance to be complained of is not each act of purchasing, but the act of conducting the business of purchasing. The complaint charges in 298 separate counts that on or about a certain date, each count setting forth a different date, defendant bought milk or cream from certain producers without having been duly licensed. Each count must be read separately, as if it were the only count. The complaint does not allege that at any time defendant carried on the business of purchasing milk or cream. Carrying on the business within the terms of the statute implies continuity of conduct in that respect, — a continuous course of dealing, not an isolated transaction. Penn Collieries Co. v. McKeever, 183 N. Y. 98, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 127, 75 N. E. 935; People ex rel. Allen v. Whiting, 68 Misc. 306, 123 N. Y. Supp. 769. Section 52 of the Agricultural Law provides for separate penalties for separate acts of selling, exposing for sale, using, and the like, but no provision is made for cumulative penalties in case the purchasing is carried on or continued from day to day. The offense of carrying on the business in violation of the statute should alone be pleaded, and one penalty sued for. People v. Spencer, 201 N. Y. 105, 94 N. E. 614, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 818. The complaint does not state facts constituting 298 causes of action, neither does it state facts constituting one cause of action. Pleading— failure to state cause of action.

Defendant's demurrer should accordingly be sustained, and this opinion might end at this point.

We are asked, however, to pass upon the constitutionality of the statute. Courts often say that they will withhold a decision on the constitutionality of a statute until it becomes unavoidable for the determination of the case (Hanrahan v. Terminal Station Commission, 206 N. Y. 494, 504, 100 N. E. 414); but it seems like an anticlimax to the careful presentation of this appeal on constitutional grounds to dispose of it temporarily as a mere matter of the wording of the complaint. Defendant urges that this is a statute to compel the payment of indebtedness; that nothing in the business of purchasing milk or cream carries with it any special necessity for imposing unusual burdens upon those who carry it on; that the statute has no relation to the public morals, safety, or convenience, or any great public need; that it is unmistakably and palpably in excess of the legislative power; that it violates the due process clauses of the state and Federal Constitutions; that it is also objectionable as "class legislation," and because it delegates legislative power to the commissioner of agriculture. Plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that, as harmful businesses may be prohibited, so useful businesses may be regulated when the public interests will be thereby subserved; that a useful business may, by reason of local conditions or customs, prove a menace to the public welfare; that it must be presumed that this business has fittingly come under the legislative eye and rule for the reason that, when unrestricted, it had become or threatened to become the cause of more than ordinary loss to a considerable class in the community, and that the manner of regulation is a matter of legislative discretion.

To hold a statute unconstitutional is a grave thing to do. To refuse, by so doing, to recognize a demonstrated evil, and to characterize the unusual in legislation as impossible, is unwise. Constitutional law is, "to a certain extent, a progressive science" (Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 385, 42 L. ed. 780, 788, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383), and the courts have become more cautious "about pressing the broad words of the 14th Amendment to a dryly logical extreme." Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 110, 55 L. ed. 112, 116, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487.

So many decisions of the courts of his state and of the United States have dealt with the question of legislative power that only a few of the most recent will be considered. We may begin with the proposition that the state may not prohibit the lawful, common, and ordinary business of purchasing milk or cream (People ex rel. Wyroler v. Warden, 157 N. Y. 116, 3 L.R.A. 264, 68 Am. St. Rep. 763, 1 N. E. 1006; Frank L. Fisher Co. v. Woods, 187 N. Y. 90, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 707, 79 N. E. 836; Adams v. Tanner, 244 U. S. 590, 61 L. ed. 336, L.R.A.1917F, 1163, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 73), but it may regulate a business, however honest in itself, if it may become a medium of fraud. It is not enough to say that the business may be honestly conducted. The state may, to some extent, compel honesty by imposing a license fee, if widespread frauds upon and losses by its people are thereby prevented. Any trade, calling, or occupation may be reasonably regulated if "the general nature of the business is such that, unless regulated, many persons may be exposed to misfortunes against which the legislature can properly protect them." Allen v. Riley, 203 U. S. 347, 51 L. ed. 216, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95, 8 Ann. Cas. 137; Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 343, 60 L. ed. 1034, 1036, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522. Passing from the general to the particular, the constitutionality of the "Blue Sky Laws" of Ohio and other states, which require dealers in corporate stocks and other securities to be licensed, has been upheld. Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co. 242 U. S. 539, 61 L. ed. 480, L.R.A.1917F, 514, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 217, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643; Caldwell v. Sioux Falls Stock Yards Co. 242 U. S. 559, 61 L. ed. 493, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Merrick v. N. W. Halsey & Co. 242 U. S. 568, 61 L. ed. 498, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227. The evils of "get-rich-quick" schemes called for protection against the frauds of unscrupulous dealers. Licenses may be required for employment agencies. Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 343, 60 L. ed. 1034, 1036, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522; People ex rel. Armstrong v. Warden, 183 N. Y. 223, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 859, 76 N. E. 11, 5 Ann. Cas. 325. The business of banking by individuals and partnerships has been held subject to license (Musco v. United Surety Co. 196 N. Y. 459, 465, 134 Am. St. Rep. 851, 90 N. E. 171; Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 128, 55 L. ed. 128, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190) "because fraud could be practised in it." The business of selling patent rights, being peculiarly one in which fraud may be practised, may be regulated. Allen v. Riley, supra. Even "ice cream" may be standardized by state legislatures in order that consumers may not be misled (Hutchinson Ice Cream Co. v. Iowa, 242 U. S. 153, 61 L. ed. 217, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28), and a standard size of bread loaves may be fixed. Schmid-

But all these statutes and many others have for their legitimate object the prevention of frauds, rather than the collection of debts through the agency of the state. This statute points to protection from the probability of financial loss rather than fraud, and goes far beyond any mere licensing statute by requiring the licensee to give security for payment of his debts to purchasers. The business regulated is not done with ignorant people, the chosen and easy prey of the cunning and unscrupulous impostor. It is done with men of ordinary intelligence, fully conscious of what they are about. "The state must adapt its legislation to evils as they appear." McKenna, J., in Merrick v. N. W. Halsey & Co. supra. If the legislature can check impending ills before they become notorious, the courts should not say that it has acted too soon. As suggested by Klein v. Maravelas, 219 N. Y. 383, L.R.A. 1917E, 549, 114 N. E. 809, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 273, that which seems vain and capricious to one generation may become the wisdom of the next. But it is urged that so much of this statute as aims to compel certain purchasers of milk to pay their debts, measured by the standards of the obligations of the state to its citizens as we now understand them, is a hateful interference with the freedom of men to transact ordinary business, not affected with a public interest, with other men as they see fit; that its implication is that bad debts may be secured or prevented by the exercise on the part of the state of its power to regulate trades and callings; that this is a doctrine of paternalism, in direct conflict with our judicial notion of liberty under the Constitution. Schnaier v. Navarre Hotel & Importation Co. 182 N. Y. 83, 70 L.R.A. 722, 108 Am. St. Rep. 790, 74 N. E. 561; People ex rel. Wineburgh Adv. Co. v. Murphy, 195 N. Y. 126, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 735, 88 N.

E. 17; People v. Ringe, 197 N. Y. 143, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528, 90 N. E. 451, 18 Ann. Cas. 474; People ex rel. Duryea v. Wilber, 198 N. Y. 1, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 357, 90 N. E. 1140, 19 Ann. Cas. 1914B, 263.

The question is not presented whether the statute is valid as an exercise of the police power of the state over individuals; nor is the determination of that question essential to the decision of this case.

The question here is whether the defendant, a domestic corporation, is affected by the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute in the features complained of. If it is not, it cannot complain. Jeffrey Mfg. Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 576, 59 L. ed. 364, 368, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 167, 7 N. C. C. A. 570; Thomas Cusack Co. v. Chicago, 242 U. S. 526, 530, 61 L. ed. 472, 475, L.R.A. 1918A, 136, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 594.

Whatever might be said of the statute as "class legislation" (State v. Latham, 115 Me. 176, L.R.A. 1917A, 480, 98 Atl. 578, supreme judicial court of Maine, September 9, 1916) is answered by People v. Havnor, 149 N. Y. 195, 205, 31 L.R.A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707, 43 N. E. 541. The statute there under consideration placed barbers in a class by themselves, and then subdivided the class between barbers in New York and Saratoga and barbers elsewhere for the purpose of regulating their right to work on Sunday; but Vann. J., said: "The statute treats all barbers alike within the same localities . . . under like circumstances and conditions. . . ." There is no constitutional prohibition against class legislation as such.

—right to raise question of unconstitutionality.

if the classification is based on some reasonable ground, and is not essentially arbitrary. The statutes are replete with instances where the legislature has selected a class of persons for regulation. People v. C. Klinck Packing Co. 214 N. Y. 121, 137, 108 N. E. 278, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1051. It is only where there is no real distinction on a substantial basis that it can be said that the equal protection of the laws is denied. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255; Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 216 U. S. 400, 54 L. ed. 536, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 287, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 220 U. S. 61, 55 L. ed. 369, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160.

Nor can it be said that the power vested in the commissioner of agriculture to waive the requirement of a bond or other security in certain cases is a delegation of legislative power. He is not left "without check or guidance." The legislature has furnished the rule; the commissioner merely applies it. His determination is subject to judicial review. § 58. In People v. C. Klinck Packing Co. supra, the provisions of the statute exempted from the application of the hours of Rest Law certain employees, "if the commissioner of labor in his discretion approves." Those words were held to have the vice of vesting the commissioner with the power wholly at his volition to suspend the operation of the statute. The legislature here prescribes the regulations which are to be enforced according to the legal discretion of the commissioner. Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340, 343, 60 L. ed. 034, 1036, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 561, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 522. Nor does it appear that defendant has applied or failed to obtain a license without giving a bond. Lehon v. Atlanta, 242 U. S. 53, 61 L. ed. 145, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 70.

Is the statute good as the exercise of the lawful power of the state over a domestic corporation? As a corporation created by this state, defendant has no natural right to purchase milk without obtaining a license on such terms as the state directs. Corporate charters may be altered or repealed. N. Y. Const. art. 8, § 1. Under the guise of an amendment to corporate charters the legislature may not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, the right of the corporation to transact business, but it may qualify it by reasonable restrictions. Sutton v. New Jersey, 244 U. S. 258, 61 L. ed. 1117, P.U.R.1917E, 682, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 110, 55 L. ed. 112, 116, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487. In Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45, 53 L. ed. 81, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33, a statute provided that "it shall be unlawful for any person, corporation, or association of persons to maintain or operate any college, school, or institution" where both whites and negroes were taught. Recognizing the power of the legislature to so amend the charter of Berea College or of all domestic corporations, the test applied was whether the law would have been enacted as to corporations alone had it appeared that it would be invalid as applied to the privileges of individuals; and it was held that the fact that corporations were separately mentioned in the act justified the inference that the statute was separable, and was to be so construed as to be upheld as to corporations under the reserved power to amend corporate charters. "The act itself, being separable, is to be read as though it in one section prohibited any person, in another section any corporation, and in a third any association of persons, to do the acts named. Reading the statute as containing a separate prohibition on all corporations, at least, all state corporations, it substantially declares that any authority given by previous charters to instruct the two races at the same time and in the same place is forbidden, and that prohibition, being a departure from the terms of the original charter in this case, may properly be adjudged an amendment." p. 57. The dissenting opinion of Harlan, J., emphasizes the distinction between persons and corporations made by the prevailing opinion. It characterizes the effect of the decision as making a law in violation of the legislative intent and against the fair presumption that equality of treatment was intended. Corporations are separately named in the act before us repeatedly and with sedulous care, and the act is not distinguishable in that respect from the case cited. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. United States, 212 U. S. 481, 497, 53 L. ed. 613, 623; 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 304; Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Clay, 197 Fed. 437.

In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Williams, 199 N. Y. 108, 116, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 549, 139 Am. St. Rep. 850, 92 N. E. 404, this court, in dealing with the provisions of the Labor Law requiring payment of employees of certain classes of corporations and persons in cash and on the 1st and 15th of the month, approved the doctrine of the Berea College Case. It said: "The constitutionality of the statute is not questioned here by any individuals . . . and even if the enactment should be deemed unconstitutional so far as persons are concerned, the provision relating to them is readily separable from the rest of the statute relating to corporations, and its invalidity in this respect, if so adjudged, need not affect the application of the provision to steam surface railroad corporations. . . . It matters not that both provisions are contained in the same section. . . . In New York a special charter may be amended by a general act which does not refer specifically to such charter. . . . Such was the effect given by the Supreme Court of the United States to a general statute of

When the companion case of Erie R. Co. v. Williams, 199 N. Y. 525, 92 N. E. 1084, affirmed in 233 U. S. 685, 58 L. ed. 1155, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1097, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 761, involving the constitutionality of the same provisions of the Labor Law, reached the Supreme Court of the United States, it was said that "cost and inconvenience would have to be very great before they could become an element in the consideration of the right of a state to exert its reserved power." p. 700.

The Ives Case, 201 N. Y. 281, 290, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 94 N. E. 431, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 156, 1 N. C. C. A. 517, decided nothing contrary when it held that the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1910 could not be upheld, in part, under the reserved power of the legislature to alter and amend corporate charters. Corporations were not specifically mentioned in the statute. The plaintiff waived the point. As in the Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141, the court declined to modify the statute in order to save part of it by writing into it words not found in it, which would, if so written, be indicative of the legislative intent.

Thus viewed, the statute as applied to the defendant merely means that it cannot continue the business of purchasing milk or cream as defined by the statute, unless it satisfies the commissioner of agriculture that it is solvent, or gives a bond or other security. As an exercise of the reserved power to amend corporate charters, this regulation may, as to this class of corporations, be salutary. It is not for us to say that it cannot be. If the law is to this extent valid, we are not concerned with the abstract question of its justice or fairness.

License—condition—bond to pay debts.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of license law which requires security for payment of debts by licensee.

- I. Introductory, 1271.
- II. General rule, 1271.
- III. Illustrations, 1273.

I. Introductory.

This note reviews only those cases which discuss the validity of the requirement of a bond for the payment of contract debts, growing out of the business authorized to be conducted by the licensee. It excludes bonds required of licensees by way of police regulation or to insure the good behavior of the licensee, and it does not purport to deal with the validity of statutes requiring bonds of building and loan associations, investment companies, banks, and insurance companies, nor with the constitutionality of those statutes commonly called "Blue Sky Laws."

II. General rule.

Since the state or a municipality may regulate any business, however lawful in itself, which may be so conducted as to become the medium of fraud and dishonesty, a requirement of a bond to insure creditors of the business against financial loss is a valid enactment, and is not class legislation, if the requirement is based on reasonable grounds and is not essentially arbitrary. Hawthorn v. People (1883) 109 Ill. 302, 50 Am. Rep. 610; State ex rel. Brewster v. Mohler (1916) 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408, affirmed in (1918) 248 U. S. 112, 63 L. ed. 152, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32; State ex rel. Beek v. Wagener (1899) 77 Minn. 483, 46 L.R.A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 80 N. W. 683, 778, 1134; Portland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1915) 75 Or. 37, L.R.A.1915D, 260, 146 Pac. 148; Ferguson-Hendrix Co. v. Fidelity & D. Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 528, 140 Pac. 700; State v. Bowen & Co. (1915) 86 Wash. 23, 149 Pac. 330, Ann. Cas.

1917B, 625. And see the reported case (PEOPLE v. BEAKES DAIRY CO. ante, 1260).

In State ex rel. Brewster v. Mohler (1916) 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408, sustaining an act requiring bond to be given by commission merchants the court stated the grounds on which such legislation was upheld as follows: "The chief objections to the act may be thus summarized: (a) The act is meddlesome, discriminatory, and class legislation, and so burdensome that it will confiscate and destroy an honorable, useful, and legitimate private business; (b) it confers judicial power on an administrative functionary; (c) it confers corporate power on the state board of agriculture; (d) it interferes with interstate commerce or unjustly burdens domestic commerce; (e) the title is defective and the act contains two subjects; (f) the act is special; (g) the judicial review is anomalous; and (h) the penalties are excessive. Examining these points in order, the act is to be justified, if at all, as an exercise of the state's police power. It is sometimes contended that the state cannot regulate private business, and that unless the business is one of public concern it is exempt from legislative interference. Probably this notion is due to the fact that the modern American state has hitherto left private business largely to its own devices, and because the state in recent years has largely concerned itself with the regulation of business as to which the public's interest was undeniable. Hence the elaborate statutes regulating public service corporations. But there can be no doubt that the state's police power may extend to private business. Our statutes relating to registration of deeds and mortgages, the statute of Frauds, the Mechanic's Lien Law, and the like, are illustrations of the exercise of the state's police power over private business. It is also true that business which has heretofore been considered to be private may, by changes and progress in the methods of its conduct, be transformed into a public or quasi public business, and this may make it desirable and even imperative that the state concern itself in its regulation and control. Of course, such regulations must be reasonable, but if they are reasonable they must be obeyed. The business of commission merchants dealing in farm produce has grown to be one of great volume and much importance. In its development its tendency seems to be to centralize in the larger cities, far removed from the points of origin, and where by no practical possibility can the originators of the traffic, the consignors, keep personal check on the doings of the commission merchants, who are merely the agents of the consignors. Such a situation would seem to warrant a reasonable extension of the state's governmental power over the business. The act does classify commission merchants, but the classification is reasonable. It relates to all who sell farm produce on commission for resale, and this includes 'agricultural, horticultural, vegetable, and fruit products of the soil, and meats, poultry, eggs, dairy products, nuts, and honey,' but not timber, floricultural products, tea, or coffee. It practically reaches all the important and useful products of farm and truck garden. It specifically exempts matters of little consequence to the Kansas producer. If, as argued, it also exempts live stock, that, too, is a reasonable exemption, since live stock is almost invariably shipped in carloads, and is so valuable as to justify the producer or shipper in the expense of accompanying his shipment to market and personally supervising the fidelity of the commission merchant who makes the sale for him, or in making the sale himself. As modern business is now conducted, it is practically impossible for the ordinary farmer or fruit producer or truck gardener to market his own products without the agency of the commission merchant. Nor do the exactions of the statute seem unduly burdensome. It exacts a license of $10 per annum. That fee is not onerous. It requires a bond to insure the commission merchant's fidelity and the payment of his obligations. This is in accord with the general tendency of modern business, to relieve it from the uncertainty of fraud or insolvency. It requires the merchant to account and report promptly and completely to the consignor. Perhaps this has always been the law, for what is the relation of consignor and commission merchant but that of principal and agent, and what is this statutory requirement to account and report but the common-law duty of faithful and full disclosure to his principal of all the agent's doings? Illustrations are submitted in affidavits showing how onerous, burdensome, and expensive it would be to make a detailed account of the sales of a commission merchant. Thus, a barrel of garlic is usually sold in small quantities, the remainder being kept in cold storage until called for. A carload of onions containing 470 crates is disposed of by the commission merchant to perhaps four hundred different retail merchants. A barrel of radishes is usually sold in bunches of a few dozen. Many such illustrations are given, and while they do show that a strict compliance with the act will necessitate a good deal of bookkeeping, we cannot but marvel how commission merchants have kept track of all these details hitherto. Probably the legislature was convinced that they did not keep accurate accounts of these innumerable transactions, not through wilful breach of faith, but because it was not humanly possible for a man's memory to stand such a strain, and hence the legislative determination that the memory method, or whatever method it was, should be superseded by an accurate and detailed system of accounting. If this occasions an added expense to the business, the traffic will have to bear it." The foregoing decision was affirmed in (1918) 248 U. S.

112, 63 L. ed. 152, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32. Mr. Justice McReynolds saying: "Plaintiffs in error maintain that the statute is class legislation which abridges their rights and privileges, that it deprives them of the equal protection of the laws and also of their property without due process of law, all in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Manifestly, the purpose of the state was to prevent certain evils incident to the business of commission merchants in farm products by regulating it. Many former opinions have pointed out the limitations upon powers of the states concerning matter of this kind, and we think the present record fails to show that these limitations have been transcended."

III. Illustrations.

A statute requiring a person handling agricultural products on commission, to give a bond for the security of persons consigning goods to him, has been upheld in several cases: State ex rel. Brewster v. Mohler (1916) 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408, affirmed in (1918) 248 U. S. 112, 63 L. ed. 152, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32; State ex rel. Beek v. Wagener (1899) 77 Minn. 483, 46 L.R.A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134; State v. Bowen & Co. (1915) 86 Wash. 23, 149 Pac. 330, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 625.

In State v. Powles & Co. (1916) 90 Wash. 112, 155 Pac. 774, the court held a similar act to be void because of indefiniteness as to the term "commission merchant."

In Ferguson-Hendrix Co. v. Fidelity & D. Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 528, 140 Pac. 700, the court had under consideration the constitutionality of a statute providing that it shall be "unlawful" for a commission merchant to engage in the business of selling farm, dairy, orchard, and garden produce "on commission" without first obtaining a license to carry on such business, and giving a bond to the state "executed by a surety company" authorized to do business in the state, the bond to be in the sum of $3,000 for the benefit of persons consigning produce to be sold on commission, and its form to be approved by the attorney general. It was contended that the act was unconstitutional in that the bond was required to be executed by a surety company, authorized to do business in the state, thus denying the right of the licensee to deposit money or to give personal security. The court held that it could not yield its assent to this view, saying that "it is well known that lapse of time, fluctuations in values of property, the uncertainty of human life, and the risk of a dishonest surety, often render personal security inadequate when called upon to meet its promised responsibility. This is doubtless one of the reasons which influenced the legislature in requiring that the bond be executed by a surety company authorized to do business in this state. The court further said: "It was further remarked that it was evident to the court that it would be more economical for the public to become its own insurer of the good faith of its officials, which would result, perhaps, in no official bond in any case. We had supposed that under the Constitution, the question as to whether the public welfare justified or required the state to exert its police power was a legislative question, and that, ordinarily, courts would not thwart the legislative will if any reason existed or could be suggested for the exercise of the power. It is certain that personal sureties have frequently failed to respond to their obligations, and we must assume that the legislature knew this fact and considered that the character of bond under review would afford a safer, and hence a better, security to those who would be its beneficiaries. It would seem that the power to exact the security includes the right to determine the character and sufficiency of the security; that the greater power includes the lesser power. The presumption always obtains that a legislative act is constitutional, and it will be held unconstitutional only where it so plainly appears to be so as to free the mind from reasonable doubt. Guided by these principles, and for the reasons suggested, we are constrained to hold the law a valid exercise of the police power of the state. The respondent contends that there can be no recovery upon the bond because the statute makes it 'unlawful' to carry on a commission business without obtaining a license and giving a bond, and penalizes the offender, although the act does not in terms make a transaction without a license or bond void, and authorities are cited to that effect. We have held to the contrary."

In Huson v. Brown (1915) 90 Misc. 175, 154 N. Y. Supp. 131, the court had before it § 284 of the Agricultural Law (3 McKinney, Consol. Laws, p. 159), providing for actions brought on the bond of a commission merchant, and it was held that the principal, by giving a bond required by the statute pursuant to engaging in business, waived his right to question the constitutionality of the statute, and that the surety stood in no better position.

But in People ex rel. Valentine v. Berrien Circuit Judge (People ex rel. Valentine v. Coolidge) (1900) 124 Mich. 664, 50 L.R.A. 493, 83 Am. St. Rep. 352, 83 N. W. 594, it was held that an act requiring all merchants who sell farm produce on commission to procure a license and to execute a bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of their contracts, was unconstitutional as class legislation, and as an unjustifiable interference with the right of citizens to carry on a legitimate business. The court said: "There is no more reason why a commission merchant should pay a license fee and execute a bond to pay his debts and to do his business honestly, than there is that any other merchant should pay a like fee and file a like bond to properly do his business and pay his debts. The business requires no regulation, any more than any other mercantile pursuit. There is nothing in it hostile to the comfort, health, morals, or even convenience of a community. It is carried on by private persons in private buildings, and in a manner no different from that in which the merchant selling hardware or groceries or dry goods carries on his business. The law can find no support in the police power inherent in the state. It is not like the liquor traffic, which, under the decisions of every court, is subject to the police power because of the injury it does to the health, morals, and peace of the community, and may be prohibited altogether. Neither is there anything in it requiring regulation, as do hack drivers, peddlers, keepers of pawnshops, and the like. The legislature of this state is not empowered by the Constitution to regulate contracts between its citizens who are engaged in legitimate commercial business, or to require any class of persons to pay a fee for the right to carry on business, or to give a bond to perform their contracts which other parties may choose to make with them. The Constitution guarantees to citizens the right to engage in lawful business, unhampered by legislative restrictions, where no restrictions are required for the protection of the public." The decision in this case was commented on by the court in State ex rel. Brewster v. Mohler (1916) 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408, affirmed in (1918) 248 U. S. 112, 63 L. ed. 152, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 32, wherein it was said: "Whatever that great court says is always read and studied with profit, but curiously enough, in that case, the particular clause or clauses of the Constitution, state or Federal, which the statute was held to infringe, are not cited nor even hinted at. The case does not cite a single precedent of any sort; and it neither persuades nor convinces, as do the decisions of the supreme courts of Minnesota, Illinois, and Washington on this subject."

In Hawthorn v. People (1883) 109 Ill. 302, 50 Am. Rep. 610, a statute requiring the operators of butter and cheese factories on the co-operative plan to give bonds for the faithful accounting of property for manufacture was held to be constitutional, the court saying: "It is also objected that the legislature had no power to require the manufacturer to give the bond required to enable the manufacturer to commence or continue business, in this mode, in an innocent and lawful business. The business of selling liquor by saloon keepers is lawful, unless prohibited by law, and all persons might carry on the traffic; but the law has imposed as a condition that all persons shall execute a bond that they will not violate the law, before engaging in that traffic, and such a bond is intended as a security for damages he may inflict on persons injured by violating the law. The bond in this case is intended to secure those who intrust their property to the keeping of the manufacturer, against fraud or misappropriation by him of their property, just as the executor or administrator is required to give bond to secure those entitled to the funds of the estate, or the saloon keeper to give security that he will not violate the law, and thus inflict injury on his customers. It is urged that this is an unheard-of species of legislation, that the past has furnished no precedent for the law. If this should be conceded to be true, that would not of itself render the law unconstitutional. Government was organized and is supported to afford protection to the governed against wrong and oppression, and in its organization ample power was conferred on the legislative branch to afford such protection. That branch of the government holds, so to speak, a vast reservoir of legislative power never yet exercised, because the exigencies have not arisen requiring it to be exerted; but with our wonderful increase of population, advancing civilization, and increase and complication of business, that reserved power will certainly be called into action. The Constitution has not limited the exercise of legislative power to such enactments as have hitherto been passed. To so hold would be to embarrass good government, and would prove highly injurious, if not destructive. But it is insisted that it restrains and embarrasses business.

If that were conceded to be true, what provision of the Constitution forbids the legislature from exercising the power? We are aware of none. Most, if not all, of the states in the Union have required that persons in almost every species of business should procure and pay for a license to enable them to pursue the calling. Nor, so far as we are aware, has the constitutionality of such laws ever been questioned. They were undeniably a regulation, if not a restraint, on trade, and yet the power was clearly legislative, and properly exercised."

In Portland v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1915) 75 Or. 37, L.R.A.1915D, 260, 146 Pac. 148, the court upheld the validity of a municipal ordinance, providing that no person, firm, or corporation shall engage in the general messenger business without having first obtained a license and filed with the auditor a bond conditioned for the faithful delivery of any goods, packages, notes, or letters.

In New York the constitutionality of a statute requiring persons engaged in selling steamship tickets, and, in conjunction therewith, receiving deposits for transmission to foreign countries, to obtain a license and to give a bond, has been upheld. Guffanti v. National Surety Co. (1909) 196 N. Y. 452, 134 Am. St. Rep. 848, 90 N. E. 174; Musco v. United Surety Co. (1909) 196 N. Y. 459, 134 Am. St. Rep. 851, 90 N. E. 171; *Benvegna v. APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Reno County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. F. Dumont Smith and Eustace Smith for appellant.

Mr. C. M. Williams for appellee.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for libel. Plaintiff alleged that the defendant, which owns a newspaper having a large circulation in and about the city of Hutchinson, had published in its Sunday morning issue the following of and concerning the plaintiff:

"Raided Rooming House.—Sheriff Scott Sprout yesterday raided the rooming house on First avenue west, conducted by Ruth Newman. Two girls, Bess Stolen and Minnie Hatfield, were charged with being inmates of an immoral house, and the Newman woman with running an immoral house. They were released on $500 bail."

It was further alleged that the charge that plaintiff was an inmate of an immoral house was untrue, and that the publication caused her great mental anguish, humiliation, and injury. The defense was a general denial, and an averment that the language used in the article had no reference to the plaintiff, and was so understood by persons reading it, and that there were other persons living in that community where the paper was circulated named Minnie Hatfield. It was admitted that the circulation of the newspaper on the morning in question was between 7,000 and 8,000 and there is no claim that the charge mentioned in the article as against plaintiff was true. It appears that one of the parties arrested was named Minnie Olson; that the defendant's reporter had a conversation with the sheriff who made the raid preparatory to the writing of the item for the paper; that he failed to ascertain the names of the parties involved, and, through mistake, wrote the name of Minnie Hatfield instead of Minnie Olson. Plaintiff's attorney was informed by defendant's manager that an apology would be printed, and the article republished with the name corrected. The article was again published, with the change of names, but no explanation or apology accompanied it. It does not appear that there was any other person in the community by the name of Minnie Hatfield, nor that the reporter made any effort to verify the names of the parties arrested by looking up the court record. Plaintiff asked for a peremptory instruction, and it was refused. Verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The publication in plain terms specifically charged the plaintiff, a single woman of unquestioned character and reputation, with unchastity and immorality. As the imputation was untrue, malice is inferred, and of itself it constitutes a libel. Cooper v. Seaverns, 81 Kan. 267, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 517, 135 Am. St. Rep. 359, 105 Pac. 509. The only excuse is that a mistake was made in the use of plaintiff's name; the writer saying that he did not know the plaintiff, and had no intention to hurt her, and also that he did not know how he came to use her name. This is not a valid excuse. The imputation against the plaintiff was just as hurtful as if the writer had been acquainted with the plaintiff, and had intentionally applied the charge to her. The law looks to the tendency and consequences of a publication, rather than to the intention of the publisher. It is generally said that malice is a necessary element in libel, but that element is <sup>—implication of malice.</sup> present where the publication of a false charge is made without a legal excuse. When the falsity of the charge was conceded, malice was established. There is no excuse for a false charge of unchastity and immorality, which would be understood by reasonable people to refer to plaintiff, and especially where, as here, there is a lack of care and diligence on the part of the publisher to ascertain the real facts before the publication is made. One who makes an un- <sup>—charge of un-</sup> true charge of the <sup>—chaastity—risk</sup> kind in question, <sup>of liability.</sup> whether it is done recklessly or with care, does so at his peril, and takes the risk of liability for resulting injury. It has been held that "it is not a legal excuse that defamatory matter was published accidentally or inadvertently, or with good motives and in an honest belief in its truth." Moore v. Francis, 121 N. Y. 199, 207, 8 L.R.A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810, 23 N. E. 1129.

It has also been held that "publication of the portrait of one person, with statements thereunder as of another, by mistake, and without knowledge of whom the portrait really is, is not an excuse. A libel is harmful on its face, and one publishing manifestly hurtful statements concerning an individual does so at his peril; and if there is no justification, other than that it was news or advertising, he is liable if the statements are false, or are true only of someone else." Peck v. Tribune Co. 214 U. S. 185, 53 L. ed. 960, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554, 16 Ann. Cas. 1075 (Syl. ¶ 2.)

It is generally held that an honest mistake in identity is no defense to an action for libel, although it may be admissible in mitigation of damages. Dunlevy v. Wolferman, 106 Mo. App. 46, 79 S. W. 1165; Jones v. Murray, 167 Mo. 25, 66 S. W. 981; Greer v. White, 90 Ark. 117, 118 S. W. 258, 17 Ann. Cas. 270. See also Farley v. Evening Chronicle Pub. Co. 113 Mo. App. 216, 87 S. W. 565; Wandt v. Hearst's Chicago American, 129 Wis. 419, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 919, 116 Am. St. Rep. 959, 109 N. W. 70, 9 Ann. Cas. 864; note in 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 240.

The defendant relies on § 126 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Gen. State. 1915, § 7018), which provides: "In an action for libel or slander, it shall be sufficient to state, generally, that the defamatory matter was published or spoken of the plaintiff; and if the allegation be denied, the plaintiff must prove on the trial the facts showing that the defamatory matter was published or spoken of him."

It is contended that plaintiff failed to comply with the requirements of this section, in that she did not prove that the publication related to her, or that persons reading it would understand it had reference to her.

The statute does not change the general rule that has been stated. The provisions apply to cases where there is indefiniteness as to persons defamed. The legislative purpose manifestly was to avoid setting forth at length the extrinsic facts tending to show that plaintiff was the one referred to, and making sufficient a general averment that the defamatory words were spoken or published of the plaintiff. In such a case, if the general averment is denied, it devolves upon the plaintiff to prove it as fully as if the extrinsic facts and circumstances pointing to the plaintiff had been alleged, and probably this much would have been required, if no provision had been made as to the proof. Here there is no indefiniteness. The reference to the plaintiff by name was specific; plaintiff was the only Minnie Hatfield in the city; all who knew her would reasonably infer that she was the person against whom the charge was directed; the defamatory words are actionable per se; and no other proof was necessary as to the object of the libel, nor as to the injury to the plaintiff by reason of the publication.

So far as the damages are concerned, general damages from such a publication arise by inference of law, — damages.

and need not be proved. Odgers, Libel & Slander, 5th ed. 372. In view of the fact that no valid defense was made, and that the proof showed without dispute that there was no legal excuse for the libel, only a question of law was presented, and the court should have instructed the jury that the only question for its determination was the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff.

Instead of that, the court appears to have submitted to the jury the question whether the publication referred to the plaintiff or to some other person, and instructed them unless it was shown that the publication was made of and concerning her and was false, a verdict must be returned for the defendant.

There is a suggestion that a settlement was made, based on the fact that the attorney of the plaintiff asked the defendant for a retraction and an apology, which were promised to be made, and that subsequently the article was republished, substituting the name of Minnie Olson for that of the plaintiff in the article, but making no other change nor explanation. No retraction or apology was published;

but, even if it had been, the arrangement made would not have amounted to a settlement.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial as to the amount of the damages to which plaintiff is entitled.

ANNOTATION.

Necessity and sufficiency of proof that libel or slander in which the plaintiff's name was used was published or spoken concerning plaintiff.

- I. Necessity of proof that plaintiff is the person defamed, 1279.
- II. Sufficiency of proof, 1279.

I. Necessity of proof that plaintiff is the person defamed.

The necessity of alleging, and, where such allegation is put in issue, of proving, the identity of the plaintiff with the person named in a defamatory publication, is so thoroughly understood that the courts have spoken to the point only in an incidental manner. Instances among the cases falling within the scope of this note, in which the necessity of proof that plaintiff is the person defamed has been alluded to, are: Every Evening Printing Co. v. Butler (1906) 75 C. C. A. 657, 144 Fed. 916; Harlow v. Carroll (1895) 6 App. D. C. 128; Colvard v. Black (1900) 110 Ga. 642, 36 S. E. 80; Hanson v. Globe Newspaper Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 293, 20 L.R.A. 856, 34 N. E. 462; Farley v. Evening Chronicle Pub. Co. (1905) 113 Mo. App. 216, 87 S. W. 565; Byrne v. News Corp. (1916) 195 Mo. App. 265, 190 S. W. 933.

The form in which this rule is ordinarily stated, namely, that it must be alleged and proved that the defamatory matter was published or spoken of the plaintiff, has led to a difficulty, as is illustrated by the reported case (HATFIELD v. GAZETTE PRINTING CO. ante, 1276), where the defamatory matter was intended to be published or spoken of another than the plaintiff; but it has been uniformly held that by such form of expression it is not to be understood that the defendant may escape liability because he had in contemplation another person. The apparent anomaly is explained by the fact that the action is, in reality, one for negligence in connecting plaintiff's name with the transaction described.

Where the libelous publication is ambiguous, either as to its meaning or as to the person to whom it applies, there must be some proof that third persons understood its actual meaning and also understood to whom the words applied. Byrne v. News Corp. (Mo.) supra.

As said in Duvivier v. French (1900) 43 C. C. A. 529, 104 Fed. 278: "The gravamen of an action for libel is not injury to the plaintiff's feelings, but damage to his reputation in the eyes of others. It is not sufficient, therefore, that the plaintiff should understand himself to be referred to in the article. It is necessary, to constitute libel, that others than the plaintiff should be in a position to understand that the plaintiff was the person referred to."

II. Sufficiency of proof.

There seems to be a difference of opinion as to the extent to which it is necessary to go in order to establish the identity of the plaintiff with the person defamed.

In Davis v. Hearst (1911) 160 Cal. 148, 116 Pac. 530, where the plaintiff was expressly named in the alleged libelous article, it was said that no other evidence was needed than the article itself, to show that it would be understood by its readers as referring to plaintiff.

But in Harlow v. Carroll (1895) 6 App. D. C. 128, it is held that identity of name is not sufficient prima facie evidence to go to the jury to show the identity of the person libeled and the complainant; but it appeared that there was no proof in the case of the plaintiff's name.

In Davis v. Marxhausen (1891) 86 Mich. 281, 49 N. W. 50, it was held that, where the libel describes the plaintiff both by name and residence.

it is not competent for the jury to find that plaintiff was not the person libeled.

And in Griebel v. Rochester Printing Co. (1896) 8 App. Div. 450, 40 N. Y. Supp. 759, it was held to be error to submit a case to the jury on the theory that they might find that the article in question was not published of and concerning the plaintiff, Ferdinand Griebel, where he was a participant in the transaction described, being, however, the complaining witness, and not the person arrested on the charge of obtaining goods under false pretenses, and was the only person of the name in the city, though his surname was misspelled.

But in Hanson v. Globe Newspaper Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 293, 20 L.R.A. 856, 34 N. E. 462, it was held (Holmes, Morton, and Barker, JJ., dissenting) to be competent for the trial court to find as a fact that a libelous article concerning "H. P. Hanson, a real estate and insurance broker of South Boston," was not defamatory of the person thus named and described, it having been intended to refer to A. P. H. Hanson, who was also a real estate and insurance broker in South Boston.

It is not necessary for a plaintiff to satisfy every description given in the libel, as otherwise one might libel with impunity, by adding to a description which everybody would understand one which did not appertain to the person slandered. Mix v. Woodward (1837) 12 Conn. 262.

In Every Evening Printing Co. v. Butler (1906) 75 C. C. A. 657, 144 Fed. 916, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff had, for a long time, been connected with the wild west show of Buffalo Bill as an expert rifle and wing shot, under the name of "Annie Oakley," and that during this period she had exhibited constantly in this role in this country and in Europe, that she had more than once exhibited before King Edward VII. of England, in the courtyard of Buckingham palace, and that, as Annie Oakley, the plaintiff was known as the most expert rifle shot the world over, would have warranted the court in instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that plaintiff was the person meant to be referred to in a news item, headed, "Annie Oakley Arrested, Famous Woman Rifle Shot Locked up on Larceny Charge in Chicago," and stating: "Annie Oakley, daughter-in-law of Buffalo Bill, and the most famous rifle shot in the world, was arrested in Chicago, Monday, under a Bridewell sentence, for stealing the trousers of a negro in order to get money with which to buy cocaine. This is the woman for whose spectacular marksmanship King Edward himself once led the applause in the courtyard of Buckingham palace," — notwithstanding the defendant produced evidence of the arrest, upon the charge stated in the libelous publication, of another woman who was an expert rifle shot, and as such exhibited in connection with Cody's wild west show, similar to the one run by Buffalo Bill, that she was the wife of S. F. Cody, that at the police court in Chicago she had given the name of Elizabeth Cody, and that she exhibited sometimes under the name of "Anny Oak Lay;" and, accordingly, that there was no error in submitting to the jury the question whether the plaintiff was the person meant by the libellant to be referred to.

But in Butler v. News-Leader Co. (1905) 104 Va. 1, 51 S. E. 213, an action based upon the same state of facts, it was held that the jury were warranted in finding a verdict for the defendant.

A publication of the likeness of the plaintiff, a stenographer whose name was Rose Ball, and who was at the time a resident of Helena, Montana, but who had formerly resided in Chicago, her family residing elsewhere, as "the latest photograph of Miss Ball," in connection with a libelous article in a newspaper relating to the death of Pearl Ball, who, as therein stated, was a pianist, and who lived in Forty-seventh place, Chicago, whose family was correctly stated by the article to reside in Chicago, her father to be engaged in business there, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be defamatory of the plaintiff; but it is for the jury to find the effect which would be ascribed to the publication by the readers thereof. Ball v. Evening American Pub. Co. (1909) 237 Ill. 592, 86 N. E. 1097.

In International Fraternal Alliance v. Mallalieu (1897) 87 Md. 97, 39 Atl. 93, it was held that plaintiff sufficiently identified himself with the object of a libelous article, stating: "The public is also warned against a man named Mallalieu, connected with the Metropolitan, who is staying," etc., by proving that his name was Mallalieu, that he was connected with the Metropolitan Insurance Company as its agent at the time of the publication of the libel, and that, after the publication, he was stopped on the street by a gentleman who accosted him with the remark: "I see you are a liar, and the public is warned not to trust you."

The jury are warranted in finding an article to have been published of and concerning the plaintiff, where it described the plaintiff by his right name and contained at least one paragraph which repeatedly referred to events in his life, although it also contained other statements which, to those intimately acquainted with his work and residence, might have been known not to be true of him. Ellis v. Brockton Pub. Co. (1908) 198 Mass. 538, 126 Am. St. Rep. 454, 84 N. E. 1018, 15 Ann. Cas. 83.

Proof that a picture published as that of the person concerning whom was written an article containing statements concerning a person of the same name which, as applied to plaintiff, were defamatory, was that of the plaintiff, is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that plaintiff was the person defamed. Farley v. Evening Chronicle Pub. Co. (1905) 113 Mo. App. 216, 87 S. W. 565.

In Van Vechten v. Hopkins (1809) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 211, 4 Am. Dec. 339, proof that plaintiff, at the time when the corrupt agreement was charged to have been made in the libel, was recorder of the city of Albany, and a member of the state assembly, and that he was the only person of the name of Abraham Van Vechten in the city of Albany, and kept an office there, was held sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether he was intended to be charged as being one of the parties to the agreement charged in the alleged libelous publication which consisted of an affidavit stating that, on a certain occasion, affiant went to the office of Abraham Van Vechten, Esq., in Albany, with a certain other person, and, the conversation turning upon political matters, and severe remarks having been passed upon the political character of Governor Lewis, "Mr. Van Vechten said to him, 'These severe remarks and animadversions which you have made respecting Governor Lewis will not do, for we have agreed to support him at the ensuing election. . . .'" Mr. Van Vechten then produced a written instrument, which he put into the hands of Major Lansing, who read it. Major Lansing then laid it down on the table, and went into conversation with Mr. Van Vechten. This deponent, while these gentlemen were conversing, turned over the said instrument of writing, which purported to be an agreement containing articles of coalition. The first was an engagement by several leading Federal men, whose names were thereto subscribed, to support with all their strength and influence the next election of Governor Lewis. In consideration of this Federal article of agreement there was an article stating that the friends of Governor Lewis, whose names were therewith subscribed, should exert all their power and influence to cause the election of S. Van Renselaer, Esq., to the office of governor in the gubernatorial election of 1810. This deponent believed that there were as many names subscribed to the said agreement as fifteen or twenty, principally Quid and Federal members of the legislature."

The jury are warranted in finding that Thomas Palmer, who had been president of the De Kalb Avenue Railroad for eight years, and the only president of that name, and who had resided on De Kalb avenue for twenty-three years, was defamed by a newspaper article, headed: "President and Pauper. Speculator Dissipates a Railroad Magnate's Fortune.

In a Police Court at Last. A policeman recognizes in his prisoner a former wealthy employer," and giving a detailed account of the arrest of an intoxicated tramp, who gave the name of Edward E. Palmer, his arraignment at the police station and at the police court, and a recognition of him by the police officer as the former president of the De Kalb Avenue Railroad, and concluding as follows: "Edward E. Palmer was for several years president of the De Kalb Avenue Railroad Company in Brooklyn, and was at one time president of the bank in that city. He had a charming family, an elegant residence upon De Kalb avenue, and was possessed of considerable wealth. He speculated in cotton and lost everything, and then took to drink. He has for some years been lost to his old friends. He lives with his family a short distance out of the city. He is not doing anything, and has no means, and, when arrested, was trying to raise a drink to brace up his shattered system." Palmer v. Bennett (1903) 83 Hun, 220, 31 N. Y. Supp. 567, affirmed without opinion in (1897) 152 N. Y. 621, 46 N. E. 1150.

Proof that plaintiff, whose name was James Clark, was watchman of the Starr Garden park, Seventh and Lombard streets, is sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether he was the person defamed by a newspaper article, stating that "John Clark, watchman in Starr Garden park, Seventh and Lombard streets," was implicated in a burglary. Clark v. North American Co. (1902) 203 Pa. 346, 53 Atl. 237.

In Jones v. Hulton [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 444, affirmed in [1910] A. C. 20, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 198, 101 L. T. N. S. 831, 26 Times L. R. 128, 54 Sol. Jo. 116, 47 Scot. L. R. 591, 16 Ann. Cas. 166, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff, whose name was Thomas Artemus Jones and who was a barrister on the North Wales circuit, was known on that circuit and by the reports of his cases in the local papers as Mr. Artemus Jones, and evidence that readers of the papers, on reading the article, thought that it did refer to him, was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that he was defamed by an article published in the defendant's paper, purporting to describe what a correspondent of the paper had witnessed at the Dieppe motor festival, containing the following passage: "Upon the terrace marches the world, attracted by the motor races—a world immensely pleased with itself, and minded to draw a wealth of inspiration—and, incidentally, of golden cocktails—from any scheme to speed the passing hour. . . . 'Whist! there is Artemus Jones with a woman who is not his wife, who must be, you know—the other thing!' whispers a fair neighbor of mine, excitedly, into her bosom friend's ear. Really, is it not surprising how certain of our fellow countrymen behave when they come abroad? Who would suppose, by his goings-on, that he was a churchwarden at Peckham? No one, indeed, would assume that Jones, in the atmosphere of London, would take on so austere a job as the duties of a churchwarden. Here, in the atmosphere of Dieppe, on the French side of the channel, he is the life and soul of a gay little band that haunts the Casino and turns night into day, besides betraying a most unholy delight in the society of female butterflies;"—and this notwithstanding the plaintiff was not a churchwarden, and did not reside at Peckham.

In Kenworthy v. Journal Co. (1905) 117 Mo. App. 327, 93 S. W. 882, it was held that plaintiff did not identify himself as the person defamed in an article naming the seven witnesses in a certain case, and alleging that three of them would be arrested for perjury, by proving that he was one of the witnesses and was the person named in the article. STATE OF KANSAS

v.

J. E. McCARTY et al., Appts.

1. In a prosecution of the defendants for knowingly and wilfully obstructing and resisting, by force and violence, a sheriff in the execution of a warrant for felony, it appeared that the sheriff took the offender into custody inside a building, in the presence of the defendants, took the offender out of the building, and, while on the way to the office of the justice of the peace who issued the warrant, the defendants fell upon the sheriff, and held, pulled, and beat him, until the offender escaped. The defendants offered to show that at the time of the arrest inside the building they were guarding the offender, at the call of a constable who was not then present, but who had reduced the offender to custody on a warrant for breach of the peace, and that the defendants apprised the sheriff of the facts. Held, the sheriff was clothed with superior authority and was vested with superior right to the custody of the offender; the offered evidence did not tend to show that the force and violence displayed outside the building were not knowingly and wilfully exercised; and the offered evidence, if true, afforded no justification for obstructing and resisting the sheriff.

Evidence — resisting officer — prior acts.

2. Upon prosecution for resisting a sheriff in making an arrest after he had taken his prisoner from the building where he was found, evidence is not admissible that accused had the prisoner in lawful custody inside the building as deputy of a constable who had previously arrested him.

Arrest — superior authority of sheriff.

3. A sheriff holding a warrant for arrest of a person for felony may take him out of the custody of a constable who holds him under warrant for misdemeanor.

4. Persons charged by a constable with the duty of guarding one whom he has arrested under warrant for a misdemeanor have no right to oppose a sheriff who is attempting to execute a warrant for arrest of the prisoner for felony.

Criminal law — mistrial — adjournment over day.

5. Adjourning the court from Saturday to Tuesday in which a prosecution is on trial for resisting arrest, in order to hold court in another county on Monday, does not constitute a mistrial.

[See 7 R. C. L. 990, 991.]

Appeal — rejected evidence — non-prejudicial error.

6. There can be no reversal for rejecting evidence which might properly have been admitted if there was no prejudice to substantial rights.

— instruction on credibility.

7. Prejudice resulting from giving an instruction relating to the competency and credibility of accused as witnesses will not be presumed.

Headnote 1 by BURCH, J.

(Marshall and West, JJ., dissent in part.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Morton County convicting them of feloniously obstructing and resisting a sheriff in the execution of a warrant of arrest. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edgar Foster, H. A. Gas-kill, F. S. Macy, and Samuel Yaggy for appellants.

Messrs. S. M. Brewster, Attorney General, G. Porter Craddock, John W. Davis, and Mayo Thomas for the State.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The prosecution was one for felonious obstruction and resistance of a sheriff in the execution of a warrant of arrest. The defendants were convicted, and appeal.

The prosecution grew out of the facts attending the killing of Sheriff Moore by Don Van Wormer, set forth in the opinion in the case of State v. Van Wormer, 103 Kan. 309, 173 Pac. 1076. Three of the defendants are the persons who claimed they were deputized by Constable Thompson to keep the custody of Van Wormer while the constable went away for a while on such business as he had. In addition to the facts narrated in Van Wormer's Case, it should be said that a porch extended along the front of Van Wormer's office, which faced toward the east. The door was near the center of the building. After arresting Van Wormer and taking him out of the door, the sheriff struggled with him along the porch toward the north, and the escape was effected while the sheriff and Van Wormer were on the ground at the north end of the porch. There was ample evidence that Van Wormer succeeded in breaking away from the sheriff because the defendants were at the time obstructing and resisting him, by holding, pulling, and striking him.

The transaction divides naturally into two phases—one inside Van Wormer's office, where he was taken into custody by the sheriff, and one outside the building, where he escaped. The assignments of error which are of substantial merit relate to the action of the court in excluding evidence as to what occurred inside the building, other than the arrest and removal of Van Wormer by the sheriff in the presence of the defendants, and in restricting the defendants to whatever they might offer by way of defense respecting the mêlée which occurred outside the building.

The statute under which the defendants were prosecuted reads as follows: "If any person or persons shall knowingly and wilfully obstruct, resist or oppose any sheriff or other ministerial officer in the service or execution or in the attempt to serve or execute any writ, warrant or process, or in the discharge of any official duty in any case of felony, every person so offending shall upon conviction be punished by confinement and hard labor for a term not exceeding five years, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a term not less than six months, or a fine not less than five hundred dollars." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 3553.

It will be noted that this statute does not limit the crime to resistance only, in which the person charged must participate with greater or less display of force. 29 Cyc. 1329. The prosecution, however, was in fact so limited. The specification in the information of the manner and means whereby the sheriff was obstructed, resisted, and opposed was that the defendants, armed with deadly weapons, assaulted, struck, beat, and wounded him. The opening statement to the jury by counsel for the state connected the defendants with what occurred at the time of the arrest inside the building no further than that they were present, and saw and heard what took place, and so knew that the sheriff was duly executing a warrant of arrest. The statement continued as follows: "The sheriff seized Van Wormer, took him into his custody, and took him out of his building, and was proceeding to take him to the office of the justice of the peace. . . . Now after they had gotten out of the door of the Van Wormer real estate office, these four defendants all followed him out into the street. The sheriff and Don Van Wormer were struggling together. Van Wormer was fighting and resisting the sheriff, and Van Wormer said to these defendants, who stood just a few feet away from them, he said, 'Are you,' or 'You are a fine lot of sons of bitches to let this big son of a bitch take me,' or words to that effect. When Don Van Wormer said that, these four men all jumped onto the sheriff, and beat him, tearing his clothes, assaulting him, resisting him, and holding him, and they let Don Van Wormer escape from the sheriff's custody."

The evidence on behalf of the state developed what occurred inside the building no further than the opening statement had indicated, except that in an incidental way some statements and protests of the defendants relating to Van Wormer's being their prisoner and in their charge crept in. The case was submitted to the jury under the following instruction: "If you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that Martin E. Moore, sheriff of Morton county, Kansas, on the evening of July 22, 1916, in manner and form as charged in the information, arrested and was attempting to take, or had taken into his custody, one Don Van Wormer, and that, while the said sheriff was attempting to take Van Wormer to the office of Justice Perkins, the defendants, J. E. McCarty, Joe Littell, Walter Littell, and Lewis Perkins interfered by striking, beating, or wounding the sheriff, or by holding onto the sheriff or to Van Wormer, so that said Van Wormer was enabled to escape from the custody of the sheriff, they would be guilty of knowingly and wilfully obstructing, resisting, or opposing the sheriff in the execution of his duty, after having made the arrest, and it will be your duty to return a verdict of guilty."

The correlative instruction was as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the defendants, J. E. McCarty, Joe Littell, Walter Littell, and Lewis Perkins, on the evening of July 22, 1916, did not strike, beat, or wound, or hold onto the sheriff, or in any wise interfere with him by obstructing, resisting, or opposing the sheriff in the arrest of Don Van Wormer, or while he was attempting to take, or had taken him into his custody, the defendants would not be guilty, and it would be your duty to so find."

While this instruction, considered technically and alone, was somewhat broader than the other, it was plainly intended to be the reverse of the other; and, reading the two together, the guilt of the defendants was made to depend solely upon actual violence displayed toward the sheriff.

The defendants desired to prove Van Wormer's arrest by the constable, their deputyship under the constable, their lawful custody of Van Wormer by virtue of their deputyship, and their notification to the sheriff while they were inside the building of their relation to Van Wormer. The purpose was to show two things: First, that the defendants did not knowingly or wilfully obstruct, resist, or oppose the sheriff; and, second, that if they did they were justified.

The evidence bore no relevancy to the gravamen of the charge, acts of violence committed outside the office. The state did not claim resistance to the officer inside the building, and, of course, the defendants made no such claim. The issue was whether or not after the arrest, after the sheriff, in further execution of the warrant, had taken the prisoner out of the building, and while the sheriff was proceeding to take the prisoner to the court which issued the warrant, the defendants set upon the sheriff and fought him and beat him. A righteous mental attitude preserved toward the sheriff while he was in the building, and until he was leaving the building behind him in execution of his process, had no tendency to disprove the knowing and wilful character of the physical force used.

The evidence was not admissible in justification of the violence displayed toward the sheriff. Conceding that the defendants originally had authority to hold Van Wormer in order that he might be brought to justice, they had no right to stage a forcible and violent rescue after the sheriff had peaceably, so far as they were concerned, reduced the offender to his own custody. The state of Kansas was exercising authority over the person of Van Wormer through its executive officers. Its interests were the paramount interests. Officers charged with identical duty to preserve the public peace, suppress riots and affrays, and bring to punishment violators of the criminal laws must not cast off that duty and turn raging combatants of each other. To do so is to thwart the purpose of the state in appointing them. In this instance it led to the escape of the prisoner fought over, and to murder.

The defendants, however, were not equal in authority with the sheriff. If the constable had been present when the sheriff appeared, the sheriff would have had the right to supersede him. It is true that a constable exercises powers of the same general character as those of a sheriff, respecting preserving the public peace, apprehending criminals, and the like. Gen Stat. 1915, § 11,590. But the sheriff is the state's chief executive and administrative officer in his county. In the exercise of executive and administrative functions, in conserving the public peace, in vindicating the law, and in preserving the rights of the government, he represents the sovereignty of the state, and he has no superior in his county. When a situation arises like that which confronted the community of Rolla on July 22, 1916, it becomes the sheriff's right, and it is his duty, to determine what the public safety and tranquillity demand, and to act accordingly. He must, of course, act according to law; but if, holding a felony warrant, he should deem it necessary to take custody of a disturber held by a constable under a misdemeanor warrant, it is his duty to do so, and it is the duty of the constable to yield. In such a case, the justification of the constable lies in the rightful exercise of overruling authority by the sheriff.

In this instance, the defendants were only bystanders, called on to guard, during the temporary absence of the constable, a man whom the constable had arrested for breach of the peace. The defendants were not general deputies, clothed with the general powers of the constable, and they held no writ or process of any kind. The authority of the sheriff under his felony warrant was clearly superior to theirs, and they were not justified in opposing him at all, much less with physical force. In the Van Wormer Case, it was said the evidence left little room for substantial doubt that the purported arrest by the constable, and the placing of Van Wormer in charge of a guard of friends, was a sham and a pretense; the real purpose being to obstruct the sheriff. Granting that in this case the good faith of the scheme would be a matter for the jury, if it were properly before them, it did not constitute legitimate defense.

There is nothing else of importance in the case. The defendants were prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced under the statute quoted. It did not work a mistrial when the court adjourned from Saturday until Tuesday in order to hold a session of court in Grant county on Monday.

Certain evidence complained of was properly admitted. While some of the rejected evidence offered by the defendants, other than that which has been considered, might have been admitted, and in some instances more extended cross-examination might have been permitted, the issue on which guilt or innocence depended was very narrow, and the defendants suffered no prejudice to their substantial rights. Prejudice resulting from giving an instruction relating to the competency and credibility of the defendants as witnesses will not be presumed. Re-instruction on credibility. requests for instructions relating to the powers and duties of constables were properly refused. The jury were correctly and adequately instructed.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Johnston, Ch. J., and Mason, Porter, and Dawson, JJ., concur.

Marshall, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the conclusion reached by the court that the judgment be affirmed; but I dissent from the holding that a sheriff, armed with a warrant issued by a justice of the peace, commanding the sheriff to arrest the person named in the warrant, has a greater right to the custody of that person than has a constable armed with another warrant issued by a justice of the peace for the same person, commanding the constable to arrest that person and take him into custody. Neither officer can legally take the person named in his warrant from the custody of the other. The warrant held by the constable can be executed by either the sheriff or the constable, and the warrant held by the sheriff, if in the form prescribed by law, is directed "to any sheriff or constable of the state of Kansas." In the present action, after the sheriff obtained custody of Don Van Wormer, the defendants had no right to oppose, or interfere with the sheriff in that custody.

West, J., joins in the foregoing concurrence and dissent.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Burch, J., on March 8, 1919, handed down the following additional opinion:

The defendants file a petition for a rehearing on the ground they have been denied the right to be fully heard in this court.

The cause was argued orally by the attorney who signs the petition and by counsel for the state. The defendants' abstract and brief were on file, but the state's counter abstract and brief had not been completed. Time was given for this to be done, and the defendants were given leave to reply by further abstract and brief, if necessary. The state's counter abstract and brief were not filed within the time allowed, and did not reach the attorney until a few days before the opinion affirming the judgment of the district court was filed. The attorney now says he would have submitted further abstract and brief, had he been given an opportunity.

The extent to which the defendants were harmed may be judged by the fact that no additional abstract or brief is tendered. Furthermore, no subject which additional abstract might illuminate is indicated, and no statement or argument contained in the state's brief, to which the attorney desired to reply, is specified. The fact is, the court's opinion was written before the state's belated counter abstract and brief were received. The determining questions in the case were clearly delineated and fully argued in the district court. The statements of their positions by counsel for the respective parties, their arguments, and the views of the trial court were fully presented in the defendants' abstract. The abstract, the defendants' brief, and the oral arguments at the hearing in this court put the court in full possession of the case. The court was able to reach a decision without further assistance from counsel for the state, and did so. When the state's counter abstract and brief came in, they required no modification of the opinion already prepared, which treated the case as the defendants had presented it, and it would not advance their interests for them to go to the trouble and expense of replying to anything the state's counter abstract and brief contained.

The petition for a rehearing charges that the court's opinion was based on an unfounded assumption that the warrant held by the constable was one for breach of the peace only. The defendants are far from clear in their statements about the character of the warrant. They say the warrant was for an occurrence at the back door of Van Wormer's office, where he discharged a shotgun, a deadly weapon; some of the shot striking the defendant, Perkins. They do not assert positively that the warrant was not for breach of the peace, but sometimes they call it a felony warrant.

In stating the case to the jury the attorney signing the petition said the evidence would show that his clients were deputized to guard Van Wormer, while the constable went to get a warrant and to arrange for a trial, after service of the warrant. In the colloquy between court and counsel over the theory of the case, the court indicated that it understood the warrant was for a misdemeanor, and was not corrected. When the constable was on the witness stand, the attorney offered to prove by him that he was informed that Van Wormer had disturbed the peace by shooting out of the rear door of his office, and some of the shot had wounded Perkins; that Van Wormer surrendered to the constable, and he deputized the defendants to guard the prisoner; that he went to the justice of the peace, made complaint, and received the warrant; that he returned and served the warrant on Van Wormer; and that he again left the prisoner in custody of the defendants while he went to the justice of the peace and arranged for the trial on the charge contained in the complaint and warrant. Other offers of proof follow:

"Mr. Macy: The defendants, and each of them, offer to prove by this witness now on the stand that the witness appointed the defendants, J. E. McCarty, Joe Littell, and Walter Littell, as officers to guard and keep the custody of Don Van Wormer, until such time as he could make arrangements for the holding of a session of the court to try the defendant for the crime for which he had just arrested Don Van Wormer.

"Thereupon Fred Thompson arrested Van Wormer, and appointed and deputized Joe Littell, Walter Littell, and J. E. McCarty to guard Van Wormer, while he went to the justice of the peace's office and got a warrant for his arrest. That soon after Constable Thompson came back to the Van Wormer office with a warrant, and formally arrested Van Wormer under the warrant, and again appointed and required Joe Littell, Walter Littell, and J. E. McCarty to remain at the Van Wormer office, and to guard and hold Don Van Wormer while he arranged for a trial on the charge contained in the complaint, filed by Constable Thompson, and also contained in the warrant which had just been served on Don Van Wormer.

"The defendants and each of them now offer to prove by the witness on the stand that when Martin E. Moore entered the Van Wormer office, he said to Don Van Wormer, 'I have a warrant for you, Don,' to which both Walter Littell and Cy McCarty replied to Martin E. Moore: 'Don is already under arrest by Officer Thompson, and he has appointed us to guard him until he can arrange a place for trial.'"

One feature of these offers which stands out in bold relief is the contemplated trial of Van Wormer. The constable was informed that Van Wormer had disturbed the peace. The constable went to Van Wormer's office, found him there, and Van Wormer voluntarily surrendered. For some undisclosed reason, the constable did not proceed to take his prisoner before a magistrate. He recognized that under the circumstances he had business with the justice of the peace, but, after mounting a guard over the culprit, he went alone. Finding the justice of the peace, the constable made complaint, and a warrant was issued. The constable then returned to Van Wormer's office, found him in the secure keeping of the deputies, and "arrested" him. The constable, however, had omitted, for some reason, to arrange with the justice of the peace for the trial. He again requisitioned the services of his guardsmen, and went back alone to arrange for the trial. When the sheriff appeared, the defendants told him they were guarding Van Wormer until the constable could arrange for the trial. The constable did arrange for the trial, and the trial was to be on the charge contained in the complaint made by the constable and stated in the warrant. Now, this story is singular enough; but the court hesitates to believe that whoever invented it intended to add a finishing touch of absurdity by having the constable make formal arrangements for felony trial before a justice of the peace.

In the petition for a rehearing it is said that if the acts of the defendants, from the time the sheriff arrived at Van Wormer's office until he was killed, were continuing acts, the rejected evidence should have been admitted. The evidence was offered for just two purposes, stated in the former opinion, and neither purpose was subserved, whether the acts of the defendants were successive,—protest inside the building, followed by force displayed outside the building,—or were continuing acts of protest, or force, or both, beginning inside the building and continuing until Van Wormer was set at liberty.

Complaint is made because the original opinion made no mention of an offer to prove a conversation between the constable and the sheriff, occurring after the constable had procured, but before he had served, his warrant, in which the sheriff told the constable he was doing all right and to go ahead. The evidence, if admitted, would have shown proper noninterference with the constable while he was apparently pursuing,—somewhat irregularly, but pursuing,—the course of an officer of the law. The evidence had no tendency to exculpate the defendants for what occurred two or three hours later, when the sheriff, holding a felony warrant for the offender, found him still at his office, surrounded by his friends, the constable's warrant still unexecuted, and the constable absent.

It is said the court assumes a state of facts to exist by reference to the Van Wormer Case. What state of facts the court assumed, and what effect the assumption had on the decision, the petition forbears to disclose.

It is said the court refers to statements made by Van Wormer, and an argument is made that the defendants were not bound by such statements, unless there was a conspiracy, and conspiracy was not charged. A reading of the opinion will disclose that, in showing the prosecution was limited to obstruction and resistance of the sheriff by force and violence, the court quoted from the opening statement to the jury by counsel for the prosecution. In the quotation was a statement attributed to Van Wormer.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

All the Justices concur.

ANNOTATION.

Dispute over custody as affecting charge of obstructing or resisting arrest.

A careful search has failed to disclose any case other than the reported case (STATE V. MCCARTY, ante, 1283) passing on the question whether a dispute over the custody of a prisoner is a justification to a charge of obstructing or resisting arrest.

In that case it appeared that a prisoner had been left in the custody of three deputies of a constable while the constable went to arrange for the trial of the accused before a justice of the peace. In his absence, the sheriff of the county arrived with a warrant for the arrest of the accused on a felony charge. He took the accused into his custody, and was taking him away, when he was attacked and beaten by the three deputy constables, and as a result the prisoner escaped. It was held that the fact that the deputies had custody of the prisoner was no defense to a charge of obstructing and resisting the sheriff in the performance of his duty, as he had a superior right to the custody of the prisoner.

MOTION PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION of Minneapolis et al.

(140 Minn. 481, 168 N. W. 766, 169 N. W. 529.)

Conspiracy — "bannering" — legality.

1. "Bannering" plaintiff's place of business as unfair to organized labor, and thereby deterring the public from patronizing him, if done for the purpose of compelling him not to work as an operative himself in his own business, is unlawful and may be enjoined.

— combination to secure lawful end.

2. Men, either singly or in combination, may use any lawful means to accomplish a lawful purpose, although the means adopted may cause injury to another; but they may not intentionally injure or destroy the business of another to accomplish an unlawful purpose.

Constitutional law — right to labor.

3. The Constitution guarantees to everyone the right to work in his own business, and any attempt to deprive him of that right is unlawful.

Injunction — denial — discretion.

4. As the facts are not free from doubt, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to issue a temporary injunction.

Appeal — ruling as to injunction pendente lite.

5. Granting or refusing an injunction pendente lite rests so largely in the discretion of the trial court that an appellate court is not justified in interfering, unless the conclusion reached is clearly erroneous, and will result in an injury which it is the duty of the court to prevent.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County (Dickinson, J.) in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin them from interfering with plaintiff's business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Nathan H. Chase for appellant.
Messrs. Fifield & Finney for respondents.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion:

The defendants are the Motion Picture Machine Operators' Union of Minneapolis, known as Local 219, and composed of motion picture machine operators; the Trades and Labor Assembly of Minneapolis, composed of representatives from a large number of labor unions of Minneapolis, of which Local 219 is one; and a large number of individuals, who are officers or members of one or the other, or both, of these associations.

Plaintiff has operated a motion picture theater, known first as the Orient and later as the New National Theater, in the city of Minneapolis from May 1, 1916, until the present time. He employed members of Local 219 to operate his machines until September 10, 1916. Since that date he claims to have operated the machines himself unassisted. Several conferences took place between plaintiff and representatives of the defendants concerning the re-employment of union operators, but no agreement was reached. In December, 1916, the Trades and Labor Assembly declared plaintiff's theater "unfair to organized labor;" and thereupon and repeatedly thereafter, defendants published in the Labor Review, their official paper, that the New National Theater was "unfair to organized labor." In February, 1917, defendants caused a banner bearing the words, "Unfair to Organized Labor," to be carried back and forth in the street in front of the theater, and at the time of the hearing were still "bannering" the theater in that manner. In May, 1917, plaintiff brought this action for an injunction, and, upon the complaint supported by affidavits, applied for a temporary injunction pendente lite. Defendants answered, and, upon the answer supported by affidavits, opposed the issuance of the temporary injunction. The court declined to issue it and plaintiff appealed.

Defendants admit the acts above mentioned, and also an intention to continue them, and insist that they have the legal right to do so. Plaintiff alleges that prior to the commission of such acts he had built up and enjoyed a large and lucrative business. He also alleges that these acts deter the public from patronizing his theater to such an extent that his business has been greatly injured, and will be ruined if they are continued, and that he has no adequate remedy at law.

The undisputed facts, some of which are mentioned above, show plainly that the purpose of defendants is to injure and perhaps destroy plaintiff's business unless he accedes to their demands, and that the course adopted is having the effect intended, and that plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

No person or combination of persons has the right maliciously to injure or destroy the business of another, by acts which serve no legitimate purpose of his own. Tuttle v. Buck, 107 Minn. 145, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 599, 131 Am. St. Rep. 446, 119 N. W. 946, 16 Ann. Cas. 807; Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, 62 L. ed. 260, L.R.A.1918C, 497, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 65, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 461, filed December 10, 1917. As said in Ertz v. Produce Exch. 79 Minn. 140, 48 L.R.A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433, 81 N. W. 737: "One man singly, or any number of men jointly, having no legitimate interests to protect, may not lawfully ruin the business of another by maliciously inducing his patrons and third parties not to deal with him."

Defendants may use any lawful means to accomplish a lawful purpose, although the means adopted may incidentally cause injury to plaintiff; but they may not intentionally injure or destroy plaintiff's business to accomplish an unlawful purpose. Gray v. Building Trades Council, 91 Minn. 171, 63 L.R.A. 753, 103 Am. St. Rep. 477, 97 N. W. 663, 1118, 1 Ann. Cas. 172; Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, supra; Erdman v. Mitchell, 207 Pa. 79, 63 L.R.A. 534, 99 Am. St. Rep. 783, 56 Atl. 327; Connors v. Connolly, 86 Conn. 641, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 564, 86 Atl. 600; March v. Bricklayers & Plasterers Union, 79 Conn. 7, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1198, 118 Am. St. Rep. 127, 63 Atl. 291, 6 Ann. Cas. 848; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 65 Atl. 165, 9 Ann. Cas. 698; Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. 28 C. C. A. 99, 49 U. S. App. 709, 83 Fed. 912; Klingel's Pharmacy v. Sharp & Dohme, 104 Md. 218, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 976, 118 Am. St. Rep. 399, 64 Atl. 1029, 9 Ann. Cas. 1184.

Defendants cite and rely upon the case of Steffes v. Motion Picture Mach. Operators' Union, 136 Minn. 200, 161 N. W. 524, as authorizing them to do the things complained of, and the showing which they make indicates that they intended to, and probably did, confine their acts to those which were recognized in that case as permissible for the purpose, and under the circumstances there disclosed. In that case the purpose sought to be accomplished was found to be a lawful one, and, to bring the present case within the doctrine of that case, the purpose sought to be accomplished in the present case must also be a lawful purpose.

Plaintiff is not a member of the operators' union, and cannot become a member, because the constitution of the union provides that no owner, or part owner, or manager of a place of amusement shall be admitted to membership. It also provides that any member who shall become owner, part owner, or manager of a place of amusement must either withdraw or be expelled. Plaintiff opens his theater at about 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and closes it at about 11 o'clock at night. He insists upon working as an operator of his motion picture machines for one half the time each day in order to save expense. Defendants insist that only members of the union shall work as operators of the machines, and, as plaintiff is not a member of the union and cannot become a member of it, that he shall not work as an operator, although qualified to do so. Plaintiff asserts that the only controversy between himself and the defendants is as to whether he shall be permitted to perform the work of an operator himself in his own theater, and that the action taken by defendants is solely for the purpose of compelling him to cease working as such operator. He claims that he is not, and never has been, unfair to union labor; that he has always employed union labor, and none other; that he employed union operators until he began work as an operator himself; that, before beginning work himself, he endeavored to make an arrangement to work half the time each day himself, and to employ union operators upon union terms for the remainder of the time; but that the members of the union refused to work in the theater if he worked as an operator himself; that at the several conferences with defendants and their representatives he made the same proposition, and has been ready to carry it out at all times; that he ceased to employ union operators solely for the reason that they refused to work in the capacity of fellow workmen with him; and that ever since he has operated his machines himself without any assistance whatever.

In the Steffes Case, Steffes employed a nonunion operator, and the purpose of the union was to secure the employment of a union operator. No question as to whether the owner should be permitted to work himself was involved. In the present case, according to the claim of plaintiff, the sole question involved is whether the owner shall be permitted to work himself in his own business.

If, men, either singly or in combination, may lawfully injure or destroy the business of another for the purpose of compelling him not to work in such business himself, it will have far-reaching consequences. Such a doctrine would limit the field of business to those who have sufficient capital to carry on a business without becoming operatives therein themselves, and would debar those who have little or no capital, except their personal skill and ability, from seeking to better their condition by engaging in business on their own account. Such a doctrine means that a machinist who starts a machine shop may lawfully be prevented from working therein as a machinist; that a carpenter who starts a carpenter shop may be required to have all his work done by others; that a barber who opens a barber shop must cease to work as a barber. It means that the man in any occupation who starts in business for himself, relying upon his personal skill and ability to attain success, must forego the right to profit by his own skill, at the arbitrary behest of another, or see his business ruined. Such is not the law. The right of every person to work in his own business is a fundamental right,

guaranteed to him by the Bill of Rights in the Constitution and by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and any attempt to deprive him of that right is necessarily unlawful. Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 60 L. ed. 131, L.R.A.1916D, 545, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283. However ar members of an organization may go in an attempt to force an employer to employ members of the organization, an attempt to force him to desist from working himself in his own business is clearly an invasion of the rights secured to him by the Constitution. Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 74 N. E. 603, 3 Ann. Cas. 738; Willner v. Silverman, 109 Md. 341, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 895, 71 Atl. 962; Gray v. Building Trades Council, 91 Minn. 171, 63 L.R.A. 753, 103 Am. St. Rep. 477, 97 N. W. 663, 1118, 1 Ann. Cas. 172; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 254, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 65 Atl. 165, 9 Ann. Cas. 698; Hundley v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 105 Ky. 162, 63 L.R.A. 289, 88 Am. St. Rep. 298, 48 S. W. 429; Erdman v. Mitchell, 207 Pa. 79, 63 L.R.A. 534, 99 Am. St. Rep. 783, 56 Atl. 327; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E. 317; Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, L.R.A.1918C, 497, 62 L. ed. 260, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 65, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 461.

If the facts bear out plaintiff's claim that the purpose of defendants is to compel him to cease working as an operator in his own business, it will follow that they are seeking to accomplish an unlawful purpose, and that the acts by which they are attempting to prevent the public from patronizing him will fall within the class of acts which the law deems malicious, and which it is the duty of the courts to restrain. Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, supra. Acts which may not be unlawful if committed for the purpose of inducing an employer to discharge one workman, or set of workmen, in order to give employment to another workman, or set of workmen, may be enjoined if committed for the purpose of depriving the employer of the right to use his own skill and ability in the furtherance of his own business; for his right to work in his own business is superior to the right of any other in respect to such business.

Granting or refusing an injunction

tion pendente lite rests so largely in the discretion of the trial court, however, that an appellate court is not justified in interfering unless the conclusion reached is clearly erroneous, and will result in an injury which it is the duty of the court to prevent. While the question as to whether plaintiff shall work as an operator is, doubtless, the principal controversy between the parties, defendants deny that that is the only controversy. They assert that plaintiff discharged his union operators without cause, and refused to re-employ union operators unless they would work with nonunion operators. Also that he employed nonunion men to make improvements and repairs in the theater, and has had nonunion operators, other than himself, operating his machines. Defendants could not well complain of the employment of nonunion operators, if union operators refused to work for the sole reason that plaintiff worked himself; but we understand defendants to claim, that plaintiff required union men to work with nonunion men other than himself. The refusal of the trial court to issue the injunction requires us to take the view of the facts most favorable to the defendants, and we cannot say that plaintiff's contention is conclusively established. The case is presented upon the pleadings and upon affidavits pro and con; it has not yet been tried. If, when the case is tried and findings are made determining the facts, it shall appear that plaintiff's contention is correct, he is entitled to relief, but we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to issue an injunction before the facts are ascertained; and the order appealed from is affirmed.

Hallam, J.:

I concur in the result.

Appeal—ruling as to injunction
pendente lite.

Injunction—denial—discretion.

I do not understand that the right of a man to work in his own business is questioned, nor do I understand that there is any claim of right of defendants to "destroy plaintiff's business" on any ground.

I understand that defendants have the right to refuse to work as fellow workmen with nonunion men or with an employer, and that they have a right, in a proper and orderly manner, to advise one another, or the public, that a certain employer does not employ union operatives, or that he insists on operating his own machines. It seems to me the main question in the case is whether the conduct of defendants has amounted to more than that. If not, their acts have not been unlawful.

A petition for rehearing having been filed the following Per Curiam response was handed down December 7, 1918:

Plaintiff applied for a rehearing, claiming that the admitted facts show a violation of § 8973 of the General Statutes of 1913. The matter was submitted to the trial court upon the pleadings and upon affidavits pro and con, and that court refused to issue a temporary injunction. Defendants relied upon the Steffes Case, 136 Minn. 200, 161 N. W. 524, and apparently assumed that they had brought themselves within the rule applied in that case. The right to and necessity for a temporary injunction is not so conclusively established that we feel required to order that one issue, notwithstanding the refusal of the trial court to issue it. To direct its issuance under the circumstances would be, in effect, to determine the case upon affidavits, and the rights of the parties can be more satisfactorily determined after the parties adduce their evidence at the hearing upon the merits.

Rehearing denied.

Justifiability of interference with another's business for the purpose of compelling him not to work as an operative therein.

The reported case (RORABACK v. MOTION PICTURE MACH. OPERATORS' UNION, ante, 1290) seems to be one of first impression upon the question whether a labor organization may resort to tactics calculated to interfere with another's business, for the purpose of coercing him to employ a member of the organization to do work which the proprietor of the business has himself undertaken to do.

Although the conclusion reached in the reported case commends itself as a proper one, some of the language used therein, so far as it conveys the impression that any attempt to deprive a person of the right to work in his own business is necessarily unlawful, would seem to require qualification. If one's habits or conduct or character may constitute a justification for a combination of his fellow workmen to refuse to work with him, in consequence of which their employer dispenses with his services (see Berry v. Donovan (1905) 188 Mass. 353, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 74 N. E. 603, 3 Ann. Cas. 738; De Minico v. Craig (1911) 207 Mass. 593, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E.

317), it would seem that one's employees might, on like grounds, lawfully combine to refuse to continue in his employment, although, when confronted with the alternative, he might elect not to work, rather than to part with his employees. So also, it would seem that in order to procure the work for themselves, one's employees might lawfully give their employer the option of relinquishing the work done by him, or of doing without their services (compare National Protective Asso. v. Cumming (1902) 170 N. Y. 315, 58 L.R.A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648, 63 N. E. 369; Pickett v. Walsh (1906) 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 Ann. Cas. 638); even though they may not do so for the purpose of compelling him to employ another member of their union. It is, however, by no means certain that the courts will be logically consistent when these questions come before them.

The explorer of this terra incognita may derive some benefit from a consultation of Labatt on Master and Servant, chapters CXV. and CXVI.

Trial — jury — cause of death.

4. Whether one insured against accident died from disease or accident is, upon the conflicting evidence, for the jury.

Definition — accident.

5. When the words, "accident," and "accidental," are used in an insurance policy, they are to be construed and considered according to the common speech and common usage of people generally.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1238.]

Insurance — accident.

6. That an injury happens to one through his own voluntary act does not prevent its being an accident within the meaning of that term as used in an insurance policy.

— voluntary act.

7. Death due to a strain or injury to a vital organ, when one, in attempting to remove a tire from an automobile by the exertion of his strength with some degree of violence, is caused to stagger or fall back by the sudden giving way of the tire, is accidentally caused, within the meaning of an accident insurance policy.

— when result of voluntary act accident.

8. When injury or death results from the voluntary act of the insured and the act is one which is not manifestly dangerous, but which is ordinarily done or performed without serious consequences to the doer, such result is caused by accidental means.

9. Recovery on an accident insurance policy is not defeated by the mere fact that negligence of the insured contributed to the injury.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1256.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County (Dudley, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certificate of accident insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Clinton L. Nourse, for appellant:

When, in view of all the facts and circumstances, the question is one as to which men may honestly differ, the case is one for the jury; and this rule is not changed merely because the facts are not in dispute.

Rothrock v. Cedar Rapids, 128 Iowa, 252, 103 N. W. 475; Long v. Ottumwa R. & Light Co. 162 Iowa, 11, 142 N. W. 1011; Philpott v. Jones, 164 Iowa, 730, 146 N. W. 861; Meardon v. Iowa City, 148 Iowa, 12, 126 N. W. 939; Paulsen v. Modern Woodmen, 21 N. D. 235, 130 N. W. 231.

Before the court is warranted in directing a verdict on an issue tendered, every fact favorable to the party against whom the verdict is asked must be considered as established.

A case should be submitted to the jury if there is any evidence tending to show that there was anything unintended, unexpected, unforeseen, or miscalculated in the events leading up to the death of the insured.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, an accident insurance association, issued its policy or certificate to one Bert A. Dunbar, insuring him against bodily injury occurring through external, violent, and accidental means, and resulting, independently of all other causes, in death, within ninety days from the date of the accident. While this insurance was in full force, and the insured was a member of the association in good standing, Dunbar died, and this action was brought on said contract of insurance by the beneficiary therein named on the theory that his death was the result of accidental bodily injury, within the scope and meaning of said contract. The defendant resists payment of the insurance, alleging that Dunbar's death resulted from natural causes, disease, or bodily infirmity, or voluntary overexertion, and that for death so resulting there is no liability under the terms of the policy.

The policy was issued November 21, 1910. It provides against liability of the insurer for death of the insured, resulting wholly or partially, directly or indirectly, from disease or bodily infirmity, or from voluntary overexertion. At the date of the contract Dunbar was in apparently strong and robust health. He was a traveling salesman for a wholesale grocery house at Des Moines, and had his headquarters at Carroll, Iowa. In his business he kept and made frequent use of an automobile. On July 1, 1913, with another man and two women as guests in his car he set out for a trip to Glidden and Coon Rapids, and thence back to Carroll. On the road one of the tires on the car sustained a puncture, and Dunbar, with the aid of the other man, took off the tire, patched the inner tube, and then, replacing the tube and casing on the wheel, started to complete the trip. It soon appeared that the puncture had not been effectually mended, and, stopping again, he, working alone, attempted once more to remove the tire, but for some reason it resisted his efforts. Kneeling upon one knee he took hold of the casing with both hands, pulling and jerking at it for some time, when it came off with a snap, and with such suddenness as to cause him to slip or stagger back with the tire in his hands. He immediately turned pale, complained of being very ill, put his hand to his head, and lay down on the ground. Help was called, and he was removed to a hotel, where he died about an hour later. A post mortem examination was made of the body by three physicians, who found that the immediate cause of death was due to a blood clot in the right coronary artery near the heart. Two of them gave it as their opinion that Dunbar died of arteriosclerosis and obstruction of the coronary artery, that he was afflicted with abnormal arteriosclerosis, and that the coronary arteries were quite sclerotic. On the other hand, the third doctor testified that he found no more arteriosclerosis than is usual with a man of the size and age of the deceased. He further said that blood clot was due to inflammation, or injury to the artery, and that he did not observe or find any such inflammation in the body.

The foregoing is a brief summary of the record as to the facts, but is sufficiently complete for our consideration of the question whether they made a case upon which plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury.

When the issues joined are viewed in connection with the testimony of the medical experts, it is too clear for argument that the court could not properly rule as a matter of law that Dunbar's death was the result of disease, or other natural causes, and we do not understand that such was the position of the trial court, or that it is insisted upon in this court. It is quite apparent that the direction of a verdict in defendant's favor was grounded upon the thought, either that the insured did not come to his death through accidental means, or that his death resulted from voluntary overexertion. Upon the first of these propositions the burden was doubtless upon plaintiff to present evidence from which the jury could properly find that the death of the deceased resulted from injuries of the nature or kind against which the policy insured him; but the claim or assertion that he died from overexertion is in the nature of an affirmative defense, upon which the defendant assumes the burden. We, therefore, turn to a consideration of those features of the case as shown by the record.

I. Was there any evidence on which the jury could be permitted to find that the death of Dunbar was the result of external, violent, and accidental means, independent of all other causes?

As we have seen, it is not open to doubt that the question whether he died of disease was for the jury. The only evidence tending to show that the death was the natural result of disease is that of the two physicians who express the opinion that he died of arteriosclerosis, which, as we understand it, is the technical term for hardening of the arteries; but this is met by other evidence that the sclerosis discovered in this case was such only as is ordinarily found in men of his size and age; and the weight and influence to be accorded to these conflicting opinions was for the jury. If the arteries of the deceased were sclerotic, but the sclerosis was such only as is the natural or usual accompaniment of increasing years, the fact, if it be a fact, that a bodily injury sustained by him would more likely be fatal than would be the case if such condition did not exist, would not prevent a recovery on the policy should it otherwise appear that the injury was of the nature or kind described in the contract. Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 156 Mass. 351, 17 L.R.A. 753, 30 N. E. 1013.

Coming, then, to the question whether there is in this record any testimony tending to show that the death of the insured was the result of injury from accidental cause or means, we confront again the oft-recurring inquiry: What is an accident? And when is a means or cause accidental within the meaning of the contract? It is not always easy to define a word, though one of familiar, common, and daily use, in other words or terms which shall at once be so clear, accurate, and comprehensive as to be everywhere and always applicable. Attempts to accomplish such a definition quite as often serve to confuse as to elucidate, and usually courts can well assume that common speech and common usage are as little susceptible to judicial explanation as an axiom in mathematics is susceptible to improvement by changing its form of expression. One thing at least is well settled, the words, "accident" and "accidental," have never acquired any technical meaning in law, and when used in an insurance contract they are to be construed and considered according to the common speech and common usage of people generally. Hundreds of attempts have been made by the courts to define these words in other terms, and while some of them may be regarded helpful in so far as they adhere to popular usage, others have served only to confuse the situation, if not in fact to grossly mislead. Certain it is that no attempt in this direction is in any respect an improvement upon the definition found in our standard lexicons, and from these by way of illustration we quote from Webster's International Dictionary:

"Accident. An event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an undesigned, sudden, and unexpected event; chance; contingency."

"Accidental. Happening by chance or unexpectedly. Synonyms: Undesigned; unintentional; unforeseen; unpremeditated."

This is also the meaning given to these words in United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755. It is an event from an unknown cause, or an unexpected event from a known cause. Raiford v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 130 N. C. 597, 41 S. E. 806. A thing done or disaster caused without design or intention. The Blue Wing v. Buckner, 12 B. Mon. 250. An unusual and unexpected result, attending the performance of a usual or necessary act. Providence L. Ins. & Invest. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 310. Mr. Cooley, in his very thorough compilation of the cases, says that an event which the actor did not intend to produce is produced by accidental means. 4 Cooley, Briefs, on Ins. 3156. The same thought is adopted, though variously expressed, in Joyce, Ins. § 2863; Bouvier's Law Dict.; Kerr, Ins. p. 380; 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 482; Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 89 Cal. 170, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, 26 Pac. 762; Railway Officials & E. Acci. Asso. v. Drummond, 56 Neb. 235, 76 N. W. 562. The list could be extended quite indefinitely, but it can hardly be denied that these authorities, cited from courts and writers of the highest standing, make clear that the meaning of these words in law differs in no essential respect from the meaning attributed to them in popular speech.

There is, however, another alleged definition which has had a degree of judicial sanction, which ought not to be passed without notice. According to this definition, if correctly interpreted by counsel for the defense, an injury happening to the insured through his own voluntary act is not an accident, nor is his hurt to be attributed to accidental means—a proposition which is wholly at variance with every statement of the true rule as illustrated in the numerous authorities above cited. It may be, and it is, true that if the insured does a voluntary act, the natural, usual, and to-be-expected result of which is to bring injury upon himself, then a death so occurring is not an accident in any sense of the word, legal or colloquial; and it is only when thus limited that the rule so stated has any proper application. To illustrate: A may be foolhardy enough to believe that he can leap from a fourth-story window with safety, and, trying it, is killed. B, desiring to descend from the same floor, climbs out upon a fire escape, which collapses, and he falls to his death. In no proper sense of the word is A's death accidental, or caused by accidental means, nor can any reasonable person deny that B's death is accidental and produced by accidental means; yet neither would have happened but for the voluntary act of the deceased. To say that the deceased in the case at bar did just what he attempted and intended to do, that is, he attempted to remove and did remove the tire from the wheel, and therefore there was no accident or accidental means producing his injury, is to beg the whole question and to ignore the well-established meaning of words. Says Mr. Cooley in 4 Briefs on Ins. 3156: Accident insurance companies do business mostly with the common people, and the term "accident" as used in these policies should be defined according to the ordinary and usual understanding of its significance.

It makes no difference whether the injured man or some other person voluntarily sets in motion the first of a series of events which, in connected line of causation, results in his injury or death. If, to use the language I have quoted, the resulting injury and violence to him "unexpectedly took place," or was "an unexpected result from a known cause," or was produced "without design or intention," or was "an unusual and unexpected result, attending the performance of a usual or necessary act," or was an "event happening without the concurrence of the will of the person by whose agency it was caused," or if it was "caused or produced without design," it falls directly within the letter and spirit of the definition which has been placed upon the words by the most competent lexicographers, as well as by our most eminent jurists who have given attention thereto. True, the deceased did undertake to remove the tire, and, finding it more difficult than he anticipated, he exercised his strength with a considerable degree of violence to pull or jerk it loose, and this action was undoubtedly voluntary. But it is equally apparent that the tire gave way or came loose with an unexpected suddenness, causing him to stagger or fall back from the stooped and strained position he was occupying, and in our judgment it was open to the jury to find from all these circumstances that in this involuntary and undesigned movement, so unexpectedly produced, he sustained a strain or injury to some of his vital organs, which proved fatal. A death so produced would be accidental, both in cause and in effect.

That this is correct may be demonstrated by very many precedents. These cases are so numerous that any attempt to mention them in much detail would unduly prolong this opinion. At the head of the list, however, we mention the case of United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, supra. There Dr. Barry, with two or three companions, in leaving a railway station platform, jumped to the ground below, a distance of 4 or 5 feet. His act was perfectly voluntary, but in some way not shown by any direct proof he sustained a jar, which, it was claimed, caused an injury to his bowels, resulting in his death, and although there was no evidence by any witness that he was seen to slip or fall, or that he alighted in any other manner than he intended, it was held that the jury were at liberty to find that, by some unexpected or unforeseen or involuntary movement of his body in his descent from the platform to the ground, the injury was caused. The Supreme Court also examined and approved an instruction to the jury to the effect that while, if Barry jumped and alighted just as he intended, and nothing unforeseen, unexpected, or involuntary occurred, affecting his movement or causing him to strike the ground in any different way than he intended, then his injury was not caused by accidental means; but if "there occurred from any cause any unforeseen or involuntary movement, turn, or strain of the body which brought about the injury, or if there occurred any unforeseen circumstance which interfered with or changed such a downward movement as he intended to make, or as it would be natural to expect under such circumstances, and injury resulted therefrom, the injury would be attributable to accidental means." If this be good law (and the eminence of the court pronouncing it commands our respect), then the case at bar was one for a jury. If any reference to other cases which are in all essential respects like this in fact and principle is needed, we may mention the following, in each of which the insured was allowed to recover: In Young v. Railway Mail Asso. 126 Mo. App. 325, 103 S. W. 557, the insured, in lifting a mail sack, ruptured a blood vessel. In McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 8 Biss. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 8,682, the insured suffered a similar injury in exercising with Indian clubs. In Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112, 53 S. W. 49, the insured, a worker in a machine shop, undertook to remove a piston head, which coming off more easily than expected, the man exerted considerable strength to prevent its falling, and was immediately taken sick and died. In Atlanta Acci. Asso. v. Alexander, 104 Ga. 709, 42 L.R.A. 188, 30 S. E. 939, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 616, the insured, a blacksmith, in swinging a heavy hammer, suddenly felt a severe pain in his abdomen, where a hernia appeared with fatal results. In Rodey v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 3 N. M. 543, 9 Pac. 348, the insured, while bathing, dived from a plank into the water, causing injury to his eardrum. In Horsfall v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 Wash. 132, 63 L.R.A. 425, 98 Am. St. Rep. 846, 72 Pac. 1028, the insured lifted a heavy iron bar, causing, dilatation of the heart, causing in death. In Martin v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 1 Fost. & F. 505, the insured was injured in lifting a heavy burden. In Ludwig v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 113 Minn. 510, 130 N. W. 5, the insured, a baseball player, was running a base, and voluntarily "made a dive for second," and was injured. In McGlinchey v. Fidelity & C. Co. 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190, 14 Atl. 13, the insured sustained a strain caused by trying to hold a frightened horse. In North American Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 51, 8 Am. Rep. 212, the assured, while assisting in loading hay, received a strain or injury resulting in death. In Fetter v. Fidelity & C. Co. 174 Mo. 256, 61 L.R.A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 73 S. W. 592, the insured was using a pole to raise a window, when the pole slipped, causing him to fall forward and receive an injury. In Hamlyn v. Crown Accidental Ins. Co. [1897] 1 Q. B. 750, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 409, 4 Reports, 407, 68 L. T. N. S. 701, 41 Week. Rep. 531, 57 J. P. 663, the insured stooped to pick up a marble for a child, and in doing so dislocated his knee. To the same legal effect is Clark v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 156 Iowa, 209, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 631, 135 N. W. 1114, where the insured was drowned by reason of shock, resulting from his voluntary entry into the cold water. With perhaps a single exception, the insurer in each and every one of the foregoing cases had stipulated against liability for injury or death of the insured except from accidental cause, and in each and in every one a recovery was allowed.

The rule clearly deducible from the overwhelming weight of authority is that, when injury or death follows or results from a voluntary act of the insured, and the act is one which is not manifestly dangerous, but which is ordinarily done or performed without serious consequences to the doer, such result is caused by accidental means. This is nowhere better stated than by Sanborn J., in Western Commercial Travelers' Asso. v. Smith, 40 L.R.A. 653, 29 C. C. A. 223, 56 U. S. App. 393, 85 Fed. 401, where he says: "An effect which does not ordinarily follow and cannot be reasonably anticipated from the use of those means, an effect which the actor did not intend to produce and . . . cannot be charged with the design of producing, . . . is produced by accidental means."

This same proposition in substantially like terms was quoted and approved by this court in Jenkins v. Hawkeye Commercial Men's Asso. [47 Iowa, 117, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 181, 124 N. W. 199. The mere fact that the insured may have been negligent, and that such negligence may have contributed to his injury, is no defense to the action on the policy.

Bohaker v. Travelers Ins. Co. 215 Mass. 32, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 543, 102 U. S. 342. In the recent case of Lanley v. Fidelity & C. Co. 180 Iowa, 805, 161 N. W. 114, we had occasion to consider the request of an insurer for an instruction to the jury that if the insured was voluntarily doing an act by means which were "exactly what the man [he] intended to use, and did use, and was prepared to use," then, while an injury to him in doing such an act might be accidental, the means by which it was produced would not be accidental. We sustained the trial court in refusing to so instruct, and in so doing said: "To have charged as thus asked would have been to utterly mislead the jury into the thought that, if Hatfield voluntarily undertook to drive the screw and in so doing was injured by slipping or falling upon the screwdriver, then such injury was not accidentally caused within the meaning of the policy, a rule which, if carried to its logical extent, would render the protection of an accident insurance policy the merest farce. Practically speaking, every unexpected or unintended personal injury may be traced in some of its lines of causation to the voluntary act of the victim."

It is manifest, from what we have said, that the injury was accidental. To come within the terms of the policy, such accident must have been external and violent.

Myrtle Caldwell was asked, on cross-examination: Did you not notice Mr. Dunbar slip, did you?

A. Only when the tire came off. It came off suddenly with a jerk.

If, then, Dunbar in pulling the tire from the wheel, slipped as might be found from this testimony, and fell in consequence thereof, the jury might have concluded, not only that the injury was accidental, but that it was due to slipping as the wheel came off, and that this was accidental means. No argument is required to demonstrate that such means might have been found external and violent. For the reason stated, we are of the opinion that the trial court erred in directing a verdict, and the judgment is reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Arterio sclerosis as affecting right to recovery under accident policy.

The fact that arterio sclerosis, the technical term for hardening of the arteries, is a condition frequently found in persons as they advance in years, emphasizes the importance of the question of its effect upon the right of recovery under accident insurance policies.

It will be observed that in the reported case (LICKLEIDER v. IOWA STATE TRAVELING MEN'S ASSO. ante, 1295), under a policy insuring against bodily injury occurring through external, violent, and accidental means, and resulting, independently of all other causes, in death, it was held that a recovery was not prevented by the fact that the insured's arteries were sclerotic, if they were no more so than was natural to a man of his age, although the bodily injury sustained by an accident was more likely to be fatal than would be the case if such condition did not exist.

The provisions in the policies are not entirely uniform, and under the varying phraseology a recovery has been allowed in some cases, notwithstanding the presence of a sclerotic condition; while in others such a condition has been held to preclude liability by the insurer.

Moon v. Order of United Commercial Travelers (1914) 96 Neb. 65, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1203, 146 N. W. 1037, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 222, strongly supports the conclusion in the reported case. In the Moon Case the contract provided for a benefit, if a member of a benefit association sustained bodily injury through accidental means which, alone and independent of all other causes, should occasion death, and also that the payments authorized should not extend to any death or disability resulting in consequence of bodily infirmity, nor to any death or injury resulting from or in consequence of any disease, or loss caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmity or disease, nor any death or disability, unless caused by bodily injury which was accidental, and the proximate, sole, and only cause of the death or disability. The insured in this case accidentally fell, striking near his heart on a rock, and died in a short time; and it was contended that the walls of his heart and arteries were thinned by the effect of advancing years, and that because of their condition there could be no recovery under the policy. The court, however, refused to sustain the contention, saying: "To this it may be said that, if the insurance is to be defeated because of the fact that the walls of the heart grow thinner by advancing years, or the arteries become sclerosed, or the valves of the heart act improperly, and this condition is the result of age, then the collection of the insurance money may nearly always be defeated by the effect of increasing years, which change the condition of the assured. We do not believe this to be the policy of the law. If it was the policy of the law, it would permit the defeat of meritorious cases. It would, in effect, allow an association of this sort to conduct a business and to furnish salaries to those engaged in managing the affairs of the association, and it would give the members of such an association and their families nothing upon which there might be any reliance."

The court in the Moon Case also refused to sustain the further contention that the insured's death was in consequence of disease, and that it was caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmity, and that the injury was not the proximate cause of death, although there was evidence for the defendant that an injury such as the insured sustained could not produce such a rupture as he suffered, in a normal heart. The court stated that, from anything that appeared in the evidence, the insured might have lived many years but for the accident, and that they were of the opinion that the fall was the proximate cause of his death, and that the injury sustained was within the conditions of the certificate of membership.

In Hooper v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. (1912) 166 Mo. App. 209, 148 S. W. 116, it was held that notwithstanding the fact that the insured's arteries were diseased and his death resulted from apoplexy, yet if he accidentally fell and ruptured a blood vessel, which caused the apoplectic stroke, his death was accidental. The court remarked that if a man is so afflicted that he will die from such affliction within a few hours, yet if, by some accidental means, his death is caused sooner, it is a death from accident; and it was, therefore, held an important question of fact in the case whether the insured fell and thereby caused a rupture of a blood vessel. It does not appear in this case exactly what the phraseology of the policy was.

In Binder v. National Masonic Acci. Asso. (1905) 127 Iowa, 25, 102 N. W. 190, however, where the accident policy involved provided that no benefits should be paid for any death or disability happening directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, accidentally or otherwise, because of, or resulting in or from, any disease or bodily infirmity, it was held that an instruction was erroneous that if the insured sustained a fall, and the bursting of an artery was caused thereby, there could be a recovery, even though it was found that the artery was in a weakened condition by reason of disease. The court here stated that the instruction entirely ignored the stipulation in the contract above set out, and that, as long as parties who are capable of so doing shall be permitted to make their own contracts, it is the plain duty of the court to enforce them as written, unless fraud or public policy intervene.

In Commercial Traveler's Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Fulton (1897) 24 C. C. A. 654, 45 U. S. App. 578, 79 Fed. 423, affirmed in (1899) 85 C. C. A. 493, 93 Fed. 621, where the policy provided that it should not cover accidental injuries or death resulting from, or caused directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by, disease in any form, it appeared that at the time the insured sustained an accident he was suffering, among other diseases, from calcification of the arteries, which made them rigid and fragile, and it was held that there could be no recovery for the insured's death unless the accidental injury was sufficient of itself to cause death to a healthy man; that if his diseased condition contributed to his death the insurer could not be held liable.

And in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Morrow (1914) 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1213, 130 C. C. A. 179, 213 Fed. 599, where the policy insured against injuries effected solely through external, violent, and accidental means that, independently of all other causes, resulted in death or injury, and it appeared that at the time the insured accidentally injured his toe he was suffering from numerous diseases, including arterio sclerosis, it was held that under the provision of the policy there could be no recovery, as it was admitted that the insured's death was caused by the concurring action of the injury and of pre-existing disease.

And in North American Acci. Ins. Co. v. Miller (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 750, where the policy insured against injury sustained through accidental means, and resulting directly, independently, and exclusively of all other causes in total disability and death, it was held that if the insured's death was not alone produced from an accidental blow, but was caused in part by arterio sclerosis, no recovery could be had under the policy. The evidence in the case, however, was held sufficient to show that the insured died from aneurism of the aorta, caused alone by a blow accidentally received by him.

A recovery of a benefit was sought in Miskern v. United Brotherhood, C. J. (1904) 93 App. Div. 364, 87 N. Y. Supp. 640, on the theory that on a certain date insured was suffering from arterio sclerosis, and that the strain to which he was subjected in lifting heavy timber ruptured a blood vessel and unfitted him for further labor at his trade. The evidence in the case, however, was held insufficient to make out an accidental injury, it amounting to nothing more than a statement that he suddenly became dizzy while endeavoring to put up the frame and rafters upon an addition to a house.

STATE OF WISCONSIN EX REL. WALTER C. OWEN, Attorney General, Respt.,
v.

LOUIS SCHOTTEN, Appt.

Municipal corporation — power of council to correct minutes.

1. A municipal council has no authority to change the minutes of a prior meeting at which liquor licenses were granted, for the purpose of making a correction in the record as to the order in which the licenses were granted, after rights have attached under the action as recorded in the minutes.

Intoxicating liquor — number of licenses — dry period.

2. In determining the number of licenses to sell intoxicating liquor which may be issued, upon a return to the license system after a town has been dry for a year, the number allowed by statute for the number of inhabitants of the town must prevail, and the number of licenses existing before the town went dry does not govern under the statutory proviso for protection of existing saloons.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County enjoining him from maintaining a saloon without a valid license.
Affirmed.

Statement by Vinje, J.:

Action to enjoin defendant from maintaining a saloon in the village of Norwalk because no valid license was issued to him. The facts found by the court are these: The village of Norwalk had a population of between 500 and 1,000 on June 19, 1916. In April, 1915, the electors of the village voted "no license" for the license year beginning July 1, 1915, and ending July 1, 1916, so no licenses were issued. In April, 1916, the electors voted in favor of license, and on the 19th day of June the village authorities granted three licenses for the year from July 1, 1916, in the following order: one to John Weibel, one to W. C. White, and one to the defendant herein. The minutes of the meeting showed that the licenses were issued in the order stated, and such minutes were read and approved at the next regular meeting held July 6, 1916; but after this action was begun and on the 3d of August, 1916, three members of the village council, with six out of the seven members present, voted in favor of the following motion, and three did not vote: "That error in the minutes of the regular meeting be corrected thus—placing Louis Schotten second, and W. C. White third." As conclusions of law the court found that the license granted to defendant was void, and that he should be enjoined from conducting a saloon in the village of Norwalk. From a judgment entered accordingly he appealed.

Messrs. Wolfe, Wolfe, & Reid, for appellant:

A public body may correct its records at any time.

Chippewa Bridge Co. v. Durand, 122

Wis. 85, 106 Am. St. Rep. 931, 99 N. W. 603; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 554; Ryder v. Alton, 175 Ill. 94, 51 N. E. 821; McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 626; Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret, 20 Conn. 590; Whitney v. Hudson, 69 Mich. 189, 37 N. W. 184; Jones, Ev. § 46; 28 Cyc. 339.

Defendant, by reason of § 1565d of the statute, should not lose his right to operate the saloon business.

Koch v. State, 157 Wis. 437, 147 N. W. 366; State ex rel. Platte County v. Sheldon, 79 Neb. 455, 113 N. W. 208; Harrington v. Smith, 28 Wis. 68.

Messrs. Walter C. Owen, Attorney General, and J. E. Messerschmidt, Assistant Attorney General, for respondent.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant contends that the village council had the power to, and did on August 3d, correct the minutes of the regular meeting of June 19, 1916, to correspond with the fact that defendant was granted the second license. Assuming that the language of the motion is adequate to express the fact that an error was made in the original minutes, and that such error was corrected to correspond to the fact, namely, that the second license was granted to the defendant; and assuming further that the motion was carried,—an assumption negatived in Oconto County v. Hall, 47 Wis. 208, 2 N. W. 291,—we are of the opinion that the council had no power to make such correction because the rights of third parties had intervened and would be prejudicially affected by such correction. The original minutes showed that Mr. White was voted the second license, and the evidence shows a license was issued to him. On July 6, 1916, the minutes of the meeting of June 19th were read and approved, and no effort was made to correct them till August 3d, after this action was begun. In the meantime Mr. White, relying upon the fact that the minutes correctly showed that he was granted the second license, paid for it, and presumably has operated under it. Should the minutes be permitted to be corrected as it is claimed they were, he would be subject to the penalties prescribed for running a saloon without a license, if only two licenses could be legally granted by the village. He would thus not only lose his license fee, but would be subject to severe penalties, not through any fault or neglect on his part, but solely because he was led astray by a record upon which he had a right to rely. Dillon states the rule thus: "The council, unless private rights have attached, may doubtless order the record of its own proceedings, even after it has once been approved, to be corrected according to the facts. But if third parties have acted in reliance upon the record, and private rights have accrued thereunder, the record cannot be amended." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 554; Sawyer v. Manchester & K. R. Co. 62 N. H. 135, 13 Am. St. Rep. 541; California Improv. Co. v. Moran, 128 Cal. 373, 60 Pac. 969; New Haven, M. & W. R. Co. v. Chatham, 42 Conn. 465.

Defendant further contends that under the proviso in § 1565d, Stat. 1915, three valid licenses could be issued notwithstanding the fact that no licenses were issued for the year ending July 1, 1916, since three valid licenses had been issued by the village before it voted dry in 1915. The claim is that a vote of no license for a year or more, and the failure to grant licenses during a no-license period, do not constitute a lapse within the meaning of the proviso of § 1565d, so as to bring the number back to that prescribed in the first part of the section, viz., one license for every 500 inhabitants or fraction thereof. The claim is not well founded.

Intoxicating liquor—number of licenses—dry period.

As explained in the cases of State ex rel. Marvin v. Larson, 153 Wis. 488, 140 N. W. 285, Zodrow v. State, 154 Wis. 551, 143 N. W. 693, and Koch v. State, 157 Wis. 437, 147 N. W. 366, the purpose of the proviso was to protect existing saloon business in such a way as to create as little hardship there-to as possible, and at the same time provide a method for reducing the number of saloons to the ratio prescribed in the first part of the section. A saloon that has been out of business for one year, due to the inability to secure a valid license, is no longer an existing business. It needs no protection because it has no existence. It was not the object of the statute to foster or create new business beyond the limit of the ratio. On the contrary, it sought to reduce the number down to the ratio limit as speedily as possible without disturbing existing business. A vote of "no license" destroyed all the saloon business for a year. At the end thereof there was no existing business to invoke the aid of the proviso. If a no-license vote of one year did not have this effect, then a no-license vote for ten years or more would not have it. Since the defendant is unable to show an existing business entitled to the protection of the statute, he fails to show that a valid license was issued to him, for confessedly the village could grant but two valid licenses under the ratio limit.

Judgment affirmed.

Wisconsin.—See the reported case (STATE EX REL. OWEN v. SCHOTTEN, ante, 1306).

"The courts are liberal respecting amendments of corporate records. If, through inadvertence or misapprehension, the record has been defectively made, it is competent to complete it according to the truth." White v. Clarksville (Ark.) supra.

"A liberal and favorable construction should prevail to support the proceedings of cities and towns, and this may well be the rule when no one is injured by it, or deprived of his rights; and especially, as in this case, when the object is only to declare of record as done that which was done." Chamberlain v. Evansville (1881) 77 Ind. 542.

The right of amendment by a board of aldermen of its minutes or by the clerk of a municipal corporation is very broad. Webb v. Strobach (Mo.) supra.

A public corporation may, like every court of record, amend its record nunc pro tunc. Logansport v. Crockett, Chamberlain v. Evansville, Everett v. Deal (Ind.) and Webb v. Strobach, (Mo.) supra.

Thus, under a mandatory statute requiring the votes of the common council of a city to be taken by ayes and noes, and a record to be made of the proceedings of the council, where it appears that the clerk has omitted to record the ayes and nays of a vote on a resolution of the council, a nunc pro tunc entry of the omitted proceedings may be made. Logansport v. Crockett (Ind.) supra.

In Anniston v. Davis (Ala.) supra, it appeared that the original minutes of the council meeting at which the proceedings were had stated that the plaintiff was "unanimously" elected to fill a vacancy in the council, the charter requiring "a majority vote of the remaining members." At a subsequent meeting, held by the same members of the council, a resolution was adopted to correct the previous minutes, "to make them speak the truth and show the facts," striking out the word "unanimously" as not in accordance with the facts, and stating that three members voted for the plaintiff, and, of the other two members, one voted against him and the other did not vote. It was held that the correction was properly made.

In Ryder v. Alton (Ill.) supra, it was objected that the report of a committee making an assessment of the cost of an improvement was never approved by the city council. The record produced recited that the special committee appointed under the ordinance made a report, which was approved, all the members voting aye, and then set out the report so made to the city council. It was attempted to be shown by certain witnesses who examined the records of the city clerk that the same, when examined by them, did not show the approval of the report of the committee. Whether the record was written up at the time the examination was made by the witnesses was not shown. The court said that, if the record could be attacked only for fraud and if it was not written up at the time of its examination, the clerk might amend the same according to his knowledge of the truth, so long as he had the custody thereof as clerk; and also that the city council might, unless private interests had attached, order the record of its own proceedings to be corrected according to the facts, even after it had once been approved.

In Gilberts v. Rabe (1893) 49 Ill. App. 418, it appeared that the record of a meeting of a village board consisting of six members, as originally made by a clerk pro tem, recited that all the members except one were present, and that the ordinance in question was passed, but it contained no recital of the manner of its passage. The ordinance was duly approved, and copies were posted. During the pendency of a prosecution for violations of it some five months later, at a regular meeting of the same board at which all the members were present, it was, by unanimous vote, ordered that the record of the proceedings at the previous meeting should be corrected so as to correspond with the facts, by inserting after the word "passed," where the passage of the ordinance was shown, the word "unanimously," and the record was amended accordingly. The record was in like manner amended so as to show that the member not present at the opening of the meeting came in and took his seat before the passage of the ordinance. The court held that the village board had the right to amend the record of its proceedings so as to correspond with the facts, and make the truth appear by supplying the omitted facts. It was, however, also contended that, inasmuch as the record did not, at the time the ordinance was violated, show that it had been passed by the affirmative vote of a majority of the board, the defendant had acquired some sort of vested right to immunity, which could not be disturbed by the subsequent amendment, or that the subsequent amendment was ex post facto in its character, and void as to him. In denying this contention, the court said: "The record as originally made recited that the ordinance was passed, and it was approved and published as an ordinance of the village. When defendant contemplated a violation of its provisions, ordinary prudence would require that he should ascertain whether it was in fact passed in the required mode. He is presumed to have known that the law authorized the board to amend its record by adding any omitted fact, and he could acquire no vested right that the prosecution for his wrongdoing should be governed by the record in its incomplete form. When he undertook to violate the ordinance, because he thought that the village would not be able to prove its passage, he took the risk of such proof being made, and had no right to insist that the proof should not be made. When the record was completed by adding the omitted fact that the vote on the passage of the ordinance was unanimous, the record had the same force and effect as though originally made as amended, and showed that the ordinance was legally passed July 31, 1890. . . . It was in full force when it was violated by the defendant, and the completion of the record did not make that an offense which was not an offense when committed."

In Owens v. Dalton (Ga.) supra, it appeared that the city council adopted a resolution which recited the entry of the minutes of a meeting held eight months previous; that the latter portion of the motion actually made and adopted at that meeting, which was set out, had been inadvertently omitted from the minutes by the clerk; and that the minutes should be amended by adding the omitted words. It was held that the resolution was simply a correction of an erroneous entry made by the clerk, and was within the authority of the council.

In White v. Clarksville (Ark.) supra, it appeared that the ordinance in question was challenged because the original record failed to show that it was read on three separate days, or that such three separate readings were dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, as required by the statute (Kirby's Dig. § 5481). The council, after the suit was instituted, and before the last trial, passed a resolution reciting and declaring that the minutes omitted to record the fact that by a two-thirds vote the rules were suspended, and the ordinance passed under such suspension, and directing the minutes to be corrected accordingly to make them speak the truth. The personnel of the council was unchanged so far as the record disclosed, except that at this meeting all the members were not present who were present at the other meeting, but all present at the last meeting were present when it was passed. The court held that the right of amendment existed.

In Wagner v. State (Ind.) supra, the question for determination was the power of the common council, after the expiration of over one year after a special meeting, the record of which showed a resolution appointing the defendant a councilman, adopted by an aye and nay vote, to correct that record by another vote, which was a tie and decided by the vote of the mayor, so as to leave it reading, as corrected: "The resolution was passed." The second vote did not attempt to change the record so that it would show that another person was in fact appointed, but only so that it would appear that the yea and nay vote was not taken. The court said that it was not an open question that the record of a common council might be corrected to speak the truth, and also that the resolution of appointment was not such an act as was required to be in the form of a resolution and the ayes and nays to be taken, the statute so requiring referring only to legislative action. The court stated that the effect on the rights of others, acquired in the faith of a record before changed, need not be considered, for the right to a public office, though a substantial

In Chamberlain v. Evansville (1881) 77 Ind. 542, it appeared that the proceedings of the common council with respect to certain street improvements were entered at full length on the minute book or record of the council; but, by a clerical omission, no order was entered on the minute book assessing the several amounts against the several pieces of property chargeable with the costs of the improvement, although the report was approved by the council and an order passed charging against each lot its appropriate share of the expenses. About a year and a half later, the action of the council approving the report and charging the cost of the improvements against the adjacent lots was entered nunc pro tunc. It was held that the council had the right, like a court of record, to amend its record nunc pro tunc.

In Mann v. Le Mars (Iowa) supra, it appeared that the record of a city council showed a tie vote for street commissioner, that a councilman desired to change his vote, but was ruled out of order by the mayor, whose vote on the tie elected the plaintiff. At the next regular meeting, the record was corrected so as to show that the councilman so desiring was allowed to change his vote, and that there was no election; and, as modified, was approved. The court held that the sections of the statute, providing that the council should "determine the rules of their own proceedings and keep a journal" (Code, § 668), and providing that the clerk should "make an accurate record of all the proceedings had" (Code, § 659), contemplated the control of its own record of proceedings by the city council, and that until this had been approved at the next succeeding regular meeting, it was open to such modifications as might be necessary to truthfully exemplify what had been done.

In Adams County v. Quincy (1889) 130 Ill. 566, 6 L.R.A. 155, 22 N. E. 624, the court stated that the right of the city council to amend the records of its meetings, to make them accord with the facts, was not questioned. It was shown that the record of a meeting was amended by order of the city council so as to show a formal approval of the report made by a committee appointed by the council to levy a special tax for the cost of a proposed improvement.

In People ex rel. Cady v. Ihnken (Mich.) supra, the question was whether the clerk of a village council should be permitted to raise the objection that the record of a meeting of the council was inaccurate, in that the trustee who purported to sign the record as clerk pro tem, was not present at the meeting, or whether, the record on its face having been authenticated by the president of the council and by one purporting to act as clerk pro tem, he should enter the record, subject to correction by the council itself. The court held that while, under the statute (1 Comp. Laws 1897, § 2731), it was the duty of the clerk to enter the record, it was always within the province of the council to correct any errors that had occurred; and that the proper proceeding was for the clerk to enter the record, and for the council then to make the correction of any error which was apparent.

In Chase v. Springfield, (Mass.) supra, wherein it appeared that the record of the board of aldermen with respect to an assessment for the improvement of a street was defective in not showing what the amount of that expense was, it was held that the defect might and should be cured by an amendment of that record.

In St. Charles v. O'Mailey (1857) 18 Ill. 407, the court said that it did not perceive any objection to an amendment of the entry of the proceedings of the board of trustees of a town, to make it set forth the truth.

A California statute (Stat. 1885, p. 149) provides that on an appeal to the city council from a street assessment "all the decisions . . . of said city council . . . shall be final and conclusive . . . as to all errors, informalities and irregularities which said city council might have remedied and avoided." Thereunder, in California Improv. Co. v. Moran (1900) 128 Cal. 873, 60 Pac. 969, it was held that while the city council could "remedy and correct any error or informality in the proceedings," correct and revise the acts of the superintendent of streets, "confirm, amend, set aside, alter, modify, or correct the assessment," etc., it could not dispense with, alter, amend, modify, or correct any proceeding previously taken, on which its jurisdiction to act depended, so as to confer a jurisdiction which it had failed to acquire by such proceeding. Hence, the council remaining unchanged, the court conceded that it might have directed the clerk to correct the record so as to conform to the fact, but stated that no such determination was made. The court stated that the council confirmed the assessment, but did not amend the record, which the evidence now showed could not have been amended in conformity with the truth so as to confer jurisdiction on the council.

In Samis v. King (Conn.) supra, it appeared that the question was whether the official record of a meeting of the common council, duly certified by the clerk of the city, or the record as attempted to be amended at a subsequent meeting of the council, was to be treated as the true record and as evidence of what took place at the meeting. The court stated that if the clerk had made a mistake in his record he might doubtless correct it, and it might be corrected, if erroneous, by mandamus, but held that the record, until amended by the clerk, or by order of the court on mandamus, was the proper evidence of what took place at the meeting.

The commissioners of highways have the right to control the amendment of a record of their proceedings according to the facts, and to order the clerk to make the amendment accordingly. Du Page County v. Martin (1891) 39 Ill. App. 298. In that case it appeared that the records of the commissioners of highways on page 396 showed that at a meeting of the commissioners, February 19, 1887, it was decided "to build an iron bridge in place of the one swept away" at Garry's Mills, and the legal notices inviting bids for the construction of the bridge were proposed, and afterwards posted and recorded. Then the record of a meeting of the commissioners of highways at the bridge site at Garry's Mills for the purpose of letting the contract of building the bridge, held March 1, 1887, was introduced, and in connection therewith an amended record was read and inserted on the same page before the record of the bridge contract, which showed that the board at the same meeting found that the immediate building of the bridge in question was necessary, and a delay in so doing detrimental to the public interest, and it was unanimously voted that the bridge be immediately built, as provided by law, and that aid be asked of the county board as provided by statute. The part of the record last recited was inserted on the 16th day of September, 1889, pursuant to a vote of the commissioners to correct the record, which record of the order to correct was read, and showed that at a meeting of the commissioners of highways of the town, duly called and held on the 16th day of September, 1889, C. D. Clark was appointed clerk protem., the clerk being absent from the county, and thereupon a motion was duly and unanimously voted that the minutes and record of the previous meeting of the board be amended and corrected to correspond with the fact by inserting the following on page 398 before the record of the bridge contract. The court held that the commissioners of highways had the right to order the clerk to make an amendment of the record according to the facts.

An erroneous record of the proceeding of a municipal council cannot be corrected or amended, to the destruction of rights acquired under it in good faith, without notice of the error. California Improv. Co. v. Moran (1900) 128 Cal. 373, 60 Pac. 969; New Haven, M. & W. R. Co. v. Chatham (1875) 42 Conn. 465; Sawyer v. Manchester & K. R. Co. (1882) 62 N. H. 135, 13 Am. St. Rep. 541.

In the reported case (STATE EX REL. OWEN V. SCHOTTEN, ante, 1306), it appeared that village authorities had granted three licenses to keep saloons in the village, whereas, under the statute (Stat. 1915, § 1565d), only two licenses could be legally granted by them, the record of the meeting showing that the third license was granted to the defendant. These minutes were read and approved at the next regular meeting; but a month later three members of the village council, with six out of the seven members present, voted in favor of a motion correcting the error in the regular license meeting, placing the defendant second, and the previous second licensee third. The second licensee, relying on the fact that the minutes correctly showed that he was granted the second license, paid for it, and was presumably operating under it, with the result that, if the minutes were corrected, he would not only lose the license fee, but would be subject to the penalties prescribed for running a saloon without a license, not through any fault or neglect on his part, but solely because he was led astray by a record on which he had a right to rely. The court holds that the council had no power to make the correction, because the rights of third persons had intervened and would be prejudicially affected by the correction.

In New Haven, M. & W. R. Co. v. Chatham (1875) 42 Conn. 465, it appeared that a town, for the purpose of aiding a railroad company, had, under authority of the legislature, voted to guarantee a certain amount of bonds of the railroad company, the resolution and the warning of the meeting at which the town acted on the matter stating that the voters should pass on the matter by ballot. In the warning, it was stated that those in favor of the adoption of the proposition would deposit a ballot marked, "Yes," and those who were opposed, a ballot marked, "No." The record made by the town clerk of the action of voters stated: "Voted, that the resolutions prescribed in the warning be adopted, Yes, 178; No, 86." The officers and inhabitants of the town knew, after this record was made and exhibited to the public, that the company and the contractors under it, relying on the vote of the town, and on the record thereof as evidence that it was legally passed, were expending large sums of money and incurring obligations in completing the road, and adding substantial value to property in which the town had made large previous investments, and that the work of construction was carried on wholly on this pledge of assistance from the defendant town and other towns in like situation. When asked from time to time to place the guaranty upon the bonds, by the company and by the contractors whom they had seen expending money and performing labor on the faith of their record, they received the request in silence or refused compliance for varying reasons; but no officer or individual citizen ever gave any notice or even intimation to the company or any person that there was any defect or informality in the manner of passing the vote, or any error in the record thereof, until the road had been completed and they had derived all possible benefits from silence, when, three years later, it was claimed that the vote on the passage of the resolutions was not taken by ballot, but by dividing the house and counting the affirmative and negative votes. It appeared that a peremptory writ of mandamus was then obtained to compel the then town clerk, but not the town clerk at the time the record was made, to correct the record of the vote, directing him to correct the record so as to conform to the fact, by recording, in addition to what before appeared and at the end thereof, the following words, viz.: Said vote was taken by a division of the house and a count, and not by ballot. In addition to which and at the suggestion of the court a conspicuous memorandum of the correction was inserted by him on the same page in the record book as that on which the original entry was made, explaining the time when, and on whose application, and by what order it was done. The court held that the town was estopped from correcting the record.

In Sawyer v. Manchester & K. R. Co.

(N. H.) supra, it appeared that the warning of a special meeting of a town stated that one of its purposes was to see what sum the town would raise and appropriate as a gratuity to a railroad company, the road "to be completed on or before the 1st day of January, 1878." The vote of the town, as recorded by the town clerk, stated that it was voted to raise 5 per cent of the present valuation of the town as a gratuity to the railroad. Over three years later, on the application of the town, it was ordered by the court that the record of the vote be amended by adding thereto the words, "and complete the road on or before the 1st day of January, 1878." It was held that the court could not properly permit the erroneous record to be amended according to the truth, to the destruction of rights acquired under it in good faith, without notice of the error.

In California Improv. Co. v. Moran (Cal.) supra, it was held that whether or not a new municipal council had power to change the record of a preceding council, it clearly could not exercise that power if it injuriously affected intervening rights.

In New Albany v. Endres (1895) 143 Ind. 192, 42 N. E. 683, it appeared that a petition to widen a street was pending before the common council on July 21, 1890, and that the property in question was conveyed to the plaintiff on December 2, 1890. On the final report of the city commissioners to meet, view, report for appropriation, and assess for damages, filed on December 15, 1890, and approved by the common council on the same day, the records of the proceedings of the council failed to show the vote taken. The statute (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3630; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3167) providing for a two-thirds vote by the council, on March 30, 1893, by nunc pro tunc the resolution calling out the city commissioners was corrected so as to show the vote thereon, and by nunc pro tunc the resolution adopting the final report of the commissioners was corrected by setting out the vote thereon, showing the two-thirds vote in favor of such action. It was held that the proceedings were binding on the plaintiff, and that he had no intervening right, the fact that he was an intervening purchaser between the adoption of the resolution and the nunc pro tunc entry not relieving him from the binding force of the action of the common council.

Conceding the existence of the power of the same city council, at a subsequent meeting, to correct an error in the journal in relation to their proceedings at a previous meeting, it does not follow that a different council, whose only knowledge of the proceedings that actually occurred at a previous meeting of the board would have to be derived from the information of other persons, can properly exercise such a power. Covington v. Ludlow (1858) 1 Met. (Ky.) 295; Locke v. Com. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 840; Pontiac v. Axford (1882) 49 Mich. 69, 12 N. W. 914.

In Covington v. Ludlow (Ky.) supra, it appeared that some two years later the words, "passed unanimous," were added to an ordinance for the improvement of a street by an order of the city council, when an entirely new board had come into office. The court held that the new board had not the power to amend an entry on the journal so as to make it appear, not only that an ordinance had been reported, but also that it had been acted on and passed by unanimous vote of the city council. The court said: "The city council keep a journal of their proceedings. The entries in that journal furnish the evidence of their action in their official capacity. If changes and amendments can be made at a remote period, and by a different board, then all the entries become uncertain, and none can be relied upon, even by those who are acting under them. The evils resulting from such a practice would be innumerable. All confidence in the entries in the journal would be destroyed, and the action of the city council, at the meetings held by them, would be a matter open for controversy, which would have to be determined by an appeal to the uncertain recollection of witnesses. We conclude, therefore, that the amendment of the entry of the proceedings of the city council . . . was unauthorized."

In Locke v. Com. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 840, it appeared that the minutes of a meeting in January of the board of trustees of a town were not signed by the chairman or any other member of the board. At the following September meeting of the board, which was then a different board, though three of the members were on both boards, it was ordered that the first record be amended so as to show that the minutes were signed by the clerk and the chairman. It was held, following Covington v. Ludlow (Ky.) supra, that a new board could not correct errors and omissions in the journal entry of official actions of their predecessors.

In Pontiac v. Axford (Mich.) supra, it appeared that a city charter required that "the votes of all the members of the common council in relation to any act, proceeding, or proposition had at any meeting shall be entered at large in the minutes," and a subsequent clause particularly applied this provision to the taxation or assessment of property. In that case the minutes relating to a city tax voted only showed the names of persons present at meetings, without showing their presence at the passage of any of the measures in question, which were stated in general terms, and without any names of voters, to have been unanimously passed. Some time later, amendatory resolutions were passed by a subsequent council, including a portion, but less than a majority, of the members in office when the first action was had, whereby the records were made to show the names of those who had voted. The court held that, assuming that such amendments might cure the defects, this could be the case only where it appeared that the amendment was made by the same council that originally acted, and therefore had knowledge of what took place at its meetings. This could not be made out, the court held, by matter ascertained by a subsequent council, inquiring on testimony, and not acting on any knowledge of its members.

A new municipal council has no power to change the record of a preceding council, if it injuriously affects intervening rights. California Improv. Co. v. Moran (1900) 128 Cal. 373, 60 Pac. 969.

II. Correction by clerk:

a. In general.

It is generally held that the clerk of a town or other municipal corporation has the right and power to amend the minutes or records of the proceedings of the municipality, so long as he has the custody thereof, according to the facts and his knowledge of their truth, where, through inadvertence, mistake, or neglect, the record of the proceedings is incomplete or defective. Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret (1850) 20 Conn. 590; Ryder v. Alton (1898) 175 Ill. 94, 51 N. E. 821; Du Page County v. Martin (1891) 39 Ill. App. 298; Schuyler County v. Missouri Bridge & Iron Co. (1912) 173 Ill. App. 435, judgment affirmed in (1912) 256 Ill. 348, 100 N. E. 239; Chamberlain v. Dover (1836) 13 Me. 466, 29 Am. Dec. 517; Welles v. Battelle (1814) 11 Mass. 477; Halleck v. Boylston (1875) 117 Mass. 469; Com. v. McGarry (1883) 135 Mass. 553; Webb v. Strobach (1910) 143 Mo. App. 459, 127 S. W. 680; Mott v. Reynolds (1855) 27 Vt. 206. See also Samis v. King (1873) 40 Conn. 298. See, however, II. b, infra.

This is on the ground that he is a public officer appointed to keep the records and sworn to perform this duty, has the custody of the records, and is presumed to know the fact in relation to which the amendment is made. Chamberlain v. Dover (1836) 13 Me. 466, 29 Am. Dec. 517; Welles v. Battelle (1814) 11 Mass. 477; Halleck v. Boylston (1875) 117 Mass. 469; Com. v. McGarry (1883) 135 Mass. 553.

In Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret (1850) 20 Conn. 590, the court said: "Our statutes expressly require town clerks to keep the record books of their respective towns, and to enter truly all the votes and proceedings of the town. Title 3, chap. 5, § 58, p. 147. This duty is not performed by an erroneous entry of those votes and proceedings; and unless we are to adopt the technical idea that, as to any particular proceeding of the town, the clerk is functus officio as to his power of recording it, when he has once made an entry of it, however untruly, on the record book, we can perceive no good reason why it may not be rectified by him. We know of no authority which requires so narrow a construction of his powers; and it would, in many cases, work great inconvenience and injustice, not only to the town whose proceedings are thus recorded, but to others who are interested in those proceedings."

So, it has been said that to deny the clerks of corporations such as cities and villages the right to complete or correct the journal entries according to the facts might involve such corporations, and the officials executing their laws or ordinances, in most serious trouble, without subserving any good purpose. Belknap v. Miller (1894) 52 Ill. App. 617.

These reasons do not apply, however, where one of the selectmen of a town, by appointment of his associates, keeps the minutes of their proceedings. He does not keep a record required by law, nor act under the sanction of an oath of office as clerk, and hence has not the power to make amendments of the minutes which will give them the character of records, constituting independent and conclusive evidence. Com. v. McGarry (1883) 135 Mass. 553.

The amendment of the records is to be confined to the officer whose duty it was originally to make them, and is allowed even to him only while he is in office. Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret (Conn.) supra. But the clerk may amend an entry in the record, where he was the person who officiated at the time of the first entry, and has been re-elected to the same office, if at the time he undertakes to amend he is in office, and amends only what was done by him when he was in the same office before. Schuyler County v. Missouri Bridge & Iron Co. (1912) 173 Ill. App. 435, judgment affirmed in (1912) 256 Ill. 343, 100 N. E. 239; Welles v. Battelle (1814) 11 Mass. 477; Halleck

v. Boylston (1875) 117 Mass. 469; Mott v. Reynolds (1855) 27 Vt. 206. So, where a clerk continues in office several years, by repeated annual elections, he may amend the record of a former year, notwithstanding an election has intervened, and though he does not hold the office under the same appointment. Welles v. Battelle (1814) 11 Mass. 477; Halleck v. Boylston (1875) 117 Mass. 469. But the town clerk of a former year, who does not at the time hold office, cannot be allowed to come in and amend the record of a former year, made whilst he was in that office. Hartwell v. Littleton (1832) 13 Pick. (Mass.) 229. See also Mott v. Reynolds (Vt.) supra. Compare, however, the New Hampshire cases set out in II. b, infra.

The town clerk may not amend the record of the proceedings of the town made the day preceding the day of the meeting at which he was elected town clerk, as he was not town clerk on the first day, and had no control of the records, and no official knowledge of what took place before his election. Taylor v. Henry (1824) 2 Pick. (Mass.) 397. And the clerk of a school district cannot amend the record made while he was in office, after his successor has been sworn into office and he has been out of office for many years. Third School Dist. v. Atherton (1846) 12 Met. (Mass.) 105.

The clerk as custodian and keeper may amend the record according to the truth without direction or authority of the officials who took the original action; nor is it necessary that it should be made from some official memorandum of that action. Schuyler County v. Missouri Bridge & Iron Co. (Ill.) supra. So, if the same clerk who made the entry is still in office, he may, without an order of the board, amend the journal entry according to the truth, being liable for an abuse of the right. Belknap v. Miller (Ill.) supra.

The amendment of the record by the town clerk is not invalid on the ground that it affects the terms of a contract between the parties. The vote is only an action of the town, which furnishes evidence of the contract; and in regard to the propriety of allowing it to be amended, there is no difference between such a vote and any other, by which its own interests or those of another may be affected. Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret (Conn.) supra.

Nor is the amendment invalid because it was made by the town clerk, not on his own personal knowledge, but on information derived from others. Boston Turnp. Co. v. Pomfret (Conn.) supra, wherein the court said: "An amendment of a record stands on the same ground, in this respect, as the original record; and neither can be impugned by an inquiry into the sources of knowledge on which it was made. It is not unusual that entries in our public records, even in those of a judicial character, are made by the recording officer, without any personal knowledge of the truth of what is recorded; but when thus made, has it ever been supposed that they were not to be deemed records on that account? It is sufficient that the fact recorded is ascertained by him, by whatever means, and that it is recorded by him, or by his authority. Nor is his power originally to make, or afterwards to amend, a record, to be determined by an inquiry into the truth of it, as so made or amended. Such power is derived solely from his official character, and does not depend on the permission of the court in which the record is offered as an instrument of evidence. The only inquiry, then, is whether it is a record. Being shown to be such, it imports absolute and uncontrollable verity, and is, therefore, conclusive evidence of the facts which it states."

However, it has been held that the officer may not ordinarily alter or amend a record on the testimony of third persons, and ought not to do it on his own recollection, unless in very obvious cases of omission or error. Mott v. Reynolds (1855) 27 Vt. 206. Such an omission, it was held, was shown in that case. It did not appear therein, from the book of records of a school district, that the warning for the meeting in question had ever been signed by the clerk of the district, further than that he had signed the attestation immediately under the warning. The clerk testified that he had signed the original, and that he was clerk at that time and at the time of the trial, though another person had been clerk during a portion of the time between those periods. The clerk was there allowed to amend his record, by adding thereon his signature as clerk to the record of the warning. The court held that the clerk had the power so to amend the record, if the amendment was according to the truth, and that the amendment was properly made.

If the clerk makes an erroneous record, the town is not bound by it merely because others confide in its correctness, but is entitled to have it set right. Otherwise the council members would be concluded, not by their own votes, but by whatever, by design or accident, might be improperly entered by the clerk, and that without any chance of relief by amendment. Chamberlain v. Dover (1836) 13 Me. 466, 29 Am. Dec. 517.

In Ryder v. Alton (1898) 175 Ill. 94, 51 N. E. 821, it was objected that the report of a committee making an assessment of the cost of an improvement was never approved by the city council. The record produced recited that the special committee appointed under the ordinance made a report, which was approved, all the members voting aye, and then set out the report as made to the city council. It was attempted to be shown by certain witnesses who examined the records of the city clerk that the same, when examined by them, did not show the approval of the report of the committee. Whether the record was written up at the time the examination was made by the witnesses was not shown. The court held that the record could be attacked only for fraud, and said that, if it was not written up at the time of its examination, the clerk might amend the same according to his knowledge of the truth, so long as he had the custody thereof as clerk, and also that the city council might, unless private interests had attached, order the record of its own proceedings to be corrected according to the facts, even after it had once been approved.

In Schuyler County v. Missouri Bridge & Iron Co. (Ill.) supra, it was claimed that the clerk could not amend the records according to the truth, because he had no independent recollection of the proceedings, and because there was no official memorandum by which to make the amendments. The evidence of the clerk on this point was that by direction of the new commissioners he, with one of the attorneys for the defendant, amended the records so that they would be all right, and that he was furnished with a typewritten statement of the amendments to be made by the attorney, which he used in writing up the amended records. But while such aid was furnished him, and while he made some statements in connection with the proceeding that left some doubt whether he had any independent recollection, so that he could record the truth, or whether he took the attorney's statement for his data, yet he testified that the attorney helped him amend the record; that the statement was dictated by the attorney under his direction, and from his statement of the facts, and further said that the amended records spoke the truth. The court said that it would not be justified in holding adversely to the trial judge that the records were not properly made.

In Welles v. Battelle (1814) 11 Mass. 477, it appeared that on the record of the meeting of the inhabitants of a town for the purpose of electing the necessary municipal officers, it was stated that a named person was chosen clerk for the ensuing year, and the word "sworn" was immediately added, without any certificate of his oath. By the same record, it also appeared that the defendants were chosen assessors, and the words, "all sworn into office," were added. Some three years later the same person who acted as clerk in the year of the meeting added to the record words sufficient to show that the clerk was sworn by the moderator of the meeting, no justice of the peace being present, and that the assessors were sworn by the clerk on the evening of the day of the meeting. It was held that the clerk had a right to amend the record in the manner and at the time he did.

In Chamberlain v. Dover (Me.) supra, it appeared that the records of the proceedings of a town meeting commenced as follows: "The inhabitants of Dover met agreeably to warrant and opened the meeting by reading the warrant, and adjourned the meeting to A. S. Patten's store. Met according to adjournment and proceeded to business in the following manner, viz." In the margin of the book of records, and opposite the foregoing extract, the town clerk had made the following entry: "The inhabitants of Dover met in the highway near the schoolhouse, in district No. 2, and read the warrant in the open air, and adjourned the meeting to A. S. Patten's store." The court stated that it was the duty of the town clerk to record the doings and proceedings of the town, and held that if, through inadvertence or misapprehension, the record had been defectively made, it was competent for him, while in office, to complete it, by amending it according to the truth.

In Halleck v. Boylston (1875) 117 Mass. 469, it appeared that a vote of a town "to re-establish the school district system" was adjudged (1872; 110 Mass. 214) to be defective and insufficient because it failed to show that the vote was adopted by two thirds of the legal voters present and voting thereon, as required by the statute (Stat. 1870, chap. 196). After the rendition of that judgment, the town clerk then in office, who held the office when the vote was passed, and had remained in office by successive annual elections, amended the record by adding to the words, "to re-establish the school district system," the words, "two thirds of the legal voters present and voting thereon having voted therefor, 103 voting in the affirmative, and 5 in the negative." It was held that the clerk had the right to amend the record made by him.

In Hoag v. Durfey (1826) 1 Aik. (Vt.) 286, it appeared that the record of the proceedings of a town meeting stated the warning of the meeting to have been on the 17th, and the meeting to have been held on the 19th of the month. The town clerk testified that he had made a mistake in the record, and that the original warning stated the 29th, so that there was the requisite twelve days' notice. It was held that it was the duty of the clerk to have made the record according to the truth, and that he would have been justified in making the correction, though the court refused its assent.

In Belknap v. Miller (1894) 52 Ill. App. 617, wherein it appeared that the record of the village board stated that it had adopted certain ordinances, all the members being present, the question was whether the yeas and nays must appear on the journal in order to give validity to the ordinances. The court stated that while apparently the record showed that all the members were present, the word "adopted" signified that a "majority" of the members of the village board had voted for the passage of the ordinance, yet if this should not be the correct legal position, and the word "majority," or "unanimously," should have been entered in the journal, in addition to the word "adopted," according to what the actual fact might have been, the village board had the right, on proper proof, to supply an omitted or correct an erroneous entry, and thus make the record complete. And the court held that if the same clerk who made the entry was still in office, he could, without an order of the board, amend the journal entry according to the truth, being liable for an abuse of the right.

In Samis v. King (1873) 40 Conn. 298, the question was whether the official record of a meeting of the common council, duly certified by the clerk of the city, or the record as attempted to be amended at a subsequent meeting of the council, was to be treated as the true record and as evidence of what took place at the meeting. The court stated that if the clerk should have happened to have made a mistake on his record, he might doubtless correct it, and it might be corrected, if erroneous, by mandamus, but held that the record, until amended by him, or by order of the court on mandamus, was the proper evidence of what took place at the meeting.

In Taylor v. Henry (1824) 2 Pick. (Mass.) 397, it appeared that on the day preceding the supposed election of the petitioner as town clerk, there was a town meeting, the proceedings of which were recorded by the petitioner; but no adjournment of that meeting was recorded. The record of the meeting of the next day, at which he was elected, was merely that "at an adjourned meeting," etc., without saying of what meeting it was an adjournment, and the question was whether the petitioner might not amend the record so as to show that the meeting on the second day was held by adjournment of the meeting of the day preceding. It was held, however, that he was not town clerk on the first day, and that he had no control of the records and no official knowledge of what took place before his election.

In Webb v. Strobach (1910) 143 Mo. App. 459, 127 S. W. 680, it appeared that in April the board of aldermen passed a resolution declaring the necessity of improving a named street. In the following June, the board ordered interlineations in the nature of a nunc pro tunc amendment to the resolution, which appeared in the record as follows: "It appearing to the board of aldermen that in the minutes of the proceedings of this board, appearing on page 388 of the city minute-book record of the meeting of April 8, 1909, the minutes are incomplete, and do not show the exact proceedings of the board, it is, therefore, ordered that in order that the minutes of the said meeting may show the exact proceedings held at said time, the minutes of said meeting be corrected by the interlining in said record of the said meeting, of the seventeenth line of the said page 388, the following: 'It is further ordered by the board of aldermen that said resolutions Nos. 4 and 5 be published in the city of Rolla, No. 4 in the Rolla New Era, and No. 5 in the Rolla Herald-Democrat, and the clerk is ordered to have the same published.' It is further ordered that the clerk interline this order of correction." In sustaining the right to make this amendment, the court said: "The authorities show that the right of amendment by a board of aldermen of its minutes, or by the clerk of a municipal corporation, is very broad. A nunc pro tunc amendment may be made on the minutes at a succeeding meeting. 'The city clerk may amend the minutes in the record of the corporation made by himself, according to his knowledge of the truth, so long as he has custody of them.' 28 Cyc. 346. 'Whenever the city clerk in charge of the municipal records has, through inadvertence or neglect, recorded proceedings so that they are incomplete, he may amend the record so as to make it speak the truth.' 'In the event of the neglect or inadvertence of the clerk in failing to keep a complete record which has been discovered by the council, the latter may order the record amended so that it will give a correct recital of the proceedings.' 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 10; Ryder v. Alton (1898) 175 Ill. 94, 51 N. E. 821. Under these authorities, the board of aldermen had the right to correct the minutes of April 8, 1909, by the entries made by the clerk on June 28, 1909, and, as amended, they show that the board of aldermen, in publishing the resolution, acted in strict compliance with the statute."

McClain v. McKisson (1898) 15 Ohio C. C. 517, 8 Ohio C. D. 357, was an action of mandamus to compel the clerk of a city council to correct the council record of a meeting. In denying the writ the court stated that the statutes (Rev. Stat. §§ 1679, 1755), requiring the record of the council to be kept by the clerk, and giving the council the right to adopt rules governing its procedure, construed together, gave the council the right to determine when the journal truly set forth its proceedings. These provisions of law, the court declared, were intended to require the clerk to make an accurate record of all the doings of the council while in session, which record should be presented to the council at its next meeting for examination, and for such corrections as the council should determine were necessary, to make the journal fully conform to the action of the council. After the journal or record had thus been corrected and disposed of by the council, the court held, the clerk had no further right to change it, nor was there any duty enjoined on him by the law so to do.

In California Improv. Co. v. Moran

(1900) 128 Cal. 373, 60 Pac. 969, the court stated that, without determining whether the clerk might at any time while in office, without any order of the council, amend the record according to the truth, being liable for any abuse of the right, it was sufficient to say that, according to testimony of the clerk, the change was not in accordance with the truth, for he testified that the name of the newspaper in which the notice of an assessment was to be published was placed in the resolution when he drew it, was there when passed by the council and when recorded in the resolution book, and remained there from July until the following February, when, on his own motion, he changed it.

b. Rule in New Hampshire.

In New Hampshire, it is held that the clerk may not amend the record, except under the direction of the court, and on a showing that justice requires it. Pierce v. Richardson (1858) 37 N. H. 306; Sawyer v. Manchester & K. R. Co. (1882) 62 N. H. 135, 13 Am. St. Rep. 541. The general rule is that amendments or records are made with a saving of the rights of third persons, acquired since the existence of the defect. Gibson v. Bailey (1838) 9 N. H. 168. So, it is immaterial whether the clerk in making the record acts as the agent of the town, or as a public officer in the performance of a duty imposed by law. At any time before the rights of third persons have attached, a town may rescind its votes, or the record thereof, if erroneous, may be amended in accordance with the facts; but not after others have acquired rights based on the original record. Sawyer v. Manchester & K. R. Co. supra.

Under these conditions it has been held that the records of towns may be amended to conform to the truth. Bishop v. Cone (1826) 3 N. H. 513; Gibson v. Bailey, supra; Cavis v. Robertson (1838) 9 N. H. 524; Cass v. Bellows (1855) 31 N. H. 501, 64 Am. Dec. 347; Pierce v. Richardson, supra; Jaquith v. Putney (1868) 48 N. H. 138. And it is well settled in this state that the court may, by an order, allow amendments of town records by the officer by whom they were made, even after he has ceased to hold office, where the amendments can be made consistently with the truth. Gibson v. Bailey, supra; Bean v. Thompson (1848) 19 N. H. 290, 49 Am. Dec. 154; Cass v. Bellows (1855) 31 N. H. 501, 64 Am. Dec. 347; Pierce v. Richardson, supra. The order of the court sets out in terms the precise amendment to be made, after being satisfied, by the testimony of witnesses in writing, that the amendment can be made consistently with the truth of the case. It does not permit any erasures, or interlineations of the original record, but requires the amendment to be written on a separate sheet of paper, signed by the proper officer, and with it a copy of the order allowing the amendment; and this paper is then annexed to the original record. Pierce v. Richardson, supra. See also Gibson v. Bailey, supra.

In Bishop v. Cone, supra, it appeared that the record of the vote of a town at a meeting was as follows: "Voted, to raise  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent on the grand list, to repair highways and bridges." It was moved that the town clerk for that year might have leave to amend the record of the vote, according to the truth, which was granted, and the amended record read as follows: "Voted, to raise the amount of the grand list, to repair highways and bridges the present year." The court held that there was no doubt that a record might be amended to conform to the truth. In Jaquith v. Putney, supra, it was held that as the rights of third persons had not intervened, the amendment of the records of the county convention proving the grant of the county tax, which purported to be signed by the clerk, but did not show that he had been sworn, so as to show that the clerk took the oath of office, being conformable to the truth, might be allowed.

Where what is necessary, in the proceedings of a town, although not formally entered of record, is so far stated as to lead to a belief that a correct record might have been made, a subsequent purchaser of land sold for taxes takes his title from the former owner, subject to the right of others whom it may concern, to have the record amended if the truth will warrant it. Gibson v. Bailey and Bean v. Thompson, supra. See also Cass v. Bellows (1851) 31 N. H. 501, 64 Am. Dec. 347.

In Gibson v. Bailey, supra, it was said: "The general rule is, that amendments of records are made with a saving of the rights of third persons, acquired since the existence of the defect. . . . To apply this rule, however, to all cases of defects in sales of land for taxes, would, in effect, be very nearly denying a right to amend; as the owner of the land sold would attempt to defeat any amendment, by conveying to some friend, who would bring a suit in his behalf. It would, at least, be necessary to confine the application of the principle to cases where the land had been actually conveyed bona fide. But instances might exist, where the purchaser, although he might not have found upon the records all that was necessary to make a formal and valid record, might have been well assured, from what he did find, that all that was necessary had in fact been done. For instance, in relation to the two first defects in the records in this case—in the return of the warning of the meeting, and in the record of the oath of the collector—although these records are not sufficient in point of law, they lead the mind of anyone to the belief that what was requisite was probably done. And in such cases, where the fact appears to be stated, but not in a formal manner, there is no reason that he who purchases should not be subjected to the same liability to have the amendment made and the record put in form that his grantor would have been, had he attempted to recover the land. There are cases where, although all that is required may not appear of record, it may be left to a jury to presume that all that was required was done. . . . Whether that principle could be applied against a subsequent purchaser, it is not necessary to determine. But where what is necessary is, although not formally stated, so far set down as to lead to a belief that a correct record might have been made, there seems to be no reason why a purchaser who has access to the records should not take it subject to a right to have the record put in form, if the truth will warrant it. Where, on the other hand, nothing appears upon the record in relation to any particular fact necessary to make out a title, nor is anything set down from which it is naturally to be inferred that the fact existed, a subsequent bona fide purchaser ought not to have his title defeated by supplying a record instead of amending a record." It appeared, in that case, that the record of the return of a warrant for a town meeting stated that "we, the selectmen of Unity, certify that we have posted up a true copy of the within warrant at the house of Francis Chase, fifteen days previous to said meeting," which was signed by the selectmen. It also appeared that the record of the election of one John Thirston, as collector, at that meeting, stated, "Qualified by Francis Chase, Esq." It was moved that these proceedings of the town, under which the land was sold for taxes, be amended to show when the warrant for the town meeting was posted up; that it was posted at a public place; and that the collector chosen took the oath of office prescribed by law. The court said: "Upon these principles, if the facts will warrant it, the return in relation to the meeting may be so amended as to show the time when the warrant was posted up, it being stated in the original record to have been fifteen days before the meeting; and that Francis Chase's, where it is stated to have been posted, was a public place. So, as to the record stating that Thirston, the collector, was 'qualified by Francis Chase, Esq.,' an amendment may be made, setting forth that the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by Francis Chase, a justice of the peace. So, if the truth will admit of it, the return of the collector, that he 'proceeded to open the vendue at 1 o'clock, P. M.,' etc., may be amended, by stating that the sale was closed before 6 o'clock, P. M., and to the fact that it was struck off to Gage may be added that he was the highest bidder, if such was the fact."

In Bean v. Thompson, supra, it was stated that, no return appearing upon the warrant calling the town meeting at which the tax was voted and the officers chosen, the persons who had been selectmen in 1842, and whose duty it had been to make such return, were, on motion, and on satisfactory evidence that the facts would justify them, permitted by the court to make the proper return, and the town clerk for that year had leave also to amend the record accordingly. In holding that the amendments were correctly allowed, the court said: "Leave is often granted to officers, whose returns of their doings or records of public transactions are by law made evidence, to correct errors or to supply omissions to conform to the truth. The interest which the public has in the correctness and fullness of the record, and the responsibility of the officer himself for the accuracy of his own doings, are primarily a good cause for granting such indulgences, tending to the promotion of reasonable objects. And it has never been deemed an objection to the amendment of a return or a record that proceedings were pending which might be affected by it, except that, where rights or claims bona fide have intervened, amendments that would entirely defeat them have in some instances been denied. The extent to which such claims would be regarded, in settling applications to amend the returns and records of town officers, was discussed somewhat in Gibson v. Bailey, supra, in which case it was held, in substance, that where the record contains enough to lead to a reasonable belief that all that was necessary was done, and that a correct record might have been made, the purchaser, having access to such records, should take the land subject to the right of others, whom it might concern to have the record amended. We think this case falls within the principles there laid down. The warrant itself was recorded, with evidence on its face of having been seasonably issued. The meeting was held in pursuance of its exigency, and a record of the meeting accordingly made up. All the facts stated in the return might reasonably be presumed by anyone searching the records for information, and that the omission to enter such return upon the warrant was not owing to the omission of the formal acts, of which the return would have furnished evidence. It appeared to the court of common pleas that these formalities were complied with, and they correctly allowed the amendments.

In Cass v. Bellows, supra, it was held that, on the authority of Gibson v. Bailey, supra, the records of a town could have been amended, so as to show that the collector took the oath of office prescribed by law, had the town clerk who was in office at the time the defective record was made been living.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

v.

LEE BUCKNER, Plff. in Err.

(281 Ill. 340, 117 N. E. 1028.)

Limitation of actions — criminal prosecution — former indictment — exclusion of crime.

1. An indictment quashed because the jurors were not sworn is within the operation of a statute, declaring that the time which elapsed during the maintenance of an indictment subsequently quashed shall not be reckoned within the time limited by statute for the prosecution of the crime.

Criminal law — failure to swear jury — quashing indictment.

2. An indictment may be quashed on motion when the record fails to show that the jury was duly summoned, impaneled, and sworn.

Limitation of actions — change of statute.

3. The statutes limiting the time for prosecution for crime may be changed or repealed in any case where a right to acquittal has not been absolutely acquired by the completion of the limitation period.

Evidence — horse tracks.

4. Upon trial of one for statutory rape, alleged to have been committed in the woods to which accused drove with his victim, evidence is admissible of tracks of a horse going into and out of the woods, and of their character and measurements, for the purpose of showing that they were made by an animal belonging to accused.

Criminal law — instruction — assumption of facts.

5. An instruction in a prosecution for statutory rape, which, under the statute, may be committed on a girl under sixteen years of age by a man over seventeen years of age, that neither the element of force nor the question of consent has any application in the case, is erroneous in assuming that the parties are of the age described by the statute.

Appeal — assumption of facts — instructions.

6. It is not reversible error for the court to assume, in instructing the jury in a criminal case, facts which are not disputed in the case.

[See 2 R. C. L. 259.]

Criminal law — comment by prosecutor.

7. The prosecutor may, in his argument to the jury in the prosecution of a minister of the gospel for statutory rape on one of his parishoners, comment upon the enormity of the crime committed under such circumstances.

— sentence — place of confinement.

8. There is no error in sentencing a convict to a penitentiary "at" a certain place if from public statutes it is manifest that the public officials understand that it is located there.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County (Kern, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of statutory rape. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Creighton & Thomas and Arthur Poorman for plaintiff in error.

Carter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An indictment was returned at the October, 1911, term of the circuit court of Wayne county against plaintiff in error, for the crime of statutory rape. At about that time he left the state and was not found until the spring of 1916, when he was located in Missouri and brought back to this state for trial under said indictment. At the October term, 1916, of said circuit court, the indictment was quashed on motion of plaintiff in error. At the same term of court the grand jury, being then in session, returned against him another indictment containing four counts, for the same offense. On motion of plaintiff in error the first and fourth counts were quashed, and he pleaded not guilty to the second and third. The state elected to prosecute him on the second count, and he was tried and found guilty under that count, and sentenced to the penitentiary at Chester, Illinois, for the period of five years. This writ of error has been sued out to review the judgment of the trial court.

The evidence upon which the jury found plaintiff in error guilty is substantially as follows: In June, 1911, plaintiff in error was a minister of the Methodist Protestant denomination and pastor of the Wayne City and Hopewell churches of that denomination, in Wayne county. The prosecutrix's name at the time the offense was committed was Mary E. Johnson. At the time of the trial she had recently been married to a man named Schell. At the time of the alleged offense she was fourteen years of age and had recently been taken into the church of which plaintiff in error was pastor, and of which her father and mother were both members. In the early part of June, 1911, plaintiff in error went to the home of W. H. Johnson, father of the prosecutrix, and obtained the consent of her parents for her to accompany him to his home to act as company for his wife while he was away for a week. On Friday evening, June 9, 1911, plaintiff in error returned home, and on the following Saturday morning he hitched a black horse to a single top buggy, and, with his wife and two children and the prosecutrix in the buggy, drove north out of Wayne City, where he then resided. After driving about 2 miles north he let his wife and children out of the buggy, and they walked west about half a mile to the home of Ed. Woolever. Plaintiff in error drove on north with the prosecutrix with the ostensible purpose of taking her to her home. After driving about a mile further north, to what is known as the Matthews corner, where he should have gone east to take the prosecutrix home, he told her he wished to drive west to the home of James Brocher, to get some money for the church. Upon arriving at the home of Brocher he drove past, telling the prosecutrix that Brocher was working in the woods about a half mile further west, and that he would have to go there. When the plaintiff in error, this case, passing the Brocher home, there laid, seen and recognized by Bailey, Brocher's face of having. Just over the fence, The meeting side of the road on in error was driving, and just east of the woods, two farmers, Clevenger and Singleterry, were planting corn. As plaintiff in error drove past they both recognized him and had a word or two of conversation with him, and Clevenger recognized the girl. Singleterry and Bailey also saw her, but did not know her at the time. Plaintiff in error drove on west to a tract of timber which was on the south side of the road. His horse and buggy were seen to enter and leave the woods about that time by a witness named Sherman Harris, who was planting corn about a quarter of a mile west, and on the other side of the road. Plaintiff in error drove into the timber about 100 feet, and tied his horse to a tree where the underbrush obstructed the view from the road. He went to the buggy, took out a lap robe, spread it upon the ground, and asked the prosecutrix to get out and have sexual intercourse with him. She testified that at first she refused, and said it was not right and she did not wish to do so; that he explained it was not wrong for her to have intercourse with him, a minister of the gospel, and told her it would not hurt her. After about five or ten minutes' persuasion plaintiff in error prevailed upon the prosecutrix to get out of the buggy, and he then laid her on the lap robe upon the ground and had sexual intercourse with her. When the act was consummated, he obtained from the prosecutrix a promise never to tell of the crime, and then drove with her back along the road east, again passing and talking to Clevenger and Singleterry, and arrived at the Johnson home about 11 o'clock. He watered his horse and talked briefly with Mrs. Johnson, and, although asked to remain to dinner, said he could not do so, and left immediately, arriving at Woolever's about noon, where his wife asked why he had been gone so long. On the following Monday, in a conversation by plaintiff in error in the presence of Clevenger, Singleterry, and Woolever, when they joked him about going into the woods with a girl, he became quite angry, and told them he went into the woods to collect 25 cents from Brocher to pay the president of the church; that it was not right to joke him about that in the presence of anybody, as Johnson would be mad about it.

Upon the following Tuesday Clevenger was passing through the woods in question, and noticed where the buggy had gone on the Saturday previous. He followed the tracks into the woods, and came to the place where the horse had been tied. The ground being low, wet, bottom land, the buggy and horse had made tracks about an inch and a half deep. He observed the prints of a cloth on the ground near where the buggy had been standing, and the impression in the ground where a human body had been lying upon it. Just east of where the cloth had been were marks on the ground from 1 to 2 inches deep that had been made by the toes of a man's shoe, and also marks of a man's and woman's shoes where parties had alighted from the buggy. He also observed tracks made by a horse when tied to the tree, and observed tracks both going in and coming out therefrom, and noticed that the horse that made the tracks had been shod on the front feet with heavy toes in front. He apparently had examined Buckner's horse before this, when Buckner was trying to sell the horse to him, and observed that the horse was shod with heavy toes in front, and said that from his observation the tracks in the woods were made by Buckner's horse. He also said there was only one horse and buggy track going into and returning from the woods at that place. On the following Wednesday, Singleterry, Ed. Woollever, P. C. Green, and Clevenger went to the woods, and there the other three parties observed the same marks on the ground as Clevenger. Green measured the horse tracks in the woods, and then measured the track which had been a. up rape, all in the wo with his vic of tracks of

acter and mea

made by Buckner's horse on the day of the alleged crime, in a small ditch at the side of the road east of Woolever's home where Green and Buckner had stopped to talk, and the measurements and appearance of the tracks were identical.

After seeing these tracks in the woods Clevenger told Johnson, the father of the prosecutrix, what he had seen and had been told by Buckner, and Johnson immediately asked his daughter about it, and she then told him of the alleged crime. A complaint was filed before a justice of the peace and a warrant issued for the arrest of Buckner on or about June 15, 1911. The warrant was placed in the hands of the sheriff, who went to the home of Buckner in Wayne City and made a search for him. Buckner at that time was about 5 miles away, where he was apparently notified that the crime had been discovered and that a warrant was in the hands of the sheriff for his arrest. He then got the person he was visiting to take him to the nearest railroad station, and he fled from the state. Warrants were in the hands of the Wayne county sheriff continuously from the time the first was issued until Buckner's arrest in 1916. Warrants were also, during that time, sent to different counties in Illinois, and some to other states, for the arrest of Buckner, without results, until he was finally located in Missouri in April, 1916, where he was arrested. Requisition papers were issued by the governor of Illinois, but Buckner came without obliging the sheriff to have them honored by the governor of Missouri. Buckner had been in Missouri most of the time since August, 1912, and on his return to this state he told the sheriff who brought him about his eluding a former sheriff, Anderson, when Anderson was looking for him in Missouri. He also told the sheriff that he went west with the prosecutrix from the Matthews corner on the day of the alleged crime.

On the trial plaintiff in error took the stand in his own behalf, and admitted driving north on June 10, 1911, with his wife and children and the prosecutrix, and letting his wife and children out of the buggy to go to Woolever's at about 10 o'clock, and testified that he then drove to the home of the prosecutrix, a distance of about 2 miles, and returned immediately to Woolever's, arriving there about noon, having traveled about 4 miles and consuming two hours in doing so. He denied driving west from the Matthews corner, or having seen Clevenger, Singleterry, and Bailey on that day, or having the conversation at the home of Woolever on the Monday following, and denied having had intercourse with the prosecutrix. He admitted receiving the note on Thursday, June 15, 1911, that there was a warrant out for his arrest, and getting the person on whom he was calling to take him to a town on another railroad, so he could leave. The father of plaintiff in error testified that he came to Wayne City on Saturday, June 17, and took plaintiff in error's wife and children, her household furniture, and the black horse in question back home with him to Clark county, where he then lived. He testified that at the time the black horse was not shod.

The principal question urged by counsel for plaintiff in error is that the conviction was barred by the Statute of Limitations, for the reason that the indictment under which he was tried was returned more than three years after the commission of the alleged crime. Section 3 of division 4 of the Criminal Code provides that all indictments for felonies of this character must be found within three years next after the commission of the crime. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1916, p. 938. It is conceded by the state that the indictment here in question was returned more than three years after the commission of the alleged offense, but it is insisted that the running of the statute was arrested by § 6 of said division 4, which reads: "When an indictment, information or suit is quashed, or the proceedings on the same are set aside, or reversed on writ of error, the time during the pendency of such indictment, information or suit, so quashed, set aside or reversed, shall not be reckoned within the time limited by this act, so as to bar any new indictment, information or suit for the same offense."

Plaintiff in error insists that the first indictment returned against him did not toll the operation of the statute, for the reason that the record shows that the grand jury by which it was returned was not sworn, as required by law. The record in this case shows with reference to the organization of the grand jury at the October term, 1911, as follows: "And now on this 16th day of October, A. D. 1911, comes the sheriff of Wayne county, and returns into open court the names of the persons who were summoned by him according to law to serve as grand jurors for the circuit court of Wayne county for the October term, A. D. 1911, being as follows, to wit: [Naming twenty-three different individuals]—who, on being called, all answered to their names, and are by the court charged touching their present service, whereupon Ed. Keen was by the court designated as foreman, and R. F. Bogle officer in charge."

It seems to be conceded that the record does not show that the first grand jury which found the first indictment was impaneled and sworn as the law directs. This court has held that where the record fails to show the jury was duly summoned, impaneled, and sworn, the indictment may be quashed on motion. Yates v. People, 38 Ill. 527; Williams v. People, 54 Ill. 422; Sullivan v. People, 156 Ill. 94, 40 N. E. 288; People v. Gray, 261 Ill. 140, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1215, 103 N. E. 552.

sions of the Criminal Code heretofore referred to, an indictment which is thereafter quashed, in order to be effective to toll the statute, must be a valid indictment, and not one that is void. Statutes of limitations are measures of public policy only. They are entirely subject to the will of the legislature, and may be changed or repealed altogether in any case where a right to acquittal has not been absolutely acquired by the completion of the period of limitation. Such a statute is an act of grace in criminal prosecutions. The state makes no contract with criminals, at the time of the passage of acts of limitations, that they shall have immunity from punishment if not prosecuted within the statutory period. 17 R. C. L. 704. Said § 6 of division 4 of the Criminal Code does not state that when a "valid" indictment is quashed it will be a bar to a new indictment for the same offense, but simply states, "When an indictment is quashed," etc., without any adjective or modifying word as to the kind of an indictment. It is clear, as a matter of public policy, that the Statute of Limitations in criminal cases is enacted for the purpose of allowing the accused to defend himself while the charge is new, and the evidence as to actual facts can be more readily obtained than if there had been a long delay in bringing the charge. It is also manifest that the provision that the Limitation Statute will not run against the charge if an indictment is quashed is put upon the same basis; for, if the indictment is originally brought within the time, the accused has knowledge of the charge, and can look up his evidence and be prepared to defend himself against the accusation. The Statute of Limitations is not grounded upon mere delay in the prosecution, but rather upon delay in commencing the prosecution, and the running of the statute is also suspended if the accused is absent from the state to avoid prosecution. There is no case in this state that is decisive of the question. In Swalley v. People, 116 Ill. 247, 250, 4 N. E. 381, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 414, the court said: "Whether the time during which the first indictment was pending is not to be reckoned depends upon whether the proceedings on the first indictment were 'set aside,' within the meaning of the section above cited. The section names three modes of disposition of the indictment: Quashing it, reversal of the proceedings thereon on error, and setting aside the proceedings on it. The first two are specific modes; the last is general. To 'set aside' is very broad in scope, 'to defeat the effect or operation of;' and we think it may well be held to embrace here every other mode of defeat of the proceedings on an indictment than quashing it and reversal on error, and so that the manner of disposal of the first indictment amounted to a setting aside of the proceedings under it, and came within the saving clause of the section."

In this last case an order was entered which nolle prossed the former indictment. The reasoning of the opinion above quoted shows that the court intended to construe the statute herein questioned as applying to all proceedings in which a former indictment was for any reason set aside. There is no suggestion in the reasoning as to whether it must be a valid indictment or not. Indeed, from the reasoning it would seem that, if it was set aside or quashed for any reason, the statute would be tolled. If an indictment is valid, how can it be legally quashed?

In State v. Hansbrough, 181 Mo. 348, 80 S. W. 900, an indictment charging bigamy was nolle prossed by the prosecuting attorney. That indictment stated that the alleged bigamous marriage occurred in a county to the grand jurors unknown, and as that court had held that an indictment for a bigamous marriage could only be prosecuted in the county where the marriage occurred, no conviction could be had under the first indictment, because the court would be without jurisdiction. The court there said, in construing a statute very similar to the one here under consideration (181 Mo. 352): It "does not restrict its operation to any particular cause or causes for which the indictment may be quashed, set aside, or reversed, and must therefore include any and all grounds which may be held by the court to be sufficient grounds for quashing the indictment."

See also as bearing on this question: State v. Child, 44 Kan. 420, 24 Pac. 952; Stafford v. State, 59 Ark. 413, 27 S. W. 495; 12 Cyc. 254; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 163, 165, and cases cited.

There can be no question that the offense charged in this last indictment, and the offense charged on the former indictment which was quashed, are one and the same offense. The statute here under consideration should receive a reasonable construction. We do not think it reasonable to construe § 6 of division 4 of the Criminal Code as if it read, "When a valid indictment is quashed," inserting the word "valid" before "indictment." On the ground of public policy we do not see any reason why, under the circumstances of this case, the Statute of Limitations should be considered as having run; the evidence clearly showing that the accused knew all about the warrant being issued shortly after the offense was committed, and undoubtedly knew about the original indictment, and was in no way misled to his injury in the trial by the fact that the original indictment was not valid. When any indictment, valid or invalid, is quashed, or the proceedings thereunder are set aside or reversed by writ of error, we think the Statute of Limitations does not run during the pendency of such indictment, and, therefore, the trial court did not err in entering judgment on this verdict or in giving the instructions as to the running of the Statute of Limitations which are objected to as misleading the jury.

It is objected by counsel for plaintiff in error that the testimony as to the buggy and horse tracks in the woods by Clevenger and others was improperly admitted. Whatever testimony tends directly to show the defendant guilty of the crime charged is competent. The test of admissibility is the connection of the facts proved with the offense charged. People v. Jennings, 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077, and cases cited. Under the reasoning of this court, under somewhat similar conditions, in People v. Pfanschmidt, 262 Ill.

Evidence— 411, 104 N. E. 804, horse tracks. Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1171, we think the testimony as to these tracks, their measurements, etc., was admissible.

The objection is also made by counsel that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff in error to be cross-examined as to certain things to which it is claimed no reference was made in his direct examination. We think the subject-matter that was referred to in the questions asked of him on cross-examination had been referred to in the examination of plaintiff in error in chief. We do not find any error in this regard. See Jones, Ev. §§ 820-825; People v. Strauch, 247 Ill. 220, 93 N. E. 126.

Counsel for plaintiff in error further insist that the trial court erred in giving the fifteenth instruction for the people. This instruction, in the language of the statute, told the jury that any female under the age of sixteen years shall be incapable of consenting to the act of intercourse, and that anyone over seventeen years, having sexual intercourse with a girl under sixteen years, would be guilty of rape whether he had obtained the consent of the girl or not, and then concluded: "In the present case neither the element of force nor the question of consent has any application. The prosecutrix could not consent, and the law resists for her."

It is insisted that this instruction should not have been given because it invades the province of the jury, and assumes that the prosecutrix was under the age of sixteen years, and that the plaintiff in error was over seventeen years. We think the instruction in this form should not have been given, but we cannot see how it is possible that the jury was in any way misled by it. No one disputed the fact that the prosecuting witness was under sixteen years of age. Four witnesses testified that she was between fourteen and fifteen years at the time of the crime, and that fact was also proved from the family records. Several witnesses testified that plaintiff in error was over the age of seventeen years, and he testified on the stand that he was thirty-eight years of age at the time of the hearing in March, 1917. Therefore, according to his own testimony, he would have been thirty-two years of age at the time the crime was committed. There was no conflict of any kind in the evidence as to the age of the prosecuting witness or that of plaintiff in error, and, therefore, the giving of this instruction was harmless error. See People v. Probst, 237 Ill. 390, 86 N. E. 588.

It is further contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that the arguments of one of the attorneys for the state were very inflammatory, and prejudiced the plaintiff in error before the jury. The remarks of the assistant prosecutor are set out in full in the abstract. In that part objected to, apparently, the assistant prosecutor commented on the enormity of this crime as being committed by a man who was a preacher of the gospel. We think the comments were justified, in view of the uncontradicted evidence in the record as to the nature and character of the offense.

It is further insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that the judgment of the court in sentencing the plaintiff in error to the "penitentiary at Chester, Illinois," is erroneous; it being insisted that there is no penal institution at such place in this state. This criticism of the form of the judgment is without merit. Section 75 of chapter 108 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1916, p. 1975) refers to the Southern Illinois penitentiary at Chester. The order granting plaintiff in error a super-sedeas, and permitting him to remain out on bail pending the decision of this court on the case, was directed to "the penitentiary at Chester, Illinois." It is manifest that public officials understand that there is a penitentiary at Chester.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Exclusion of time of pendency of prior indictment in computation of limitation.

Thus, in Smith v. State (1885) 79 Ala. 21, a motion in arrest of judgment was made on the ground that the record showed that the indictment, when it was found, was barred by the Statute of Limitations. A previous indictment within the statutory period was then proved, which indictment had been dismissed because it was not properly indorsed. The court, applying the statute, held that the time elapsing between the finding of the two indictments must be deducted in computation of the period of limitation.

In Davis v. State (1906) 145 Ala. 69, 40 So. 663, an indictment was quashed for defects, and the court ordered another indictment for the same offense, which second indictment was preferred two years subsequent to the original. It was held that the order quashing the first indictment and directing another eliminated the time elapsing between the preferring of the first and subsequent indictments, from the time limited for the prosecution of the offense charged.

In Swalley v. People (1886) 116 Ill. 247, 4 N. E. 381, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 414, the court construed the Illinois statute, which provides as follows: "Where an indictment, information, or suit is quashed, or the proceedings on the same are set aside or reversed on writ of error, the time during the pending of such indictment, information, or suit so quashed, set aside, or reversed shall not be reckoned within the time limited by this act, so as to bar any new indictment, information, or suit for the same offense." It was held that the entry of a nolle prosequi to an indictment is a sufficient "setting aside" thereof within the terms of the statute, to prevent the running of the statute.

To the same effect, the court said, in State v. Child (1890) 44 Kan. 420, 24 Pac. 952: "Where any indictment or information is quashed, set aside, or judgment reversed, the time during which the same was pending shall not be computed as a part of the time of the limitation prescribed for the offense. . . . It is immaterial whether the indictment or information is quashed, set aside, nolle, or the judgment reversed. The accused in such action may, within the time prescribed, be again proceeded against for the same offense."

In State v. Hansbrough (1904) 181 Mo. 348, 80 S. W. 900, the Missouri statute, providing that "when an indictment shall be quashed, set aside, or reversed, the time of the pendency thereof shall not be computed as part of the period of limitation," has been construed as including an indictment as to which a nolle prosequi was entered.

See, to the same effect, State ex rel. Graves v. Primm (1875) 61 Mo. 166.

In some jurisdictions it has been held, independently of statute, that the pendency of a prior indictment for the same offense tolls the Statute of Limitations, provided the disposition of the first indictment and the finding of the second are such as to constitute one continuing prosecution.

Vermont.—State v. Stevens (1892) 64 Vt. 590, 25 Atl. 838.

Thus, in Berkley v. Com. (1915) 164 Ky. 191, 175 S. W. 364, the indictment under which the defendant was tried was returned after the expiration of the statutory period therefor. On appeal, the commonwealth proved a prior indictment found within the period of limitation, which had been dismissed for insufficiency, with leave to resubmit. The court held that there had been a continuous prosecution, and that the operation of the statute as to the later indictment had been suspended.

See, to the same effect, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. (1883) 4 Ky. L. Rep. 627; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. (1886) 7 Ky. L. Rep. 836.

In Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Com. (1892) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 196, it was held that, where a new indictment contains a recital referring to a prior indictment and showing its disposition, the new indictment will be considered a continuation of the first, and that, this being so, the time pendency of the first indictment will not be computed in determining whether the statute has run against the subsequent bill.

Likewise, in R. M. Hughes & Co. v. Com. (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 179, 101 S. W. 1194, it was held that, where an indictment is shown to be in lieu of a prior one for the same offense, the time of pendency of the first will be deducted in computation of the period of limitation.

In Tully v. Com. (1877) 13 Bush. (Ky.) 142, the indictment on which defendant was tried was returned after the period of limitation had expired. On a motion in arrest of judgment, the prosecution was able to prove the return of a prior indictment within the period of limitation, which indictment had, however, been found fatally defective. The court decided that, although the first indictment was defective, yet it was a commencement of prosecution which had since been continuous, and so the statute would not raise a bar to conviction.

But, unless a prosecution is clearly shown to have been a continuous one, the Statute of Limitations will operate as a bar to conviction on an indictment found after the expiration of the period of limitation, although for the same offense as that embraced in the original proceedings. Com. v. T. J. Megibben Co. (1897) 101 Ky. 195, 40 S. W. 694.

In Louisiana, it is held that, where the first prosecution was not voluntarily abandoned, the plea of prescription would not avail as against an indictment found after the expiration of the time limited. State v. Thomas (1878) 30 La. Ann. 301.

But, where the first prosecution has been abandoned by the state, it must be considered as never having taken place, and it cannot be invoked by the state as preventing the running of the statute. State v. Vines (1882) 34 La. Ann. 1073; State v. Baker (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1134.

In North Carolina, it has been held that an indictment is the beginning of a prosecution, and, as such, suspends the operation of the Statute of Limitations during its pendency. State v. Williams (1909) 151 N. C. 660, 65 S. E. 908.

In the early case of State v. Cox (1846) 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 440, the indictment on which the defendant was tried had been returned after the prescribed period of limitation. The defendant moved for an acquittal on this ground, whereupon the prosecution proved an earlier presentment of a bill for the same offense, within the statutory period. The court held the first presentment was a commencement of prosecution, and prevented the running of the statute thereon.

But see State v. Tomlinson (1842) 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 32, wherein the court, in construing a statute which provided that, unless the "indictment be commenced within twelve months from the date of the offense, the prosecution shall not be carried on," held that the fact of another indictment for the same offense, brought within the proper time, was not an answer to the objection.

In an early South Carolina case, it was held that where the original prosecution was continued, and later another indictment preferred therefor, the running of the statute was suspended during the intervening time. The court said: "The connection of time which must subsist between one step in a case and the next has not been fixed in criminal proceedings, as it has been in civil, and to the wise discretion of a grand jury in rejecting bills that have been improperly delayed, or of a judge in urging trials after bill found, the defendant called to answer a stale charge must generally look for protection." State v. Howard (1868) 49 S. C. L. (15 Rich.) 274.

In Tennessee, in the absence of express statute, it was held that the period between the return of an original defective indictment and a subsequent valid one should not be computed as part of the time limited by statute, within which prosecution could be brought. The court said: "The question now arises whether in this state, in the absence of any statute on the subject, the prosecution under this second indictment may be considered such a continuation of the original prosecution that the Statute of Limitation cannot apply. We think there is no doubt but that it was the same prosecution under both indictments. While the first indictment was defective and invalid because it did not contain the name of the person upon whom the assault was committed, yet it was a prosecution for the same offense as that embraced in the second indictment." Hickey v. State (1914) 131 Tenn. 112, 174 S. W. 269.

The Texas court, in construing a Statute of Limitation which provided that, in computing the lapse of time prior to prosecution, the time of entry of the indictment should be considered as the time of commencement of the prosecution, held that, where an indictment was found as a substitute for another, which had been lost or destroyed, the period between the finding of the first and second indictments should be deducted in computation of the period of limitation. Brown v. State (1910) 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 570, 124 S. W. 101.

In construing a Vermont statute providing that, "if an action, complaint, information, or indictment . . . is commenced after the time limited, such proceedings shall be void," it was held that, where an indictment is a proceeding in continuation of a prosecution previously commenced, it should not be held insufficient because filed after the lapse of the permitted time. State v. Stevens (1892) 64 Vt. 590, 25 Atl. 838.

The entry of a nolle prosequi is an abandonment of the prosecution which will prevent its pendency from tolling the statute. United States v. Ballard (1844) 3 McLean, 469, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,507; State v. Baker (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1134, overruling State v. Cason (1876) 28 La. Ann. 40; State v. Vines (1882) 34 La. Ann. 1073.

II. Effect of insufficiency of first indictment.

In some jurisdictions it is held that the first indictment, to toll the running of the statute, must be one on which a valid conviction could have been founded. State v. Disbrow (1906) 130 Iowa, 19, 106 N. W. 263, 8 Ann. Cas. 190; State v. Curtis (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1166; State v. Mor- ris (1889) 104 N. C. 837, 10 S. E. 454; Redfield v. State (1859) 24 Tex. 133.

In State v. Disbrow (1906) 130 Iowa, 19, 106 N. W. 263, 8 Ann. Cas. 190, the court declared that the first indictment must, in order to suspend the running of the statute, be one on which a valid conviction or judgment can be founded, saying: "It seems to us a reasonable and just proposition that, in the absence of any statute saving such right to the state, the running of the Statute of Limitations ought not to be interrupted or suspended by the return and pendency of an indictment upon which no valid conviction or judgment can be founded. Such an indictment is no indictment."

Where a bill sent to the grand jury was returned with the indorsement, "Continued," for want of material witnesses, and so entered, this was held not to be a sufficient presentment to stop the running of the statute. State v. Morris (1889) 104 N. C. 837, 10 S. E. 454.

It has been held that, where a second indictment is found after the lapse of the time limitation, the fact that a conviction was obtained on a previous defective indictment within the time limit is not sufficient to prevent the bar of the statute. Redfield v. State (1859) 24 Tex. 133.

Where the first prosecution has been declared a nullity, it is as if no indictment had been found, and does not interrupt prescription. State v. Morrison (1879) 31 La. Ann. 211; State v. Precovara (1897) 49 La. Ann. 593, 21 So. 724.

Likewise, in State v. Curtis (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1166, it was held that a conviction obtained on a fatally defective indictment is without legal effect in favor of the state, to interrupt prescription.

In other jurisdictions it is held that, although the first indictment was so defective that a conviction thereon would be reversed, yet the time between its rendition and the return of a subsequent indictment will be deducted, in computing the period of limitation. Foster v. State (1863) 38 Ala. 427; Weston v. State (1879)

63 Ala. 155; State ex rel. Graves v. Primm (1875) 61 Mo. 166; Hickey v. State (1914) 131 Tenn. 112, 174 S. W. 269.

Thus, it has been held that an indictment charging a person with the sale of liquor to a slave, "whose name and owner are unknown," although fatally defective on demurrer, is sufficiently specific to uphold a recognition thereon to another term of the court, which will toll the statute. Foster v. State (Ala.) supra.

So, though a first indictment was defective, because it did not contain the name of the person on whom an assault charged was committed, it has been held to be a sufficient commencement of the prosecution to toll the statute as to a new and valid indictment, subsequently returned. Hickey v. State (Tenn.) supra.

Where the magistrate before whom a complaint was filed, charging a person with crime and causing his arrest and detention, had no jurisdiction to try the accused for the offense, it is not such a commencement of prosecution as will raise a bar to the statute. Bube v. State (1884) 76 Ala. 73; State v. Robertson (1898) 55 Neb. 41, 75 N. W. 37.

III. Identity of offense.

The first and subsequent indictments must charge an identical offense, arising from the same transaction, and affecting the same parties and subject-matter. Otherwise, the indictment will be of no avail in preventing the running of the statute as to the subsequent indictment. State v. Dunham (1846) 9 Ala. 76; Smith v. State (1878) 62 Ala. 29; Buckalew v. State (1878) 62 Ala. 334; Jester v. State (1854) 14 Ark. 552; Ross v. People (1917) 62 Colo. 193, 162 Pac. 152.

In Ross v. People (1917) 62 Colo. 193, 162 Pac. 152, the court held that an information charging the offense of "seduction under pretense of marriage" was not sufficient to stop the running of the Statute of Limitations as to an information charging the offense of "seduction under promise of marriage."

In Buckalew v. State (1878) 62 Ala. 334, 34 Am. Rep. 22, the court held that an indictment for exhibiting a gaming table was not such a continuation of a prosecution for exhibiting a lottery as would prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations.

And in Jester v. State (1854) 14 Ark. 552, a second indictment, which charged the crime of gaming, alleged that the illegal games were played by three persons, whereas the first indictment, adduced in evidence by the state to avoid the bar of the statute, disclosed a charge against them for betting at games played by four persons. The court held that the record of the previous indictment must show that the game was played by the same persons, and that, as the record adduced showed a material variance, it was not competent.

But see Lay v. State (1883) 42 Ark. 105, holding that, although a person is charged in the first indictment as a principal and in the second as an accessory, the first is sufficient to prevent the running of the statute thereto.

See also Foster v. State (1863) 38 Ala. 425, wherein an indictment which charged the selling of spirituous liquor to "a certain male slave, whose name and owner are unknown," was demurred to, and a second indictment found which charged the selling to "a slave named Moses, belonging to James Chapman." It was here held that there was a sufficient description of the offense charged in the first instance to prevent the running of the statute.

An early Alabama statute provided that the period of time elapsing between the preferring of a defective indictment, and the finding of a second or subsequent indictment, should be deducted from any term limited for the prosecution of the offense. Construing this statute, where a defective indictment charged the defendant with selling goods without a license as a peddler, and recited the sale of a hair comb to Joshua A. Lowe, and the second indictment charged the sale of one bonnet and one pair of shoes to Henry Williams, the court held that the variance was fatal, and that the second indictment would not come within the sanatory influence of the statute. State v. Dunham (1846) 9 Ala. 76.

Where a first indictment against Henry Smith charged that he uttered offensive language in the dwelling house of Sarah Holly, and the second indictment was against James Henry Smith and charged the commission of the offense in the dwelling of John S. Turner, the court held that the discrepancy between the two indictments was material, and that to prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations the offense and the offender must be shown to have been the same. Smith v. State (1878) 62 Ala. 29.

In Smalley v. People (1886) 116 Ill. 247, 4 N. E. 379, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 414, an indictment charged the commission of a crime on the 2d day of February, 1885, and, after the entry of a nolle prosequi to that indictment, a second indictment was returned charging the same crime, but giving the date of commission as May 1, 1884. The court held that, the identity of offense being proved, the operation of the Statute of Limitation was defeated.

Similarly, where the first indictment, charging defendant with having forged a check indorsed, "W. H. Peters," with the intent to cheat Funsten & Company and W. H. Peters, was nolle prossed, and the second indictment set out the same check and alleged the forged indorsement of the name of "W. H. Peters," with intent to cheat H. K. Wade, the court held that both indictments were based on the same transaction. Stafford v. State (1894) 59 Ark. 413, 27 S. W. 495.

IV. Burden of avoiding bar of statute.

The burden of proving a state of facts which would suspend the operation of the Statute of Limitations is on the prosecution. White v. State (1893) 103 Ala. 72, 16 So. 63; Jester v. State (1854) 14 Ark. 552; Gill v. State (1882) 38 Ark. 524; Ross v. People (1917) 62 Colo. 193, 162 Pac. 152; R. M. Hughes & Co. v. Com. (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 179, 101 S. W. 1194.

The court, in Gill v. State (1882) 38 Ark. 524, held that it was necessary to a conviction for the state to prove, either that an offense had been committed within the period of the statute, or that there had been a former indictment found for the offense within the period of limitation, which indictment had been quashed or set aside.

Likewise, in R. M. Hughes & Co v. Com. (Ky.) supra, the court stated that, to avoid the bar of the statute, it was "indispensably necessary to charge and prove that the last indictment was in lieu of the prior one, which had been dismissed and resubmitted by order of the court," and that "it devolved upon the commonwealth to prove it."

In Jester v. State (1854) 14 Ark. 552, it was held that, to displace the bar of the statute, it was necessary for the state to prove the pendency and quash all of a former prosecution for the same offense.

In White v. State (1893) 103 Ala. 72, 16 So. 62, it is held that, where the first indictment was quashed as defective, it is essential to prove its presentment, and that it has been quashed, to obviate the defense of the Statute of Limitations which might otherwise arise during the time between the rendition of the first and a subsequent indictment.

In order that the state may avail itself of a statute suspending the period of limitation during the pendency of an indictment, a sufficient entry of record must be made, setting forth the facts as to the finding and setting aside of the original indictment. De Bardeleben v. State (1918) — Ala. —, 77 So. 979, affirmed on certiorari in (1918) — Ala. —, 78 So. 877.

Likewise, in Coleman v. State (1882) 71 Ala. 312, it is held that, when a new indictment is ordered, the disposal of the previous indictment must be set forth in the judgment entry in order to prevent the running of the Statute of Limitations.

So, in State v. Davis (1892) 44 La. Ann. 972, where an indictment on its face showed that the statute had run against prosecution, and there was no statement of facts which might have suspended the statute, the indictment was ordered quashed.

It has been held that, unless the new indictment sets forth the facts as to the finding of the previous indictment and the orders of the court in relation thereto, then there is nothing therein to put the defendant upon notice that it is a continuous prosecution, and the statute will be an available defense. Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Com. (1892) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 196; Com. v. T. J. Megibben Co. (1897) 101 Ky. 195, 40 S. W. 694.

So, in R. M. Hughes & Co. v. Com. (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 179, 101 S. W. 1194, the court said: "Appellant could not have been convicted under the last indictment without showing that it was a continuation of the proceeding or prosecution under the former indictment, for the offense was barred by the Statute of Limitation, counting from the return and filing of the last indictment; therefore, it was indispensably necessary to charge and prove that the last indictment was in lieu of the prior one, which had been dismissed and resubmitted by order of the court of a subsequent grand jury."

In Com. v. T. J. Megibben Co. (Ky.) supra, it was held that an averment in a new indictment that "the offense herein charged is the same offense charged in indictment No. 1014, filed in this honorable court on February 16, 1896," fails to show whether the other indictment was pending or dismissed, and does not make the prosecution a continuous one, so as to prevent the statute from running.

But in Brown v. State (1809) 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 570, 124 S. W. 101, it was held that, where a copy of an indictment is substituted for an original, which was lost, it is not necessary to set out the facts of the loss, since the Statute of Limitations applies only to new, and not to substituted, indictments. ## INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF COLORADO et al., Plffs. in Err., v.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Colo. —, 174 Pac. 589.)

Conflict of laws — Workmen's Compensation Act — extraterritorial effect.

1. An employee of one doing business in a state having a Workmen's Compensation Act, whose duties require him temporarily to perform service in another state, may recover compensation under the act for injury received in such other state.

Workmen's compensation — negligence.

2. The question of negligence is not involved under the principle of compensation provided by the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

— purpose of act.

3. The purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Acts is primarily to relieve the public of the burden of supporting injured workmen and their dependents, who may, by reason of such injuries, become objects of charity.

— scope of employment — meaning.

4. It was not the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Acts to hold the right of compensation to such strict construction of the term, "scope of employment," as in cases of tort, where the employer may be held to compensation for his own negligence.

— injury while going from job to job.

5. Injury, by the overturning of the private conveyance in which he is riding, to a foreman of construction work, going from one job to another, arises out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Master and servant — contract of employment — Compensation Act.

6. The provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act are to be considered written into contracts of employment, and are therefore a part of the same.

(White and Bailey, JJ., dissent.)

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver (Burke, J.) to review a judgment vacating an award by the Commission to claimants, in a proceeding by them under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of their decedent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Leslie E. Hubbard, Attorney General, John L. Schweigert, Assistant Attorney General, and Walter E. Schwed for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Milton Smith, Charles R. Brock, and W. H. Ferguson, for defendant in error:

It does not appear that at the time of the accident Mr. Lynch was performing a service arising out of and in the course of his employment; nor does it appear that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment.

Mr. John P. Akalb also for defendant in error.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the Industrial Commission of the state, from a judgment of the district court, vacating an award by that Commission under the Workmen's Compensation Statute (Laws 1915, p. 515). The claim for compensation is by Cora M. Lynch, widow, and Clyde and Orville Lynch, dependent children of Charles E. Lynch, deceased.

The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of fact both before the Commission and the district court, as follows:

"Charles E. Lynch, from a time prior to August 1, 1915, when the Workmen's Compensation Act became effective, and until the time of his death, on September 14, 1915, was an employee of the C. E. Walker Contracting Company. Mr. Lynch was a resident of the state of Colorado, and the C. E. Walker Contracting Company was and is a Colorado corporation, with its principal office in the city and county of Denver. The contract whereby Mr. Lynch was originally employed or hired was made in the state of Colorado.

"The C. E. Walker Contracting Company has a general contract with the Mountain States Telephone & Telegraph Company for the construction of telephone exchange buildings at different points in the states of Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico. Lynch was employed to act as foreman in connection with the construction of these buildings.

"On September 13, 1915, Lynch had just completed his work as foreman in connection with the erection of a telephone exchange at Afton, in the state of Wyoming. He intended to leave Afton that day by the regular stage running to Montpelier, Idaho, where he was to undertake the work of foreman on a similar job. For some reason, however, he missed the stage and was invited to ride to Cokeville, Wyoming, in a Ford automobile and there catch a train for Montpelier, the only way out of Afton. The automobile was privately owned and operated by an acquaintance residing at Afton, and he was invited to take the trip as a guest; no payment of compensation being expected. In addition to the owner of the machine and Mr. Lynch, there were two other passengers. When the machine approached Cokeville, it skidded for some reason and turned absolutely over. When the car was lifted, Mr. Lynch was unconscious. He was taken to the hospital at Montpelier on the first train, and there operated on. It developed that the base of his skull was fractured, and that nothing could be done for him. He died approximately twenty-four hours later and on the 14th day of September, 1915. The accident which resulted in his death happened in the state of Wyoming.

"That the average weekly wage of the said Lynch exceeded $16."

The defendant in error, having complied with the statute, in that respect admits its liability if the award was properly allowed under the Workmen's Compensation Statute.

The judgment of the trial court is based on the conclusion that the facts do not support an award by the Commission to the dependents of the deceased workman.

It is contended by defendant in error that the judgment should be sustained for the reasons: (a) That it does not appear that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment; and (b) that the Workmen's Compensation Act of this state has no extraterritorial effect.

As relates to the first question raised, § 8, chap. 179, Laws 1915, provides: "The right to the compensation provided for in this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, to any and all persons whomsoever, for any personal injury or death accidentally sustained on and after August 1, 1915, shall obtain in all cases where the following conditions concur:

"I. Where, at the time of the accident, both employer and employee are subject to the provisions of this act.

"II. Where, at the time of the accident, the employee is performing service arising out of and in the course of his employment.

"III. Where the injury is proximately caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and is not intentionally self-inflicted or intentionally inflicted by another."

The agreed statement limits the inquiry to that of whether or not, under the law applicable, is this a case where the injury was proximately caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. At the time of his employment and at the time of the accident and death, Lynch was a resident of the state of Colorado. The employment was to act as foreman for his employer in the construction of telephone exchange buildings for a telephone company, operating and erecting buildings in the several states of Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico. To do this he must necessarily proceed from one point to another within these several states, and it must be assumed that he was to so proceed to and from such places as directed by his employer. He had just completed a duty within his employment at the town of Afton, Wyoming. He was proceeding under direction of his employer to the town of Montpelier in the state of Idaho, to perform a like duty. He was proceeding to the railroad station at Cokeville by automobile, the only way provided to reach the railroad station. There is no indication of any unnecessary loss or waste of time. Was he, then, acting in the course of his employment at the time of the accident?

Workmen's compensation laws are comparatively new in the United States, and it is but natural that in this early period of judicial interpretation there should be divergent views as between the courts of the several states in some respects. The difficulty in this particular seems to have arisen because of an apparent failure in some cases to clearly recognize the distinction in principles to be applied in such cases, and those applicable in negligence cases.

Under the principle of compensation awarded and commanded by the state, the question of negligence is compensation—

negligence.

in no sense involved.

The validity of these statutes, in so far as has been determined by our courts, rests upon the basis of a proper exercise of the police power, as being in the interest of the public welfare. The purpose primarily is to relieve the public of —purpose of act.

the burden of supporting injured workmen and their dependents, who may, by reason of such injuries, become objects of charity. The expense is to be treated as an additional cost of the operation of business, and, under our statute, is collected by the state from the employer in the nature of premiums, based upon the number of employees, wages paid, the character of employment, and other considerations calculated to establish a reasonable charge for accident insurance. This fund is designated as an insurance fund, from which the Commission is required to make allowances to the workman and his dependents, according to nature and character of the injury as provided and detailed in the statute.

It is quite apparent that it was not the purpose of the law to hold

employment—meaning.

the right of compensation to such strict construction of the term, "scope of employment," as in cases of tort, where the employer may be held to compensation for his own negligence. In fact the term, "in the course of employment," used in the statute, may well be said to differ in meaning from the term, "scope of employment," as used in judicial determinations in negligence cases. In truth, the payment of compensation does not fall upon the employer at all, but is to be charged to the expense of operation of the business, and is, therefore, made a part of the cost of the product,—as much so as the cost of labor, materials, and other actual expenses of operation,—so that this expense of insurance becomes ultimately and in fact a part of the price to the purchaser of the product, and to that extent is paid by the public.

Our courts are in agreement that these acts should be broadly and liberally construed, to the end that their beneficent intent and purpose may be reasonably accomplished. Upon this point, it was said in Zappala v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 82 Wash. 314, L.R.A.1916A, 295, 144 Pac. 54: "In construing the language of the act, we must have in mind the evident purpose and intent of the act to provide compensation for workmen injured in hazardous undertakings, reaching 'every injury sustained by a workman engaged in any such industry; and make a sure and certain award therefor, bearing a just proportion to the loss sustained, regardless of the manner in which the injury was received.' State ex rel. Davis-Smith Co. v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 466, 117 Pac. 1101, 2 N. C. C. A. 823, 3 N. C. C. A. 599, and that the act should be liberally interpreted, to the end that the purpose of the legislature in suppressing the mischief and advancing the remedy be promoted, even to the inclusion of cases within the reason, although outside the letter, of the statute, and that every hazardous industry within the purview of the act should bear the burden arising out of injuries to its employees regardless of the cause of the injury. Peet v. Mills, 76 Wash. 437, L.R.A.1916A, 358, 136 Pac. 685, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 154, 4 N. C. C. A. 786."

Construing a statute similar to our own, it was said in Young v. Duncan, 218 Mass. 346, 106 N. E. 1: "The purpose of this act has been stated several times. Briefly, it was to substitute a method of accident insurance in place of the common-law rights and liabilities for substantially all employees, except domestic servants, farm laborers, and masters of and seamen on vessels engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, and those whose employment is casual or not in the usual course of trade, business, or employment of the employer, and probably those subject to the Federal Employers' Liability Act. It was a humanitarian measure, enacted in response to a strong public sentiment that the remedies afforded by actions of tort at common law, and under the Employers' Liability Act, had failed to accomplish that measure of protection against injuries and of relief in case of accident which it was believed should be afforded to the workman. It was not made compulsory in its application, but inducements were held out to facilitate its voluntary acceptance by both employers and employees. It is manifest from the tenor of the whole act that its general adoption and use throughout the commonwealth by all who may embrace its privileges is the legislative desire and aim in enacting it. The act is to be interpreted in the light of its purpose, and, so far as reasonably may be, to promote the accomplishment of its beneficent design."

The English Workmen's Compensation Acts were adopted some years prior to that of any American statute on that subject, and the question now under consideration has been frequently construed by the English courts. The subject is reviewed at length by Mr. Chartres, in his work on Judicial Interpretations of the Law Relating to Workmen's Compensation 1915, beginning at page 137. It seems to be generally held by the English courts that employment is not necessarily synchronous with contract of service, but that, in all those things that he is entitled to do by virtue of his contract, he is, for the purposes of the act, employed to do; and they are, therefore, within his contract of employment. The author quotes, among many other authorities, the language of Farwell, L. J., in Gane v. Norton Hill Colliery Co. [1909] 2 K. B. 544, which seems to be a fair statement of the English law: "It is well settled that the employment is not confined to the actual working, whether in a pit or at any other trade, in which the workman may be engaged. He is employed not only to work in the pit, but also to do other things that he is entitled to do by virtue of his contract of employment; for example, he is entitled to do, and therefore employed to do, such acts as coming on the employer's premises, passing and re-passing for all legitimate purposes connected with his work on the premises, such as getting to the pit's mouth, going to get his wages, going to make proper inquiries from proper officers, or taking a train which he is entitled to use by virtue of his contract of service, as in the cases of Cremins v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefolds [1908] 1 K. B. 469, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 326, 98 L. T. N. S. 335, 24 Times L. R. 189, and Holmes v. Great Northern R. Co. [1900] 2 Q. B. 409, 69 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 854, 64 J. P. 532, 48 Week. Rep. 681, 83 L. T. N. S. 44, 16 Times L. R. 412. All those things that he is entitled to do by virtue of his contract he is, for the purposes of the act, employed to do, and they are, therefore, within his contract of employment. I would qualify this by saying that he must make a reasonable user of the facilities and rights which are given to him in this way."

In the case at bar it was an essential part of his employment that the deceased should travel from the place where he had installed one plant to the place where he was to install another. It is also clear that he adopted a reasonable and apparently the only facility for such travel under the circumstances, and as safe as any other that may have been available. No case is cited that adopts a different rule, and we know of none, as applied to Workmen's Compensation Statutes.

It is urged that the case of Industrial Commission v. Anderson, — Colo. —, L.R.A.1918F, 885, 169 Pac. 135, supports the contention of defendant in error. We do not think so. In that case Anderson was permitted to do his work either at his home or at his employer's place of business. This was a matter of choice with him, and not either a direction or a requirement of his employment. He was going from one of these places to the other. The case was decided upon this principle. In this case, the contract of employment, impliedly at least, required the deceased to proceed from the one place of employment to another. He was traveling on his employer's business, which by his contract he was bound to do, and for which it is reasonably assumed he was being paid to do, for it is not to be presumed that he was, under the circumstances, traveling such distances upon his own time. It may be safely said that he was doing that which was incidental to the character of the business, and —injury while going from job to job.

not independent of the relation of master and servant, but rather had its origin in a risk connected with the employment.

This distinction is well supported by authority. In the case of Terlecki v. Strauss, 85 N. J. L. 454, 89 Atl. 1023, 4 N. C. C. A. 584, where a factory employee quit work at her machine shortly before noon, and was, in accordance with custom, combing particles of wool out of her hair preparatory to going home, and at a point 32 feet from her machine, when her hair was caught in other machinery and she was seriously injured, it was held that the accident arose out of and in the course of her employment.

In Kunze v. Detroit Shade Tree Co. 192 Mich. 435, L.R.A.1917A, 252, 158 N. W. 851, involving an award by the industrial accident board, under a state of facts as follows: "Having been with the defendant company for about two years, on July 18, 1914, he was employed as a foreman, and, in the course of this employment, it was his duty to go from job to job about the city. On the day aforementioned, he had inspected a job on Virginia park, a street in the city of Detroit, and, having completed this inspection at about 9 o'clock in the morning, he left the work in charge of another employee and started east on Virginia park to the intersection of Woodward avenue, where it is to be reasonably inferred from the evidence he was about to take a car to inspect another job north of Virginia park at the corner of Josephine avenue and Woodward avenue; and it also appears that there was another job for inspection at the corner of Mt. Vernon and John R. streets, which was also north of Virginia park. While at the intersection of Virginia park and Woodward avenue, he was knocked down by an automobile, seriously injured, and died the following day,"—it was held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

In the very interesting case of Foley v. Home Rubber Co. 89 N. J. L. 474, 99 Atl. 624, the employee lost his life in the sinking of the Lusitania, while engaged as a traveling salesman and en route to visit his employer's London office, and it was held that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. The court said: "If the Lusitania had been lost through a collision, fire, or storm at sea, resulting in the death of Foley, it would, under the principle enunciated in all the cases bearing on this subject, be held to have been an accident arising out of his employment. Foley's presence on the ship was connected with the very employment in which he was engaged. The fact that the Lusitania was lost through none of the common perils of the sea, but by an extraordinary peril, does not make the extraordinary peril less a cause of accident arising out of Foley's employment.

Both Foley and his employer were chargeable with knowledge of the perils of war upon the high seas. They must be assumed to have known that a belligerent vessel sailing under a belligerent flag, carrying contraband of war, subjected the vessel to attack by an enemy vessel, and that as a result of such attack, under many contingencies recognized by the law of nations, not only the loss of the vessel attacked, but the loss of lives of those upon her, might result."

In the very recent English case of White v. W. & T. Avery, 53 Scot. L. R. 122, and under the following facts: "A machine fitter, whose duty it was to go round to various places where his employers had erected or executed repairs upon weighing machines, was engaged in inspecting railway weighing machines. To one of the machines he proceeded to walk upon a road rendered slippery by frost after rain. While endeavoring to avoid a vehicle, he slipped and fell, breaking his wrist,"—it was held, following an unbroken line of English decisions, that the injury was caused by accident arising out of as well as in the course of the employment. This was under the Workmen's Compensation Law.

The case of Summers v. California Iron Works and London & Lancashire Indemnity Co., first appellate district of California, reported in Five Decisions Industrial Acci. Commission, 386, is almost parallel to the one at bar. It was there held that an injury sustained by a millwright while journeying in an automobile belonging to his son, to a place where he had been directed to go by his employer to install machinery, is an injury arising out of his employment within the Workmen's Compensation Act, where it is shown that his employment was in the nature of a traveling employment, requiring him to go to any particular place where a contract for the installation of machinery had been obtained. It was there said: "On behalf of the respondent herein, it is conceded that the general rule governing ordinary cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act is that for which the petitioner herein contends; but the respondent herein argues, we think convincingly, that the facts of this case bring it within the exceptions to the general rule. The exceptional cases are those wherein the employment itself is one in which the employee is required to travel from place to place at the will of the employer, and hence where the risks of such travel are directly incident to the employment itself, and hence wherein the accident occurring by reason of such risk is one arising out of the employment, and therefore a proper subject of compensation under the Employers' Liability Act"—citing Cameron v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 83, 159 Pac. 149; Milwaukee v. Althoff, 156 Wis. 68, L.R.A.1916A, 327, 145 N. W. 238, 4 N. C. C. A. 110.

We now come to the question as to whether or not the Colorado Workmen's Compensation Act has what is termed "extraterritorial effect." It is contended that there can be no recovery for the reason that the accident occurred in the state of Wyoming, notwithstanding the contract was made in Colorado; that both parties to it at all times resided in Colorado; and that the services under it were to be performed partially, at least, in this state.

Counsel concede that it is within the legislative power to give extraterritorial effect by express provision, but contend that in the absence of such expressed purpose it must be conclusively presumed that general words were intended to be limited in their application to the territorial jurisdiction of the legislature using them. The Gould Case, 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60, is cited to support this contention. This case construed the statute of Massachusetts, which, in respect to the question at issue, is like the Colorado law, in that the statute is voluntary, and that it does not in express terms provide for compensation in case of accidents occurring without the state. It was there held that the statute does not apply. This decision was perhaps the first involving the question by an appellate court in this country, and the doctrine there announced has not generally been followed, but, on the contrary, has been very generally disapproved by courts of last resort. The Gould Case was followed and approved by Mr. Bradbury in the first edition of his work on Workmen's Compensation and State Insurance, but in the 2d edition of this work the author recedes from this position, and announces his belief that the doctrine which must be finally established will be, in effect, that the law of the place where a contract of employment is made will govern the rights and liabilities of employees and employers to claim and to pay compensation. It will be noted that in the Gould Case the court relied largely on the English cases, which were in fact the only authority it had; but the author quite clearly points out the inapplicability of these authorities as follows:

"In Great Britain the conditions are entirely different from those existing in the American states, although the decisions hereinbefore cited arose in relation to accidents which happened entirely outside the United Kingdom. True the accidents in one of the cases, at least, happened on a British vessel. Under the decisions in the cases of McDonald v. Mallory, 77 N. Y. 546, 33 Am. Rep. 664, and Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 430, it might be that even the Massachusetts act would be held to apply in similar circumstances. In this respect the British decisions are in conflict with adjudications of our Federal Supreme Court. But the principal difference in the conditions between Great Britain and the United States is that in the former the Compensation Act applies to the whole of the territory of the United Kingdom. Thus, if an employer in London sends an employee to Scotland, Wales, or Ireland, and he is there injured, the Compensation Act applies, while, under the doctrine of the Gould Case, supra, if a Massachusetts employer should send a workman to New York, the Massachusetts act would have no application whatsoever, and the employee would have no claim whatsoever on his employer, unless he could base it on negligence. This, of course, would be assuming there was no compensation law in New York.

"Therefore, partially receding from the position taken in the first edition of this work, although that position has been sustained by eminent authority, it is believed that the doctrine which must be established finally will be, in effect, that the law of the place where a contract of employment is made will govern the rights and liabilities of employees and employers to claim and to pay compensation." 1 Bradbury, Workman's Comp. 2d ed. p. 55.

The later authorities in this country base the conclusion chiefly on the proposition that, under voluntary compensation statutes such as ours, the cause of action of petitioner is ex contractu, and that the lex loci contractus governs the construction of the contract and determines the legal obligations arising under it.

The provisions of the Compensation Act are to be construed as written into the contract, and therefore a part of it. The reasoning of these cases is well stated in Deeny v. Wright & C. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. 121, to be:

"It appears that there is an implied contract to compensate for injuries arising out of and in the course of the employment, and under it all other methods and rights to any other form of compensation are relinquished. The statute can have no extraterritorial effect, but it can require a contract to be made by two parties to a hiring that the contract shall have an extraterritorial effect. The contract is binding on the employee himself, and upon the employer, and it is conclusively presumed that the parties have accepted the provisions of § 11, and have agreed to be bound thereby. The method of termination of the contract is provided for in ¶ 10. It would seem that the reasonable construction of the statute is that it writes into the contract of employment certain additional terms. The cause of action of petitioner is ex contractu. The lex loci contractus governs the construction of the contract, and determines the legal obligations arising from it. 9 Cyc. 664. That the cause of action is ex contractu, see Sexton v. Newark Dist. Teleph. Co. 34 N. J. L. J. 368, 2 N. C. C. A. 839, and 35 N. J. L. J. 8; Perlsburg v. Muller, 35 N. J. L. J. 202.

"The English cases cited in Bradbury's book are not precedents, because a claim under the English act is ex delicto.

"The objects of our act are to protect the citizens and inhabitants of New Jersey. It is based upon the proposition that the inherent risks of an employment should, in justice, be placed upon the shoulders of the employer, who can protect himself by an addition to the price of his product, and so cause the burden ultimately to fall upon the consumer; that indemnity to an injured employee should be as much a charge upon the business as the cost of replacing or repairing disabled or defective machinery, appliances or tools; that under our former system the loss fell immediately upon the employee, who is almost invariably unable to bear it, and therefore ultimately upon the community, which is taxed for the support of the indigent; and that our former system was uncertain, unscientific, and wasteful, and fostered a spirit of antagonism between employer and employee, which it is to the interest of the state to remove.

"The contract here was to be partly performed in New York and partly in New Jersey. The law of New York, the admiralty law, or the act of New Jersey applies. The parties chose the law of New Jersey by making the contract here without giving the notice required by the act to come under § 1. Shall the public policy of New Jersey to place the burden on the industry be carried into effect, or shall the sole loss fall on the petitioner, in violation of the law of his state? It would be contrary to public policy to place the burden on the employee under the facts in the case."

The principle is concisely and curtly stated in Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, in the following language: "We are now dealing with the simpler question, whether a New Jersey court will enforce a New Jersey contract according to the terms of a New Jersey statute. The question hardly calls for an answer. The place where the accident occurs is of no more relevance than is the place of accident to the assured in an action on a contract of accident insurance, or the place of death of the assured in an action on a contract of life insurance."

In the case of Grinnell v. Wilkinson, 39 R. I. 447, L.R.A.1917B, 767, 98 Atl. 103, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 618, the court entered upon a most elaborate review of the authorities, and fully answers many contentions in the brief of counsel in this case, concerning particular expressions in our act quite similar to those found in the Rhode Island act, which it was there urged, as in this case, lends support to the construction contended for. The court concluded as follows:

"The latest case which has come to our attention is Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 10 N. C. C. A. 888 (January, 1916), a New York case, where the same question arose under the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York [Consol. Laws, chap. 67]. The case follows substantially the same line of argument, and arrives at the same conclusion as the cases of Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, supra, and Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. supra, both of which it cites with approval. See also Deeny v. Wright & C. Lighterage Co. 36 N. J. L. J. 121; 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Compensation, pp. 50, 52 et seq., cited with approval in the Kenner-son Case, 89 Conn. 378, L.R.A. 1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, supra, and in the Post Case, supra.

"We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the cases above cited from New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut is quite applicable to the case at bar; that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Rhode Island the relation of employer and employee is contractual, and the terms of the act are to be read as a part of every contract of service between those subject to its terms; that on principle and in reason, and in view of the purpose, scope, and character of the act, it should be construed and held to include injuries arising out of the state as well as those arising within it; and that the weight of authority upon acts similar to our own gives full support to our conclusion."

The New York statute, in the respect we are considering, is not materially different from that of Colorado, and it was held in the case of Post v. Burger, supra, after an extensive review of the authorities, that "the act, taken as a whole, in view of its humane purpose, should be construed to intend that in every case of employment there is a constructive contract between the employer and employee, general in its terms and unlimited as to territory, that the employer shall pay, as provided by the act, for a disability or the death of the employee as therein stated. The duty under the statute defines the terms of the contract. Where, therefore, a resident of this state, employed by a corporation engaged in business in this state, is sent by his employer to perform work in another state away from the plant of the employer, but under the employer's express direction, and, while engaged therein, is injured, he is entitled to compensation when in other respects he comes within the provisions of the law."

The difficulties and injustice that may arise in case the law shall be held to apply to accidents occurring within the state only are forcibly stated in the well-reasoned case of Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. supra, where it was said:

"The remedy provided by our Compensation Act is substitutionary in character, furnishing what was purposed to be a more humanitarian and economical system, as a substitute for one deemed wasteful to industrial enterprises and commerce, and unfair to employees. Its intent was to afford its protection to all Connecticut employers and employees who might voluntarily choose to make its provision for compensation for injury a part of their contracts of employment. It assumed that accident is incident to employment, and purposed to charge its cost, in the case of every injury not caused by the wilful and serious misconduct or intoxication of the injured employee, to the industry in which it occurred. It intended that the employee should know what compensation he or his dependents, would receive in the event of injury, and that payment should be made speedily by a procedure at once simple and inexpensive. It intended that the employer should know his liability in this regard, and so might include it among the items charged to operation. If our act intends its contracts of employment to include compensation for injuries occurring only within our jurisdiction, it manifestly defeats its own ends. In that case the employer may not charge to the industry the compensation for injuries occurring without the state, and the employee or his dependents may not collect the same.

"Neither employer nor employee can know what portion of this period of employment will be subject to the provisions of the act, and no provision for insurance of this liability will be practically possible, since it may not ordinarily be known what part of the service will be in and what part out of the state, or in what jurisdiction the service will be performed, in industries and commercial enterprises engaged in intrastate and interstate employment. The state boundary is not the limit of very many businesses. To subject them to the laws of the many jurisdictions in which they may be engaged will be especially burdensome to them, and involve them probably in greater expense and liabilities and far greater difficulties than under the old system.

"Equally hard will it prove to the employee, since he must pursue his remedy in the state of the accident, or the Federal court applying that state's law, and thus he may be brought under any one of many different compensation acts, with whose provisions he cannot hope to be familiar; some acts contractual in character, some compulsory, some optional, and some ex delicto; and he may find he has forfeited the benefit of the foreign act through failure to comply with its provisions. A reading of the several acts now in force convinces us that these difficulties are not imaginative, but imminent actualities.

"Is it reasonable to infer that our legislature, inaugurating a new system based upon humanitarian and economical considerations, should intentionally frustrate the object of the new system, and cast a multitude of employers and employees into a maelstrom of trouble, uncertainty, and liability? On the other hand, is it not reasonable to infer that the legislature, having botomed the right to compensation upon contract, deemed unimportant the place of injury, since it must be presumed to have known that the contract, and not the place of injury, would govern the recovery. Such a construction of the act would lift insuperable burdens from in-men, and give to each his course and the ascertained fruits of the contract of his will."

Continuing, the court said: "Where as with us, the determination of the award is committed to a board or commission under a specified procedure, there will be serious obstacles to the enforcement of the contract in a foreign-jurisdiction. 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Comp. 2d ed. p. 52. If it should be necessary to so rule, no hardship would result; the parties in interest would be relegated to the place where they had elected to make their contract and no questions of conflict of laws could arise. At the base of this question is the character of the compensation. Mr. Bradbury, repudiating his earlier view, stoutly maintains that, if the act be contractual, the contracts arising will, unless a contrary intent appears, be found to cover injuries without as well as within the state. We think his later conclusion sound, and one which will prove beneficial alike to employer and employee."

Counsel, however, urge that § 5 of the Act of 1915, by the use of the words, "for a personal injury sustained within this state," supports the contention that compensation may be allowed for accidents occurring within the state only. The section deals only with negligence cases, not with compensation, and denies the defenses, in such cases, of assumed risk, the fellow-servant rule, and contributory negligence. The very purpose of the provision is to induce employers to accept the Compensation Law, in so denying such defenses in negligence cases. Beside, the act should be construed as a whole, in the light of its purposes. It was held in the case of Gooding v. Ott, 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862, where the Compensation Statute was seemingly limited to persons "as shall have received injuries in this state," that it was a construction too narrow to hold that these words limited the right of compensation to injuries occurring within the state, in view of the objects and purposes of the act.

In the case at bar, if we are to determine, in the absence of any provision of the statute to the contrary, that the doctrine of lex loci contractus does not govern, it will be to destroy the very spirit and purpose of the law as it affects the employer, the employee, and the public welfare. If we assume that there are no Workmen's Compensation Laws in the states where the deceased was to perform his services outside of Colorado, then there can be no recovery of compensation, notwithstanding all premiums sufficient to maintain the workers' accident insurance had been fully paid. On the other hand, if we are to assume that a Workmen's Compensation Law prevails in each of the seven states of Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico, then the employer must be compelled to comply with each statute, and to pay the premiums required by the law of each state for the protection of the one employee, or approximately seven times the amount otherwise required. If this were legally permissible, the expense would make it prohibitive. The result in this case must be that the employer has paid the full premium demanded by the state to insure his employee against accident; the employee has relied on the pledge of his state for the protection of himself and his dependents; his widow and children discover the whole arrangement to be a delusion and a snare, and find themselves without protection. Thus the employer, the employee, his dependents, and the public have all been deceived and cheated, because, forsooth, the accident occurred beyond the imaginary line that marks the boundary of the commonwealth, though it happened within the line of employment. We cannot assume that the legislature ever intended such an injustice and absurdity, in the absence of some clear and express provision in the statute to that effect, which we do not find.

NOTE.

As to the extraterritorial operation of compensation statutes and conflict of laws, see the annotation to STATE EX REL. CHAMBERS v. DISTRICT Ct. post, 1351. The decision of the Colorado supreme court in the reported case (INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION v. ÆTNA L. INS. CO. ante, 1336), is in line with the greater weight of authority in holding that compensation statutes are applicable in case of injuries occurring outside of the state.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. LENA CHAMBERS et al.,
Plffs. in Certiorari,

v.

DISTRICT COURT, HENNEPIN COUNTY, et al.

(139 Minn. 205, 166 N. W. 185.)

Workmen's compensation — injury out of state.

1. The Minnesota Workmen's Compensation Act is elective. By becoming subject to it the employer and employee agree that the employer will pay and the employee receive for an accidental injury the compensation fixed by the statute, and that the employee will forego his common-law right of action. It is not important who is at fault or whether anyone is. The right to compensation is not based on tort. It is contractual. The relator's husband was a resident of North Dakota. He entered into a contract of employment with a Minnesota corporation doing a grain brokerage business in Minnesota and having its place of business in Minneapolis, and, so far as appears, none elsewhere. The contract was made there. It contemplated that he should solicit business for the corporation in Minnesota, North Dakota, and elsewhere. An automobile was furnished him for use in his work. While using it in the course of his employment it accidentally overturned at a point in North Dakota and he was killed. Under these facts it is held that the Minnesota Compensation Act is applicable, and an award of compensation should be made.

Certiorari — orders in compensation case.

2. The writ of certiorari does not bring to this court for review orders in a compensation proceeding not in their nature appealable. It does not lie to review an order for judgment on the pleadings, for such an order is not in its nature appealable. It lies to review the judgment entered pursuant to such an order.

[See 5 R. C. L. 253, 254.]

CERTIORARI to the District Court for Hennepin County to review a judgment denying relator compensation, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, for the death of her husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. McNamara & Waters for relator.

Mr. John F. Bernhagen for respondents.

Dibell, C., filed the following opinion:

Certiorari to the district court of Hennepin county to review a judgment denying the relator compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of her husband.

1. Judgment was entered on the pleadings on motion of the defendant employer. The facts stated in the complaint, which we are to take as established, are substantially these: The relator's husband was a resident of North Dakota. He was employed by C. C. Wyman & Company a Minnesota corporation doing a general grain brokerage business in Minnesota and having its place of business in Minneapolis. It does not appear that it had a business situs elsewhere. The contract of employment was made in Minneapolis. It contemplated the rendition of services by the deceased in soliciting business in Minnesota, North Dakota, and elsewhere. The company furnished him an automobile which he used in performing such services. While he was in North Dakota on May 5, 1917, the automobile was accidentally overturned and he was killed. The accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

The question is whether, with the facts as stated, the motion of the employer for judgment on the pleadings was rightly granted. Liability would be conceded had the accident happened in Minnesota. The claim of the employer is that compensation cannot be awarded for an accident occurring outside the state.

The Minnesota Compensation Act provides for elective compensation. Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 8202 et seq.; Mathison v. Minneapolis, Street R. Co. 126 Minn. 286, L.R.A.1916D, 412, 148 N. W. 71, 5 N. C. C. A. 871. The employer and employee become subject to the act only by agreement, express or implied. If they elect to become subject to it they in effect contract that the employee shall receive and the employer will pay the statutory compensation for all accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of the employment, and the employee waives his common-law right of action. It is unimportant whether the cause of the accident is referable to a tortious or a blameless act, or whether, if tortious, the employer or some third person is blameworthy, or even that the employee is at fault, if not wilfully so. The statute requires compensation of the employer, when the employer and employee have elected to become subject to the act, "in every case of personal injury or death of his employee, caused by accident, arising out of and in the course of employment, without regard to the question of negligence, except accidents which are intentionally self-inflicted or when the intoxication of such employee is the natural or proximate cause of the injury. . . . Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8203. The statute evidences no affirmative purpose to restrict the operation of the contract to accidental injuries happening within the state. That a statute might make such limitation expressly is clear; or the wording of it might require such construction by way of proper inference.

In Connecticut, New York, Rhode Island, West Virginia, Indiana, and New Jersey, under varying statutes and with facts changing from case to case, it is held that compensation may be awarded for an injury occurring outside the state. Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372; Post v. Burger & Gohlke, 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 10 N. C. C. A. 888; Grinnell v. Wilkinson, 39 R. A consideration at length of the arguments which support the diverse views does not serve our present purpose. Different arguments appeal to different courts. Often a distinction is drawn between an elective and a compulsory act, with the suggestion that in the case of the former there is a contract to pay which is the basis of the right to compensation; that a contract is not local as is a tort, and therefore state boundaries are not important. Whether an agreement to pay is imported into the contract of hiring where a compulsory act is in force is not material to our inquiry, for ours is not such an act. That under our act there is a contract obligation is clear. The weight of authority supports the view that under an elective act like ours, and with facts such as are present, an accidental injury, though it occurs outside the state, is compensable. This view we adopt. There is nothing in Johnson v. Nelson, 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620, opposed. The injury there involved occurred in Wisconsin and the employer and employee were by their election subject to the Compensation Act of that state. It was held that the employee could not maintain a common-law action in Minnesota for the Wisconsin injury. A basic thought underlying the Compensation Act is that the business or industry shall in the first instance pay for accidental injuries as a business expense or a part of the cost of production. It may absorb it or it may put it partly or wholly on the consumer if it can. The economic tendency is to push it along, just as it is to shift the burden of unrestrained personal injury litigation. When a business is localized in a state, there is nothing inconsistent with the principle of the Compensation Act in requiring the employer to compensate for injuries in a service incident to its conduct, sustained beyond the borders of the state. The question of policy is with the legislature. It may enact an elective compensation act bringing such result if it chooses. In the case before us the business of the employer was localized in the state. What the employee did, if done in Minnesota was a contribution to the business involving an expense and presumably resulting in a profit. It was not different because done across the border in North Dakota. It was referable to the business centralized in Minnesota. Sometimes the construction which we adopt will result to the immediate advantage of the employee and against the employer, and sometimes the result will be the reverse. Whatever view is adopted, perplexing situations may arise. Business has scant respect for state boundaries. An industry may be located a part in one state and a part in another, or it may have separate business situs in two or more, and its employees may from time to time work in each and may reside in one or another at their convenience. Situations may arise where it is difficult to say whether the employment is referable by the act of the parties or by intendment of law to a business conducted in one state or another, and whether the governing law applicable to an injury coming from the employment is that of the one or the other, or whether there may be a recovery of the employer under the Compensation Act of one state and of a third person under the common law of the state of the injury. They are safely left for determination when they arise. Here, if the facts stated in the complaint are true, the employment was referable to the business conducted in Minnesota, and its Compensation Act is the governing law between employer and employee. We hold that judgment on the pleadings should not have been directed for the employer.

2. The statute contemplates the review of questions of law arising in the administration of the Compensation Act by certiorari. Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8225. It does not intend the review by certiorari of orders and judgments not in their nature appealable under our practice. An order for judgment on the pleadings from early times has been held not appealable. 1 Dunnell Dig. (Minn.) § 309. The writ sought to review the order granting the motion for judgment. To convenience the parties we allowed a remand of the case for the entry of judgment and the making of amendments appropriate to bring the judgment here for proper review. Some inconvenience has resulted to the parties from relator's improper procedure. We emphasize the importance of the observance of the statute and settled practice by withholding from the relator statutory costs.

ANNOTATION.

Extraterritorial operation of Workmen's Compensation Statutes; conflict of laws.*I. Introductory, 1351.*II. Extraterritorial operation of statutes:

- a. Extraterritorial operation necessary to carry out purpose of statutes, 1351.
- b. Acceptance of elective acts as constituting contract effective in other states, 1355.

I. Introductory.

There is a sharp conflict of authority as to whether the compensation statutes have extraterritorial operation, and this conflict is based upon the views of the individual courts as to the general purposes of the statutes, and upon the provisions of the statutes themselves, rather than upon any general underlying principles of law. Compensation statutes may be divided into two general classes; those which are compulsory and those which are elective; but this fundamental distinction does not afford any guide in determining whether or not the statutes are to be considered as applying to injuries occurring outside of the state, since statutes of both classes have been construed to apply and not to apply to such injuries. Consequently the decisions of one state have but little weight in determining the proper construction of the statutes of another state. This point has been recognized by the supreme court of Iowa.

Thus, in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, the court said: "We conclude that resort to the decisions in other jurisdictions would be of very doubtful value in interpreting the Iowa act, and we shall refrain from so resorting."

So, too, in STATE EX REL. CHAMBERS v. DISTRICT CT. (reported herewith), ante, 1347, the Minnesota supreme court said: "A consideration at length of the arguments which support the diverse views does not serve our present purpose. Different arguments appeal to different courts."

- d. Doctrine that statutes do not have extraterritorial operation, 1359.

III. Conflict of laws, 1361.

The question of the extraterritorial operation of the statutes and the question of conflict of laws are so closely interwoven that it is necessary to discuss both questions in one annotation.

The doctrine is put forward in some cases that the Compensation Acts rest upon the basic principle that the business or industry shall in the first instance pay for accidental injuries as a business expense or a part of the cost of production; and, consequently, work done by an employee acting within the scope of his employment is presumably done to advance the business, although the work may be performed across the border of the state; and any accidents suffered by him while so engaged should be compensated by the business, precisely the same as if it were performed within the state boundary. Therefore, an employee, although injured outside of the state, is entitled to the benefit of the statute unless the statute itself clearly shows the intention of the legislature to confine its operation to accidents occurring within the state.

This is the view taken in STATE EX REL. CHAMBERS v. DISTRICT CT. (reported herewith) ante, 1347. A concise statement of this view may be repeated here to show more clearly the position of the court: "When a business is localized in a state there is nothing inconsistent with the principle of the Compensation Act in requiring the employer to compensate for injuries in a service incidental to its conduct, sustained beyond the borders of the state. The question of policy is with the legislature. It may enact an elective compensation act bringing such result if it chooses. In the case before us the business of the employer was localized in the state. What the employee did, if done in Minnesota, was a contribution to the business, involving an expense and presumably resulting in a profit. It was not different because [it was] done across the border in North Dakota. It was referable to the business centralized in Minnesota."

The same view was adopted by the Minnesota court in State ex rel. Maryland Casualty Co. v. District Ct. (1918) 140 Minn. 427, 168 N. W. 177, and in State ex rel. McCarthy Bros. Co. v. District Ct. (1918) — Minn. —, 169 N. W. 274.

The Wisconsin supreme court also, in holding that the act would apply to an injury occurring in another state, based its decision upon the theory that the Compensation Act is based upon the economic theory that it is in the interest of the general welfare that the damages arising from injuries sustained by persons engaged in particular industries shall be borne by that industry. Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 170 N. W. 275. The court said: "If the application of the law be limited to injuries occurring within this state, then in the case of injuries sustained without the state the employer will not be liable, except he be negligent, and where he is not negligent the whole loss must be borne by the employee, and the whole legislative purpose is, as to injuries sustained without the state, defeated. We have extensive borders; thousands of employees are passing out of and into Wisconsin daily and almost hourly, in the discharge of their ordinary duties. Can it be that the legislature intended that every time these employees crossed the state line their right to compensation for injuries incidental to and growing out of their employment should be changed, and that as to injuries which occur beyond the state line the old system, instead of the new, should apply?"

So, too, the Connecticut supreme court in Keenerson v. Thames Towboat Co. (1915) 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A. 1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, said that the act assumed that "accident is incident to employment," and purposed to charge the cost in the case of any injury not caused by the wilful and serious misconduct or intoxication of the injured employee to the industry in which it occurred. It intended that the employee should know what compensation he or his dependents would receive in the event of injury, and that the employer should know his liability in this regard, and so might include it in the items charged to operation. The court said: "If our act intends its contract of employment to include compensation for injuries occurring only within our jurisdiction, it manifestly defeats its own ends. In that case the employer may not charge to the industry the compensation for injuries occurring without the state, and the employee or his dependents may not collect the same. Neither employer nor employee can know what portion of this period of employment will be subject to the provisions of the act."

To hold that the Colorado statute did not apply to injuries occurring outside of the state would destroy the very spirit and purpose of the law as it affects the employer, the employee, and the public welfare, said the Colorado supreme court in INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION v. AETNA L. INS. CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1336. In this case the employer did business not only in Colorado, but in a number of surrounding states. The contention of the court was that, if the statute was held not to apply extraterritorially, then, if it were assumed that there are no compensation laws in the states where the employees were to perform their services, there could be no recovery of compensation notwithstanding all premiums sufficient to maintain the workers' accident insurance had been fully paid. On the other hand, if it was assumed that the Workmen's Compensation Law prevailed in each of the states in which the employer did business, then the latter must be compelled to comply with each statute, and to pay the premiums required by the law of each state for the protection of one employee.

And in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, the Iowa supreme court said that if the statute contained an express provision limiting its application to injuries occurring within the state, it would make impossible the accomplishment of the one purpose of the act, namely, to bring about speedy payment by procedure at once simple and inexpensive; and it would further tend to nullify another thing intended; namely, that the employer shall be enabled to charge to the industry what injury to the employee engaged therein will cost. The court said: "As to the first, compelling the employee to bring a common-law suit, and to apply to its decision the statutes of another state, is certainly not calculated to promote speedy payment by procedure simple and inexpensive. As to the second, the employer could fix no tax upon his business to meet expenditures for compensation because he would not pay statute compensation where the injury occurred outside of the state, and could not foretell what proportion of injuries to be compensated for would arise outside of the state."

So, too, in Gooding v. Ott (1916) 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862, it was held that it would work great injustice on the part of both the employer and employee were the compensation to be paid limited to cases of injuries received within the state. The court said: "So construed, the statute would impose unequal burdens upon and give unequal protection to mine owner and miner from whom premiums were exacted. They would both be liable for benefits not received." This view of the court was reasserted in Fouthey v. Ott (1917) 80 W. Va. 88, 92 S. E. 143, 15 N. C. C. A. 919.

Again, in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (Iowa) supra, it was held that the view that it was not intended to limit recovery under the act to injuries sustained while in the state is supported by an application of the reasoning upon which the rule "designatio unius est exclusio alterius" rests. The court stated that the statute repeatedly asserts that the employer is to provide compensation for injuries sustained arising out of and in the course of the employment, and that the only cases excepted from the statute are those which do not arise out of and in the course of the employment. The court said: "Where stated things are enumerated, things not named are excluded. On the same reasoning, where a statute declares that compensation under its terms is to be made for any and all injuries sustained, without limitation beyond that they shall occur in the course of and arise out of the employment, it is the declared intention that compensation shall be made under the statute if the injury be of the class named in the statute; the only limitation is the relation of the injury to the duty. No exception based on the place where the injury occurs is found in the language, and if it is to be ingrafted upon that language it must be done by judicial legislation."

The Connecticut court in Kennerston v. Thames Towboat Co. (1915) 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, also laid special emphasis upon the fact that the expression "any injury" was repeatedly used throughout the statute, without any limitation as to the place in which the injury arose.

And the New York act, which is a compulsory statute, has been held to apply to accidents which occur outside of the state, since the cost of insurance to be carried by the employer is determined by the number of his employees and the wages paid to them, and not by the number of employees employed within the state. Post v. Burger & Gohlke (1916) 216 N. Y. 544, 111 N. E. 350, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158, 10 N. C. C. A. 888. So, too, the word "employees," as defined by the act, includes the person engaged in the course of his employment away from the plant of the employer; the language of the statute, if construed literally, expressly includes an employee who was injured in another state, away from the plant of his employer, but under the employer's express direction. The court further said that one of the objects of the act was to prevent injured workmen and their dependents from becoming objects of charity, and the danger of injured workmen and their dependents becoming objects of charity was just as great when the accident occurred outside the boundaries of the state as when it occurred within.

The decision in the Post Case has been followed in Fitzpatrick v. Blackall & B. Co. (1917) 220 N. Y. 671, 116 N. E. 1044; Jenkins v. T. Hogan & Sons (1917) 177 App. Div. 36, 163 N. Y. Supp. 707; Gilbert v. Des Lauriers Column Mould Co. (1917) 180 App. Div. 59, 167 N. Y. Supp. 274; Holmes v. Communipaw Steel Co. (1919) 186 App. Div. 645, 174 N. Y. Supp. 772.

So, a claimant who was employed under a New York contract, and was injured while performing services for his employer away from the plant of such employer in the state of New Jersey, is under the protection of the New York statute rather than under the New Jersey statute, and the fact that the claimant was induced to invoke the New Jersey statute in the first instance does not deprive him of his rights under the New York statute, and the insurance carrier is not aggrieved if credited with the amount it had paid under the provision of the New Jersey act. Gilbert v. Des Lauriers Column Mould Co. (1917) 180 App. Div. 59, 167 N. Y. Supp. 274.

In support of the contention that the New York statute applies extra-territorially because the amount which an employer is required to pay into the insurance fund is based solely upon the size of his pay roll and the character of his business, and the fact that one of his employees may, from time to time, be outside the state in the course of his employment, does not diminish the amount of premium which the employer has to pay, the court, in Spratt v. Sweeney & G. Co. (1915) 168 App. Div. 403, 153 N. Y.

Supp. 505, 9 N. C. C. A. 918, said: "The employee cannot refuse to do the master's bidding within the course of the employment upon the ground that it requires him to pass over the state line, and the law cannot contemplate that he shall lose the benefit of the act because he is performing the duties of his employment. The statute must have a broad and liberal interpretation to protect the employee and to compensate him for all injuries received in the course of the employment, and to charge upon the fund or the insurer the loss which otherwise must fall upon the master. By complying with the act the employer is guaranteed protection, and the moneys which he has paid into the fund or secured to be paid must bear the losses which they were intended to meet; otherwise the employer and the employee are suffering at the hands of the state." The decision in this case was affirmed by the court of appeals in (1916) 216 N. Y. 763, 111 N. E. 1100, on authority of Post v. Burger & Gohlke (N. Y.) supra.

So, too, in Gooding v. Ott (1916) 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862, the court called attention to the fact that employers were compelled to pay into the state compensation fund upon the basis of the entire wages paid to the employees.

It was held in Rounsaville v. Central R. Co. (1915) 87 N. J. L. 371, 94 Atl. 392, that the fact that the accident happened in another state is irrelevant when the proceedings were brought in New Jersey for liability under the New Jersey act, and the contract of employment was a New Jersey contract. The supreme court said: "The place where the accident occurs is of no more relevance than is the place of accident to the assured in an action on a contract of accident insurance, or the place of death of the assured in an action on a contract of life insurance." The judgment of the supreme court in this case was reversed by the court of errors and appeals in (1917) 90 N. J. L. 176, 101 Atl. 182, upon the ground, not within the scope of this note, that the injury was received in the course of interstate commerce.

The question whether the Kansas act applies to injuries received outside the state was suggested but not decided in Hicks v. Swift & Co. (1917) 101 Kan. 760, 168 Pac. 905. The court said that the operation of the statute is not in so many words limited to the state, but contains some incidental expressions implying an assumption that the injuries to which it relates would occur in Kansas. Releases, agreements, and awards under it are required to be filed in the "county in which the accident occurred," and provisions relating to defenses are made applicable to an action "for a personal injury sustained within the state."

The Indiana act expressly provides that the statute shall be applicable to injuries received outside of the state, and it has been held by the Indiana court that this provision can be defeated only by other words within the statute which are equally plain, unmistakable, and rigid. Hagenback v. Leppert (1917) — Ind. App. —, 117 N. E. 531.

The New York statute expressly applies to the operation without the state, "including repair of vessels other than vessels of other states or countries used in interstate or foreign commerce." In Edwardsen v. Jarvis Lighterage Co. (1915) 168 App. Div. 368, 153 N. Y. Supp. 391, it was held that the captain of a lighter, who was injured while his lighter was being unloaded, was engaged in the "operation" of the lighter, and consequently was entitled to compensation although the injury took place outside of the state.

In Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. (1915) 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, the court said that unless the intention to have a statute operate beyond the limits of a state is clearly expressed or reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act or from its purpose, subject-matter, or history, the presumption is that the statute is intended to have no extraterritorial effect, and that a like presumption should control the operation of a contract based upon statutory authority.

But the rule that statutes shall not be construed to have extraterritorial operation unless authority for such construction is found in the act in unequivocal language, or plain and unmistakable words, was held by the Iowa supreme court in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, to be applicable to cases in delicto only, and not to the construction of a compensation statute.

In some decisions it is pointed out that under the elective acts the rights and duties as to compensation are contractual, and consequently it is immaterial that the injury occurs outside of the borders of the state.

Thus, in STATE EX REL. CHAMBERS v. DISTRICT CT. (reported herewith), ante, 1347, the court said: "Often a distinction is drawn between an elective and a compulsory act, with the suggestion that in the case of the former there is a contract to pay which is the basis of the right to compensation; that a contract is not local, as is a tort, and therefore state boundaries are not important. Whether an agreement to pay is imported into the contract of hiring where a compulsory act is in force is not material to our inquiry, for ours is not such an act. That, under our act, there is a contract obligation, is clear. The weight of authority supports the view that, under an elective act like ours, and with facts such as are present, an accidental injury, though it occurs outside the state, is compensable."

In response to the contention that no distinction in construction is to be based upon whether the act is compulsory or elective, the Iowa supreme court in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, said that the fact that the statute is elective has controlling bearing on one thing that is highly important; namely, where the statute is elective as to both employer and employee, payment of compensation is not the performance of a statutory duty, but the performance of conditions in the contract of hiring, which conditions are in the contract by means of reading the compensation statute into the contract. The court said: "It follows, then, that it is quite unnecessary to make this case turn upon a holding that the statute itself is operative in Nebraska. It suffices if employer and employee contracted in Iowa that, if injury was sustained in Nebraska, compensation should be governed by the terms and conditions found in the Iowa statute, to which, by law, such contract makes reference."

And in Deeny v. Wright & C. Light-erage Co. (1913) 136 N. J. L. J. 121, the court said: "The statute can have no extraterritorial effect, but it can require a contract to be made by two parties to a hiring, that the contract shall have an extraterritorial effect."

So, in Gooding v. Ott (1916) 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862, the West Virginia supreme court of appeals said: "A distinction has been noted in some of the authorities between cases arising under compulsory statutes and those controlled by statutes, as in New Jersey, and we think in this state, which are optional. Where the statute compels submission by the employer and employee, there is no contract, as a general rule, enforceable outside of the state. But where, as in New Jersey and in this state, the statute makes acceptance optional, and the parties freely enter into the contract of employment with reference to the statute, the statute should be read into the contract as an integral part thereof, binding the parties, and enforceable in any jurisdiction, the same as any other contract."

The court further said: "Employment under these new compensation acts, when elective, and not compulsory, and voluntarily entered into, are treated as contracts of employment, to be interpreted and enforced as all other contracts, and as binding upon the parties for injuries or death sustained in any place to which such contracts of employment extend the rights of the parties."

So, too, in Grinnell v. Wilkinson

(1916) 39 R. I. 447, L.R.A.1917B, 767, 98 Atl. 103, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 618, after citing the Connecticut, New Jersey, and New York cases referred to above, the Rhode Island supreme court said: "We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the cases above cited from New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut is quite applicable to the case at bar; that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Rhode Island the relation of employer and employee is contractual, and the terms of the act are to be read as a part of every contract of service between those subject to its terms; that on principle and in reason, and in view of the purpose, scope, and character of the act, it should be construed and held to include injuries arising out of the state as well as those arising within it; and that the weight of authority upon acts similar to our own gives full support to our conclusion."

Again, in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, the Iowa court said that the contention that the statute could not have an extraterritorial application because a statute is a law only within the state in which it was enacted overlooked the distinction that the statute may be so read into a contract of hiring as that compensation according to the terms of the statute may be recovered, though the injury was sustained in the jurisdiction in which such statute was not effective as a law.

On the other hand, the Wisconsin supreme court in Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 170 N. W. 275, in taking the view that the statute had an extraterritorial application, said that in their opinion it did not matter that the law had an elective feature and was noncompulsory. The Wisconsin court also took sharp issue with the Minnesota court which held that the liability of employers in compensation cases was based upon contracts. The liability was purely statutory, although it grew out of and was incidental to a relationship based upon contracts, but this fact did not make it contractual any more than it made the liability of the employer at common law contractual, for that, too, was a liability which grew out of and was incidental to a like relationship. The court said that if, as had been said in some cases, the liability of the employer under the law is a contractual obligation, then the rights and liabilities of the parties would always be referable to the law in force at the time the contract of employment was entered into; and if this was true, the law is not subject to amendment as against existing contracts in any respect which would impair the contract within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution. "Such construction is to be avoided in the interest of a simple and correct administration of the law, and should not be adopted unless the clearly expressed legislative intent excludes other construction."

The mere fact that a contract of employment was made within the state cannot bring the employer within the act, where it related solely to work to be performed outside of the state, and no service in the state was contemplated or performed.

Thus, in Gardner v. Horseheads Constr. Co. (1916) 171 App. Div. 66, 156 N. Y. Supp. 899, the court, in holding that an award of compensation was erroneous, said: "The contract of employment did not contemplate any work by him within the state; no such work was done. The statute in question is intended to regulate the relations between the employer and employee in hazardous employments within the state, and to protect the employee within the state from the ordinary risks of the employment, and to charge those risks upon the ultimate consumer. The mere fact that an employee is engaged by a resident of the state to go out of the state for service, and no service in the state is contemplated or done, cannot bring the employment within the act. Ordinarily a statute has no extraterritorial effect. But where the regular service of the employee is being performed in the state, and, as an incident to it, he goes over the state line temporarily, we have held that such temporary absence from the state does not relieve the employer from liability under this statute. The relations between the decedent and the company with reference to the work at Ford City depended upon the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and the protection there given to the employer and the employee. The mere fact that the contract was made in the state, if it was made in the state, is not material here, when we understand that the contract related solely to work to be performed outside of the state. It follows, therefore, that the employment of the decedent was outside of the state of New York, and that he was not an employee or engaged in an employment within the state at the time of his death."

The New York act has no application in case of an injury to an employee in another state, where the contract of employment, although made in New York, was made prior to the enactment of the Compensation Act, and the hazardous business of the employer had been removed from the state prior to such enactment, and at the time of the injury no hazardous business to which the act applied was being conducted by the employer within the state. Smith v. Heine Safety Boiler Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 9, 119 N. E. 878, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 316.

c. Effect of miscellaneous provisions in statutes.

Section 25 of the West Virginia act provides that the compensation commissioner is authorized to disburse the compensation funds to employees "who shall have received injuries in this state in the course of and resulting from their employment." The supreme court of West Virginia, however, has held that, considering the object and purposes of the statute and all the terms and provisions thereof, to hold that no compensation was recoverable where an employee was injured outside of the state would be to place too narrow a construction upon the statute. Gooding v. Ott (1916) 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862. In the case at bar, the employee was a miner, and was injured while working in a mine, the entrance to which was within the state, but the point at which he was injured was a short distance beyond the state line. Certain amendments to the statute were held by the court to clearly show the intention of the legislature to have the act apply to injuries occurring outside of the state, notwithstanding the provision refers to the payment of funds out of the compensation fund.

And in Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 170 N. W. 275, it was contended that various provisions in the statute itself showed that it was the intention of the legislature to limit its application to injuries arising within the state. The Wisconsin act is an elective statute, and in case the employer does not elect to become bound by the terms of the provision relating to compensation, he is deprived of certain affirmative defenses available to him under the prior law, and the statute provides that these defenses shall be denied him "in any action to recover damages for personal injury sustained within this state." It was contended that this phrase "within the state" clearly limited the operation of the entire act to injuries arising within the state, but the court pointed out that, entirely aside from the statute, the state of Wisconsin could not prescribe liability of employers for purely tortious injuries to employees occurring outside of the state, because the liability in such cases is that prescribed by the law of the place where the injury occurred, and therefore the phrase in question is to be considered merely as declaratory of the existing general law, and not as a limitation upon the operation of the compensation features of the statute.

It was also contended that the provisions in the statute relating to minors "who were legally permitted to work under the laws of the state" indicated a restriction of the operation of the statute. But in reply to this contention, the court said that the legislature had no power to require safeguards or to authorize the employment of minors, or to regulate or supervise places of employment without the state, and so again, this provision could not be considered as limiting the application of the act, but as relating solely to particular classes of injuries, and as conferring special powers upon the Industrial Commission.

The court further pointed out that the portion of the statute withdrawing the common-law defenses from the employer in actions for tortious injuries was distinct from that portion imposing the statutory obligation for compensation upon the employer, and that in the latter portion of the statute there was no language from which it may be inferred that its application was intended to be limited to injuries which occur within the state.

So, too, the Colorado supreme court in INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION v. AETNA L. INS. CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1336, held that the use of the words, "for a personal injury sustained within this state," in the section dealing only with negligence cases, and not with compensation, and denying the defenses of assumed risks, the fellow-servant rule, and contributory negligence, did not show the intention of the legislature to limit the compensation features of the statute to accidents occurring within the state only.

Again, in Kennerson v. Thames Towboat Co. (1915) 89 Conn. 367, L.R.A.1916A, 436, 94 Atl. 372, the court held that a provision in the act that each commissioner had jurisdiction of all claims arising in his district does not show an intention that the act should not apply to injuries arising in other states, since the claim may be said to arise at the domicile of the injured party. It was further held that a provision that awards and agreements as to compensation might be filed in the office of the clerk of the court within the county in which the injury occurred should not be given a mandatory construction so as to prevent applicability of the act to injuries arising out of the state. And so, too, a provision that an appeal from the Commission's award may be had to the "superior court of the county in which the injury was sustained" does not prevent the application of the act to injuries outside the state, since the injury may be said to have been sustained in the place where the contract was made.

The contention was also made in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (1919) — Iowa, —, 172 N. W. 191, that the provisions of the statute that failure to give notice within a stated time should work a bar to recovery, and that on request the employee must submit himself to a medical examination within a reasonable time, indicated an intent to limit the scope of the statute to the state, because if the injury were suffered at a greater distance from the place of hiring in Iowa, the employee might be prevented from giving notice within the time required, and might be subjected to great hardship to submit to an examination at the place elected by the employer. The court pointed out, however, that this inconvenience was merely a matter of degree, and that it might be easier for the employee to give notice and submit himself to examination if the injury occurred across the state line, than if it occurred at a far distant point within the state; furthermore, the provision as to examination does not enter into the question at all, where both the injury and the death therefrom occurred in another state.

The Nebraska supreme court in Pierce v. Bekins Van & Storage Co. (Iowa) supra, also overruled contentions to the effect that to construe the act to apply to injuries outside the state would work class legislation, and that the limitation of the statute to injuries occurring within the state was shown by the provision making the statute inapplicable to interstate commerce, the provision relating to subrogation to rights of employees, the provision prohibiting the employer from relieving himself by contract or other device from liability under the statute, and the provision relating to safety devices to be installed by the employer.

On the other hand, a number of courts have held that the Compensation Statutes, both elective and compulsory, do not apply in case of injuries received while the employee was at work in another state. Various reasons have been ascribed by the courts for so limiting the application of the statutes.

Thus, in Gould's Case (1913) 215 Mass. 480, 102 N. E. 693, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 372, 4 N. C. C. A. 60, in holding that the Massachusetts act had no application to accidents occurring outside the state, the court said that, in the absence of unequivocal language to the contrary, it was not to be presumed that statutes respecting this matter are designed to control conduct or fix the rights of parties beyond the territorial limits of the state. The court further pointed out that there were several provisions of the statute which indicate solely intrastate operation. It was provided that the employee who had received an injury should submit himself, on request, to be examined by a physician or surgeon with authority to practise medicine under the laws of the commonwealth; the part of the act dealing with procedure dealt only with the boards and courts within the commonwealth; the hearings of the committee on arbitration were to be held in the city or town where an injury occurred; upon resort to the court, copies of the papers were to be presented "to the superior court for the county in which the injury occurred, or for the county of Suffolk," in which county the officers of the Industrial Accident Board were; employers were to make report of accidents within forty-eight hours. The Massachusetts employees' insurance association created by the act, with power to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations for the prevention of injury on the premises of the subscribers, "and to this end its inspectors shall have free access to such premises during working hours," could have such power only within the state. The act disclosed no purpose to exempt from its operation nonresident employees of alien employers while working within the state, and if the Massachusetts act is to be interpreted as having extraterritorial force, similar effect must be accorded to like laws of other states. Agreements made by employees to waive the provisions of the act are made invalid; and it was provided that no payment under the act shall be liable in any way for debts of the employee. The court also called attention to the fact that the act was copied largely from the English Workmen's Compensation Act, and that that act, although it has been generally held to be inoperative outside of the United Kingdom, in express terms applies to masters, seamen, and apprentices in the sea service under certain conditions, and definitely points out the manner of proving and enforcing claims for injury occurring therein with reference plainly to those outside the United Kingdom; and had the legislature intended to make the act apply extraterritorially, it should have so expressly provided.

The court further said that a number of foreign acts made careful and definite provisions for accidents occurring outside of their territory, and in a footnote the following list was given: 24 Annual Report of U. S. Com. of Labor, vol. 2 (1909); France: Acts of 1898, 1902, 1905, and 1906, p. 2501; Austria: Law of 1894, art. 2, pp. 2456, 2457; Belgium: Act of 1903, art. 26, p. 2464; Germany: Law of 1900 (a), art. 4, p. 2517 (see also German Ins. Code of 1911, art. 157, translated in Boyd, Workmen's Comp. p. 1252); Hungary: Act No. 19 of 1907, arts. 4, 5, and 6, p. 2569; Italy: Law of 1904, arts. 21 and 25, p. 2617; Luxemburg: Law of 1902, art. 3, pp. 2621, 2622; Netherlands: Law of 1901, art. 9, p. 2641.

So, too, the Michigan act does not apply to injuries occurring outside the borders of the state. Keyes-Davis Co. v. Alderdyce, Detroit Legal News, May 3d, 1913 (Mich.) 3 N. C. C. A. 639, note. The court based its decision upon two grounds: First, a general rule of statutory construction that every statute is confined in its operation to persons, property, and rights which are within the jurisdiction of the legislature which enacted it; second, the provision of pt. 3, § 8, of the act, which requires that the hearing to adjudicate disputed claims for compensation "shall be held at the locality where the injury occurred."

So, too, in Union Bridge & Constr. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 287 Ill. 396, P.U.R.1919D, 171, 122 N. E. 609, the Illinois supreme court held that the Illinois act did not have any application to injuries occurring without the state. The court held that such an application of the statute was negatived by the wording of the title to the effect that the act provided compensation for accidental injuries or death suffered in the course of the employment "within the state," by provisions for a personal inspection by the arbitrator or committee of arbitration of the premises relating to questions in dispute, and provision as to the place of hearing, and also the provision that either party may present a certified copy of the decision of the Commission "to the circuit court of the county in which the accident occurred, or either of the parties are residents."

This question was raised but not decided in an earlier Illinois case in which it was held that upon an application by an employee for judgment to enforce an award, under the provisions of the Illinois statute, the court has no jurisdiction to determine whether the statute applies to injuries outside the state, the statute providing for a review of the determination of this question either by a writ of certiorari or by a suit in chancery, to be instituted within twenty days after the award. Friedman Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 284 Ill. 554, 120 N. E. 460.

The California supreme court has held that the compulsory Compensation Act of that state does not apply in case of injuries occurring outside the borders of the state; the liability of the employer to pay compensation arises from the law itself rather than from any agreement of the parties, so that the question whether it is to be given an extraterritorial effect is determined from the statute itself, and the intention to make the act operative as to occurrences outside of the state will not be declared to exist unless such intention is clearly expressed or reasonably to be inferred from the language of the act, or from its purpose, subject-matter, or history. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 174 Cal. 1, L.R.A.1917E, 642, 162 Pac. 93.

The California court said that the Connecticut, New Jersey, West Virginia, and New York decisions were distinguishable; the decisions in the first three states were under elective statutes and the liability to compensation was consequently based on a contract; while the New York statute, although compulsory, as was the California statute, was one providing for the payment of compensation out of an insurance fund, and the amount of premiums was based upon the pay roll and the number of men employed, without regard to the fact that from time to time some of them worked outside of the state.

So, in Hartman v. Toyo Kisen Kaisha S. S. Co. (1917) 244 Fed. 567, the Federal court followed the supreme court of California in holding that the California Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction to award compensation for injuries inflicted outside the territorial limits of the state. In this case it should be noted in addition that the injuries arose out of a maritime transaction, and consequently were not within the application of the California act. (A judgment for the plaintiff in this case upon the ground of defendant's negligence was reversed by the circuit court of appeals (1918) — C. C. A. —, 253 Fed. 422.)

Section 7 of the English act makes provision for awarding compensation for injuries to workmen in the sea service; except as it is expressly given in § 7, the act has no application outside the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. Tomalin v. S. Pearson & Son [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 61, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 863, 100 L. T. N. S. 685, 25 Times L. R. 477, 2 B. W. C. C. 1 (English contractor not liable for compensation for death of workman engaged in working for him in the island of Malta); Schwartz v. India Rubber, Gutta Percha, & Teleg. Works Co. [1912] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 299, W. N. 98, 28 Times L. R. 331, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 780, [1912] W. C. Rep. 190, 106 L. T. N. S. 706, 5 B. W. C. C. 390 (no compensation for death of workman lost in the Bay of Biscay while on his way to work at Teneriffe); Hicks v. Maxton (1907; County Ct.) 124 L. T. Jo. (Eng.) 135, 1 B. W. C. C. 150 (no compensation for injuries to charwoman taken from England by a Frenchwoman to do work for her in France, and injured while in that country); and see Vincent v. La Cie de Chemin de Fer du Grand Fronc (1914) Rap. Jud. Quebec 45 C. S. 353.

III. Conflict of laws.

This annotation does not include cases merely passing upon the question whether the Federal Employers' Liability Act or a state compensation act applies, where the answer to the question depends wholly upon the fact whether, at the time of the injury, the employer and employee were both engaged in interstate commerce.

It is not proposed to enter the field of conflict of laws further than to show what have been the decisions in this branch of the law in cases involving the compensation statute. Any attempt to deduce general rules from these cases would be useless, since the general principles of conflict of law are well settled and are not in any way affected by the compensation statutes.

In a number of decisions the law of the state in which the injury occurred has been applied, although a different law prevailed in the state in which the action or proceeding was brought.

Thus, the Washington supreme court in Reynolds v. Day (1914) 79 Wash. 499, L.R.A.1916A, 432, 140 Pac. 681, 5 N. C. C. A. 814, held that the maintenance of a common-law action for damages in accordance with the law of the state in which the injury occurred is not precluded by a local compensation statute which abolished all civil actions for such an injury, and provided a system of industrial insurance.

So, in Hamm v. Rockwood Sprinkler Co. (1916) 88 N. J. L. 564, 97 Atl. 730, the maintenance in New Jersey of a common-law action in accordance with the law of the place where the contract was made and the injury occurred is precluded neither by the existence of the compensation statute in New Jersey, or by the facts that the workman was a resident of New Jersey and the defendant corporation was authorized to do business in that state.

So, too, the supreme court of Rhode Island has held that an action for damages cannot be maintained in accordance with the law of Rhode Island, where a compensation statute was in force and applicable in the state in which the contract of employment was made and the injury occurred. Pendar v. H. & B. American Mach. Co. (1913) 35 R. I. 321, L.R.A. 1916A, 428, 87 Atl. 1, 4 N. C. C. A. 600.

In Albanese v. Stewart (1912) 78 Misc. 581, 138 N. Y. Supp. 942, which was a common-law action by a servant against his master to recover for personal injuries sustained in the course of his employment in the state of New Jersey, the New York supreme court overruled a demurrer to the answer, which set up as defenses the provisions of the New Jersey Compensation Act. To the same general effect is Wasilewski v. Warner Sugar Ref. Co. (1914) 87 Misc. 156, 149 N. Y. Supp. 1035, holding that an employee, although a resident of New York, cannot bring an action in the New York courts based on the New Jersey Employers' Liability Act, where the contract of employment was made in New Jersey, and he was bound by the terms of the New Jersey Compensation Act.

But it has also been held that an elective statute accepted by the parties would preclude the maintenance of an action for damages, even in the state in which the injury occurred. Thus, in Barnhart v. American Concrete Steel Co. (1917) 181 App. Div. 881, 167 N. Y. Supp. 475, it was held that a judgment for personal injuries received within the state must be reversed where the decedent was a resident of New Jersey, the defendant was a New Jersey corporation, and the contract of hiring was made in that state, since, under those circumstances, the New Jersey Compensation Law controls. There was a dissenting opinion by Blackmar, J., who took the position that the Constitution of the state provided that the right of action now existing to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated; that the amendment to the Constitution of 1913, permitting the passage of a compensation act, restored the legislative competency over this class of actions in so far as they grew out of the relations of master and servant, but that the amendment did not confer on the legislature of New Jersey the power to abrogate this cause of action, which was protected by the Constitution.

A lower New York court has held that the Workmen's Compensation Act of Germany, to which both the employer and employee subscribe, is a bar to an action in New York state for injuries to the employee received while on the vessel of defendant as it was leaving quarantine to dock at New York city. Schweitzer v. Hamburg American Line (1912) 78 Misc. 448, 138 N. Y. Supp. 944. The court said: "A foreign law to which both employer and employee engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and transportation have subscribed, and upon the basis of which the contract of employment was made and entered into, where the cars or ships of the employer enter our state, and in or upon which, while within our borders, an accident occurs to the employee through his employer's negligence, particularly where the contract of employment provides for a fixed compensation in case of specified injury, to take the place of a right of action at law, and which is lawful both in the place where made and that in which the cause of action arose, should obtain recognition and enforcement here. To hold otherwise works not for benefit, but rather injury to our interstate and foreign commerce."

A citizen of the state of California, who was employed under a contract made in that state, and who made a settlement in that state for injuries received in the state of Nevada, cannot subsequently bring proceedings under the Compensation Act of the latter state for the same injury. Leach v. Mason Valley Mines Co. (1916) 40 Nev. 143, 161 Pac. 513. The court said: "As appears from the record in this case, appellant was at all times a citizen of the state of California. At the time the contract and settlement were made, he was a resident and citizen of that state. Such settlement was in accordance with the laws of the state of California and was a complete bar to any action which might be instituted in that state to recover damages for such injuries. Such settlement in the state of his residence was a complete extinguishment of his chose in action. When he came to the state of Nevada, after such settlement, he brought nothing with him that could form the basis of an action, because he had finally settled his cause of action in the state of his residence."

It is a rule asserted by the courts of several jurisdictions that the local compensation act will be applied in case of injuries occurring within the state, although the contract of employment may have been made elsewhere.

Thus, the Wisconsin Compensation Act will apply in case of injuries occurring within that state, to the exclusion of a common-law action in Minnesota, in which state the contract was made. Johnson v. Nelson (1914) 128 Minn. 158, 150 N. W. 620.

So, although the contract of employment was made in New York, the New Jersey Compensation Act applies where the injury occurred in New Jersey, and the contract of employment contemplated the performance of the employee's duties partly in New York and partly in New Jersey, and there was nothing in the contract to show that the employer sought to be exempted from the New Jersey act, and he had given no notice under § 2 of the statute that he elected not to be bound by it. American Radiator Co. v. Rogge (1914) 86 N. J. L. 436, 92 Atl. 85, 7 C. C. A. 144, affirmed in (1915) 87 N. J. L. 314, 93 Atl. 1083, error dismissed in (1917) 245 U. S. 630, 62 L. ed. 520, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 63, for want of jurisdiction, and followed in Davidheiser v. Hay Foundry & Iron Works (1915) 87 N. J. L. 688, 94 Atl. 309, and in West Jersey Trust Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1915) 88 N. J. L. 102, 95 Atl. 753, reversed in (1917) 90 N. J. L. 730, 101 Atl. 1055, because injury was received in course of interstate commerce.

An employee is within the protection of the New York act, where he was injured in that state and had been in business there for some time, although his employers were located in another state, in which the contract of employment had been made. Royal Indemnity Co. v. Platte & W. Ref. Co. (1917) 98 Misc. 631, 163 N. Y. Supp. 197.

So, the Connecticut act is applicable in case of injuries occurring within the state, although both parties lived in Massachusetts and the contract of employment was made in that state, where both parties had accepted the provisions of the Connecticut act, and the Massachusetts act had been construed to possess no extraterritorial effect. Douthwright v. Champlin (1917) 91 Conn. 524, 100 Atl. 97, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 512, 15 N. C. C. A. 870. The court said: "The express acceptance of our act by these parties added its compensation features to their contract. In the absence of their refusal, the law would have added this to their contract; in either case it would have become a part of the contract. If the Massachusetts act had by her court been construed to have an extraterritorial effect, we should have endeavored, in an action for an injury suffered here by an employee who contracted in Massachusetts, to have given effect to the act as broadly as her own courts would have done. We should have treated the contract as subject to the law of the place where it was made just as we would if the claim had been for a breach of any of its provisions."

So, too, the Connecticut act has been held applicable to injuries received within the state, although the employer was a resident of Massachusetts and the original contract of employment was made in New York, where the employee went to Connecticut under what was substantially a new contract, and was given the option to go or to refuse to go. Banks v. Albert D. Howlett Co. (1918) 92 Conn. 368, 102 Atl. 822. The court said: "The rule thus invoked (although perhaps limited in its practical application), to wit, that a Connecticut employment which is the specific and sole subject of the contract of employment, whenever made, comes within the operation of the Connecticut law governing the payment of compensation in cases of personal injury arising therefrom, appears to be one better calculated than any other to make for uniformity of treatment both as between those engaged upon a given work and as between persons employed in Connecticut work generally, for simplicity and convenience in remedial proceedings and for the preservation to Connecticut citizens of the benefits which it has seen fit to prescribe for the protection of Connecticut workmen."

A New York court has said that the provisions of the New Jersey statute apply only when the contract of hiring was made in that state. Pensabene v. F. & J. Auditore Co. (1913) 155 App. Div. 368, 140 N. Y. Supp. 266. The court held that a complaint in an action under the New Jersey statute, which fails to set up a hiring made in that state, will be dismissed on demurrer.

In a few cases the question has arisen whether or not the compensation act of one state will be enforced by the courts of another state.

There have been several decisions by lower New York courts that they do not have jurisdiction to enforce proceedings under the New Jersey act, since that act specifically provides the court in which the proceeding must be brought.

Thus, as the New Jersey act provides the forum for the settlement of disputes between the parties, namely, the court of common pleas of that state, the New York courts will not assume jurisdiction of a case arising under that statute. McCarthy v. Mc-

The supreme court of New York state does not have jurisdiction of a proceeding under § 18 of the New Jersey act, which provides that in case of a dispute or failure to agree upon a claim for compensation between the employer and employee, either party may submit the claim to the judge of the court of common pleas of such county as would have jurisdiction in a civil case, merely because the complaint alleges that personal service cannot be obtained upon the defendant, which is a corporation and has removed its place of business to the state of New York, in which state it was incorporated. Lehmann v. Ramo Films (1915) 92 Misc. 418, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1032.

Although there is no objection to the maintenance of an action in the courts of New York, based upon a foreign statute not contravening any public policy of New York, the New Jersey Compensation Act cannot be enforced by New York courts, since it, by its own terms, has provided an administrative remedy by prescribed procedure in New Jersey courts as a substitute for any cause of action that there might otherwise be. Verdicchio v. McNab & H. Mfg. Co. (1917) 178 App. Div. 48, 164 N. Y. Supp. 290.

But it has been said that the relation of employer and employee under the West Virginia act, being voluntary and noncompulsory, is contractual, the statute becoming an integral part of the contract, limiting the rights and liabilities of employer and employee, binding upon the parties, and enforceable in other jurisdictions, unless opposed to the public policy thereof, as all other foreign contracts are enforceable therein. Gooding v. Ott (1916) 77 W. Va. 487, L.R.A.1916D, 637, 87 S. E. 862.

And in Douthwright v. Champlin (1917) 91 Conn. 524, 100 Atl. 97, the court said that the only actions to secure compensation under a foreign statute which they could not enforce were those "where right and remedy are so united that the right cannot be enforced except in the manner and before the tribunal designated in the act."

In Bozo v. Central Coal & Coke Co. (1919) — Utah, —, 180 Pac. 432, the Utah supreme court said that a cause of action arising in Wyoming, under the Wyoming statute, is permitted to be instituted in the courts of Utah merely by reason of the comity existing between the several states.

In Anderson v. Miller Scrap Iron

Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 170 N. W. 275, the court said: "We do not consider in this case, because it is neither argued nor necessary to the decision, whether the Workmen's Compensation Law of this state should be enforced by the courts of Michigan, under the facts and circumstances in this case. Neither do we consider whether or not, were the facts and circumstances reversed, we should enforce a like law of a sister state." W. M. G.

MAGNOLIA BANK, Appt.,

v.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF PIKE COUNTY.

(111 Miss. 857, 72 So. 697.)

Tax — banking capital — discrimination against.

1. No unconstitutional violation of the provision for equal and uniform taxation, or of due process of law, or the equal protection of the laws is effected by taxing the capital of a bank at full value while other property is assessed at only a percentage of its value, where the Constitution expressly authorizes the taxing of banking capital according to the value thereof, and requires the valuation of corporate property at its true value.

— effect of Federal Constitution.

2. Each state has the sovereign right to classify property for taxation, and, so long as property of the same class bears the same rate, there is no violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing due process of law and equal protection of the laws.

[See 6 R. C. L. 426, 427.]

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike County sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a petition filed for the reduction of an assessment against it for taxation. Affirmed.

Statement by Stevens, J.:

Appellant presented its petition to the board of supervisors of Pike county, objecting to the assessment against it for taxation for the year 1915, and praying that its assessment be reduced from $76,000 to $43,636.66. The petition, in substance, avers that the capital stock of appellant, in the sum of $55,000, is assessed at par, and that this valuation is augmented or increased by the surplus and undivided profits, less real estate, in the amount of $21,000, making a total valuation of its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, $76,000, from which is deducted real estate valued at $10,545; that this assessment is excessive, and, if approved, will force appellant to pay taxes at a rate in excess of taxes paid by other "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens in the county of Pike, where said bank is located;" that the tax assessor of Pike county, in making the assessment, did "systematically and intentionally" assess the property of appellant at full market or par value of the shares, augmented by surplus and undivided profits, while assessing other property for taxes in said county at 66 cents on the dollar; that this method of assessing appellant at full value, and other taxable property at 66 cents on the dollar, is in violation of § 181 of the Constitution of Mississippi, and also is in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, in that it denies objector the equal protection of the law. The prayer of the petition is that the assessment of appellant's bank should be reduced to conform to other valuations placed upon real and personal property in Pike county. The board of supervisors overruled the objections and denied the relief sought; and appeal was prosecuted from the order of the board to the circuit court, in accordance with the provisions of § 81 of the Code. On the trial of the case anew in the circuit court, demurrer was interposed to the petition and sustained by the court. From the order sustaining the demurrer to and dismissing the petition, appellant has appealed to this court; and, in the presentation of the case, counsel for appellant invokes § 112 of our Constitution, as well as § 181 thereof, and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It is the contention of appellant that the method adopted by the taxing authorities of Pike county, as set forth in the petition, violates the equality and uniformity clause of our state Constitution, and denies appellant due process of law, in violation of the Federal Constitution.

Messrs. Mayes & Mayes, Moody & Williams, and L. Brame for appellant.

Mr. George H. Ethridge, Assistant Attorney General, for appellee.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded by appellant that the shares of its capital stock, augmented by surplus and undivided profits, are worth the amount at which the stock is assessed. It may be here observed, also, that the petition makes no complaint at the valuation of the bank's real estate, and no relief is sought against the assessment of its realty. The contention, briefly stated, is simply this: Appellant admits that its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits are worth $76,000. This is the true value, and the value upon which the Constitution and statutes of our state contemplate taxes shall be paid. The bank, while conceding that it is under the primary obligation to pay taxes upon this valuation, yet seeks a reduction of 34 per cent, because it says that real estate and taxable personal property owned by individual citizens of the county of Pike are being systematically assessed at 66 cents on the dollar, or, in other words, individual citizens, by and with the consent of the board, are paying on assessments much lower than the law requires and the government exacts. Does the petition of the bank, then, state a legal cause for complaint? Section 181 of our Constitution provides: "The property of all private corporations for pecuniary gain shall be taxed in the same way and to the same extent as the property of individuals, but the legislature may provide for the taxation of banks and banking capital, by taxing the shares according to the value thereof (augmented by the accumulations, surplus, and unpaid dividends), exclusive of real estate, which shall be taxed as other real estate."

Section 112 of our Constitution provides: "The legislature may provide for a special mode of valuation and assessment for railroads, and railroad and other corporate property. . . . But all such property shall be assessed at its true value," etc.

By these express provisions of the Constitution the legislature is authorized to place banks and banking capital in a class to themselves, and to adopt a method of assessment which the framers of our organic law thought equitable and just. In pursuance of this constitutional authority the legislature has enacted § 4273, Code 1906, requiring the president, cashier, or other officer to make out and deliver to the assessor a written statement under oath of the number and amount of all shares of the capital stock paid in; the amount of undivided profits, surplus, or accumulations of any sort, exclusive of real estate; the value of each share, estimated at par and increased by the surplus or accumulations; and stipulating that banks shall be assessed in conformity with the plan suggested and the authority expressly conferred by § 181 of the Constitution. We assume that appellant, in accordance with the statute, executed the written statement provided for, and upon this statement the assessor placed upon the assessment roll of Pike county a perfectly lawful assessment of appellant's bank.

Counsel frankly admit that, if the relief prayed for in this case is granted, appellant will not pay in accordance with the literal provisions of § 181 of the Constitution, but contend that § 112, providing that "taxation shall be uniform and equal throughout the state," and that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value," and the further provisions of § 181 that "the property of all private corporations for pecuniary gain shall be taxed in the same way and to the same extent as the property of individuals," justify and demand the relief sought. Some of the authorities cited by counsel from other states apparently justify their contention, but each case is largely controlled by the specific language of the Constitution of the state under which the case arises. The rights of appellant in the present case are, of course, measured and controlled by our own Constitution, and, looking to the express provisions of both §§ 112 and 181, the legislature is authorized to provide a special mode of assessment of banks and banking capital; and when appellant has been assessed in accordance with this method it has no complaint to register. There is no intimation of any discrimination as between banks or banking capital. All banks in Mississippi are assessed exactly alike, and all pay the same rate of taxation. They all do business in accordance with and are protected by the laws of our state. The method adopted for their assessment, as compared with the method of assessing individuals, is highly favorable to the banks. This provision, so favorable to banks, has already been alluded to by our court in Bank of Oxford v. Oxford, 70 Miss. 504, 12 So. 203, where Campbell, Ch. J., calls attention to the fact that the solvent credits of an individual are taxable assets, but that the assets of a bank invested in securities of various kinds are not taxable, and further observes: "Why this is so is not for judicial inquiry; but so the law is written, and has been in this state for about half a century, and it has been embodied in the Constitution of 1890, permissively, but suggestively to the legislature. § 181."

Although the individual money lender may be operating upon borrowed capital, he yet must pay on all money on deposit, loaned, or invested in solvent credits. Banks invest not only their capital stock, but money placed with them on deposit, whether subject to check immediately or placed on time certificates. There can be no contention, therefore, that banks, as a class, are discriminated against by the revenue laws of our state. The bold request is here made to give them a discount not authorized by the law, simply because the other taxpayers of Pike county are not measuring up to the requirements of the law. This, in our judgment, is not a sufficient ground for complaint. There are no positive averments of fraud in the petition, and we are not called upon to vitiate or condemn the entire assessment on the ground of fraud. We are not called upon to declare a statute invalid as being in violation of the Constitution. The assessment here in question is in strict accord with the Constitution, and to grant the relief prayed for would, in a sense, defeat, rather than accomplish, the provisions of § 181. We are mindful of the fact that our statutes apparently do not provide a specific method whereby one taxpayer can object to the assessment against another taxpayer, at least, to the extent of granting in such case an appeal from the order of the board of supervisors to the circuit court. It yet remains that it is the duty of each person, in fixing the value of his property, to estimate the same at its cash value, and the board is under the duty to increase or diminish the valuation as it may deem just and proper, and it is also the duty of the board to report any taxpayer who wilfully undervalues his property, to the grand jury of the next circuit court of the county, in accordance with the provisions of § 4268 of the present Code. The maladministration of the law by members of the board of supervisors in one of the eighty counties of our state should not have the far-reaching and destructive effect contended for in this case.

Counsel for appellant rely upon the case, among others, of Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903, but this very case well observes that "while it may be true that this system of submitting the different kinds of property subject to taxation to different boards of assessors and equalizers, with no common superior to secure uniformity of the whole, may give opportunity for maladministration of the law and violation of the principle of uniformity of taxation and equality of burden, that is not the necessary result of these laws, or of any one of them."

If the board of supervisors systematically assesses taxable property at much less than its true value, and appellant is accorded the right to have its assessment reduced to this unlawful minimum, then why should not all the banking establishments in all the other seventy-nine counties of the state have the constitutional right to a reduction of their assessment to conform to the assessment accorded appellant? If this method were pursued to its last analysis, we would have the ridiculous spectacle of the board of supervisors in one county forcing an arbitrary reduction of all the taxable property of the state far below that which the Constitution and laws demand.

But, it is contended that this court, in Adams v. Mississippi State Bank, 75 Miss. 701, 23 So. 395, and Adams v. Bank of Oxford, 78 Miss. 533, 29 So. 402, made a distinction between the provisions of § 112 of our present Constitution and the like provisions in the Constitution of 1869. We think the two cases last mentioned are materially different from the case at bar. In the first of these cases, the primary question at issue was the constitutionality of chapter 29, Acts 1894, declaring that no city or town shall impose or collect a greater tax on banks or solvent credits than the state tax for the same year. The court held this statute obnoxious to the equality and uniformity clause of our Constitution. The weakness of this statute was the effort to impose a smaller municipal tax on banks and solvent credits than other taxable property was required to pay. In Adams v. Bank of Oxford, supra, the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of 1890, prohibiting cities and towns from levying on banks or solvent credits a tax greater than 75 per centum of the state tax, was asked to be held in violation of the Constitution of 1869, following the first decision, Adams v. Mississippi State Bank, supra. The court declined to disturb its prior decisions, or to give the views expressed in the first case a retroactive effect. It must be observed that each of these statutes attempted to apply a different rate of municipal taxation on banks and solvent credits than that which was being applied generally upon all other taxable property within the confines of municipalities. That is not the case now before us.

The case of Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350, is cited with much confidence as authority for appellant. The case was decided by the circuit court of appeals, then composed of Judges Taft, Lurton, and Severens; and the opinion of these eminent jurists is, of course, high authority. That case, however, arose under the Constitution of Tennessee (Const. art. 2, § 28), which has the express provision that "all property shall be taxed according to its value, that value to be ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct, so that taxes shall be equal and uniform throughout the state. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of the same value."

The action in that case was against the board of equalization of Tennessee, and the showing was made that the railroad property of the state was assessed at its real value, while all other taxable property of the state was being systematically assessed at not exceeding 75 per cent of its true value. In other words, this suit involved state-wide action by the board of equalization, and even then the opinion of the court admitted that "the court is placed in a dilemma, from which it can only escape by taking that path which, while it involves a nominal departure from the letter of the law, does injury to no one, and secures that uniformity of tax burden which was the sole end of the Constitution."

The Tennessee Constitution did not place railroads in a class to themselves, but forbids discrimination as between species of property. The dilemma that confronted the court in that case would be insignificant compared with the dilemma into which all the revenue laws of our state would be plunged should we grant the relief asked for in the instant case. Our state tax is uniform throughout the confines of our commonwealth, and the ultimate amount of the tax to be paid by a particular bank or individual will, of course, depend upon the assessment. If Pike county unlawfully and arbitrarily establishes a low-value assessment on certain species of property, and appellant, as a resident bank, is thereby accorded the right to cut its assessment to the unlawful minimum, then all the other banks in Mississippi should, in equity, be accorded the same right; and such a holding would result in putting it within the power of the board of supervisors of one county to establish an arbitrary minimum and unlawful standard of values or criterion by which all the other counties must be governed. Furthermore, if this equitable view of our Constitution should be strictly applied, why should not the bank in this case have a right to complain that much valuable property has escaped taxation altogether? As a matter of fact there are many successful "tax dodgers" in our state, who ought to be bearing their part of the burdens of taxation. After all, we must get back to the admitted fact that the law itself does not authorize unequal taxation, and that in the enforcement of the revenue laws exact equality cannot, in all cases, be attained.

There is no merit in the contention that a denial of the relief sought would in any wise violate the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, guaranteeing due process of law and equal protection of the laws. Each state has the sovereign right to classify property for purposes of assessment and taxation, and so long as property of the same class bears the same rate, or, to <sup>—effect of</sup> state differently, so <sup>Federal</sup> long as there is no <sup>Constitution.</sup> discrimination between property of the same class, there is no violation of these provisions of our Federal Constitution. Michigan C. R. Co. v.

By paying the full tax for which appellant is assessed in this case, it will pay only what the supreme law of the land has exacted. It will simply be rendering "unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

I. In general.

This note does not include cases turning upon the constitutionality of statutes attempting to discriminate against corporate property in assessments. That class of cases involves the power of the legislature to classify property for the purposes of taxation. The note deals exhaustively only with cases in which it appears that there are two perfectly consistent provisions, either constitutional or statutory, the one providing for uniformity of taxation, and the other requiring that all property shall be assessed at its full value. Where either or both provisions are lacking, a case is not good authority upon the question here discussed. Provisions requiring taxation of all property at full value were, undoubtedly, adopted or enacted for the purpose of breaking up, or at least changing, what was once an almost universal custom—the custom of assessing all property at a fixed percentage of what the assessing officials judged to be its full value. Taxing officials have, in numerous instances, persisted in following the custom, even after the adoption of a provision, or the enactment of a statute, requiring full-value assessments of all property. In some instances, they have followed the old custom, in spite of the provision, in assessing property generally, but have assessed some species of corporate property at its full value. This is an obvious violation of the principle of uniformity in taxation;

but, when the injured party has appealed to the courts or asked the interference of equity, the provision requiring full-value assessment has been invoked. The court is thus placed "in a dilemma" spoken of in Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350, infra, and quoted by the court in the reported case (MAGNOLIA BANK v. PIKE COUNTY, ante, 1365). The "escape" from this dilemma is the dominant theme of the note.

The court has, in practically all of the cases in which the issue was squarely presented, escaped from the dilemma in the same way that it escaped in the Taylor Case, "by taking that path which, while it involves a nominal departure from the letter of the law, does injury to no one, and secures that uniformity of tax burden which was the sole end of the Constitution." In other words, they have given relief to the injured party, in some form, according to the nature of the proceeding and the power of the court therein. But it should be noted here that it requires a high standard of proof of a clean-cut, narrow issue to place the court in the dilemma. In several cases cited herein, the principle here stated is fully approved, but the relief denied, for the reason that proof was lacking. This is not surprising in view of the fact that a general custom of undervaluation must be proved, or, as some courts say, the undervaluations must be shown to be systematic and intentional. This must be the rule, since courts will not interfere if the assessing officers have attempted to assess all property at full value, no matter how much or how general the undervaluations. Interference under such circumstances would be merely disturbing assessments for errors of judgment. And the burden of showing a systematic, intentional undervaluation of other classes or species of property is, of course, upon the complainant.

The court in the reported case (MAGNOLIA BANK v. PIKE COUNTY) distinguishes that case from the Taylor Case by the fact that in the latter there was a clause in the state Constitution, prohibiting discrimination between different species of property. Such argument would seem to be more appropriate to legislative classifications of property for taxing purposes. The argument that the valuations of bank stock for the whole state would be disturbed, if the court should interfere, by valuations in one county, would, however, appear to be a sound basis for the refusal of relief.

In many cases it has been either directly or indirectly held that, under a provision requiring uniformity of taxation, a corporation whose property has been assessed at its full value, according to a provision requiring full-value assessment of all property, is entitled to relief in some form, upon proof by it that other property has been intentionally and systematically assessed at less than 100 per cent of its full value:

II. In equity courts.

Where the assessing officers or boards of equalization adopt the policy of assessing property, generally, at a certain per cent of its actual value, in the face of a statute or constitutional provision requiring the assessment of all property at its full value, and at the same time apply to some species of corporate property the rule or policy of assessing it at its full value, equity will grant relief to the owners of the corporate property on the ground that maladministration is resulting in injustice and in an infringement of the constitutional provision that taxation must be uniform. Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350; Southern R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission (1900) 104 Fed. 700; State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1901) 165 Mo. 502, 65 S. W. 775, affirmed in (1903) 190 U. S. 412, 47 L. ed. 1116, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730 (relief refused on other grounds; see same case, infra); First Nat. Bank v. Christensen (1911) 39 Utah, 568, 118 Pac. 778 (relief denied for failure of evidence).

In State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1901) 165 Mo. 502, 65 S. W. 775, affirmed in (1903) 190 U. S. 412, 47 L. ed. 1116, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, supra, the court, while holding that the decision must be against the corporation, since the action was at law, and only an equity proceeding could avail the corporation, also held that the evidence of systematic undervaluation of other property was not sufficient, even though the proceeding had been a proper one in equity. Although relief was denied, the decision quite strongly supports the general rule above stated. The court said: "The defendant contends that it has been discriminated against, contrary to the provisions of § 4 of article 10 of the Constitution of Missouri, and of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in this: that the Constitution of Missouri relied on provided that 'all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value,' and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibits any state to deny any person in its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, and that the state board of equalization has assessed defendant's property at its full value, while the local assess-sors throughout the state have only assessed the property of other persons at from 35 to 40 per cent of its value. In support of its contention the defendant cites a great number of cases, among them Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (1880) 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor (1898) 86 Fed. 168, appeal dismissed in (1899) 44 L. ed. (U. S.) 1219, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1022; German Nat. Bank v. Kimball (1881) 103 U. S. 732, 26 L. ed. 469; Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank (1880) 101 U. S. 143, 25 L. ed. 901; Balfour v. Portland (1886) 28 Fed. 738; Cincinnati Southern R. Co. v. Guenther (1884) 19 Fed. 395; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Republic County (1895) 14 C. C. A. 456, 32 U. S. App. 224, 67 Fed. 411; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Atchison County (1895) 54 Kan. 781, 39 Pac. 1039; Stanley v. Albany County (1887) 121 U. S. 535, 30 L. ed. 1000, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1234. The principle here contended for is tersely expressed by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of German Nat. Bank v. Kimball (1881) 103 U. S. 732, 26 L. ed. 469, as follows: 'It is held in these opinions that when the inequality of valuation is the result of a statute of the state, designed to discriminate injuriously against any class of persons or any species of property, a court of equity will give appropriate relief; and also where, though the law itself is unobjectionable, the officers who are appointed to make assessments combine together, and establish a rule or principle of valuation, the necessary result of which is to tax one species of property higher than others, and higher than the average rate, the court will also give relief. But the bill before us alleges no such agreement or common action of assessors, and no general rule or discriminating rate adopted by a single assessor, but relies on numerous instances of partial and unequal valuations, which establish no rule on the subject.' The defendant has not brought itself within the rule announced in those cases, for it has shown no combination among assessors, and no course of conduct among them to discriminate against the defendant or other telegraph companies and other property owned by citizens generally. It has only shown by the testimony of one member of the state board of equalization that, in his judgment, the valuation put upon property, generally, is only 35 or 40 per cent of its true value. The law contemplates that for purposes of taxation property shall be assessed at its true value in money (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 9180); and it also presumes that all officers do their duty (Agan v. Shannon (1890) 103 Mo. 661, 15 S. W. 757; State ex rel. Gracy v. Bank of Neosho (1894) 120 Mo. 161, 25 S. W. 372; Mathias v. O'Neill (1887) 94 Mo. 520, 6 S. W. 253). The evidence adduced is not sufficient to overthrow this presumption, nor to establish a combination or unlawful course of conduct. It is only enough to show what the witness believed to be the value of the property, but not enough to convict the local assessors of intentional or systematic violation of duty."

In Railroad & Teleph. Cos. v. Board of Equalizers (1897) 85 Fed. 302, supra, the holding that equity will interfere on the ground that the assessment violates both the uniform tax clause of the state Constitution and the equal protection clause of the United States Constitution is based upon the finding that there is no provision that property must be assessed at its full value; nevertheless, Judge Clark, in arguing the point, says: "Conceding, for the purpose of testing the soundness of this proposition, that the constitutional term, 'according to its value,' means the same thing as 'at its full value,' the contention of the state then, stated with reference to its effect, is this: That it may assess the property of A at its full value, in obedience to the Constitution, and the property of D at one half of its value, in violation of the Constitution, and, when A complains that the result has been to violate the Constitution in respect to the equality provision, the answer is that the objection is not open to A, because he is taxed on no more than the full value of his own property, and that he must pay 50 per cent more on the same actual value than D. Now, it will certainly be admitted that the simple statement of such a proposition suggests its utter untenableness. If decisions may be found which apparently uphold a result such as this, they promulgate a doctrine which cannot be accepted as 'good law.' Another decision by the same judge (Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor (1898) 86 Fed. 168, appeal dismissed in (1899) 44 L. ed. (U. S.) 1219, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1022) proceeds upon a similar basis, and the holdings are very materially strengthened by the decision in Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350, where the same conclusion is reached, the assessment having been made in the face of a statute requiring all property to be assessed at its full value. It should be noted here that the court, in the reported case (MAGNOLIA BANK v. PIKE COUNTY, ante, 1365), distinguishes these cases on the facts from the one it was deciding, because of a different wording in the state Constitution, which, in the Federal cases, practically prohibits even a legislative classification of property such as would permit the assessment discussed.

In Southern R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission (1900) 104 Fed. 700, supra, the court, in giving instruction to the standing master, adopted this same view of the matter, when it said: "The Constitution of the state of North Carolina, and the acts of assembly passed under the authority thereof, require all real and personal property in the state to be assessed for taxation at its actual value in money. The Corporation Commission, which is intrusted with the assessment of railroad property for taxation, assessed the property of the several complainants at a certain sum each. The complainants thereupon come into this court, alleging that the method adopted with regard to them differs materially from the method adopted with regard to all other real and personal property in the state, so that they are exposed to unjust discrimination. On that allegation they ask an injunction. On the truth of that allegation depends the action of this court. It cannot assess the value of property, nor perform any of the functions of the assessor. It cannot pass upon the assessment, and say whether or not it be excessive, whether it be illegal, irregularly imposed, or unjust. State R. Tax Cases (1876) 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 669. There must be some ground for the interference of a court of equity. And its interference cannot go to the reassessment of the property, but to the removal of the unlawful action. In the present case we must assume that the Commission did its duty and fulfilled the constitutional and statutory requirement in assessing the railroad property. The amount of the assessment this court cannot question. The sole question is, Does there exist in North Carolina a rule or practice universal enough to presume the existence of a rule whereby all real and personal property other than railroad property is assessed below its value for taxation? The burden of showing this is on complainants. Until this burden is removed, the inquiry must be directed to it. If it be removed, then it may possibly be competent for the defendants to show that, if such a rule or practice does exist, it is applied also to the railroad companies, and as to them there is no discrimination. The standing master will conduct the examination in accordance with these rulings."

And in Michigan R. Tax Cases (1905) 138 Fed. 223, affirmed in (1906) 201 U. S. 245, 50 L. ed. 744, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, the suit was dismissed on complainant's failure "to show a fraudulent, intentional, systematic undervaluation of property," assessed under a statute other than the one under which complainant's railroad properties were assessed. The court explained that the undervaluation required to justify interference must be systematic and intentional to that extent that, in effect, amounts to fraud. The case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coulter (1903) 131 Fed. 282, directly supports the proposition stated supra; but the case was reversed in (1905) 196 U. S. 599, 49 L. ed. 615, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, on the ground that a case of habitual and systematic undervaluation was not proved by the evidence.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Christensen (1911) 39 Utah, 568, 118 Pac. 778, the court, while holding the evidence insufficient to show that the assessed value of plaintiff's property—national bank stock—was proportionally higher than the assessed value of other bank stock and other "moneyed capital," within the meaning of the statute providing for uniformity and equality of tax rates and valuations, said: "Though the Constitution and the statute require the taxing officers to assess all taxable property at 'its full cash value,' yet, should taxing officers of a county assess real estate, live stock, merchandise, and chattels at 50 to 70 per cent of their actual or cash value, and moneys or shares of stock in manufacturing or industrial enterprises or investments, at their actual or cash value, the assessment would not be equal or uniform. In such case, those whose property was intentionally assessed at a higher percentage or valuation than was placed on the general mass of taxable property in the county may invoke the aid of courts to compel the taxing officers to reduce the excessive assessment so made, to the same proportion of value as was placed upon the general mass of other taxable property in the county. A denial of such right results in inequality and a want of uniformity in the assessment and taxation. Lively v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1909) 102 Tex. 545, 120 S. W. 852; Raymond v. Chicago Union Traction Co. (1907) 207 U. S. 20, 52 L. ed. 78, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7, 12 Ann. Cas. 757; Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 364; 37 Cyc. 737. If, therefore, plaintiff's shares of stock were assessed at a value greater in proportion to that placed upon the general mass of taxable property in the county, it is entitled to have that value reduced to the proportion placed on such mass of taxable property. But on the evidence adduced we cannot say such was the case."

III. On appeal from assessment.

Courts will, on an appeal from the assessment, grant relief to a corporation whose real property has been assessed at its full value, upon proof that all the real estate in the county has been systematically assessed at a percentage of its full value, by reducing the assessment to such per cent of its full value as will make the assessments uniform, even though a statute requires that all property be assessed at its full value. Ex parte Ft. Smith & V. B. Bridge Co. (1896) 62 Ark. 461, 36 S. W. 1060; Bureau County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1867) 44 Ill. 229; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Boone County (1867) 44 Ill. 240; Newport Min. Co. v. Ironwood (1915) 185 Mich. 668, 152 N. W. 1088 (relief denied for lack of proof); People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Woodbury (1910) 74 Misc. 130, 133 N. Y. Supp. 135, order affirmed in (1911) 145 App. Div. 900, 129 N. Y. Supp. 1141; People ex rel. New York, O. & W. R. Co. v. Shaw (1911) 143 App. Div. 811, 128 N. Y. Supp. 177, affirmed in (1911) 202 N. Y. 556, 95 N. E. 1137; Com. v. Shamokin, S. & L. R. Co. (1900) 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 168; Com. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1900) 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 172; Com. v. Jamestown & F. R. Co. (1900) 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 214; Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. (1900) 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 220.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Boone County (1867) 44 Ill. 240, supra, the court said: "It cannot be that one portion of the taxpayers in a county, owning taxable property, shall be required to pay more taxes in proportion to its value, no matter how that may be ascertained, than another portion in the same county. If the assessors, regardless of the strict injunction of the law, shall place a value upon property far below its real cash value, and such a practice goes on unchallenged, and is recognized by the authorities having special charge of the revenue of the state, that misconduct must also contain within itself the great and cardinal principle of uniformity. No warrant is given, if the law is not strictly observed in the case of individuals, and their property is not assessed at its actual value, that the property of a corporation situate in the same county shall be assessed at greater proportional value than that of individuals, even though the enhanced assessment is not on the actual cash value of the property of such corporation. The same rule which is applied to individuals, justice and the Constitution demand shall be applied to corporations. To demand of appellants that they should schedule their property at its cash value, while individuals may schedule their property at one third, or less, of such value, would be to demand of the former three times the amount of taxes demanded of the latter."

The principle stated above is quite clearly enunciated by the court in Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Manchester (1899) 70 N. H. 200, 46 Atl. 470, although the statement does not have reference to corporate property as such, and the holding is such that it does not fall clearly within the scope of the note. The court said: "It is, in fact, conceded by the plaintiffs 'that the constitutional rule of equality requires a proportional and equal valuation of the different kinds of taxable property.' It is also true, as claimed in the plaintiffs' brief, that 'it is elementary that the law requires all property to be appraised at its true value. Yet if A's estate is appraised at that value, and all other property in the town of X at 50 per cent of that value, A is entitled to a reduction of his valuation from the legal to the illegal rate.' The reason is that in no other convenient way can A's tax on the property owned by him be made proportional to that paid by his neighbors; for the remedy of a reassessment of the whole tax upon all taxable property in the town, upon a legal appraisal at its true value, would be inconvenient and impossible of execution."

And in People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Woodbury (1910) 74 Misc. 130, 133 N. Y. Supp. 135, order affirmed in (1911) 145 App. Div. 900, 129 N. Y. Supp. 1141, it was held that a city must assess special franchises at 76 per cent of their actual values, if it assesses the real estate in the city at that rate. The court said: "I think there should be a reduction in all assessments in Buffalo of 24 per centum of the amount thereof, to equalize them with the assessments of the other real property on the local rolls. It appears by the equalization tables made by the state board of equalization that other real estate in the tax district—that is, in the city of Buffalo—is assessed at only 76 per centum of its full value. The defendants urge that the local assessors are required by law to assess all real estate at its full value, and that they have appended to their rolls their affidavits, as required by law, that they have done so in this instance. But it is well known that in many localities, if not in most, these affidavits are made by the assessors as a matter of form, because required by law, rather than as a matter of conscience, and when the state board of equalization, after investigation, has, in the discharge of its duty, made its tables showing that real estate in Buffalo has, notwithstanding the formal oaths of the assessors to the contrary, been assessed at only 76 per centum of its value, such tables should not be ignored in a matter of this kind; and the deduction stated should be made for the purpose of equalization." And the same rule was applied in People ex rel. Rochester Teleph. Co. v. State Tax Comrs. (1912) 134 N. Y. Supp. 987.

The court in People ex rel. New York, O. & W. R. Co. v. Shaw (1911) 143 App. Div. 811, 128 N. Y. Supp. 177, affirmed in (1911) 202 N. Y. 556, 95 N. E. 1137, after adopting a rule for the valuation of railroad property, and computing the value of a particular property thereunder, deducted from the value so fixed 45.26 per cent,—other property being assessed at 54.74 per cent of its actual value,—and thus obtained its value for assessment purposes. While it does not appear in this case that the undervaluation was illegal, that fact does appear in the preceding case from the same state.

In Co. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R.

Co. (1900) 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. (Pa.) 172, Simonton, P. J., said: "We are aware that it was said in the case above cited (Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. (1898) 188 Pa. 169, 41 Atl. 594) that, 'the actual value being a pure question of fact, appellant has no standing to complain of discrimination in methods so long as its capital stock is not assessed in excess of that value. It may be that the Reading and some other corporations are taxed on less than the actual value of their capital stock; if so, the commonwealth is not here appealing, and, consequently, it is not our business to inquire into the matter.' We submit, with all deference, that this leaves out of view the mandate of the Constitution that 'taxes shall be uniform,' and that, if adopted as a principle, corporations that are taxed out of proportion to others of the same kind would be without remedy. The commonwealth cannot appeal from a settlement for taxes, and, therefore, if for any reason the methods adopted by the accounting officers lead to a want of uniformity, or tend to discriminate between corporations alike taxable, those discriminated against would be helpless. The constitutional provision that 'taxes shall be uniform' surely means more than that the Taxing Acts shall provide for uniformity." And it may be observed that this case, as well as the other Dauphin county cases cited above, were decided on this rule, notwithstanding the statement of a contrary idea by the highest court of the same state. It would seem, however, that the statement quoted was dictum, as it seems unlikely that the point was raised in the lower court, or proof of undervaluation presented to the court that made the statement. Apparently Judge Simonton tried the former case, and his decision was affirmed on appeal.

In Newport Min. Co. v. Ironwood (1915) 185 Mich. 668, 152 N. W. 1088, supra, it appeared to be conceded that, if mining property had been assessed at a higher rate than nonmining property, the tax levy would be void, but it was held that there was nothing "in the record which clearly justifies the finding that mining property was assessed relatively higher than other property in the same city." Ostrander, J., in writing the opinion for the court, said: "I am impressed that sufficient appears to show that the burden placed upon mining property, including that of plaintiff, when compared with nonmining property, was excessive, that no sufficient data appears for determining what would be a relatively equal burden, and that the whole tax ought to be held fraudulent and void. A majority of the justices are, however, not convinced that this fact is made to appear in the particular case. In support of an opposed conclusion, it is said that it cannot be assumed for the purposes of this case that the nonmining property in the county in 1912 was substantially the same in value as the nonmining property there in 1911, and that in any event we are not required in this case to consider the valuation in the entire county. The record discloses no specific data for the conclusion that nonmining property in the city of Ironwood was not assessed in 1911 as high, relatively, as was the mining property. It has been pointed out that Mr. Finlay gave it as his opinion that the mining property in the city was worth $35,170,000. The board valued it at $23,283,000. Assuming that the valuation fixed by the board was the fair cash value, how can it be determined that other property in the city was not relatively assessed at its cash value? The board reported to the state board of equalization that real estate, as a whole, was assessed in the county at 22.7 per cent of its actual value. But it does not follow that in Ironwood, in which the plaintiff's mine and others were situated, real estate, other than mining, was assessed at only 22.7 per cent of its value. Mining property in the city was assessed at only 10 per cent of its value, as finally determined by the board. There can be no doubt about the rule relied upon by plaintiff. It has been repeatedly announced and applied by this court. While exact equality in taxation can never be achieved, intentional inequality of assessment invalidates the tax. Merrill v. Humphrey (1871) 24 Mich. 170; Auditor General v. Hughitt (1903) 132 Mich. 311, 93 N. W. 621; Solomon v. Oscoda Twp. (1889) 77 Mich. 365, 43 N. W. 990; Auditor General v. Pioneer Iron Co. (1900) 123 Mich. 521, 82 N. W. 260. It is as well settled that fraud in the assessment must be made out. The things supposed by plaintiff to be tangible evidence of the fact that the valuation of one class of property in the city was raised, and that the valuation of another, or of other classes, known to be undervalued, was not raised, are: First, the general impression concerning the general undervaluation of all property; second, the increase in assessed valuation of other property in the city in 1912; third, the report of the board to the state board of equalization, which is treated as an admission of its information upon the subject. The reply is that no one can point to anything in the record which clearly justifies a finding that mining property was assessed relatively higher than other property in the city in 1911."

IV. As a Federal question.

Where the assessing officers on boards of equalization adopt the policy of assessing the stock of national banks at full market value, and at the same time systematically fix, for taxation purposes, the value of "other moneyed capital" at a percentage of its full value, the Federal courts have jurisdiction to interfere, on the ground that such a system "is subversive of the act of Congress allowing such shares to be taxed, and intended to protect the owners thereof from greater burdens than were imposed on other moneyed capital" at the place where the bank is located; so, where the bank has paid the tax justly assessable, the court will enjoin the collection of the unpaid balance. Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank (1880) 101 U. S. 144, 25 L. ed. 901; Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (1880) 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903.

In Cummings v. Merchants' Nat.

Bank (U. S.) supra, where one board had fixed the value of all real estate, for taxing purposes, at one third of its value, another board had fixed the taxing value of money and invested capital at  $\frac{1}{4}$  of its actual value, and another had fixed the assessment valuation of all bank stock at its full market value, it being the duty of another board to fix the assessment value of all railroad property, each of the four boards operating independently of the others, the court, after holding that the statute of Ohio expressly authorizes the interference of equity, said: "Independently of this statute, however, we are of the opinion that when a rule or system of valuation is adopted by those whose duty it is to make the assessment, which is designed to operate unequally and to violate a fundamental principle of the Constitution, and when this rule is applied not solely to one individual, but to a large class of individuals or corporations, that equity may properly interfere to restrain the operation of this unconstitutional exercise of power. That is precisely the case made by this bill, and, if supported by the testimony, relief ought to be given." Then, after discussing the probable reason why many boards persist in assessing real property at a percentage of its full value, in the face of a statute requiring its assessment at full value, the court further said: "But, whatever may be its cause, when it is recognized as the source of manifest injustice to a large class of property, around which the Constitution of the state has thrown the protection of uniformity of taxation and equality of burden, the rule must be held void, and the injustice produced under it must be remedied so far as the judicial power can give remedy. The complainant having paid to defendant, or into the circuit court for his use, the tax which was its true share of the public burden, the decree of the circuit court enjoining the collection of the remainder is affirmed."

And under the same circumstances the Federal courts have jurisdiction to interfere upon the ground that the procedure is in violation of the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution: Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Missouri (1903) 190 U. S. 412, 47 L. ed. 1116, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730 (relief denied on other grounds; see same case, infra); Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1898) 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350; Railroad & Teleph. Cos. v. Board of Equalizers (1897) 85 Fed. 302; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor (1898) 86 Fed. 168, appeal dismissed in (1899) 44 L. ed. (U. S.) 1219, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1022; Southern R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission (1900) 104 Fed. 700; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coulter (1903) 131 Fed. 282, reversed for lack of proof in (1905) 196 U. S. 599, 49 L. ed. 615, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Missouri (U. S.) supra, the court affirmed a decision of the supreme court of Missouri, denying relief to the corporation on the ground that the proceeding was an action at law, the corporation being the defendant in an action to collect the taxes. The state court (see State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1901) 165 Mo. 502, 65 S. W. 775, cited supra) had also based its decision upon lack of proper proof of undervaluation of the other property in a systematic way, but that point is not mentioned by the Federal court.

In New York v. Barker (1900) 179 U. S. 279, 45 L. ed. 190, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, affirming (1899) 158 N. Y. 709, 53 N. E. 1130, counsel endeavored to raise the question of whether or not the assessing of corporate real estate at full value, while real property belonging to individuals is assessed at less than full value, is a denial to corporations of the equal protection of the laws; but the court refused to decide the question, for the reason that there was a failure to allege and prove any general custom to undervalue the property belonging to individuals. The court said: "In this record there is no averment and no proof of any violation of law by the assessors of New York. There is no allegation in the petition for the writ of certiorari that there has been any undervaluation of real estate, either with regard to individuals or corporations; but, on the contrary, it is therein asserted that the assessed valuation of the real estate of the company was its actual value, and that it had been overvalued in the valuation of the capital of the company. The mere fact that the law gives the assessors, in the case of corporations, two chances to arrive at a correct valuation of their real estate, when they have but one in the case of individuals, cannot be held to be a denial to the corporations of the equal protection of the laws, so long as the real estate of the individual is, in fact, generally assessed at its full value. But we are nevertheless asked by the argument at bar, in the absence of allegations or proof of habitual, or indeed of any, undervaluation, to assume or take judicial notice of its existence, notwithstanding such undervaluation would constitute a clear violation of the law of the state."

WALTER M. B. HARTLEY, Respt.,

v.

EAGLE INSURANCE COMPANY of London, England, Appt.

New York Court of Appeals—January 8, 1918.

(222 N. Y. 178, 118 N. E. 622.)

Usury — lump sum — uncertain term — possibility of exceeding legal interest.

1. An agreement to pay an amount which may be more or less than the legal interest for the use of money, depending upon a reasonable contingency, is not ipso facto usurious because of the possibility that more than the legal rate will be paid.

Appeal — question open.

2. Under the New York Constitution, upon unanimous affirmance by the appellate division of the supreme court of a verdict, the only question open in the court of appeals on the facts is whether or not they support the conclusions of law if no reversible error in the admission or exclusion of evidence is claimed.

[See 2 R. C. L. 180.]

— question of law.

3. The question whether or not the facts found support the conclusions of law is one of law, in deciding which the appellate court is not limited to the grounds urged or adopted in the courts below.

[See 2 R. C. L. 189.]

Usury — assignment of interest in remainder.

4. An assignment of an interest in a remainder will not be upheld in any case if the purpose is to evade the statutes against usury, no matter what form the transaction may take.

[See 23 R. C. L. 572.]

Appeal — finding of fact.

5. A finding that an arrangement by which an amount advanced to a remainderman, upon assignment of a much larger amount to be paid upon termination of the life estate, was a loan with undertaking to pay the full amount with maximum interest, and was usurious and void, is not a finding of fact which is binding on the appellate court where it was denominated a conclusion of law by the trial court.

[See 2 R. C. L. 202.]

Evidence — mortality tables.

6. Tables of mortality are, at best, only slight evidence of the expectancy of life of any particular person, to be considered in connection with proof of his health, constitution, habits, and mode of living.

Usury — lump sum — mortality tables.

7. An agreement for payment of interest in a lump sum, calculated at the legal rate for expectancy of life according to mortality tables of one afflicted with an incurable disease, is usurious.

8. An agreement to pay interest in a lump sum for a period measured by the probable duration of a life is not necessarily usurious because it may slightly exceed the legal rate for the period indicated for such life by mortality tables.

9. The mere fact that $18,400 was assigned, to take effect at the expiration of a life having an expectancy of about nine years under mortality tables, to secure a present loan of $9,500, does not conclusively show usury, although more than the legal rate would be paid if the indicated expectancy was not exceeded.

Appeal — absence of finding — effect.

10. A judgment setting aside a transaction for usury cannot be allowed to stand if no finding of usury has been made.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term, Part VIII., for New York County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside as void for usury, a contract between plaintiff and defendant, and the instruments executed in connection therewith. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Where a contract of loan leaves the rate of interest to be determined by hazard, so that the lender may ultimately receive either more or less than legal interest, as the chance turns out, and the speculation is a real and not a colorable one, the transaction is not within the Usury Statute.

Ferris, 14 Daly, 302; Trask v. Hazazer, 4 N. Y. Supp. 635; De Moltke-Huitfeldt v. Garner & Co. 145 App. Div. 766, 130 N. Y. Supp. 558; Lord v. Cronin, 9 App. Div. 9, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1097; Hagaman v. Reinach, 48 Misc. 206, 96 N. Y. Supp. 719; Home Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 33 Hun, 415; Jestons v. Brooke, Cowp. pt. 2, p. 793, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1365; Tate v. Wellings, 3 T. R. 531, 100 Eng. Reprint, 716; Potter v. Yale College, 8 Conn. 52; Truby v. Mosgrove, 118 Pa. 89, 4 Am. St. Rep. 575, 11 Atl. 806; Wright v. McAlexander, 11 Ala. 236; Rapier v. The contingency that the defendant would not receive its money back with legal interest was real, and not colorable. There was a high probability that the life tenant would survive until the sum paid by the defendant, with interest at 6 per cent, would exceed the amount which the defendant was to receive out of the estate.

Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711; Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436, 441, 38 L. ed. 224, 226, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; Jackson v. Edwards, 7 Paige, 386; Eastabrook v. Eq. 513; Williams's Case, 3 Bland, Ch. 186.

Messrs. Fowler & Lesser, for respondent:

It is not necessary to show an actual vicious and corrupt intent to charge more than the legal rate of interest in order to establish usury. It is sufficient if the intent to take more interest than the statute allows is evident and that such is the result which the transaction accomplishes.

Rapelye v. Anderson, 4 Hill, 472; Fielder v. Darrin, 50 N. Y. 437.

The evidence clearly establishes the existence of gross usury on defendant's part.

McLaughlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1901 the plaintiff became vested with an equal undivided one-fourth interest in remainder, amounting to at least $43,750, in the estate of his grandfather, subject, however, to the life interest therein of his grandmother. In July, 1905, in consideration of a loan of $9,500, he assigned to the defendant, through a third party, the sum of $18,400, payable from his share of the estate, with interest at 6 per cent from the death of his grandmother, the event upon which the principal sum became payable. He also executed a mortgage upon certain real property belonging to the estate as further security for the payment of the amount assigned. At the time the loan was made, plaintiff's grandmother was sixty-nine years old, and upon her death defendant would have been entitled, under the assignments, to receive $18,400 from plaintiff's share of the estate, or $8,900 more than the amount which it had loaned to him. This action was brought to have the transaction declared usurious and void and to direct the cancellation of the assignments and mortgages. Plaintiff had a judgment for the relief demanded, which was unanimously affirmed by the appellate division, and defendant appeals to this court.

The facts involved in the subject-matter of the litigation are quite similar to those considered by the court in Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. 151 App. Div. 815, 136 N. Y. Supp. 774, affirmed in 211 N. Y. 507, 105 N. E. 1085. The defendant, apparently relying upon that authority at the trial, claimed that the assignments and mortgage were in effect, and should be adjudged to be, collateral security for the repayment of the amount loaned, with interest, as was there done. In the Hall Case, however, the life estate had terminated less than two years after the loan was made, and the plaintiff had tendered to the defendant prior to the commencement of the action, the amount loaned, with legal interest. This tender was pleaded in the complaint, which alleged that the instruments had been executed and were intended merely as collateral security, and judgment was demanded in the alternative, either that they be adjudged to be held by defendant as collateral security only, or that they be declared usurious and void. At the trial the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the instruments were actually intended by the parties only as collateral security; but the trial court held there had been a valid purchase and sale of an expectant interest, and dismissed the complaint. On appeal, however, the appellate division reversed the trial court, and directed the entry of a judgment in accordance with the opinion of the court. Both parties appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed.

In the present case the issue raised by the pleadings was whether the transaction was usurious. This was the only issue, and there is an express finding of fact that it was not the intention or desire of the parties that the assignments and mortgage should merely secure the repayment of the amount loaned, with interest. There is, therefore, no ground for claiming, so far as this appeal is concerned, that the judgment should have followed the determination in the Hall Case. It is proper to state that such claim is not now made, but the defendant insists that the facts found do not establish usury, nor entitle plaintiff to the relief granted. As the judgment of affirmance was unanimous, and no reversible errors in the admission or exclusion of evidence are claimed, the appeal presents only one question, and that is whether the facts found support the conclusions of law. Niagara Falls v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 168 N. Y. 610, 61 N. E. 185, and cases cited. That question is one of law, and in deciding it the court is not limited to the grounds urged or adopted in the courts below. Hirsch v. New England Nav. Co. 200 N. Y. 263, 93 N. E. 524; Abbott v. Easton, 195 N. Y. 372, 88 N. E. 572.

There certainly was no specific agreement for the payment of usurious interest, since the defendant was to receive a lump sum in repayment of the loan, and whether the amount received would be greater or less than the amount loaned, with legal interest, depended, obviously, upon the length of time that the plaintiff's grandmother lived. But since an amount in excess of the loan was to be repaid in any event, we are confronted at the outset of the discussion with the question whether, where the rate of interest depends upon a contingency which may render it in excess of the legal rate, the agreement was usurious. It may be conceded that the English cases on the subject necessitate an affirmative answer to the question. The rule, as stated in the leading case of Roberts v. Tre- mayne, supra, has frequently been cited, the rule has quite generally been modified to the extent of holding that if the casualty goes to the entire interest, an agreement to pay interest in excess of the legal rate, depending upon a reasonable contingency which may result in no interest at all being paid, is not necessarily usurious, even though there be an absolute agreement to repay the entire principal. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 486; 39 Cyc. 952; Potter v. Yale College, 8 Conn. 52; Clift v. Barrow, 108 N. Y. 187, 15 N. E. 327. In Clift v. Barrow, supra, the plaintiff had entered into a so-called partnership agreement with a banker, under which he was to receive 10 per cent interest on all his deposits, payable from the profits of the business, no interest at all being payable unless there were profits. As surviving partner he subsequently sued a debtor of the firm, who claimed that the agreement did not constitute the plaintiff a partner, and was moreover void for usury. Upon the latter point this court said: "So long as by the terms of the instrument he was not entitled to interest, unless the profits were enough to pay it, we see no basis for submitting any question of usury to a jury." p. 194.

But if an agreement hazarding the entire interest in consideration of the possibility of receiving more than the legal rate is not necessarily usurious, there is no logical ground for refusing to apply the same principle to a case where only a part of the legal interest is hazarded. This situation arose in Richardson v. Hughitt, 76 N. Y. 55, 59, 32 Am. Rep. 267, where the defendant had advanced money to a partnership to be used in its business of manufacturing wagons. The loans were to be repaid with interest at 5½ per cent (7 per cent being the legal rate), and in addition the defendant was to receive a quarter of the profits realized from the sale of wagons. In answer to the claim that the agreement was usurious, the court said: "As the defendant was only to receive less than 7 per cent interest, as a fixed and certain sum, and there is no certainty that the profits, discounts, and interest agreed upon,—5½ per cent—would exceed, or even amount to 7 per cent, it is not apparent that the contract was usurious." While the issue of usury was not directly involved in that case, the language of the court quoted is entirely in accord with the principles announced in other decisions in this state; in fact, in the present case, it is at least impliedly admitted that if the amount advanced by the defendant had been the full present value in July, 1905, of the $18,400 payable upon the death of plaintiff's grandmother, the transaction would have been valid. It is obvious, however, even in that case, whether the defendant would actually receive more or less than the legal rate of interest would still have depended upon the length of time that plaintiff's grandmother lived.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that an agreement to pay an amount which may be more or less than the legal interest, depending upon a reasonable contingency, is not ipso facto usurious, because of the possibility that more than the legal interest will be paid. Otherwise no valid transfer or assignment of an interest dependent upon a life estate could be made for less than the full value. Such arrangements, however, will not be upheld in any case where the purpose is to evade the statutes against usury, no matter what form the transaction may take. Meaker v. Fiero, 145 N. Y.

165, 39 N. E. 714; Quackenbos v. Sayer, 62 N. Y. 344; Birdsall v. Patterson, 51 N. Y. 43. The question in each case is, and necessarily must be, whether the agreement be fair and reasonable, or a mere device to evade the Usury Statutes. This was recognized in the opinion delivered by Presiding Justice Ingraham in the Hall Case, supra, in which he said: "What we have to find in the transaction is the intention of the parties. . . . It was early recognized by the courts that if the form of the contract were to be controlling, the statute against usury would be substantially unenforceable, and thus it was made the duty of the court in each case presented to examine into the substance of the transaction between the parties, and determine whether the intent which pervaded it was one which violated the statute." p. 826.

In the case now before us there is no finding of fact that the assignments and mortgage were made as a device for the payment of interest beyond the legal rate, or that the parties had any intention of violating the Usury Statutes. The court found only that, under the American Experience Tables of Mortality, plaintiff's grandmother, at the time the loan was made, had an expectancy of life of 8.48 years, and under the Carlisle Tables of 9.44 years; that under the Carlisle Tables, in July, 1905, the present worth of $18,400 at 6 per cent, subject to the life estate of plaintiff's grandmother, was $11,470.19; that as the plaintiff received only $9,500, he, therefore, received $1,970.19 less than he should have received; and as a conclusion of law, that the transaction was a loan under which the plaintiff was to repay the defendant more than the loan, "and the maximum interest thereon, and is, therefore, usurious, and null and void."

There is no finding as to the actual expectancy of life of plaintiff's grandmother, nor that the parties knew when the loan was made what her expectancy was under the tables referred to; neither is there a finding that they intended to provide for the payment of interest in excess of the legal rate. But it is suggested that the first conclusion of law, to the effect that the transaction was a loan of $9,500 by the defendant to the plaintiff under an arrangement by which he was to repay the full amount of the loan, "and the maximum interest thereon, and is, therefore, usurious, and null and void," may be treated as a finding of fact. A similar contention was made and rejected in Alcock v. Davitt, 179 N. Y. 9, 71 N. E. 264. While a conclusion of law that a given transaction was usurious might, under some circumstances, be treated as a finding of fact, I do not think it can be so treated here. It is not denominated a finding of fact, but a conclusion of law, and from the way in which it is stated, I think it was intended to be a conclusion of law, predicated solely upon the proposition that because the defendant, in purchasing or making the loan upon an expectant interest, paid somewhat less than the present value of that interest, calculated at 6 per cent according to the Carlisle Tables of Mortality, it was guilty of usury and must forfeit the entire amount. As was said by Judge Cullen in Alcock v. Davitt, supra: "It seems to us that this action presented for determination a very simple question, purely one of fact . . . ; that the question has not been decided by the trial court as one of fact; and that, in the absence of any reasonably clear determination of the facts on which the rights of the parties wholly depend, we should not be astute in searching through the report of the referee for some pretext for upholding the judgment." p. 13.

The tables of mortality are at best only slight evidence of the expectancy of life of any particular person, to be considered in connection with proof of his health, constitution, habits, and mode of living. Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 592. Such tables show only the average length of life among the classes whose lives are taken into consideration in preparing the tables. There are several tables which differ quite widely, and it goes without saying that in any given case the habits and manner of living of the individual may be totally different from those of the persons considered in preparing the tables. Williams's Case, 3 Bland, Ch. 186; Scribner, Dower, 2d ed. pp. 663-686. No one would contend that the expectancy of life of a chronic invalid, afflicted with a disease for which there is no known cure, would equal the expectancy given in any table of mortality; and any agreement for the payment of interest in a lump sum, calculated at the legal rate for the expectancy of such an individual under any table of mortality, would be clearly usurious. If that be so, then the converse must necessarily be true, and it cannot be said that an agreement is invariably usurious because an amount somewhat in excess of the interest calculated according to some table of mortality is to be paid. In such cases the intention of the parties must control and must necessarily be determined.

Usury—lump sum—mortality tables.

So here the question is, Did the parties intend to evade the Usury Statutes of the state? or was the interest payable so large that, in view of all the circumstances, an intent to provide for the payment of interest beyond the legal rate will necessarily be imputed to them? Fiedler v. Darrin, 50 N. Y. 437. The court did find, as a fact, that over nine years after the loan was made, plaintiff's grandmother was still living. The amount payable, therefore, was not so large that it would have exceeded the legal rate if she lived a comparatively short time beyond her expectancy under the Carlisle Tables. Did the parties, in arranging the loan, intend that the defendant should receive more than the legal rate of interest on the amount loaned? The answer to the question must necessarily depend upon their intent. That was a question of fact, as to which no finding has been made. As already indicated, the finding on the subject is that, according to the more favorable of the two tables of mortality mentioned, the expectancy of the life tenant was 9.44 years, and that the then present value of $18,400 at 6 per cent, payable on her death, was nearly $2,000 more than the amount advanced. That finding was not a finding that her expectancy was 9.44 years, but merely that there was some evidence of it. It was by no means equivalent to a finding of usurious intent.

It, therefore, appears that upon the crucial question of fact in the case—was the transaction usurious

In Dougherty v. Lion F. Ins. Co. supra, it was held, and the rule is as applicable here as it was there, that where the court, upon the trial of an action, instead of finding either way upon the crucial question of fact in the case, simply found the evidence as given by the witnesses upon that question, and then drew a conclusion of law which was unsupported by any finding of fact, the judgment entered thereon must be reversed.

In reaching the foregoing conclusion there is no intention of lessening the protection which the Usury Statutes were designed to afford. All that is here decided is that every loan or payment of less than the full present value, calculated according to a mortality table, for a remainder interest, is not ipso facto usurious and void. Whether usurious depends upon the intent of the parties, to be determined from all the facts and circumstances in each case. Such question has not here been determined, and the defendant is entitled to have it determined before compelled to forfeit the amount which it loaned to the plaintiff.

For the reasons given the judgment appealed from should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide event.

ANNOTATION.

Fixed interest charge for uncertain term as usury.

General principles.

An agreement to pay an amount which may be more or less than the legal interest for an uncertain period of time, depending on a reasonable contingency, is not ipso facto usurious, because of the possibility that more than the legal interest will be paid. Parker v. Coburn (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 82; Brown v. Robinson (1918) 224 N. Y. 301, 120 N. E. 694, reversing (1916) 173 App. Div. 583, 160 N. Y. Supp. 287. And see the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. Co. ante, 1379). Otherwise no valid transfer or assignment of an interest dependent on a life estate could be made for less than the full value. See the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. Co.).

So, a loan or payment of less than the full present value, calculated according to a mortality table, for a remainder interest, is not ipso facto usurious and void. Brown v. Robinson (N. Y.) supra. And see the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. Co.).

The question in each case is, and necessarily must be, whether the agreement is fair and reasonable, or is a mere device to evade the usury statutes. Brown v. Robinson (N. Y.) supra; Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 815, 136 N. Y. Supp. 774, affirmed in (1914) 211 N. Y. 507, 105

N. E. 1085. And see the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. CO.).

Such arrangements, however, will not be upheld in any case where the purpose is to evade the statutes against usury, no matter what form the transaction may take. See the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. CO.). And see Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (N. Y.) supra.

"Post obit agreements, or bonds, are those given by a borrower of money, by which he undertakes to pay a large sum, exceeding the legal rate of interest, on or after the death of a person from whom he has expectations, in case of surviving him. This character of agreements is not always void. They are so when it is shown to the courts that the contracts are inequitable or unconscientious. When advantage has been taken of the weakness, necessity, or ignorance of another, or such extraordinary disparity exists between the sum advanced and the sum to be received, as clearly appears to be contrary to good conscience, the courts will declare the agreement fraudulent and void, as being against the policy of the law. They partake generally of the nature of a wager, and contain no principle by which the value of the chances may be calculated, so as to enable the court to ascertain whether they are reasonable or unconscionable. But when it is apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, that it is such as no man in his senses, not under delusion, would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept, on the other, the agreement will be declared inequitable and unconscientious. If this does not appear from the contract itself, it must be proved; and when proved, the court will still allow a recovery by the lender, and give him relief, by directing judgment for so much money as shall be equal to the principal received by the borrower, and interest. . . . Such contracts are not per se nullities." Crawford v. Russell (1872) 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 92.

It is recognized by the courts that, if the form of the contract is to be controlling, the statute against usury would be substantially unenforceable, and thus it was made the duty of the court in each case presented, to examine into the substance of the transaction between the parties, and determine whether the intent which pervaded it was one which violated the statute. Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (N. Y.) supra.

The intent to take usurious interest involves such a purpose on the part of the borrower as well as on the part of the lender. Such an intent, when consummated, draws after it not only civil penalties by way of forfeiture, but constitutes a crime; and before holding that a person has been guilty of such offense, it should be clearly and decisively proved and found, and not be left to inference and implication. Brown v. Robinson (1918) 224 N. Y. 301, 120 N. E. 694, reversing (1916) 173 App. Div. 583, 160 N. Y. Supp. 287.

Where, however, it appears that the intention is to evade the Usury Statute, and that the contract is a mere cloak or contrivance for that purpose, the contract is held to be void. Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 815, 136 N. Y. Supp. 774, affirmed in (1914) 211 N. Y. 507, 105 N. E. 1085; Leavitt v. Enos (1913) 155 App. Div. 584, 140 N. Y. Supp. 862; Hagaman v. Reinach (1915) 48 Misc. 206, 96 N. Y. Supp. 719; Mansfield v. Ogle (1855) 7 De G. M. & G. 181, 44 Eng. Reprint, 71, 1 Jur. N. S. 603, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 450, 3 Week. Rep. 557.

In determining whether an agreement to take an amount which may be more or less than the legal interest, when the length of time is uncertain because it depends on the expectancy of life of a third person, the tables of mortality are at best only slight evidence of the expectancy of life of any particular person, to be considered in connection with proof of his health, constitution, habits, and mode of living. Such tables show only the average length of life among the classes whose lives are taken into consideration in preparing the tables. There are several tables which differ widely, and in any given case the habits may be totally different from those of the persons considered in preparing the tables.* No one would contend that the expectancy of life of a chronic invalid, afflicted with a disease for which there is no known cure, would equal the expectancy given in any table of mortality; and any agreement for the payment of interest in a lump sum, calculated at the legal rate for the expectancy of such an individual, under any table of mortality, would be clearly usurious. If that be so, then the converse must necessarily be true, and it cannot be said that an agreement is invariably usurious because an amount somewhat in excess of the interest, calculated according to some table of mortality, is to be paid. In such cases the intention of the parties must control and must necessarily be determined. See the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. CO. ante, 1379), quoted with approval in Brown v. Robinson (1918) 224 N. Y. 301, 120 N. E. 694, reversing (1916) 173 App. Div. 583, 160 N. Y. Supp. 287.

Illustrations.

In the reported case (HARTLEY v. EAGLE INS. CO.), the question is: Did the parties intend to evade the Usury Statute of the state, or was the interest payable so large that, in view of all the circumstances, an intent to provide for the payment of interest beyond the legal rate would necessarily be imputed to them? In that case, it appears that the plaintiff became vested with an undivided one-fourth interest in remainder, amounting to at least $43,750, in the estate of his grandfather, subject, however, to the life interest therein of his grandmother. In consideration of a loan of $9,500, he assigned to the defendant, through a third person, the sum of $18,400, payable from his share of the estate, with interest at 6 per cent from the death of his grandmother, the event on which the principal sum became payable. He also executed a mortgage on certain real property belonging to the estate as further security for the payment of the amount assigned. At the time the loan was made, the plaintiff's grandmother was sixty-nine years old, and on her death, the defendant would have been entitled, under the assignments, to receive $18,400 from the plaintiff's share of the estate, or $8,900 more than the amount which it had loaned to him. The action was brought to have the transaction declared usurious and void; and to direct the cancellation of the assignments and mortgage. There was an express finding of fact that it was not the intention or desire of the parties that the assignments and mortgage should merely secure the repayment of the amount loaned, with interest, but there was no finding of fact that the assignments and mortgage were made as a devise for the payment of interest beyond the legal rate, or that the parties had any intention of violating the Usury Statutes. The court states that there certainly was no specific agreement for the payment of usurious interest, since the defendant was to receive a lump sum in repayment of the loan, and whether the amount received would be greater or less than the amount loaned, with legal interest, depended obviously on the length of time the plaintiff's grandmother lived. The trial court found only that, under one mortality table, the plaintiff's grandmother, at the time the loan was made, had an expectancy of life of 8.48 years, and under another table of 9.44 years; that under the latter tables, at the time of the loan, the present worth of $18,400 at 6 per cent, subject to the life estate of the plaintiff's grandmother, was $11,470.19; that as the plaintiff received only $9,500, he, therefore, received $1,970.19 less than he should have received; and, as a conclusion of law, that the transaction was a loan, under which the plaintiff was to repay the defendant more than the loan "and the maximum interest thereon, and is, therefore, usurious and null and void." There was no finding as to the actual expectancy of life of the plaintiff's grandmother, nor that the parties knew, when the loan was made, what her expectancy was under the tables referred to; neither was there a finding that they intended to provide for the payment of interest in excess of the legal rate. The trial court did find as a fact, however, that over nine years after the loan was made, the plaintiff's grandmother was still living, so that the amount payable, therefore, was not so large that it would have exceeded the legal rate if she lived a comparatively short time beyond her expectancy under the mortality tables. The court holds that the answer to the question whether the parties, in arranging the loan, intended that the defendant should receive more than the legal rate of interest on the amount loaned, depends on their intent, a question of fact on which no finding had been made. The finding that, according to the two tables of mortality mentioned, the expectancy of the life tenant was 9.44 years, and that the then present value of $18,400 at 6 per cent, payable on her death, was nearly $2,000 more than the amount advanced, was not, the court holds, a finding that her expectancy was 9.44 years, but merely that there was some evidence of it; and was by no means equivalent to a finding of usurious interest. This question not having been determined, and the defendant being entitled to have it determined before being compelled to forfeit the amount which it loaned to the plaintiff, the court holds that the judgment cannot stand.

In Brown v. Robinson (1918) 224 N. Y. 801, 120 N. E. 694, reversing (1916) 173 App. Div. 583, 160 N. Y. Supp. 287, it appeared that a testatrix created two trusts by her will for the benefit of her son, the payment of the principal of which to him was in each case contingent. Under the first trust he was to receive the principal of the fund when he reached the age of twenty-five years. By the provisions of the second trust he was to receive the principal on the double contingency that he survived his father and reached the age of twenty-five years. A short time after he became of age, the son made application to an English corporation, chartered to do insurance business and also to loan money on and purchase expectancies, to advance him moneys. The result was that the company paid to him the sum of $70,000, in addition to certain sums retained by it as premiums for insurance on his life and 5 per cent for apprehended expenses in connection with the transfers, and took from him two transfers of parts of his contingent interest under the first trust created by his mother's will, aggregating $96,250. The company also advanced to him the sum of $17,350, exclusive of insurance premiums and 5 per cent for apprehended expenses, as in the preceding case, and took from him a transfer of part of his contingency interest under the second trust created by his mother's will, amounting to $45,400; and also advanced him the sum of $12,650, exclusive of insurance premiums and 5 per cent for apprehended transfers, and took an assignment of another part of his contingent interest in the second trust, amounting to $40,000. The son and his wife also executed a mortgage on the former's interest in his mother's real estate, in which he had a contingent interest, to secure the payment of the sums transferred as aforesaid. In each case the instrument executed by the son and his wife was in form an absolute sale and transfer of his interest in his mother's estate to the extent stated. There was no personal obligation of any kind on his part, except the covenant that at the time when each of the instruments was executed the property held by the trustees for his contingent benefit in each trust consisted of real and personal property having "a clear market value . . . over and above all encumbrances," of $140,000. In the case of the last transfer, the son also retained the right, within six months after reaching the age of twenty-five years, provided that his father was still living, "to repurchase said sum of $40,000 hereby assigned," on payment "of the sum of $20,240, with interest thereon" from the date when the son attained his majority to the date of payment. A holding that the transactions were usurious was reversed, there being no direct proof or finding of usurious intent.

In Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 815, 136 N. Y. Supp. 774, affirmed in (1914) 211 N. Y. 507, 105

N. E. 1085, it appeared that a testator gave all his estate to his executors for the use and benefit of his wife during her life, or so long as she remained his widow, and, after her decease or remarriage, to his children on their attaining the age of twenty-one years. There was no power of sale in the will, and the remainder vested absolutely, and was not subject to be divested. At the time of the transactions in question, the plaintiff, a son of the testator, was about twenty-four years of age, while the testator's widow was upwards of sixty-three years of age and still unmarried, and the share of the plaintiff in the estate of his father, an equal undivided one sixth thereof, was valued at $70,000. Being in need of money, there was paid to him by the defendant for his present use the sum of $15,500, whereupon by an indenture, he granted, bargained, sold, assigned, conveyed, transferred, and set over unto the defendant out of the total property, interest, legacy, or distributive share which he had or should be entitled to receive on the termination of his mother's prior estate, the net or clear sum of $34,000, and he constituted the defendant his true and lawful attorney to demand, sue for, and receive the amount thereby assigned. And he secured the payment of this sum of money to the defendant by his bond, with a sufficient surety, and his mortgage on the real property of which he owned a remainder and over which the trustees had no power of control, except to collect the income during the life of the life beneficiary. By these agreements, as the court construed them, there was a loan of $15,500, and there was to be paid from the plaintiff's property, that sum and the sum of $19,000 more when the loan became payable. The loan became payable not at a fixed time, but on the death of the plaintiff's mother, a woman then over sixty-three years of age. The interest on $15,500 at 6 per cent per annum was $930 a year, and the payment of this $34,500 to the defendant would have to be postponed for over twenty years, the court stated, for the loan to earn $19,000 as interest at 6 per cent. It was proved and seems to have been conceded that the expectation of life of the plaintiff's mother was about thirteen years. The complaint alleged that these indentures and instruments were made, executed, and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, to be held by it only as security for the purpose of securing payment to the defendant of the sum of $15,500, with interest thereon to the date of payment, and that it was understood and agreed between the parties that the instruments were made, executed, and delivered only as such security, and not as any absolute assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any definite property, interest, legacy, or distributive share of the plaintiff in his father's estate. The complaint then alleged that, on the death of the mother about two years later, the plaintiff duly tendered to the defendant the sum of $15,500 with interest at 6 per cent from the date of the loan, but that the defendant declined the offer. The complaint then stated that the plaintiff demanded judgment in the alternative, either that the judgment declare that the loan of $15,500 was made as a result of a usurious and void contract, and that it be adjudged and decreed to be invalid, or that the alleged indenture or instrument of assignment, transfer, or conveyance might be declared and adjudged to have been and to be a mortgage, and that it and also the alleged indenture of mortgage were given only as collateral security for the payment of the indebtedness of $15,500, with legal interest thereon; that the defendant be directed to receive and accept that sum of money with legal interest thereon as ascertained; and that the instruments be canceled. The intention of the parties being a necessary finding in the transaction, the court held that, if this were treated as an actual transfer of $34,500, it was clearly the intention of the defendant to exact from the plaintiff in his necessitous condition a contract by which the defendant could receive for its loan, interest at a rate exceeding 6 per cent, in contravention of the Usury Statute (General Business Law, §§ 370 et seq.; 19 McKinney, Consol. Laws, pp. 207 et seq.). But the court held that, treating this, however, as an advance by the defendant of the sum of $15,500 at the time of the execution of these instruments, and without any express agreement as to the rate of interest, the law would imply that the defendant would have the right to interest on the amount loaned or advanced at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

In Leavitt v. Enos (1913) 155 App. Div. 584, 140 N. Y. Supp. 862, it appeared that an agreement was made between the executors of an estate and a distributee of that estate, whereby the latter should be paid the sum of $55,000. There was a delay in the payment of that sum to the distributee, and he applied to another for an advance thereon. The assignment arranged for purported to sell, assign, and transfer, and set over to the plaintiff any and all claims which the distributee then had in and to the estate referred to, to the amount of $7,500. Reference was made to the agreement by the executors to pay the distributee the sum of $55,000. It was further provided that, if the sum of $7,500 was not paid out of the agreed sum of $55,000, then it should be charged against any other sum due to the distributee out of that estate, and, finally, the distributee warranted and guaranteed the repayment to the plaintiff of the sum of $7,500. All that the distributee received was $5,500, the difference between that sum and $7,500 being divided between the plaintiff, her brothers and agents, and their attorney. The court held that it was perfectly clear that the transaction was a loan of money, and that the pretended assignment was a mere cloak for usury. The court stated that the transaction was very similar to, and, if anything, a little balder and less complicated than, that considered by it in Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (N. Y.) supra.

In Stotesbury v. Huber (1916) 237 Fed. 413, it appeared that the defendant, a resident of New York state, received from his mother on her death a vested remainder in the estate of his grandfather, of which his mother was one of the heirs, but which estate, however, was then subject to the life interest of the grandmother, who was seventy years of age and in good health. A part of the estate of the grandfather had been paid to the defendant's mother or her administrator prior to the making of the assignment in question, but a large amount of real and personal property was still in the hands of the executors and trustees of the grandfather's estate, who were accountable to, and which property was within the jurisdiction of, the surrogate's court of Kings county. Being in need of money, after various applications for loans, the defendant finally arranged with the plaintiff, a member of a Pennsylvania partnership, to execute and deliver to him a deed or assignment, which was on its face an absolute conveyance, of a share amounting to $55,000 of his vested remainder in his grandfather's estate, with interest from the date of the death of the life tenant and until the amount of the assigned interest should have been paid over to the assignee, in return for the sum of $23,500. The grandmother, the life tenant, died within a little less than four years after the execution of the assignment. According to the testimony, her expectation of life on the date of the assignment was 9.18 years, according to one table of mortality, and 8.5 years according to another. It also appeared that the present value of $50,000, based on the life of a woman seventy years old, computed according to the first table, would be $32,241.40, and, according to the other table, $372 more. After the death of the life tenant, the defendant offered to pay the amount advanced with interest, and asked for a reassignment on such payment, which offer was refused. The next step in the transaction was the present action, wherein the plaintiff filed a bill in equity, alleging that he had no adequate remedy at law, and sought relief to the effect that he should be declared entitled to immediate possession of $50,000, with interest from the date of the death of the life tenant, out of the interest of the defendant in the estate of his grandfather and the estate of his mother; that the executor and trustee of the defendant's grandfather's estate should be required to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $55,000, with interest as aforesaid; and that the administrator of the estate of the defendant's mother should be directed to pay the sum of $50,000, with interest as aforesaid, in case it should be determined that the executor of the grandfather's estate should pay the share of the mother in her father's estate to her administrator. It was held that though the contract itself was entered into in the state of Pennsylvania, it was governed by the laws of New York, where the property was located, and where only the contract was enforceable. Hence, while following the decision in Hall v. Eagle Ins. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 815, 136 N. Y. Supp. 774, affirmed in (1914) 211 N. Y. 507, 105 N. E. 1085 (set out at length, supra), the court stated that the present case was distinguishable from the former case in that no mortgage was given to secure the assignment or to repay the loan. The court held that, under the decision in the foregoing case, an assignment of an interest in property exceeding in value the principal and interest for the estimated life of a life tenant, on the amount given as consideration, should be deemed usurious, and to be no more than a contract of loan with security therefor, even though presented in the form of an actual sale for a fixed consideration. In applying this ruling, the court held that the instruments in the record, as well as the subsequent instruments executed by the defendant, showed his intent to treat the transaction as a sale, but yet a sale which was in effect a mortgage with illegal interest. There was no evidence of any deceit or lack of good faith on the part of the lenders, and the court held that, therefore, while it was not possible to find that in this particular instance the parties were intentionally making a usurious loan or effecting an assignment which would really cover up a usurious loan, to evade the Usury Statute (even though the brokers originally endeavored to obtain a loan before they found that this was impossible), yet the defendant borrower, as an improvident person, was entitled to some equitable relief such as was actually granted by the court in the Hall Case. The court thereupon held that the assignment was unconscionable on the present facts in a court of equity, in that it exceeded a fair sum to cover the amount paid, with interest and proper allowance for profit and expenses, and denied its enforcement on the condition that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the amount advanced, with legal interest to the date of payment, and with such profit as might be directed by the court.

In Hagaman v. Reinach (1915) 48 Misc. 206, 96 N. Y. Supp. 719, it appeared that the plaintiffs' assignment of their interests in an estate was given by them, and received by the defendant's testator, as security merely; firstly, for the collection charges agreed to be paid the testator; secondly, for an immediate advance of $3,200 to one of the plaintiffs, and a further advance of $1,000 to be made him three months later; and, thirdly, for such future advances as the defendant's testator, the assignee, might make to the plaintiffs or either of them. According to the terms of the agreement, all the advances, immediate and future, were to be repaid from the proceeds of the assignee's collections, less his agreed charges for such collection, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, the interest on the advances particularly mentioned to date from one year after the date of the agreement. The court held that, as to these two advances, or loans, for such they were, whatever name was given to them, no usury was apparent from the evidence, but that the later loans were usurious.

In Crawford v. Russell (1872) 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 92, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement in the year 1846, which read substantially as follows: "That the plaintiff should do all she could to aid a marriage between said Jeremiah and said Christina, by her influences and services, and in consideration thereof the said defendant faithfully promised and agreed with the plaintiff, in case she became the wife of the said Jeremiah Russell and outlived him, to pay said plaintiff for her services in this matter, $2,000 in cash, and to purchase for the plaintiff a pianoforte and a gold watch for her [plaintiff's] eldest daughter 'Kate,' and to pay the expense of her education to the plaintiff." The plaintiff claimed and alleged that the said Jeremiah Russell was a widower, possessing great wealth, to the value of several hundred thousand dollars. That she, the plaintiff, did, at the request of the defendant, so aid the defendant, furnished rooms, fire, and light for said Jeremiah and the said Christina to meet from time to time, and did various services for said defendant, and gave her care, skill, diligence, and attention in aid of said marriage, at great loss and expense, and performed her part of said contract so that afterwards, and on or about the 30th day of October, 1847, the said Jeremiah Russell and the said Christina Crawford were lawfully married, and from that time lived together in great prosperity, and very pleasantly and happily for many years, and until the 30th day of September, 1867, when the said Jeremiah Russell departed this life, leaving the said defendant as his widow, for her share, a large estate amounting to about $50,000. That although the defendant had been requested, she had not performed her part of said agreement, but had hitherto refused and still did refuse and neglect to pay the plaintiff said sum of $2,000, and to perform her other said covenants and agreements. The court stated that the case partook somewhat of the character of a post obit agreement, in that it was for services, care, diligence, aid, and attention rendered, and expenses furnished, to be paid for by quite a large sum of money at the death of the person named. The court then said: "But the case is relieved from many odious features of post obit contracts. There was no practice of fraud or surprise in the case; no destitute heir seduced from parental government; or anyone hazarding his future inheritance for a present pittance, to supply temporary needs. There was no improvident heir or expectant of a future estate, spending it and ruining himself before he comes to it; nor was the contract legally usurious, by statute. By it no owner of an estate to be devised was to be imposed upon in his confidence and affection, who might be thus imposed upon, and give his estate to a stranger, when he would think he was giving it to one of his blood. It was an agreement between two persons fully competent to contract; each fully understanding their own interests; and each of mature age. There was no actual fraud or imposition practised. The one was desiring aid to obtain a present relation in the marriage state, with the concomitants of social position, wealth, and happiness. The other willing to engage to assist this ambition, for a named consideration, large, certainly, if it was to be immediately enjoyed, but its payment was made subject to the contingency of success, of long delay, as well as the chance of survivorship. With the consideration of these hazards and contingencies upon the one side, and the expected advantages and enjoyments upon the other, the contract was not unreasonable. The contingencies all occurred, but only at the end of about nineteen years. If the case had depended upon this feature alone, I should think the judge erred in nonsuiting. The reasonableness of the contract would have been a question for the jury."

In Parker v. Coburn (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 82, it appeared that the plaintiff offered evidence to show that his father, six years before his death, purchased an interest in land of the plaintiff for $1,500 in cash, and "$500 and $100 for interest on it" at his [the father's] decease, saying at the time that there was no probability of the interest being over $100, as he was so old. It was held that there was no ground for the suggestion that the contract was usurious. The court held that the father did not agree to pay more than the lawful rate of interest on so much of the purchase money as was to be paid at a future time, but to pay in addition to that part of the purchase money, a certain sum, which might or might not exceed the amount of interest if computed at the lawful rate, according to the length of life of the father after making the promise. And there was no evidence whatever, the court stated, that the transaction was intended as a cover for a loan.

In Chesterfield v. Janssen (1750) 1 Atk. 301, 26 Eng. Reprint, 191, 2 Ves. Sr. 125, 28 Eng. Reprint, 82, 1 Wils. 286, 95 Eng. Reprint, 621, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 289, it appeared that a borrower was thirty years of age, had an estate of £7,000 per annum of his own, and another large estate whereof he was tenant for life, but, having contracted debts, was very much pressed for money to pay them off. His grandmother, from whom he had very great expectations, was then seventy-eight years of age. The defendant advanced to the borrower, on the latter's application, £5,000, the borrower giving a bond to pay the defendant £10,000 within a month after the death of his grandmother, if he survived her. The grandmother died about six years and five months after the bargain, whereupon the borrower, stating his inability to pay immediately the £10,000, of his own free accord gave the defendant a bond in the penalty of £20,000 and a warrant of attorney to confess a judgment for the £10,000, which was afterwards entered. The borrower afterwards paid £2,000 in part. It was held that the contract was not usurious, as there was no certain time of payment, but the whole was at hazard; though it was stated that if this in truth had really been a borrowing of the £5,000, to be repaid with an unlawful interest at a certain day, and had only been put in this shape to avoid the statute, it would have been void. The plaintiff was relieved only against the penalty on paying what remained due to the defendant of the £10,000 and interest.

8 Week. Rep. 557, it appeared that a mortgage recited that the mortgagor was entitled to the property in fee simple, subject to the life estate of his father, and that he had occasion to borrow £2,000, which two persons named had agreed to advance on the following terms, viz., the first lender, £1,500, and the second £500, on the day of the date thereof, which sums were to be repaid to them on the death of the mortgagor's father, and as much more, viz., £1,500 more to the first lender, and £500 more to the second lender, provided the father should happen to die within five years from the date of the deed; but if he should survive that period, then that, on his death after that period, £1,500 and twice as much more should be paid to the first lender, and £500 and twice as much more to the second lender. The instrument witnessed that the mortgagor granted and released the property, subject to the life estate, to a trustee on trust, on the death of the mortgagor's father, if the same should take place within five years, to raise £3,000 and £1,000 for the first and second lenders respectively; but if the father should live beyond five years, then to raise £4,500 and £1,500 for the first and second lenders respectively. It was held that the transaction was one, substantially, of borrowing and lending on usurious terms; that the form of the instrument was merely a contrivance, an ineffectual contrivance, to evade the law by concealing or coloring the true nature of the business, and hence that the instrument was void.

Lamego v. Gould (1759) 2 Burr. 715, 97 Eng. Reprint, 528, was an action on the case on a special promise by a borrower, "in consideration of 2 guineas, received of" the lender, "to pay him 20 guineas, upon the decease of my present wife." The question was whether this contract was usurious, the woman, at the time of making it, being then seventy years of age. It was held that the contract was not usurious, it being a bona fide wager, not at all intended as a loan, and not a transaction which was really a usurious loan, but designed as a wager.

LENOIR CAR WORKS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. LEE TRINKLE, Admr., etc., of A. F. Friend, Deceased.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit — December 17, 1915.

(143 C. C. A. 156, 228 Fed. 634.)

Judgment — nunc pro tunc — death of plaintiff.

1. Where plaintiff in a personal-injury action dies while the court has under advisement a motion for rehearing of a motion for new trial, which had been denied and judgment ordered in his favor, the court may, upon overruling the motion, enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of submission of motion for rehearing.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1403.]

Trial — motion for verdict — conflicting evidence.

2. The court is justified in overruling a motion for directed verdict if the testimony upon the issues involved is in conflict.

Courts — state and Federal — practice.

3. Revivor of a personal-injury action in a Federal court in the name of the personal representative upon death of the plaintiff is justified if authorized by the laws of the state where the court is sitting.

[See 1 R. C. L. 25.]

Appeal — exception to charge.

4. A general and formal exception to the charge of the trial court is futile.

[See 2 R. C. L. 96.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee (Sanford, District Judge) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Warrington and Knappen, Circuit Judges, and Clarke, District Judge.

Mr. J. G. Johnson for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. T. Kennerly for defendant in error.

Clarke, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action, A. F. Friend, in his lifetime, sued the plaintiff in error for damages for injuries which he sustained while in its employ. The injury complained of was caused by the falling of a steel car sill, about 36 feet in length, which weighed 1,800 pounds, and the cause of its falling was the breaking of one of two clevis pins by which it was supported when suspended about 4 feet from the floor, in the position required for the doing of the work upon the sill in which Friend and two other workmen were engaged when the accident occurred.

The negligence claimed is failure on the part of the employer to exercise the care required by law to furnish a clevis pin reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was intended to be used, and failure to inspect such pin after it was put into use. The defenses relied upon at the trial were proper care on the part of the plaintiff in error in furnishing to its workmen clevis pins for the purpose for which the pin which broke was used, and assumption of risk by the plaintiff.

We are clearly satisfied that the testimony in the cause presented a conflict upon both of the issues between the parties as we have stated them, such that the trial court was abundantly justified in overruling the motion of the plaintiff in error for a verdict in its favor when it rested its case.

The plaintiff in error claims that the trial court erred in several respects: First, in the admission of testimony designated in the amended assignment of errors. It is sufficient to say of these claims that the exceptions taken were in form such that they are wholly insufficient to present any question to this court for review. Second, error is assigned in the refusal of the court to charge the jury as requested by the plaintiff in error. The record shows that the trial court dealt with each of these requests to charge in a manner entirely satisfactory to this court, even if we should regard the form of exceptions taken as adequate to present the refusal of them for review, which is by no means clear.

After the trial court had overruled the motion of the plaintiff in error for a new trial, and on September 29, 1913, had ordered judgment entered on the verdict, on October 15, 1913, a petition was filed for a rehearing of the motion for a new trial. This petition was heard and submitted to the court about November 7, 1913, and was taken under advisement. A press of official duty rendered it impossible for the court to dispose of this petition until January 2, 1914, when it was denied. In the meantime the plaintiff died, and to the end that injustice might not be done, judgment nunc pro tunc was ordered entered as of November 7, 1913. This action is assigned as error, but it was clearly justified

y Arredondo, 223 U. S. 376, 56 L. ed. 476, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227. It is also claimed that error was committed in permitting revivor of the case in the name of the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff. The laws of the state of Tennessee, where this action arose, justify this action of the trial court, especially since the claim must be considered in judgment at the time the plaintiff died.

Courts—state and Federal—practice.

There are several other assignments of error, all of which we have considered; but we find them so without substantial merit that special discussion of them is neither necessary nor justified.

We think it not necessary to consider the motion of the defendant in error to dismiss this proceeding in error upon the claim that the last extension of the time for printing and filing the record was not properly allowed by the trial court, and for the assessment of a penalty upon the plaintiff in error upon the ground that this proceeding has been prosecuted merely for delay. Affirming the judgment, as we are doing, gives to the defendant in error all rights which dismissal of the petition in error would give to him, and while there is much in this record indicating a disposition on the part of counsel for the plaintiff in error to delay without just cause the final decision of the case, nevertheless, we have concluded in this instance not to impose a penalty.

The learned trial judge submitted this case to the jury in a charge so clear and comprehensive that counsel for the plaintiff in error, alert, as this record proves them to have been, in watching for possible error, saw fit to take only a general, formal, and so an entirely futile, exception to it; and he dealt with the multiplied motions, amended motions, and applications of various kinds filed by the plaintiff in error, with such patience and intelligence as to leave nothing to

NOTE.

The decision in the reported case (LENOIR CAR WORKS v. TRINKLE, ante, 1394), permitting the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of submission of a motion for rehearing of a motion for new trial, which had been denied and judgment ordered in favor of plaintiff in a personal-injury action, the plaintiff having died while the motion for rehearing was under advisement, is in accord with cases presenting similar situations, as is shown in subdivision III. b, 3, of the note beginning at page 1411, upon the general subject of the power to enter judgment nunc pro tunc after death of party.

RE ESTATE OF E. S. PILLSBURY, Deceased.

TITLE INSURANCE & TRUST COMPANY, Admr., etc., of E. S. Pillsbury, Deceased, Resp't.

(175 Cal. 454, 166 Pac. 11.)

Judgment — rendition nunc pro tunc — death of party.

1. The power of the court to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc after the death of defendant in a malpractice case which had been taken under advisement before death, although no verdict had been rendered or decision given, is not defeated by a statute providing that if any person die after a verdict or decision upon an issue of fact, and before judgment, the court may nevertheless render judgment thereon.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1403.]

Insurance — waiver of right to proceeds of policy.

2. The benefit of statutes exempting the proceeds of life insurance from execution, and permitting them to be set aside for the benefit of minor children of insured, may be waived.

Guardian and ward — failure to apply for life insurance — dereliction.

3. The guardian of a minor who, after the death of his parents leaving life insurance which might be set aside to him as exempt from execution, is adopted by a stranger before an administrator is appointed on his parents' estate, is not derelict in failing to apply to have the insurance set apart to the minor, where, under the statute, such application can only be made upon return of the inventory or thereafter.

Parent and child — effect of adoption on ownership.

4. The adoption of a child after the death of its parents does not affect its status as the heir of such parents.

[See 1 R. C. L. 614.]

— effect of adoption on status of insurance.

5. Upon adoption of a child it ceases to be of the family of its parents.

[See 1 R. C. L. 611.]

Evidence — presumption — interest of minors.

6. It will be presumed that in passing a decree allowing the adoption of infants the court acted for their best interest.

Judgment — void decree of adoption.

7. A decree of adoption procured and entered in fraud of the rights of the minor adopted will be vacated upon proper bill for that purpose.

[See 1 R. C. L. 624 et seq.]

Parent and child — effect of adoption on right to life insurance.

8. The adoption by strangers of children of one leaving life insurance deprives them of the benefit of statutory provisions exempting life insurance from execution and permitting it to be set aside for the use of surviving children of the deceased.

Physician and surgeon — basis of action for malpractice.

9. An action for malpractice sounds in tort, and may have its basis either in a wilful injury, an injury occasioned by negligence, or in the doing of that which is forbidden by positive law.

[See 21 R. C. L. 380, 400.]

Executor and administrator — liability for failure to appeal.

10. An administrator cannot be charged with liability for failing to appeal from a judgment against his intestate or to attempt to compromise the judgment, in the absence of any showing that an appeal would have been successful, or would have resulted in anything other than the imposition of additional and useless expense against the estate.

APPEAL by petitioners from a decree of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County denying a petition to set aside as exempt property certain proceeds from life insurance, and from an order denying exceptions to the final account of the administrator, and from the decree of final distribution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William A. Nunlist, William C. Crittenden, and W. M. Simmons for appellants.

Messrs. Lee C. Gates, Clarence L. Variel, Edmund W. Pugh, O'Melveny, Stevens, & Millikin, and Walter K. Tuller for respondent.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

E. S. Pillsbury died intestate in an automobile accident, in which also his wife was killed. He survived her and left surviving him three minor children, the eldest about the age of fourteen years. His life was insured, the face values of his seven policies amounting to twenty-seven thousand dollars. They were all payable to his wife, and, in the event of her predecease, then to his executors, administrators, or assigns. The proceeds of these policies, therefore, fell into his estate, and upon them his estate realized over twenty-four thousand dollars, which passed into the hands of its administrator.

A. C. Pillsbury, a brother of the deceased, applied for letters of administration on September 14, 1911, and his application was denied on October 6, 1911. On that date, however, A. C. Pillsbury and his wife were appointed guardians of the persons of the minor children of deceased, and the Title Insurance & Trust Company, the respondent herein, was appointed guardian of their estates. Then on November 13, 1911, these minors were legally adopted by A. C. Pillsbury at Oakland, in the county of Alameda, state of California. Thereafter, and on the 24th day of November, 1911, letters of administration in the above-entitled estate were issued to the Title Insurance & Trust Company. This was the first and only appointment of an administrator. On December 28, 1912, this administrator filed its first and final account of its administration, which final account showed disbursements of a large part of the moneys derived from the insurance policies in payment of the approved claims of creditors. On September 25, 1913, A. C. Pillsbury and his wife, as guardians of these minors, filed amended objections and exceptions to this account, and on the same date filed an amended petition asking that the life insurance money collected by the administrator be set apart to the minors as property exempt from execution. This, after hearing in which testimony was taken, the court in probate refused to do, and this appeal has followed.

Appellants' first contention is that by force of our statutes this insurance money was set aside to the minor children of deceased; that the administrator, whose duty it was to its parents by blood is superseded. The duties of a child cannot be owed to two fathers at the same time." No considerations of conceived hardship upon the minors can operate to modify the legal effect of this changed status. If it be said that by virtue of their adoption, they being in their helpless minorities and unable to exercise any independent judgment in the matter of the proceedings, they were wronged, it must be answered that by virtue of their tender infancy they are, in an especial sense, wards of the court in equity, and it must be presumed that in its adoption decree that court acted for the best interests of the minors. Of course, if a case shall arise where such a decree was procured and entered in fraud of the minors' rights, equity will grant its relief by a vacation of that decree, cluded that the minors at the time of this application were not of the family of the deceased, but were of the family of the adopting parents.

There remains to be considered their rights as heirs of the deceased, which rights, as we have said, stand unaffected. Herein it is contended that one payment which the administrator admittedly made was without warrant of law, and that consequently the amount of that payment must be treated as money still in the estate. It appears that the deceased who, in his lifetime, was a physician and surgeon, had been sued for damages for malpractice. He filed an answer and made a motion for a change of venue, which was denied. He did not appeal from this order of denial and the time for appeal had expired before his death. He had waived trial by jury, he had accepted notice of the trial, he had made an ineffectual attempt to secure counsel in Inyo county to represent him, and, failing in this, neither put in an appearance at the time of the trial, nor was he there represented. The trial was had and concluded two days before his death. Ignorant of that death, the trial court entered its judgment against deceased two days after his death. Several months thereafter, and being advised of the death, the court, upon motion of plaintiff in the action, and against the opposition of this respondent, entered the same judgment nunc pro tunc as of the day of the submission of the cause for determination. From this judgment so entered respondent took no appeal, and, the amount of the judgment having been presented as a claim against the estate, and having been approved by respondent and by the court in probate, was paid in due course of administration. The amount of this claim was $9,018.32. The action resulting in this judgment, as has been said, was for malpractice. It was to recover damages sustained by plaintiff's wife for injuries inflicted upon her while she was the patient of the deceased. An action for malpractice may have its basis either in a wilful injury, an injury occasioned by negligence, or, finally, in the doing of that which is forbidden by positive law. But in every instance the action sounds in tort. Abbott v. Mayfield, 8 Kan. App. 387, 56 Pac. 327; Rodgers v. Kline, 56 Miss. 808, 31 Am. Rep. 389; Tucker v. Gillette, 22 Ohio C. C. 664, 12 Ohio C. D. 401; Boor v. Lowrey, 103 Ind. 472, 53 Am. Rep. 519, 3 N. E. 151.

The question presented, then, is, Under the facts shown, did the right of the plaintiff in his damage suit to have the judgment entered after the death of the wrongdoer survive?

Under the maxim, "Actus curiæ neminem gravabit," courts of law and courts of equity from very early times exercised the power of entering judgments and orders nunc pro

tunc in order that the rights of the litigant, who was himself not at fault, should not be impaired or lost. As a specific application of this maxim, it is stated in Bacon's Abridgment, title "Abatement F:": "If the plaintiff or defendant die whilst the court are considering of their judgment, or after a special verdict or special case and pending the time for argument or for advising thereon . . . they will permit the judgment to be entered up as of the term in which it regularly might have been." This power, it has been declared in this state, is inherent in the courts, and elsewhere it has been questioned whether it was within the power of the legislature to deprive the courts of it, making, as it does, so manifestly for justice. Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328. Where the suitor is not at fault, the determinative consideration moving the court is whether or not the action, at the death of the party, was ready for the rendition of final judgment. Freeman, Judgm. § 59. And, says this court in Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. supra: "A nunc pro tunc order should be granted or refused as justice may require, in view of the circumstances of the particular case." Our only statute bearing upon the question is § 669 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares as follows: "If a party die after a verdict or decision upon any issue of fact, and before judgment, the court may nevertheless render judgment thereon. Such judgment is not a lien on the real property of the deceased party, but is payable in the course of administration on his estate." Appellants' first contention upon this proposition is that here is shown a limitation upon the power of our courts thus to enter nunc pro tunc judgments, and that limitation is that a verdict must have been rendered or a decision given, or the court is powerless to enter judgment. But in Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. supra, this section was construed and the construction put upon it is wholly antagonistic to appellants' view. It is there said that the section "does not, however, do away with the rule that authorizes the court to direct that its decision, so far as the same shall be necessary to protect the rights of the parties, shall be entered nunc pro tunc, as of a day anterior to the death of the party." The principle, as has been said, is founded upon the plainest considerations of justice. In an action ex delicto, which unquestionably before trial dies with the wrongdoer, it is the more important that the principle should be invoked than in cases where the right of action survives, and the worst that can happen to the surviving litigant is a retrial, or a change of forum. So, it will be found, without citing specific instances, that the trend of legislation is to broaden even the common-law rule, and to provide that the right of action shall survive in cases ex delicto if the defendant has appeared or has been served with process; while a brief consideration of the adjudged cases will show that nowhere is the principle enunciated denied application because the action is in tort. The quotation from Bacon's Abridgment, supra, it will be noticed, does not do so, and specifically declares that the party shall have relief if his adversary die "whilst the courts are considering of their judgment," which was precisely the situation here presented. Our own cases do not draw the distinction contended for, but state the principle broadly, as always elsewhere it is stated, and upon this precise question the supreme court of Connecticut has thus declared itself: "But it is needless to multiply cases; for it is conceded that this is law with respect to all cases which survive, and in which the executor may enter. But it is contended that the practice does not extend to cases of tort which do not survive. We find no such distinction made in the books. On the contrary, the general principle is laid down without such a limitation; and certainly we should not feel disposed to introduce such a limitation, as we do not think it founded in reason. On the contrary, we find that in cases which were of a character that they would not survive, this practice has been adopted." Brown v. Wheeler, 18 Conn. 199. In Perry v. Wilson, 7 Mass. 393, where the action was ex delicto and the court took the case under advisement, the defendant having died before decision or judgment, a nunc pro tunc judgment was entered, the court saying that "they would always take care that no party should suffer by their delay." In Hocks v. Sprangers, 113 Wis. 143, 89 N. W. 117, the action being ex delicto for slander, the court applied the principle, declaring: "The foundation principle upon which the power rests is that no one should be allowed to lose the legitimate fruits of litigation to which he is a party by mere delay in the administration of the law, whether that delay be caused by the act of the court alone, or by the act of the party against whom relief is sought, or of his counsel." In Dawson v. Waldheim, 89 Mo. App. 245, the action was ex delicto, and the circuit court rendered a judgment after the death of the defendant, and then, as here, entered a nunc pro tunc judgment upon being advised of the death. The court declared that "we . . . uphold the action of the circuit court on the broad ground that a court may, in the exercise of its common-law power, as a general rule, when the state of the record or the minutes kept by the court or clerk show that a suitor was entitled to a particular judgment, but that the judgment was not entered at the term when it should or might have been entered, at a subsequent term, cause the proper judgment to be entered, to relate back to the term when it should have been entered, provided the delay was not occasioned by the party applying." And finally, in Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 64, 26 L. ed. 369, it is said: "We content ourselves with saying that the rule established by the general concurrence of the American and English courts is that, where the delay in rendering a judgment or a decree arises from the act of the court,—that is, where the delay has been caused either for its convenience, or by the multiplicity or press of business, either the intricacy of the questions involved, or of any other cause not attributable to the laches of the parties,—the judgment or the decree may be entered retrospectively, as of a time when it should or might have been entered up. . . . A nunc pro tunc order should be granted or refused, as justice may require in view of the circumstances of the particular case."

Wherefore, it is concluded that the judgment entered against respondent's intestate was a valid judgment.

It is finally urged that respondent was remiss, and therefore should be held to the amount of the judgment, in having failed to appeal from it or to seek a compromise of it. No showing is made that an appeal, if prosecuted, would have been successful, or would have resulted in anything other than the imposition of additional and useless expense against and on the estate, and we are cited to no law, and know of none, which makes it the duty of any trustee to seek to compel a creditor to accept less than his just demand.

Executor and administrator—liability for failure to appeal.

A subsidiary contention of appellant is that the fact that these minors were adopted cannot here be considered, for the reason that the record of adoption was not formally offered and received in evidence. An examination of the transcript shows this contention to be absolutely without merit. The papers were not only actually offered, but actually read in evidence.

Wherefore, the decree appealed from is affirmed.

I. Introductory.

At common law the courts had power to enter judgment nunc pro tunc after the death of a party where the failure to enter judgment in his lifetime was due to the court or its officer.

By the Statute 17 Car. II. chap. 8, § 1, it was provided: "That in all actions personal, real or mixt, the death of either party between the verdict and the judgment, shall not hereafter be alleged for error, so as such judgment be entered within two terms after such verdict." This statute was for a limited period, but was made perpetual by 1 Jac. II. chap. 17, § 5. It has been re-enacted in substance in a number of the states of the Union.

The power of the court to enter judgment nunc pro tunc in case of death where the delay is due to the court is one at common law, and is not dependent upon statute. Mitchell v. Overman (1881) 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. ed. 369 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Teneick v. Flagg (1860) 29 N. J. L. 25; Ryghtmyre v. Durham

In Isley's Case (1589) 1 Leon. 187, 74 Eng. Reprint, 172, where, pending decision on a motion for a stay of judgment after verdict, one of the plaintiffs died, Coke, J., stated that judgment might have relation to the time of the postea, when he was alive, but the judgment was stayed, as against the evidence.

"The power of the court to enter judgment nunc pro tunc does not in any respect depend upon Stat. 17 Car. II. chap. 8. It is a power at common law, and by the ancient practice of the court, to prevent an unjust prejudice to the suitor by the delay unavoidably arising from the act of court, and has been uniformly exercised, unless the delay is imputable to the laches of the party applying. The effect of the judgment, when entered, may depend on the Statute 17 Car. II. chap. 8; but the power to enter it does not." Evans v. Rees (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 167, 113 Eng. Reprint, 774.

The Statute of 17 Car. II. chap. 8, "recognizes, but does not attempt a substitute for, the common-law power immemorially asserted by courts, to give judgments to take effect from a date prior to their rendition, and to operate as if they had been given at that time. Sometimes the power is exercised under the statute, and sometimes independently of it." Fitzgerald v. Stewart (1866) 53 Pa. 343.

In Bridges v. Smyth (1831) 8 Bing. 29, 131 Eng. Reprint, 311, 1 Moore & S. 93, 1 Dowl. P. C. 242, 1 L. J. C. P. N. S. 33, it was held that the rule established by 17 Car. II. of signing judgment within two terms after the death of a party does not apply to a case where parties are hung up by act of law, as there the common law applies and judgment is entered nunc pro tunc. In that case there was a verdict for the plaintiff and a reference as to the amount of damages to an arbitrator, who made his award in the lifetime of the defendant, who moved to reduce the amount of damages, and died pending the motion. It does not appear how the motion was decided.

In Key v. Goodwin (1832) 1 Moore & S. (Eng.) 620, the defendant had a verdict, and a motion for a new trial was suspended by the court, awaiting the decision in another action. The defendant died before judgment, which was entered for him more than two years after the verdict, on the ground that where the proceedings have been stayed by the act of the court itself, the party shall not thereby be prejudiced.

"At common law the death of either a sole plaintiff or defendant, in any case, abated the suit; yet if, after verdict, either party died in vacation, judgment could be entered that vacation as of the preceding term, and it would be a good judgment, as of that preceding term. The death of the party did not abate the suit in any such sense as to render the court powerless to enter a judgment to take effect from a day prior to the death." Fitzgerald v. Stewart (Pa.) supra.

The theory is that the delay of the court ought not to prejudice the parties ("Actus curiæ nemini gravabit"). Crispe v. Barwick (1670) 1 Sid. 462, 82 Eng. Reprint, 1218, 1 Vent. 90, 86 Eng. Reprint, 63; Farnel v. Tipper (1662) Latch, 92, 82 Eng. Reprint, 290; Craven v. Hanley (1738) Barnes, 255, 94 Eng. Reprint, 902; Evans v. Rees (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 167, 113 Eng. Y.) 59, 16 N. Y. Supp. 610. Also cases generally throughout this note.

It seems that the power of the courts to enter nunc pro tunc orders and judgments is discretionary. Dial v. Holter (1856) 6 Ohio St. 228; Tapley v. Goodwell (1877) 122 Mass. 176; Diefendorf v. House (1854) 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 243.

Under the early practice it seems that if a party died after a continuance, judgment could not be entered nunc pro tunc. Thus in Farnel v. Tipper (1662) Latch, 92, 82 Eng. Reprint, 290, it was held that the defendant being dead, judgment might be entered for him nunc pro tunc unless a continuance had been entered. So in Crispe v. Berwick (1668) 1 Vent. 90, 83 Eng. Reprint, 63, 1 Sid. 462, 82 Eng. Reprint, 1218, where, after trial, one of the plaintiffs died during the time taken by the court to consider, judgment for the plaintiff was entered as if given on the return of the postea, "there being no continuance." In Taylor v. Matthews (1716) 10 Mod. 325, 88 Eng. Reprint, 748, it is stated that "if, pending the consideration of the court, the plaintiff die, judgment may be entered without entering the continuances; and then it will have relation to the day in bank. A continuance is nothing but a 'curia advisare vult.'" But in Blackall v. Heal (1696) 1 Comyns, Rep. 12, 92 Eng. Reprint, 933, where one of the plaintiffs died after verdict, the court refused to enter the judgment nunc pro tunc, Holt, Ch. J., stating that "here is a continuance by the curia advisare vult over to this term, and therefore judgment shall not be entered before."

It has been held that a judgment by confession cannot be entered nunc pro tunc after the death of the defendant. Thus, in Bennett v. Davis (1824) 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 68, where a bond and warrant were executed April 10, the declaration was entitled of February term, and the placita was of the same term, one of the defendants died April 14th. It was held to be irregular to enter judgment in the May term as of the February term, as the power conferred by the warrant of attorney was revoked by the death, and the proceedings were set aside. In Oades v. Woodward (1698) 1 Salk. 87, 91 Eng. Reprint, 82, it was held that though judgment by confession upon warrant of attorney may be entered in vacation as of the preceding term, where the defendant died in vacation, it may not be so entered except before the essoin day of the next term. Similarly in Nichols v. Chapman (1832) 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 452, it was held that if the defendant died during a term, judgment on confession may be entered in the term or the vacation after it, relating back to the first day of the term, the court stating that it may not be entered after such vacation.

II. General requisites.

a. Condition of cause.

To enable a judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc after a party has died, the cause at the time of such death must be ripe for judgment. If it is not then in such condition, judgment nunc pro tunc cannot be entered. Wilkins v. Cauty (1842) 6 Jur. (Eng.) 807, 1 Dowl. N. S. 855, 11 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 191; McReynolds v. Brown (1905) 121 Ill. App. 261; Thomson v. Dudley (1837) 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 137; Hazard v. Durant (1883) 14 R. I. 25; Perkins v. Dunlavy (1883) 62 Tex. 241.

Thus, where, on January 21, by consent, an order was entered to stay proceedings on payment of debt and costs March 1, with liberty then to enter judgment if the payment was not then made, and the plaintiff died on February 12, his executors were not allowed to enter judgment as of January 21. Wilkins v. Cauty (Eng.) supra.

Where, in a foreclosure suit after bill taken pro confesso and reference to compute amount, the mortgagor died while the case was on the calendar upon the master's report, it was held that no decree could be had nunc pro tunc, but the suit must be revived. Thomson v. Dudley (1837) 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 137, supra. Compare Young v. Ridenbaugh (1875) 3 Dill. 239, Fed. Cas. No. 18,173, infra, III. e.

"To fix the liability of a defendant in an action which does not survive, so that it may be enforced after death against his administrators, the claim should have ripened into a final judgment for a certain ascertained amount, and not be in such a condition that he may appear and partially defeat the demand. Resisting a judgment for the amount of damages claimed is a part of the defense to all such suits, and this can take place upon a writ of inquiry." Perkins v. Dunlavy (1884) 61 Tex. 241, supra.

So it is error in an equity suit to enter judgment for fees of the solicitor and receiver against a party who died before the evidence as to those fees had been taken. McReynolds v. Brown (1905) 121 Ill. App. 261, supra.

In a case where further evidence was necessary the court said that a judgment nunc pro tunc "on account of death is proper only where a party dies after hearing, while the case is under advisement, or after the case has proceeded so far that judgment can be entered, if not as a merely formal act, at least without the need of further inquiry on evidence into matters of fact involved in the controversy." Hazard v. Durant (1883) 14 R. I. 25, supra.

In this connection reference may be made to Cuebas y Arredondo v. Cuebas y Arredondo (1912) 223 U. S. 376, 56 L. ed. 476, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, where, at the time of the death of a defaulted defendant in an equity case, against whom the bill had been taken pro confesso, the court had no jurisdiction, and the complainant later sought to give the court jurisdiction by amending his bill, striking out the living defendant, it was held that a decree could not be entered nunc pro tunc against the dead defendant.

The cases upon nunc pro tunc entries, after death, of preliminary orders or judgments, are not consistent.

It has been held, on the one hand, that the court will not make a nunc pro tunc entry which is not a final matter. Thus, where, on demurrer to a declaration, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to amend on payment of costs, the plaintiff was not permitted to enter judgment as of the first day of the term of submission, where the defendant died during that term, as the rule permitting the entry of judgments nunc pro tunc ought to be limited to final judgments. North v. Pepper (1839) 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 677. So, where the plaintiff died after argument, but before decision of his motion to strike out the answer, it was held that an order could not be entered striking out the answer as of the day of argument, as this was not a final matter. Reed v. Butler (1860) 11 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 128.

But, on the other hand, where complainant in partition died after argument on his motion to strike out the cross bill of one of the defendants, the order striking out the cross bill was made nunc pro tunc as of the day of submission. Clark v. Van Cleef (1908) 75 N. J. Eq. 152, 71 Atl. 260. See also Lachenmeyer v. Lachenmeyer (1883) 65 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 422, infra, IV. b; Bell v. Bell (1913) 182 Ill. App. 497, infra, IV. c. And in Bank of State v. Kennerly (1832) 37 S. C. L. (3 Rich.) 195, where the nature of the action does not appear, an order for judgment had been made for want of an appearance, but no interlocutory judgment had been entered up when the defendant died, and leave was granted the plaintiff to enter up an interlocutory judgment nunc pro tunc.

It has been held that judgment nunc pro tunc could not be entered where a sole defendant (in ejectment) died after the case had been submitted to referees. Kissam v. Hamilton (1860) 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 369, infra, II. b. But the rule is ordinarily otherwise where, after verdict, there has been a reference to arbitration. Miller v. Spurrs (1883) 2 Moore & S. (Eng.) 730, infra, II. b, and Heathcote v. Wing (1855) 11 Exch. 355, 156 Eng. Reprint, 868, 3 C. L. R. 1110, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 23, infra, II. b.

There are a few cases where judgment after death has been entered nunc pro tunc which, at the time of death, were not ripe for judgment.

In Emery v. Parrott (1871) 107 Mass. 95, the court in an equity case held that one of the defendants "having died since the case was fully argued and an interlocutory decree made upon the merits, and the case referred to a master to state the account, and . . . his surviving partner having been fully heard before the master and before the court on exceptions to his report, a final decree for the plaintiffs should be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of that interlocutory decree." The court said of this case in Hazard v. Durant (1883) 14 R. I. 25: "The decision goes further than any other decision with which we are acquainted and is not supported by the cases cited as authority for it."

Where, on appeal by defendants from a decree in chancery, the appellate court made a decision modifying the decree and directing an account to be stated by a master in a certain manner, taking testimony, and one of the defendants died after such decision, but before the final decision, judgment was ordered as of the date of the first decision. Brodie v. Watkins (1876) 31 Ark. 319.

The theory in such cases is that the common-law power is limited to delays by the court or its officer. It has been considered, however, where, after verdict for the defendants, they moved for an extra allowance, but before the decision granting it one of them died, that judgment was properly entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of verdict and of the motion, the court pointing out that the right to costs followed the verdict, and that the defendants were not to suffer through the court's delay. Arthur v. Schriever (1891) 28 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 59, 16 N. Y. Supp. 610.

The court will not enter judgment nunc pro tunc where the failure to enter it in time was due to the delay of the party desiring to enter the judgment. Fowler v. Whadcock (1741) Barnes, 262, 94 Eng. Reprint, 906; Lawrence v. Hodgson (1827) 1 Younge & J. 368, 148 Eng. Reprint, 713; Lanman v. Audley (1837) 2 Mees. & W. 535, 150 Eng. Reprint, 870, 5 Dowl. Reprint, 389, 4 Dowl. & L. 656, 16 L. J. C. P. N. S. 118; Freeman v. Tranah (1852) 12 C. B. 406, 138 Eng. Reprint, 964, 21 L. J. C. P. N. S.

214, 16 Jur. 1141; Tynan v. Weinhard (1894) 153 IH. 598, 38 N. E. 1014; Tuomy v. Dunn (1879) 77 N. Y. 515; Ogden v. Lee (1847) 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 153; Kissam v. Hamilton (1860) 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 369; Diefendorf v. House (1854) 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 243 (obiter); Jobe v. Kitchen (1894) 22 Pa. Dist. R. 841.

Probably we are to understand that this rule was the reason of the somewhat obscure decisions in Hodges v. Templer (1704) 6 Mod. 191, 87 Eng. Reprint, 945; Copley v. Day (1812) 4 Taunt. 703, 128 Eng. Reprint, 506; Dowbiggin v. Harrison (1830) 10 Barn. & C. 480, 109 Eng. Reprint, 529.

The court refused to allow the plaintiff to enter judgment nunc pro tunc where the plaintiff applied to sign judgment on the day after the time to plead expired, but upon the officer expressing doubt as to whether the time had expired, he forbore to sign judgment, and that day the defendant died. Wilkes v. Perks (1843) 5 Mann. & G. 376, 134 Eng. Reprint, 609, 6 Scott, N. R. 42, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 145, 7 Jur. 68, supra.

Where an action was brought on a judgment recovered in the King's bench, and after judgment the defendant brought a writ of error and obtained a stay, and the plaintiff died before the affirmance, the court refused to permit judgment of affirmance to be entered nunc pro tunc, considering that the plaintiff had not pursued the simplest remedy. Bates v. Lockwood (1787) 1 T. R. 637, 99 Eng. Reprint, 1294.

Where, by stipulation, proceedings were stayed to await the decision of another cause between the parties, and after such decision in favor of the defendant he died after notice of argument, the court held that the delay was that of the parties by reason of that stipulation, and refused leave to enter judgment for the defendant nunc pro tunc. Ogden v. Lee (1847) 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 153.

But delay of the plaintiff in moving for judgment on a verdict until the death of the defendant pending a motion for new trial will not defeat the right to judgment on the verdict nunc pro tunc, where the motion was made three days after the verdict, and notice that it would be made was given when the verdict was returned. Holker v. Kelley (1892) 130 Ind. 356, 15 L.R.A. 622, 30 N. E. 304.

It has been held that delay by referees was not delay by the court. Thus, where a sole defendant in ejectment died after the issues had been submitted to referees, the later report of the referees in his favor could not be filed and judgment entered nunc pro tunc, as the action abated on the death of the defendant, the same as if death had occurred before verdict, the delay of the referees not being that of the court. Kissam v. Hamilton (1860) 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 369.

But, on the other hand, in Heathcote v. Wing (1855) 11 Exch. 355, 156 Eng. Reprint, 868, 3 C. L. R. 1110, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 23, where there had been a reference to an arbitrator, it was said that "the delay of the arbitrator might fairly be considered as the delay of the court." In that case a verdict was taken for the plaintiff at the spring assizes, subject to a reference to arbitration, and the plaintiff died before the arbitrator's decision, which was made on the last day of Michaelmas term, and it was held that the plaintiff's executrix was in time when she applied in Easter term, under 17 Car. II. to enter judgment as of the term after the verdict.

And where a verdict was taken in Hilary term for the plaintiff by consent, subject to the award of an arbitrator, who made his award after Trinity term, the defendant having died meantime, on motion made in Michaelmas term, judgment was entered as of Trinity term, the award being considered as the verdict for the purposes of the Statute of 17 Car. II. chap. 8. Miller v. Spurrs (1833) 2 Moore & S. (Eng.) 730.

III. Status of cause at death.

a. In general.

As already stated, the cause must be ripe for judgment.

In Jennings v. Ashley (1843) 5 Ark. 128, it was held that judgment cannot be entered nunc pro tunc against a party who dies before a verdict, and that this was forbidden by the Arkansas statute. Compare Webber v. Webber (1880) 83 N. C. 280. In Bunker v. Green (1868) 48 Ill. 243, where a plaintiff had a verdict, but died thereafter before judgment, pending a motion for a new trial, judgment was entered for him nunc pro tunc as of eight days before the verdict; it was held that while it may have been irregular to enter a judgment without reviving the suit, and to enter it before the verdict, that this was not such an error as to require a reversal, as by the statute the judgment did not become a lien until the last day of the term.

b. After verdict.

1. In general.

If a party dies after verdict, where the act or delay of the court suspended the entry of judgment, the court may order judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc.

Canada.—Davy v. Cameron (1857) 15 U. C. Q. B. 175; Neil v. McMillan (1868) 27 U. C. Q. B. 257.

The practice was also recognized in Griffiths v. Williams (1830) 1 Crompt. & J. 47, 148 Eng. Reprint, 1329; Clark & L. Invest. Co. v. Rich (1908) 81 Neb. 321, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 682, 115 N. W. 1084; Springsted v. Jayne (1825) 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 423; Beard v. Hall (1878) 79 N. C. 506.

The same principle was applied in Dial v. Holter (1856) 6 Ohio St. 228, where, after verdict and judgment against him in an action of slander, the defendant died in the same term, pending motions for a new trial and in arrest, and it was held that the court, on overruling the motions, properly entered judgment for the plaintiff nunc pro tunc, as of the term of verdict. The court said: "By filing motions for a new trial and in arrest, within the rules of the court, he superseded the judgment, though not the verdict, until the court should make a disposition of them."

"If either party died after a special verdict, and pending the time taken for argument or advisement thereon, or on a motion in arrest of judgment, or for new trial, judgment could be entered at common law after his death as of the term in which the postea was returnable, or judgment would otherwise have been given nunc pro tunc, that the delay arising from the act of the court might not turn to the prejudice of the party." Fitzgerald v. Stewart (1866) 53 Pa. 343.

Thus, the court will order the judgment entered nunc pro tunc where a party dies after a verdict, pending a motion to set aside the verdict. Toulmin v. Anderson (1808) 1 Taunt. 385, 127 Eng. So, where a party dies after verdict, pending the decision upon issues of law (Miles v. Bough (1845) 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 30; Miles v. Williams (1846) 9 Q. B. 47, 115 Eng. Reprint, 1193, 16 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 56, 11 Jur. 36), or pending the decision on exceptions generally (Lewis v. Soper (1857) 44 Me. 72; Kelley v. Riley (1871) 106 Mass. 339, 8 Am. Rep. 336; Tapley v. Martin (1874) 116 Mass. 275).

Plaintiff had a verdict, and after the decision in his favor on a motion in arrest, and pending argument upon issues of law, the plaintiff died and judgment was entered for the plaintiff as of the term in which the motion in arrest was decided. Miles v. Bough (Eng.) supra.

So, judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc where a party dies before judgment, after a special verdict, or a verdict subject to the opinion of the court. Astley v. Reynolds (1731) 2 Strange, 916, 93 Eng. Reprint, 939; Trelawny v. Winchester (1757) 1 Burr. 219, 97 Eng. Reprint, 281, 1 Ld. For illustrations of cases where there were motions both in arrest and for a new trial, see Griffith v. Ogle (1806) 1 Binn. (Pa.) 172; Wood v. Boyle (1896) 177 Pa. 620, 55 Am. St. Rep. 747, 30 Atl. 853. See also Dial v. Holter (1855) 6 Ohio St. 228, supra.

After verdict in the spring on several issues against the defendant and on one for him, the plaintiff moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the last issue, and the defendant moved for a new trial in case the plaintiff's motion was granted, and died the following year, the plaintiff's motion being subsequently granted and the defendant's denied. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff as of the term after verdict. Blewett v. Tregonning (1836) 4 Ad. & El. 1002, 111 Eng. Reprint, 1060.

A motion for an extra allowance has been considered as coming within the same principle. Thus, where, after verdict for the defendants, they moved for an extra allowance, but before the decision granting it one of them died, judgment was properly entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of verdict and of the motion, the court pointing out that the right to costs followed the verdict, and that the defendants were not to suffer through the court's delay. Arthur v. Schriever (1891) 28 Jones & S. 59, 16 N. Y. Supp. 610.

2. Death of one of several plaintiffs or defendants.

Some of the cases applying the rule have been where the party dying was one of the plaintiffs who had a verdict, and judgment was later entered on the verdict for all the plaintiffs nunc pro tunc. Crispe v. Barwick (1670) 1 Sid. 462, 82 Eng. Reprint, 1218, 1 Vent. 90, 86 Eng. Reprint, 63.

So, where the party dying was one of the defendants, judgment was later entered for the plaintiffs on the verdict nunc pro tunc. Harrison v. Heathorn (1843) 1 Dowl. & L. 529, 6 Scott, N. R. 794, 6 Mann. & G. 81, 134 Eng. Reprint, 817; Ryghtmyre v. Durham (1834) 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 245.

Where, in an action of "tort," after a verdict for all the defendants, one of them died pending a motion for a new trial, or denying the motion as to her, the court properly directed judgment for her as of the term of trial. Cowley v. McLaughlin (1884) 137 Mass. 221 (where the motion for a new trial was granted as to one of the surviving defendants).

For a case of death of one of the defendants after a verdict for them, pending their motion for an extra allowance, see Arthur v. Schriever (1891) 28 Jones & S. 59, 16 N. Y. Supp. 610, supra, III. b, 1.

3. Death of sole plaintiff.

The rule applies in case a sole plaintiff dies after verdict for him which is sustained.

England.—Miles v. Bough (1845) 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 30; Miles v. Williams (1846) 9 Q. B. 47, 115 Eng. Reprint, 1193, 16 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 56, 11 Jur. 36; Seymour v. Greenwood (1861) 30 L. J. Exch. N. S. 189.

Canada.—Davy v. Cameron (1857) 15 U. C. Q. B. 175; Neil v. McMillan (1868) 27 U. C. Q. B. 257.

Where, after special verdict, and during argument, the plaintiff died, judgment was entered for the plaintiff (about a year later) as of the term on which the postea was returnable. Trelawny v. Winchester (1757) 1 Burr. 219, 97 Eng. Reprint, 281, 1 Ld. Kenyon, 256, 96 Eng. Reprint, 985.

In Spencer v. Peake (1884) 73 Ga. 803, where it does not appear what was the cause of the delay, where there was a verdict in behalf of an administrator on his application to resign his trust, but he died before judgment, judgment was entered on the verdict nunc pro tunc.

If the plaintiff dies after a verdict for him which is later set aside, judgment may be entered for the defendant nunc pro tunc. Abington v. Lipscomb (1841) 11 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 15; Moor v. Roberts (1858) 3 C. B. N. S. 830, 140 Eng. Reprint, 970.

Thus, a plaintiff having died after a verdict for him, pending a motion for a nonsuit which was afterward granted, judgment was entered for the defendant as of the term of the verdict. Abington v. Lipscomb (Eng.) supra.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff at the sittings after Trinity term, 1857; in Michaelmas term, a rule nisi was obtained to enter a verdict for the defendants; this rule was made absolute to enter a nonsuit, in Hilary term, 1858. The plaintiff having died in December, 1857, the court in January, 1859, allowed judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc as of Michaelmas term, 1857. Moor v. Roberts (Eng.) supra.

So, where, after a nonsuit, the plaintiff died pending his motion for a new trial, judgment for the defendant was entered as of the next term after nonsuit, though more than two terms had elapsed before judgment. Spalding v. Congdon (1836) 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 548.

4. Death of sole defendant.

The rule also applies in case a sole defendant dies after a verdict for the plaintiff which is sustained.

Connecticut.—Collins v. Prentice (1843) 15 Conn. 423.

Illinois.—Linn v. Brecher (1900) 90 Ill. App. 6.

Indiana.—Hilker v. Kelley (1892) 130 Ind. 356, 15 L.R.A. 622, 30 N. E. 304; Valparaiso v. Chester (1911) 176 Ind. 636, 96 N. E. 765.

Maine.—Lewis v. Soper (1857) 44 Me. 72.

Massachusetts.—Terry v. Briggs (1853) 12 Cush. 319; Kelley v. Riley (1871) 106 Mass. 339, 8 Am. Rep. 336; Tapley v. Martin (1874) 116 Mass. 275.

New Hampshire.—Blaisdell v. Harris (1872) 52 N. H. 191.

New Jersey.—Den v. Tomlin (1840) 18 N. J. L. 14, 35 Am. Dec. 525.

England.—Astley v. Reynolds (1731) 2 Strange, 916, 93 Eng. Reprint, 939; Tooker v. Beaufort (1757) 1 Burr. 146, 97 Eng. Reprint, 238; Green v. Cobden (1837) 4 Scott, 486.

So, if the defendant dies pending his motion to set aside the verdict, on the motion being granted, judgment may be entered for the defendant nunc pro tunc. Thus, where, on such a motion, judgment of nonsuit was given, the defendant's representatives were held entitled, upon application to the court, to enter up the judgment as of the term next after the trial, that they might get the costs of the nonsuit. Toulmin v. Anderson (1808) 1 Taunt. 385, 127 Eng. Reprint, 883.

Where the defendant dies after verdict for him, pending the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, on the motion being denied, judgment may be entered for the defendant nunc pro tunc. Key v. Goodwin (1832) 1 Moore & S. (Eng.) 620; Gurney v. Parks (1845) 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 140.

Where the defendant had a verdict and died thereafter before the first day of the next term wherein the plaintiff moved for a new trial, and the court took time to consider, and, owing to this and other matters not fairly attributable to laches, judgment was not entered within two terms after verdict, it was held that judgment might be entered for the defendant nunc pro tunc, as of the second term after verdict. Evans v.

Rees (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 167, 113 Eng. Reprint, 774, 4 Perry & D. 36, 9 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 817.

5. Time as of which entry is made.

Entry nunc pro tunc is usually made as of the time or term of verdict. Collins v. Prentice (1843) 15 Conn. 423; Linn v. Brecher (1900) 90 Ill. App. 6; Cowley v. McLaughlin (1884) 137 Mass. 221; Blaisdell v. Harris (1872) 52 N. H. 191; Arthur v. Schriever (1891) 28 Jones & S. 59, 16 N. Y. Supp. 610; Dial v. Holter (1856) 6 Ohio St. 228; Crispe v. Barwick (1670) 1 Sid. 462, 82 Eng. Reprint, 1218, 1 Vent. 90, 86 Eng. Reprint, 63; Abington v. Lipscomb (1841) 11 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 15.

Sometimes, however, under the early practice it was entered as of the next term after verdict. Tooker v. Beaufort (1757) 1 Burr. 146, 97 Eng. Reprint, 238; Toulmin v. Anderson (1808) 1 Taunt. 385, 127 Eng. Reprint, 883; Blewett v. Tregonning (1836) 4 Ad. & El. 1002, 111 Eng. Reprint, 1060; Mackay v. Rhinelander (1800) 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 408; Ryghtmyre v. Durham (1834) 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 245; Gurney v. Parks (1845) 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 140. See also Moor v. Roberts (1858) 3 C. B. N. S. 830, 140 Eng. Reprint, 970, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 161, 4 Jur. N. S. 241, 6 Week. Rep. 297, supra, III. b, 3.

Or, as it is sometimes expressed, as of the term when the postea was returnable. Trelawny v. Winchester (1757) 1 Burr. 219, 97 Eng. Reprint, 281, 1 Ld. Kenyon, 256, 96 Eng. Reprint, 985; Den v. Tomlin (1840) 18 N. J. L. 14, 35 Am. Dec. 525; Teneick v. Flagg (1860) 29 N. J. L. 25.

In Spalding v. Congdon (1836) 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 543, it was ordered to be entered as of the next term after a nonsuit.

It has also been entered as of the second term after verdict. Evans v. Rees (Eng.) supra. And as of the term of argument. Harrison v. Heathorn (1843) 1 Dowl. & L. 529, 6 Scott, N. R. 794, 6 Mann. & G. 81, 134 Eng. Reprint, 817.

Where, pending a motion for a new trial in a negligence case, after verdict for the plaintiff, he died, it was held that judgment was properly entered for him nunc pro tunc as of the time of submission of the motion. LENOIR CAR WORKS V. TRINKLE (reported herewith) ante, 1894.

c. After trial or hearing by the court.

1. In general.

The same rule applies that judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc where there has been a hearing or trial of fact or law by the court, and a party dies after such trial or hearing, but before the decision. Citizens' Bank v. Brooks (1884) 23 Blatchf. 137, 23 Fed. 21; Merchants Loan & T. Co. v. Egan (1908) 143 Ill. App. 572; Perry v. Wilson (1811) 7 Mass. 393; Webber v. Stanton (1864) 1 Mich. N. P. 97 (obiter); Hess v. Cole (1851) 23 N. J. L. 116; RE PILLSBURY (reported herewith) ante, 1896; Re Jarrett (1884) 42 Ohio St. 199; Stilwell v. Smith (1907) 219 Pa. 36, 67 Atl. 910. See also, as recognizing the rule, Mannix v. Elder (1885) 1 Ohio C. D. 36.

It is stated in 2 Fowler, Exch. Pr. (Eng.) 169, that in Jones v. Le David, Hil. T. 1791, "where a cause was finally heard, and the court took time to consider of their judgment, and in the meanwhile the party plaintiff died, the court gave judgment nunc pro tunc, and ordered that their decree should have relation to, and be entered upon, the day that the cause was finally heard; and in this decree the plaintiff had relief."

Where the plaintiff in a state court died while the case in that court was held under advisement, it was held that the state court properly entered a decree for the plaintiff as of the last day of the term at which it was submitted. Mitchell v. Overman (1881) 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. ed. 369, where the court does not comment on the fact that the case was submitted with a stipulation that the decree was to be rendered as of the term of trial and submission (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

In Mitchell v. Schoonover (1888) 16 Or. 211, 8 Am. St. Rep. 282, 17 Pac. 867, where it was held that it was not necessary to enter judgment nunc pro tunc against the defendant, who died the day judgment was entered, the court said: "At the time the demurrer was overruled the plaintiff was then entitled to a judgment according to the prayer of his complaint. His cause of action stood admitted upon the record, and it was the duty of the court to enter judgment against the defendant according to the facts as they were alleged in the complaint. If, while the cause is in this condition, the defendant dies, the plaintiff is not to lose the fruits of his litigation, and if necessary, it is the duty of the court to enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the previous term, or, under our practice, an earlier day in that term."

When in trustee process a trustee has answered, and the cause is continued, and the trustee dies before judgment is rendered, judgment may be rendered against the trustee, as of the term when he answered. Hall v. Harvey (1824) 3 N. H. 61.

Where, in a foreign attachment, the trustee had disclosed, but not sufficiently, and refused to submit to a further examination ordered to be had before a justice of the peace, and died before the next term, as did also the principal debtor, who was in default, judgment was entered against both as of the preceding term. Patterson v. Buckminster (1817) 14 Mass. 144.

Where, pending a motion to set aside a report of a referee in favor of the plaintiff, he died, it was stated that the ordinary practice would have allowed judgment for the plaintiff nunc pro tunc; but it was held that the particular court had no such power under the wording of the Constitution, as it was about to go out of existence. Smith v. Miller (1847) 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 132.

But where a sole defendant in ejectment died after the issues had been submitted to referees, it was held that the later report of the referees in his favor could not be filed and judgment entered nunc pro tunc, as the action abated on the death of the defendant, the same as if death had occurred before verdict; the delay of the referee was not that of the court. Kissam v. Hamilton (1860) 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 369.

2. Equity cases.

So, in equity cases the same general rule applies where a party dies after submission, but before judgment, that judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc.

United States.—Sharon v. Terry (1888) 1 L.R.A. 572, 13 Sawy. 387, 36 Fed. 354.

Iowa.—Flock v. Wyatt (1878) 49 Iowa, 466.

Michigan.—Gunderman v. Gunnison (1878) 39 Mich. 313.

New Jersey.—Burnham v. Dalling (1863) 16 N. J. Eq. 310; Molineaux v. Reynolds (1896) 55 N. J. Eq. 187, 36 Atl. 276 (obiter).

New York.—Campbell v. Mesier (1819) 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570; Ehle v. Moyer (1852) 8 How. Pr. 244.

Pennsylvania.—Schaeffer v. Coldren (1912) 237 Pa. 77, 85 Atl. 98, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 175.

England.—Turner v. London & S. W. R. Co. (1874) L. R. 17 Eq. 561, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 430; Ecroyd v. Coulthard [1897] 2 Ch. 554, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 751, 77 L. T. N. S. 357, 46 Week. Rep. 119, 61 J. P. 791.

Canada.—Snell v. Brickles (1913) 9 D. L. R. 840, 4 Ont. Week. N. 707, 24 Ont. Week. Rep. 28, reversed on other grounds in (1913) 12 D. L. R. 753, 4 Ont. Week. N. 951, 28 Ont. L. Rep. 358.

In Collinson v. Lister (1855) 20 Beav. 355, 52 Eng. Reprint, 639, more fully reported in a note in Turner v. London & S. W. R. Co. (1874) L. R. 17 Eq. (Eng.) 568, it was held that the decree would be dated on the date of argument, where a party had died before the decision.

It is irregular in partition, when one of the defendants has died after submission of the cause, to enter a decree against such defendant as of a date after his death; in such case judgment must be entered as of a date prior to his death. Flock v. Wyatt (1878) 49 Iowa, 466.

Where complainant in partition died after argument on his motion to strike out the cross bill of one of the defendants, the order striking out the cross bill was made nunc pro tunc as of the day of submission. Clark v. Van Cleef (1908) 75 N. J. Eq. 152, 71 Atl. 260.

Where the cestui que trust of the complainant died after argument, and before the decision by which the suit was determined, the court ordered the decree to be entered nunc pro tunc as of the time of the argument. Wood v. Keyes (1837) 6 Paige (N. Y.) 478.

But where a dowress died after argument on a bill for dower, and before decision the chancellor went out of office, the court declined to permit a decree to be entered nunc pro tunc, merely for the purpose of determining costs. Johnson v. Thomas (1831) 2 Paige (N. Y.) 377.

Contra.

Where, after submission of an equity case to set aside a deed, but before the decision, the principal defendant dies, judgment against him after his death is error, although dated while he was living, as in such case there is no authority to enter a decree except as of the exact date when rendered, the court considering that the heirs of the decedent were entitled to a day in court. Powe v. McLeod (1884) 76 Ala. 418.

3. Time as of which entry is made.

Entry is usually made as of the time of submission.

United States.—Citizen's Bank v. Brooks (1884) 23 Blatchf. 137, 23 Fed. 21; Sharon v. Terry (1888) 1 L.R.A. 572, 13 Sawy. 387, 36 Fed. 354, affirmed in (1889) 131 U. S. 40, 33 L. ed. 94, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705.

Michigan.—Webber v. Stanton (1864) 1 Mich. N. P. 97 (obiter); Gunderman v. Gunnison (1878) 39 Mich. 313.

New York.—Campbell v. Mesier (1819) 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570; Ehle v. Moyer (1852) 8 How. Pr. 244.

Ohio.—Re Jarrett (1884) 42 Ohio St. 199.

Pennsylvania.—Stilwell v. Smith (1907) 219 Pa. 36, 67 Atl. 910; Schaeffer v. Coldren (1912) 237 Pa. 77, 85 Atl. 98, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 175.

England.—Jones v. Le David (1791) 2 Fowler, Exch. Pr. 169.

Canada.—Snell v. Brickles (1913) 9 D. L. R. 840, 4 Ont. Week. N. 707, 24 Ont. Week. Rep. 28, reversed on other grounds in (1913) 12 D. L. R. 753, 4 Ont. Week. N. 951, 28 Ont. L. Rep. 358.

Sometimes it is ordered as of the term of submission. Hess v. Cole (1850) 23 N. J. L. 116. Or as of the last day of the term of submission. Mitchell v. Overman (1880) 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. ed. 369 (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

d. After assessment of damages.

Where a party dies after assessment of damages, but before entry of judgment, judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc. Lure v. Rest (1711) 10 Mod. (Eng.) 30, 88 Eng. Reprint, 611; Wilkins v. Wainwright (1899) 173 Mass. 212, 53 N. E. 397.

Thus, where, after writ of inquiry executed, but before entry of judgment, which was delayed by act of the court, the plaintiff died, the court apparently granted a motion to enter judgment "as of two or three terms ago." Lure v. Rest (Eng.) supra.

So, where, in a case tried by a court without a jury, damages in tort have been assessed before the death of the defendant, and nothing remains but to dispose of a motion for a new trial, judgment may be entered for the plaintiff nunc pro tunc. Wilkins v. Wainwright (Mass.) supra.

But it has been held that a decree cannot be entered nunc pro tunc in foreclosure when the mortgagor dies while the case is on the calendar upon the report of the master to whom it had been referred to compute the amount. Thomas v. Dudley (1837) 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 137.

In Ireland v. Champneys (1813) 4 Taunt. 884, 128 Eng. Reprint, 580, where, after interlocutory judgment in libel, and assessment of damages against the defendant, the plaintiff died before final judgment, it was held that judgment could not be entered under 17 Car. II. as the suit had abated by the plaintiff's death. But see the comment on this case in Kramer v. Waymark (1866) L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 241, 4 Hurlst. & C. 427, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 148, 12 Jur. N. S. 395, 14 L. T. N. S. 368, 14 Week. Rep. 659, infra, V.

Where the death of a party occurs after the decision, but before the formal entry of judgment, the court in a proper case may order the judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc. Norwich v. Berry (1769) 4 Burr. 2277, 98 Eng. Reprint, 187; Glass v. Glass (1854) 24 Ala. 468; Reid v. Morton (1886) 119 Ill. 118, 6 N. E. 414; Chester v. Graves (1914) 159 Ky. 244, 166 S. W. 998, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 678; Reynolds v. Adams (1911) 90 Neb. 343, 133 N. W. 401; Fulton v. Fulton (1880) 8 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 210; Murray v. Cooper (1820) 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 126; Re Lindsay (1895) 25 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 406.

In Chester v. Graves (1914) 159 Ky. 244, 166 S. W. 998, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 678, the court said: "From the earliest times courts of law and equity have possessed and exercised the power of making entries of judgments and decrees nunc pro tunc in cases where such entries are necessary to prevent injustice to suitors. . . . Such power does not depend upon any statute, but it is inherent in the courts. . . . One of the classes of cases in which judgments may be entered nunc pro tunc is where the former judgment has been pronounced by the court, but not entered of record by reason of some accident or mistake, or through the neglect or omission or misprision of the clerk. In such a case the court rendering the judgment has the power to order the judgment so rendered to be entered nunc pro tunc, provided there be satisfactory evidence, not only of the rendition, but of the terms of the judgment."

Often the failure to enter judgment in such case is due to the omission or mistake of the court officer. Glass v. Glass (1854) 24 Ala. 468; Chester v. Graves (Ky.) supra; Reynolds v. Adams (1911) 90 Neb. 343, 133 N. W. 401; Murray v. Cooper (1820) 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 126.

Thus, where, after a decision for the plaintiff, the prothonotary omitted to enter the judgment, and the defendant died, it was held that eight years after the decision, judgment was properly entered nunc pro tunc as of the term of decision. Murray v. Cooper (Pa.) supra.

Sometimes the decision is placed on the ground that the omission was due to the court's delay, as in Re Lindsay (1895) 25 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 406, where a surviving partner offered to purchase the interest of his deceased partner in the firm at a price named, subject to the "approval" of the orphans' court, and the matter was submitted to the orphans' court, verbally approved, and instructions given to draw a decree in accordance therewith. Such decree was accordingly drawn and presented for signature, but signing was delayed by reason of the absence of the president judge who had heard the matter. In the meantime, the survivor died. It was held that the decree would be made nunc pro tunc, as the delay of the court would not be permitted to prejudice the interests of the parties.

And in general, when such an entry is reasonable, the court may order it.

Thus, in Norwich v. Berry (1769) 4 Burr. 2277, 98 Eng. Reprint, 187, judgment for the defendant on demurrer was entered as of the term when it was pronounced, some eighteen months before, where he died after that term, the court thinking it reasonable to do so.

So, where a guardian's sale was approved by an indorsement by the judge on the report of sale, it was held proper, on behalf of the purchasers, to enter a formal order of approval nunc pro tunc, though after the death of the guardian, as a correction of the records. Reid v. Morton (1886) 119 Ill. 118, 6 N. E. 414.

So, where the master reported, there being no contest, that a bankrupt was entitled to his discharge, and the next day the bankrupt died, an order of discharge was properly entered as of the day of the report. Young v. Ridenbaugh (1875) 3 Dill. 239, Fed. Cas. No. 18,173.

In Fulton v. Fulton (1880) 8 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 210, after an oral direction for judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover the value of her dower interest, she died within a few days, having consented to take a gross sum in lieu of dower, and it was held proper that the decision and judgment be signed and entered nunc pro tunc.

But in Franklin v. Merida (1875) 50 Cal. 289, where a judgment rendered in the lifetime of the plaintiff was not recorded until after his death, it was held to be unnecessary and erroneous to order the record amended as if the judgment were entered nunc pro tunc, where the rights of the plaintiff and his successor did not require such an amendment.

In Re Cook (1888) 77 Cal. 220, 1 L.R.A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered by the court in the lifetime of the plaintiff takes effect from its rendition, although the clerk fails to enter it; and that its entry nunc pro tunc after the plaintiff's death is immaterial. And on a further appeal the court declined to consider the nunc pro tunc decree as void. Re Cook (1890) 83 Cal. 415, 23 Pac. 392.

See also Lachenmeyer v. Lachenmeyer (1888) 65 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 422, infra, IV. c.

1. Pending appeal or writ of error.

1. In general.

There are comparatively few cases upon the power to enter a judgment of the appellate court nunc pro tunc where a party has died before the hearing of an appeal or writ of error.

In Borer v. Chapman (1886) 119 U. S. 587, 30 L. ed. 532, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, a personal judgment entered against defendant, sued as executor, having been reversed by the Supreme Court after the latter's death, upon application of his personal representative, who had been substituted as plaintiff in error, upon the ground that it should have been rendered de bonis testatoris, and the cause having been remanded to the circuit court with instructions to take further proceedings in conformity with the opinion, it was held that the circuit court properly entered judgment de bonis testatoris nunc pro tunc as of a time prior to the defendant's death.

Where the complainant appealed from a part of the decree and died before the hearing, but, the fact of his death being unknown to the counsel, the cause was afterwards heard and decided by the chancellor upon the appeal, modifying the decree, it was held that the decree upon the appeal might be entered nunc pro tunc, as of a day previous to the death of the complainant, and after the entering of the appeal, but without prejudice to the rights of the parties. Vroom v. Ditmas (1886) 5 Paige (N. Y.) 528.

In Bemus v. Beekman (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 667, where one of the parties to a writ of error died "since the joinder in error," it was held that the judgment in error would be directed to be entered nunc pro tunc as of a time previous to his death.

Compare a decision in a case where the party had not pursued the simplest remedy. Bates v. Lockwood (1787) 1 T. R. 637, 99 Eng. Reprint, 1294, supra, II. b.

Where the plaintiff brought error from a nonsuit in trespass quare clausum fregit, and died "pending the writ of error," and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, judgment was entered nunc pro tunc as of a term when he was alive. King v. Dunn (1839) 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 253.

In Miller v. Gunn (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 159, where, after perfecting an appeal from a judgment against him in slander, the defendant died before argument, the court directed judgment of affirmance to be entered as of a day previous to his death. In granting a motion by his personal representatives to continue the action in their names, so that they might, if they chose, take a further appeal, the court said: "The objection that there was no necessity for this motion, so far as the pending appeal was concerned, was well founded. The case is analogous to the writ of error at common law, where, if error had not been assigned, the writ abated by the death of the plaintiff in error; but if the death happened after error assigned, the cause proceeded. In such case, the court of review directed judgment to be entered upon its decision as of a day anterior to the death of the party. So in this very case, since this motion was made, the appeal has been argued at a general term of this court, and the judgment affirmed. The court directed the judgment upon such affirmance to be entered as of a day previous to the death of the defendant."

In affirming a judgment in trustee process in favor of the alleged trustee, where it was suggested that the principal debtor had deceased since the judgment below, the court said: "It is the common practice to affirm or reverse the judgment nunc pro tunc in such case." Adams v. Newell (1836) 8 Vt. 190.

In Snow v. Carpenter (1881) 54 Vt. 17, where one of the appellants died after argument, but before the decision, and there seems to have been no nunc pro tunc entry, the court cites Adams v. Newell (Vt.) supra, as authority for the statement that "in case one of the parties dies after judgment in the county court, and before hearing in the supreme court, the practice is to affirm or reverse the judgment nunc pro tunc."

When a judgment for a plaintiff in a personal action has been erroneously set aside, and a subsequent final judgment against him is brought up by writ of error, pending which he dies, the Supreme Court will affirm the judgment in his favor nunc pro tunc as of the date when it was rendered. Coughlin v. District of Columbia (1882) 106 U. S. 7, 27 L. ed. 74,

1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37 (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

Where, on an appeal from a decree for the defendant in an equity case, the decision was for the plaintiff, and it appeared that the defendant had died during the term in which the case was argued and decided, judgment was entered as of the first day of that term. Bank of United States v. Weisiger (1829) 2 Pet. (U. S.) 481, 7 L. ed. 492 (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

But where the plaintiff died after judgment in his favor, but before the term of the appellate court to which an appeal had been taken, the court stated (there having been an opinion for affirmance) that if the death had occurred after submission, judgment might have been entered nunc pro tunc; but that there was no day as of which a judgment could be entered in the appellate court in the life of the party. Lea v. Gauze (1843) 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 9.

Before rehearing.

Where, on an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of slander, the judgment was reversed, and shortly thereafter the appellant died, the appellate court, on a later rehearing, reduced the verdict by an amount sufficient to free it from the errors of the trial, and directed judgment to be entered as of the time of the original reversal. Hocks v. Sprangers (1902) 113 Wis. 123, 87 N. W. 1101, 89 N. W. 113.

A decree nunc pro tunc is properly entered on rehearing in lieu of the former decree, which is set aside because a fact was overlooked, when the petitioner has died since the original submission, but before the first decision. New Orleans v. Warner (1899) 176 U. S. 92, 44 L. ed. 385, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280.

2. After submission.

(a) In general.

Where a party dies after submission of an appeal or writ of error to the appellate court, but before decision, judgment on the appeal may be entered nunc pro tunc.

United States.—Clay v. Smith (1830) 3 Pet. 411, 7 L. ed. 723 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Richardson v. Green (1888) 130 U. S. 104, 32 L. ed. 872, 9 Sup. Ct. England.—Cumber v. Wane (1721) 1 Strange, 426, 93 Eng. Reprint, 613.

Canada.—Gunn v. Harper (1902) 3 Ont. L. Rep. 693; Young v. Gravenhurst (1911) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 467, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 812; Bryce v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1908) 13 B. C. 446.

The same principle was asserted in Boyes v. Masters (1911) 28 Okla. 409, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 576, 114 Pac. 712.

Where the defendant brought error from a judgment granting partial relief to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff alleged cross error, in reversing the judgment on the cross error the court directed judgment to be entered as of the date of submission, the defendant in error having died since that time. Peters v. Harris (1910) 245 Ill. 419, 92 N. E. 281.

Where one of the plaintiffs died after argument on appeal from judgments against the defendants in an action for personal injuries, and from a cause other than the injuries, the court, in reducing the amount, ordered that its judgment should be entered as of the date when argument was concluded. Young v. Gravenhurst (1911) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 467, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 812.

On an appeal from a judgment for the defendant in an action for damages due to a collision of vessels, where the appellants stated that if the appeal were allowed they would not bring any more evidence as to the amount of compensation, the court, in reversing the judgment, assessed the damages, and, inter alia, awarded damages to one of the plaintiffs suing for himself, and also damages to him "suing as administrator of his wife, deceased," to be apportioned between himself and his mother-in-law in a stated proportion. On it appearing that such plaintiff had died after argument of the appeal, but before judgment, judgment was antedated as of the last day of argument. Bryce v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1908) 13 B. C. 446.

The appellate court has power to amend an order of reversal by changing its date to a date prior to the death of a party, which occurred after submission, but before decision. Carter v. Beckwith' (1880) 82 N. Y. 83; Re Beckwith (1882) 87 N. Y. 503.

Where, after argument of an appeal by a purchaser in partition from an order requiring him to complete, one of the plaintiffs died, the order of affirmance was properly entered nunc pro tunc as of a day prior to the death. Bergen v. Wyckoff (1881) 84 N. Y. 659.

In Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Cunningham (1904) 141 Ala. 470, 37 So. 689, where the plaintiff died pending an appeal from a judgment in his favor, it was held that the judgment of affirmance had effect as of the time of submission.

In Wallace v. Wallace (1912) 150 Ky. 33, 150 S. W. 18, where appellee died after submission, but before the affirmance, it was held that the judgment related back to the date of submission, and that it was therefore unnecessary to enter the judgment nunc pro tunc.

In Goggin v. Cord (1885) 7 Ky. L. Rep. 39, it was held that the Kentucky court of appeals "has power to render judgment against an appellee who is dead if he was alive when the cause was submitted, and this power does not depend upon the judgment showing that it is entered as of a day prior to the death."

Where, after a writ of error in a chancery suit had been sued out by the complainant from the decision of the supreme court of Arkansas to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, before the decision of that court, one of the original defendants died, upon the filing of the mandate of the United States Supreme Court, reversing the judgment, the Arkansas supreme court considered the case to be the same as if the death had occurred after submission to the Arkansas supreme court, and before its decision, and therefore ordered judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc as of a day prior to the death, and subsequent to the submission of the cause. Cunningham v. Ashley (1852) 13 Ark. 653.

In Aultman v. Utsey (1891) 35 S.

C. 596, 14 S. E. 289, 351, in denying a motion to set aside a judgment of affirmance where the appellant had died after submission and before decision, the court said: "It seems to us that the true rule to be deduced from the case of Keep v. Leckie (1854) 42 S. C. L. (8 Rich.) 164, is, that where a party dies after a final hearing of his cause, and before the actual rendition of the judgment, such judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc, as of the first day of the term at which the final hearing was had, notwithstanding the death of the party during the time taken by the court for deliberation, and before the final conclusion has been announced. This rule seems to have been recognized and acted upon from the earliest times."

The rule applies where the party dying is the defendant in error or respondent, and there is an affirmance on the appeal. Travelers' Protective Asso. v. Brazington (1919) — Ind. App. —, 123 N. E. 221; Wilson v. Chipewa Valley Electric R. Co. (1908) 135 Wis. 18, 114 N. W. 462, 115 N. W. 330. So where one of the respondents dies and there is an affirmance. Tallman v. Wallack (1896) — N. J. —, 41 Atl. 677. So where one of the successful plaintiffs dies, and the court, on appeal, reduces the amount of damages. Young v. Gravenhurst (1911) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 467, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 812.

In affirming a judgment in trustee process in favor of the alleged trustee where it was suggested that the principal debtor had deceased since the judgment below, the court said: "It is the common practice to affirm or reverse the judgment nunc pro tunc in such case." Adams v. Newell (1836) 8 Vt. 190.

It may be noted that where the respondent died on the day of the decision of affirmance, judgment was entered nunc pro tunc as of that date. Peetsch v. Quinn (1893) 6 Misc. 52, 26 N. Y. Supp. 729, but the judgment was reversed on further appeal (1894) 7 Misc. 6, 27 N. Y. Supp. 323.

So where the defendant in error or respondent dies after submission, but before decision, a judgment of reversal may be entered nunc pro tunc. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Behlmer (1899) 175 U. S. 648, 44 L. ed. 309, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209; Pool v. Loomis (1843) 5 Ark. 110; Savings & L. Soc. v. Gibb (1863) 21 Cal. 609; Holloway v. Galliac (1874) 49 Cal. 149; *Macon v. (d) Death of appellant before affirmance.

So, where the plaintiff in error or appellant dies after submission, but before decision, a judgment of affirmance may be entered nunc pro tunc. Cumber v. Wane (1721) 1 Strange, 426, 93 Eng. Reprint, 613; Black v. Shaw (1862) 20 Cal. 68; Ede v. Cuneo (1898) — Cal. —, 55 Pac. 772; Re Dolbeer (1906) 149 Cal. 227, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Leonard v. Springer (1912) 174 Ill. App. 516; Kuechle v. Springer (1913) 177 Ill. App. 616; Miller v. Gunn (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 159; Gunn v. Harper (1902) 3 Ont. L. Rep. 693.

So in like case where one of the appellants dies. Beach v. Gregory (1856) 3 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 78, affirming (1855) 2 Abb. Pr. 203.

In McLean v. State (1873) 8 Heisk. (Tenn.) 22, the court, in affirming a judgment in part after the death of one of the appellants who had died since the argument, gave leave to enter the judgment of affirmance as of the term of argument; but it seems that the state waived the right.

So, where the plaintiff in error or appellant dies after submission, but before decision, judgment of reversal may be entered nunc pro tunc. Clay v. Smith (1830) 3 Pet. 411, 7 L. ed. 723 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Pritchett v. Bartow County (1894) 94 Ga. 731, 20 S. E. 256; *Seymour v. O. S. tral Sav. Bank v. Shine (1871) 48 Mo. 456, 8 Am. Rep. 112.

So, where one of the successful appellants dies. Case v. San Juan County (1910) 59 Wash. 222. See also Bryce v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1908) 13 B. C. 446, supra, III. f, 2 (a).

(f) Time as of which entered.

The usual practice is to enter the judgment as of the term or time of submission.

Sometimes, however, it is ordered to be entered as of some time or term when the party dying was alive. Pool v. Loomis (1848) 5 Ark. 110; Black v. Shaw (1862) 20 Cal. 68; Savings & L. Soc. v. Gibb (1863) 21 Cal. 609; Ede v. Cuneo (1898) — Cal. —, 55 Pac. 772; Leonard v. Springer (1912) 174 Ill. App. 516; Kuechle v. Springer (1913) 177 Ill. App. 616; Miller v. Gunn (1852) 7 How. In Clay v. Smith (1830) 3 Pet. (U. S.) 411, 7 L. ed. 723 (see also Rose's Notes to this case), the plaintiff in error having died while the cause was held under advisement, judgment in his favor was entered as of the first day of the term.

IV. Divorce.

Where a party to a divorce suit dies before the rendition of a decree, none can be entered nunc pro tunc. Wilson v. Wilson (1889) 73 Mich. 620, 41 N. W. 817; Young v. Young (1901) 165 Mo. 624, 88 Am. St. Rep. 440, 65 S. W. 1016; Re Crandall (1909) 196 N. Y. 127, 134 Am. St. Rep. 830, 89 N. E. 578, 17 Ann. Cas. 874.

Thus, where complainant in divorce died after submission, it was error to enter a decree for him nunc pro tunc. Wilson v. Wilson (Mich.) supra.

So, there can be no entry of a decree nunc pro tunc when a party dies after hearing in a divorce case, and there is no written evidence of a decision before the death. Young v. Young (Mo.) supra, so holding as to the law of California.

So, where the plaintiff dies after interlocutory judgment of divorce in his favor, final judgment cannot thereafter be entered nunc pro tunc. Re Crandall (N. Y.) supra.

In Stanhope v. Stanhope (1886) L. R. 11 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 103, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 36, 54 L. T. N. S. 906, 34 Week. Rep. 446, 50 J. P. 276, holding, where the plaintiff in divorce had obtained a decree nisi, but died before the time for making it absolute, that the suit ended with the death of the plaintiff, and that no judgment could be entered, Fry, J., stated that the court had no power to declare that the marriage was dissolved at an earlier date.

In Swan v. Harrison (1865) 2 Coldw. (Tenn.) 534, it was held that no decree of divorce could be entered against a husband nunc pro tunc where he died after the case had been submitted to referees.

There are at least two cases contrary to the general rule. Thus, where the plaintiff in divorce died during the trial, but before the retirement of the jury, judgment was ordered upon the verdict for the plaintiff as of the term when rendered, on the theory that all proceedings are treated as if they took place on the first day of the term. Webber v. Webber (1880) 83 N. C. 280.

In Kinney v. Tri-State Teleph. Co. (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 201 S. W. 1180, it was held that a final decree of divorce entered after the death of the complainant, who had obtained an interlocutory decree, was valid. It is stated in the opinion that it was claimed that the final decree, "having been entered nunc pro tunc, reverted back to the interlocutory decree in point of time," but the language of the final decree does not state that it was made nunc pro tunc.

b. After rendition.

It has been held that a decree of divorce rendered in the lifetime of both parties, entered nunc pro tunc after the death of one of them, is not void. Thus in Re Cook (1888) 77 Cal. 220, 1 L.R.A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, it was held that a judgment of divorce rendered by the court in the lifetime of the plaintiff takes effect from its rendition although the clerk failed to enter it, and its entry nunc pro tunc after the plaintiff's death was immaterial. And on a further appeal the court declined to consider the nunc pro tunc decree as void. (1890) 83 Cal. 415, 23 Pac. 392.

In Lachenmayer v. Lachenmayer (1883) 65 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 422, the defendant in a separation case moved to vacate an order of arrest, which was denied, and his appeal was dismissed with costs, and one day after the plaintiff's attorney received the remittitur of dismissal the plaintiff died. It was held that an order might be entered as of the day the attorney received the remittitur.

c. After submission on appeal.

If a party to a divorce suit dies after submission of writ of error or of an appeal from the judgment, judgment on the appeal may be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of submission. Bell v. Bell (1900) 181 U. S. 175, 45 L. ed. 804, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551; Strickland v. Strickland (1906) 80 Ark. 451, 97 S. W. 659; Danforth v. Danforth (1884) 111 Ill. 236; Mead v. Mead (1876) 1 Mo. App. 247.

Thus where, after submission on appeal from a judgment of divorce in favor of the wife, the plaintiff, the defendant died, judgment of affirmance was entered as of the day of submission. Mead v. Mead (Mo.) supra.

So, a judgment of the United States Supreme Court affirming on error a judgment of the court below for a divorce and for alimony and costs, rendered after appearance and answer of the husband, may be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of argument, where the husband has died since the argument of the cause. Bell v. Bell (U. S.) supra. The court observed that if there had been no more than a decree of divorce, the writ of error would have abated; but the judgment below was not only for divorce, but for a large sum of alimony and for costs; and the wife's rights in respect of the alimony and costs should not be affected by delay in entering judgment.

So, where there was a judgment for divorce in favor of the husband, and he died after submission on appeal, the court reversed the judgment as of the date of submission. Strickland v. Strickland (1906) 80 Ark. 451, 97 S. W. 659; Danforth v. Danforth (1884) 111 Ill. 236.

It seems to have been held in the briefly reported case of Bell v. Bell (1913) 182 Ill. App. 497, that where a defendant in divorce died after submission of an appeal from an order allowing temporary alimony, but before decision, the order of affirmance might be entered nunc pro tunc as of a date prior to his death.

V. Other actions which do not survive.

Where a party dies after a verdict in an action which does not survive, judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc as if the action survived.

England.—Seymour v. Greenwood (1861) 30 L. J. Exch. N. S. 189.

See also to the same general effect, Dial v. Holter (1856) 6 Ohio St. 228, supra, III. b, 1.

In Kelley v. Riley (1871) 106 Mass. 339, 8 Am. Rep. 336, the court said: "As a matter of practice, at common law, as well as under the provisions of Gen. Stat. chap. 133, § 7, and chap. 115, § 14, judgment will be entered on the verdict on motion, as of a preceding day or term of the court, whenever an action, continued or postponed for the purpose of obtaining a disposition thereof, which may relieve a dissatisfied party from a verdict, would otherwise fail by the death of a party to it."

The rule applies where the party dying is the plaintiff, whose verdict is sustained.

So, where damages in tort have been assessed before the death of the defendant in a case tried by the court without a jury, and nothing remains but to dispose of a motion for a new trial, judgment may be entered for the plaintiff nunc pro tunc. Wilkins v. Wainwright (1899) 173 Mass. 212, 53 N. E. 397.

So, where the action is tried by the court without a jury, and the defendant dies after submission, judgment for the plaintiff may be entered nunc pro tunc. RE PILLSBURY (reported herewith) ante, 1396; Perry v. Wilson (1811) 7 Mass. 393.

But where, in an action which did not survive, the court had quashed the citation and denied a motion for judgment by default against the defendant, who afterwards died, it was held that the court had no power to enter judgment nunc pro tunc for the plaintiff, on the ground that the former decisions were erroneous. Perkins v. Dunlavy (1884) 61 Tex. 241.

And where an infant plaintiff in negligence suffered a nonsuit, and the court stayed execution to enable him to move for a new trial, and, pending the stay, he died, the court declined to permit the defendant to enter judgment nunc pro tunc in order to tax the costs against the next friend. Hemming v. Batchelor (1875) L. R. 10 Exch. (Eng.) 54, 33 L. T. N. S. 16, 44 L. J. Exch. N. S. 54, 23 Week. Rep. 398.

Counsel may stipulate as a condition of granting a motion for adjournment made by the defendant in an action which does not survive, "that in case of the death of the plaintiff herein before final judgment and determination of this action, that the alleged cause of action shall survive, and any verdict and judgment therein be regarded as if rendered in the lifetime of the plaintiff," and the court may enforce such a stipulation. Cox v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1875) 63 N. Y. 414.

And where, after a verdict for the plaintiff in a breach of promise case, she died pending a motion for a new trial, and before it was discussed, the court, in denying the motion, intimated that if they should grant a new trial, they might do so on condition that the verdict be entered as of the time of the first trial. Griffiths v. Williams (1830) 1 Crompt. & J. 47, 148 Eng. Reprint, 1329.

While beyond the scope of this note, the Ireland, Palmer, and Kramer Cases, infra, may be referred to in this connection. In Ireland v. Champneys (1813) 4 Taunt. 884, 128 Eng. Reprint, 884, where, after an interlocutory judgment in libel and assessment of damages against the defendant, the plaintiff died before final judgment, it was held that judgment could not be entered under Stat. 17 Car. II., as the suit had abated by the plaintiff's death. But in Palmer v. Cohen (1831) 2 Barn. & Ad. 966, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1402, it was held that judgment may be entered under the Statute 17 Car. II. for the plaintiff in libel, who dies after verdict. And in Kramer v. Waymark (1866) L. R. 1 Exch. (Eng.) 241, 4 Hurlst. & C. 427, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 148, 12 Jur. N. S. 395, 14 L. T. N. S. 368, 14 Week. Rep. 659, where the plaintiff died after recovering a verdict in a negligence case, it was held that judgment was properly entered for him within the time specified in 17 Car. II. and 15 &

16 Vict. chap. 76, the latter statute being, if anything, broader than the former, and including all actions. Martin, B., said: "I am unable to account for the construction put upon the statute of Charles in Ireland v. Champneys (Eng.) supra, but in Palmer v. Cohen (Eng.) supra, the same point arose again, and the court of Queen's bench decided, as I think rightly, that the words of that statute are express and admit of no doubt."

Pending appeals.

When a judgment for a plaintiff in a personal action has been erroneously set aside, and a subsequent final judgment against him is brought up by writ of error, pending which he dies, the Supreme Court will affirm the judgment in his favor nunc pro tunc as of the date when it was reversed. Coughlin v. District of Columbia (1882) 106 U. S. 7, 27 L. ed. 74, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37 (see also Rose's Notes to this case).

Where the defendant died pending his appeal from a judgment in an action of slander, but before argument, judgment of affirmance was entered as of a day previous to such death. See Miller v. Gunn (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 159.

Where, on an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of slander, the judgment was reversed, and shortly thereafter the appellant died, the appellate court, on rehearing, reduced the verdict by an amount sufficient to free it from the errors of the trial, and directed judgment to be entered as of the time of the original reversal. Hocks v. Sprangers (1902) 113 Wis. 123, 87 N. W. 1101, 89 N. W. 113.

But judgment cannot be rendered nunc pro tunc to prevent the abatement of the writ of error by the death of the accused, after submission of his writ of error to review a judgment of conviction and sentence to imprisonment. O'Sullivan v. People (1892) 144 Ill. 604, 20 L.R.A. 143, 32 N. E. 192.

Where the plaintiff appealed from a judgment against him in malicious prosecution, and one of the defendants died after submission on the appeal, judgment of reversal was entered as of the term of submission, which is the general rule laid down by the Indiana statute. Lockenour v. Sides (1877) 57 Ind. 360, 26 Am. Rep. 58. For other cases under the Indiana statute, see Knox v. Golding (1910) 46 Ind. App. 634, 91 N. E. 857, 92 N. E. 986; Steiert v. Coulter (1913) 54 Ind. App. 643, 102 N. E. 113, 103 N. E. 117, 4 N. C. C. A. 561.

VI. Particular statutes.

In Indiana it was a good while ago provided by statute that where a party dies after submission on appeal, but before decision, judgment shall be rendered as of the term at which the submission was made. Gas Light & Coke Co. v. New Albany (1894) 139 Ind. 660, 39 N. E. 462. For other decisions under the statute, see Lockenour v. Sides (1877) 57 Ind. 360, 26 Am. Rep. 58; *Jeffries v. In Fox v. Hale & N. Silver Min. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328, referred to in the opinion in RE PILLSBURY (reported herewith) ante, 1396, the cause was finally submitted May 3; the court on May 26 filed its written opinion and directed counsel to prepare findings and a decree in accordance therewith; and on June 2, one of the defendants died, whereupon findings and judgment against him were ordered as of May 26. On appeal this judgment was set aside, and it was ordered that while the findings of fact and conclusions of law should be filed as of a date before the death, that the judgment should be entered as of the date of the judgment against the codefendants of the deceased, the court considering this the proper practice, in view of § 669 of Cal. Code Civ. Proc. quoted in RE PILLSBURY.

Where one of the defendants died after verdict for the plaintiff pending exceptions, and the stay was vacated so far as to enable the plaintiff to enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict, the court held that the entry nunc pro tunc was immaterial, as the matter was controlled by statute, saying: "The Code (§ 763) provides that if a party dies after verdict and before final judgment, the court must enter final judgment in the name of the original parties; and § 1210 provides that when judgment is entered in such a case, a memorandum of the party's death must be entered with the judgment, in the judgment book, indorsed on the judgment roll, and noted on the margin of the docket of the judgment; and that such a judgment does not become a lien upon the real property or chattels real of the decedent, but establishes a debt to be paid in the course of administration. The latter section was complied with in this case, and the two sections were authority for the judgment entered as against the deceased defendant. The fact that the judgment was entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict, rather than as of the date of entry, harmed no one connected with his estate, as it could in any event be paid only in the course of administration." Long v. Stafford (1886) 103 N. Y. 274, 8 N. E. 522.

VII. Miscellaneous.

In Smith v. Miller (1847) 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 132, it was held that where a new supreme court was created, the old supreme court being vested with power to "hear and determine" suits ready for hearing or decision on a certain day, the last-mentioned court had no power to order a judgment entered nunc pro tunc, where a party had died before that day.

Where there is no written evidence of an alleged proceeding in court in which some of the alleged parties are deceased, a judgment cannot be entered nunc pro tunc in such an alleged proceeding. Tynan v. Weinhard (1894) 153 Ill. 598, 38 N. E. 1014.

In Dowbiggin v. Harrison (1830) 10 Barn. & C. 480, 109 Eng. Reprint, 529, where there had been a nonsuit, the trial was in December, 1827, the defendant died January 5, 1828, and no proceedings were had till October, 1828, when an application was made to tax costs. The court said that the Statute 17 Car. II. chap. 8, "does not apply to cases of nonsuit. Moreover, the defendant died before the day in banc, so that, if the court could allow judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc, it would still be of a term after his death."

It may be noted that where a verdict was returned for the plaintiff December 31, in an action for a personal injury, and she died January 3d, before the entry of judgment, it was considered that the entry of judgment nunc pro tunc was not warranted and was immaterial; but the court affirmed such judgment on the ground that the defendant had lost its opportunity to object. Wilcox v. International Harvester Co. (1917) 278 Ill. 465, 116 N. E. 151.

In New Orleans v. Gaines (New Orleans v. Whitney) (1890) 138 U. S. 595, 34 L. ed. 1102, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428, it was said that a judgment rendered after a defendant's death, without the plaintiff's fault, is not void, but that the irregularity or error may be cured by entering it nunc pro tunc as of a date prior to such defendant's death.

In Dawson v. Waldheim (1901) 89 Mo. App. 245, referred to in RE PILLSBURY (reported herewith) ante, 1396, there was no death, and the case appears from an earlier appeal (1899; 80 Mo. App. 52) to have been an action on contract, and not an action ex delicto.

J. L. ROBINSON, Appt.,

v.

INDIANA & ARKANSAS LUMBER & MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Arkansas Supreme Court — April 16, 1917.

(128 Ark. 550, 194 S. W. 870.)

Tax — land purchased for nonpayment of taxes — exemption.

1. Land purchased by a levee district for nonpayment of taxes assessed by it is held by it in its governmental capacity, and is within a constitutional provision exempting from taxation public property used exclusively for public purposes, and such land is, therefore, not subject to state and county taxation.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1439.]

— exemption — retrospective effect.

2. A constitutional exemption from taxation will not be given a retrospective effect unless an intention that it shall have such an effect is clearly expressed.

— property held in governmental capacity.

3. An exemption from taxation of public property used exclusively for public purposes applies to property held by a municipal corporation in the exercise of its functions as a governmental agency, but not to that which is held in its proprietary capacity.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Crittenden County dismissing the complaint in an action brought to quiet title to certain wild and unoccupied land. Reversed.

Statement by Hart, J.:

J. L. Robinson instituted this action in the chancery court against the Indiana & Arkansas Lumber & Manufacturing Company to quiet the title to certain wild and unoccupied lands in Crittenden county, Arkansas. The Lumber Company defended on the ground that it had acquired title by the payment of taxes for seven years under the Act of March 18, 1899, and that the plaintiff had been guilty of laches in bringing his suit.

The material facts are as follows: The lands in controversy were originally owned by Robert C. Brinkley. He died in 1878, and by the terms of his will the lands became the property of his children. The board of directors of the St. Francis levee district instituted an action in the chancery court under our statute to enforce the collection of delinquent levee taxes for the year 1898. The whole of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 4 north, range 7 east, containing 409 acres, in Crittenden county, Arkansas, was sold under the decree, and the levee district became the purchaser at its own sale. On September 11, 1899, the levee district conveyed to the defendant along with 20,000 acres of other lands, lots 15, 16, 17, and 18 of the northeast quarter of said section 6, for the sum of $1 per acre. On the 17th day of February, 1916, the devisees under the will of R. C. Brinkley executed a quitclaim deed to the defendant for these lots, as well as the lots herein sued for. On the 6th day of October, 1915, the levee district executed a deed to plaintiff to lots 1, 2, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the northeast quarter of said section 6, containing 249.19 acres, and on the 22d day of December, 1915, plaintiff instituted this action against the defendant to quiet his title to said lots. The lots in controversy have greatly increased in value since they were purchased by the levee district at its sale for levee taxes. It was shown by the defendant that a purchaser at a tax sale for the taxes of 1887, which is conceded to be void, executed to it a warranty deed to said lots. It was also shown by the defendant that it had paid the taxes on said lands for seven years under the Act of March 18, 1899, and that the lands have always been wild and unoccupied, and have never been in the actual possession of anyone.

The court held that the plaintiff was barred of relief by reason of the payment of taxes by the defendant for more than seven years under color of title, and a decree was entered dismissing the plaintiff's complaint for want of equity. The plaintiff has appealed.

Mr. R. C. Brown, for appellant:

The lands of the St. Francis levee district are not only exempt from taxation, but are also immune from other rules which apply to individuals, including the Statute of Limitations, as regards all of its functions of a governmental nature.

Messrs. Daggett & Daggett for appellee.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The correctness of the decision of the chancellor depends upon whether or not the lands in controversy in this case were subject to taxation for county and state taxes after they were purchased by the levee district at its own sale for levee taxes. Article 16, § 5, of the Constitution of 1874, provides that all property subject to taxation shall be taxed according to its value, provided that the following property shall be exempt from taxation: Public property used exclusively for public purposes; churches used as such; cemeteries used exclusively as such; school buildings and apparatus; libraries and grounds used exclusively for school purposes; and buildings and grounds and materials used exclusively for public charity.

Section 6 provides that all laws exempting property from taxation other than is provided in this Constitution shall be void.

It is insisted by both parties that this question has already been decided in their favor by a previous decision in this court. Counsel for the defendant rely upon the case of Bonner v. St. Francis Levee Dist. 77 Ark. 519, 92 S. W. 1124. There the court said that the lands in controversy continued subject to taxation after they were acquired by the St. Francis levee district. The levee district had purchased the lands in that case on the 24th day of January, 1898, for unpaid levee taxes, and on the second Monday in June, 1898, Bonner purchased the same land at a sale for state and county taxes. There the assessment had been completed, and the state and county taxes had become a fixed lien on the lands before their purchase by the levee district, and the court simply meant to hold that a change in the use of the property after the state and county taxes had become a lien did not release the land from liability for such taxes. The reason is that to so hold would be to give a retrospective effect to the section of the Constitution above referred to. An exemption from taxes created by the Constitution will not be given a retrospective effect unless an intention that it shall have such an effect is clearly expressed, and it is apparent that the section of our Constitution relating to this subject was not intended to operate retrospectively. Philadelphia v. Pennsylvania Co. 6 Ann. Cas. 437, and case note, 214 Pa. 138, 63 Atl. 420. So it will be readily seen that the Bonner Case is not an authority for the position taken by counsel for the defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff rely on the case of Miller v. Henry, 105 Ark. 261, 150 S. W. 700, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 754. There the court, at the end of an opinion which was devoted almost exclusively to other propositions, said the lands which had been bought in by the St. Francis levee district at a sale for levee taxes were not subject to taxation while in the hands of the levee district, but no reason was given for such holding.

—retrospective effect.

We now propose to take up the question and decide it anew, for the reason that it is now earnestly insisted that such a holding is in direct conflict with the holding of this court in School Dist. v. Howe, 62 Ark. 481, 37 S. W. 717, and Brodie v. Fitzgerald, 57 Ark. 445, 22 S. W. 29.

The St. Francis levee district is a quasi corporation to which is delegated certain powers as a governmental agency. Carson v. St. Francis Levee Dist. 59 Ark. 513, 27 S. W. 590, and St. Francis Levee Dist. v. Fleming, 93 Ark. 490, 125 S. W. 132, 659. The correctness of the chancellor's holding depends upon whether the lands were acquired by the levee district in its proprietary capacity, or in the exercise of its functions as a governmental agency. In the former case the

lands would not be exempt, and in the latter they would be exempt, from taxation. This distinction, we think, had been recognized in our previous decisions relating to the question.

In the case of Brodie v. Fitzgerald, 57 Ark. 445, 22 S. W. 29, the court held that the hospital buildings, grounds, and materials, under our Constitution, were exempt from taxation, but that the property leased or rented was not exempt, though the revenues were applied solely to the subject of the public charity. The reason is that under our Constitution it is only when the property itself is actually and directly used for public charity that the law exempts it from taxation.

In the later case of Hot Springs School Dist. v. Sisters of Mercy, 84 Ark. 497, 106 S. W. 954, we held that a hospital building, with the grounds connected therewith, which was used in the operation of a public charity, was not excluded from constitutional exemption from taxation merely because patients who were able to do so paid for the attention and medicine which they received, if the profits derived therefrom were put back into the operation of the public charity. There was a mixed use, so to speak, of the property, but the dominant purpose was the operation of the hospital as a public charity, and the receiving of pay patients was merely incidental to the main purpose. So we held the property was still actually and directly used for public charity, and that the Constitution exempted it from taxation.

In the case of School Dist. v. Howe, 62 Ark. 481, 37 S. W. 717, a portion of the military reservation at Fort Smith was donated by act of Congress to the city of Fort Smith to be held in trust for the use of the free public schools of the city. The act provided that within ten years the land should be laid off into lots, and that the lots be sold at public sale, and that the proceeds should be paid to the treasurer of the school board to be used for school purposes. Afterward our legislature passed an act providing that the school district of Fort Smith be empowered and required to become a purchaser at said sale, and own, lease, control, and sell the same. The property involved in that suit was acquired by the school district by purchase under the act. Most of the property consisted of unimproved city lots, but some of the lots had buildings upon them and were rented. The court in its opinion recognized that the property did not contain any school buildings, or libraries and grounds used exclusively for school purposes, within the meaning of article 16, § 5, of our Constitution, and proceeded to a discussion of the question of whether it was public property used exclusively for public purposes within the meaning of that section of the Constitution.

The court said that to justify it in holding that the property was exempt there must be found in the Constitution itself, provision for its exemption. The court further said that it was conceded that land was public property, but the question of its exemption from taxation was not determined alone by its character as public property, but also by the nature of its use. After a thorough discussion of the question, the court correctly held that the property was not exempt from taxation under our Constitution, because it was held by the school district solely for sale or rent, and for the sale for profit, and was not, in the meaning of the Constitution used exclusively for public purposes, and was, therefore, subject to taxation. The construction is in accord with the almost unanimous holding of the courts of last resort of other states, having a provision of the Constitution similar to our own. The reason for so holding is clearly stated in a quotation by the supreme court of Ohio in Benjamin Rose Institute v. Myers, 92 Ohio St. 252, L.R.A.1916D, 1170, 110 N. E. 924, from Academy of Richmond County v. Bohler, 80 Ga. 159, 7 S. E. 633, as follows: "Property used to produce income to be expended in charity is too remote from the ultimate charitable object to be exempt. If property is allowed to be used as taxed property, it also is to be taxed. If it competes, in the common business and occupations of life, with the property of other owners, it must bear the tax which theirs bears."

There is a material difference between the use of property exclusively for public purposes, and renting it out and then applying the proceeds arising therefrom to the public use. The property, under our Constitution, must be actually occupied or made use of for a public purpose, and our court has recognized the difference between the actual use of the property and the use of the income. So it will be seen that, in our own cases last referred to, the property itself was not directly occupied or made use of for public purposes, but only the income derived therefrom, and for this reason the court held that the property was not exempt from taxation under our Constitution.

In the present case the facts are essentially different. The St. Francis levee district was created for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a levee along the Mississippi river, on the eastern border of our state. To accomplish the purpose of its organization it was given the power of eminent domain and of taxation for levee purposes. The district was given the power to institute a suit to enforce the collection of delinquent levee taxes, and to buy in the lands at a sale therefor when no one else offered to bid thereat, and then to again sell the land so acquired and to devote the proceeds to the use for which the levee taxes were intended. The lands in controversy were acquired by the levee district at a sale for levee taxes and were held by the levee district until it could dispose of them. Thus it will be seen that the levee district acquired the land in the exercise of its governmental functions, and, during the interval between its purchase and resale on the lands, they were not subject to taxation. If the property should be taxed while so held by the levee district, new taxes must be levied to meet this tax. It is absolutely essential that taxes should be levied in order to carry out the purpose for which the levee district was organized, and if the property, which the levee district, to protect itself, purchased at a levee tax sale, was subject to state and county taxes while in its hands, the property owners of the levee district would have to pay additional taxes. The levee district only held the lands that it acquired at levee tax sale until it was practical to dispose of them again. They were not held for any purpose of gain or as income-producing property. When sold, the proceeds took the place of the levee taxes, for the enforcement of which and the expenses incident thereto, they were sold, and in this way we think the lands were directly and immediately used exclusively for public purposes, within the meaning of the Constitution, and were not subject to taxation.

Moreover, Judge Cooley says that exemption from taxation of property which belongs to the state and its agencies, which is held by them for governmental purposes, rests upon implication. He said that to levy taxes upon such property would render necessary new taxes to meet the demand of this tax, and thus the public would be taxing itself in order to raise money to pay over to itself, and no one would be benefited but the officers employed, whose compensation would go to increase the useless levy. 1 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. pp. 263 and 264; Re Hamilton, 148 N. Y. 310, 42 N. E. 717.

Having held that the property is exempt from taxation, the defense of the defendant necessarily passes out of the case.

It follows that the decree will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded with directions to grant the prayer of the complaint.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NOTE.

The reported case (ROBINSON v. INDIANA & A. LUMBER & MFG. Co. ante, 1426) extends the principle of immunity of public property from taxation to lands purchased by a levee district for nonpayment of taxes, and held until it could dispose of them. The general subject of taxation of property owned by a public body, but not devoted to public use, is discussed in the annotation beginning at page 1439.

JOHNSON CITY, Appt., v.

J. W. WEEKS et al.

Tennessee Supreme Court — September Term, 1915.

(133 Tenn. 277, 180 S. W. 327.)

Tax — exemption — water pipe line.

1. The supplying by a municipal corporation through its own mains, of water from its surplus to a national soldiers' home adjacent to its limits, is within a constitutional provision excepting from taxation property held by cities and towns and used exclusively for public or corporate purposes, so as to relieve the main through which the water is carried from taxation.

Definition — adjacent territory.

2. The term, "adjacent territory," in a statute permitting a municipal corporation to own and operate a system of waterworks for such city and adjacent territory, means the suburbs of the city not within the limits of another municipality.

Municipal corporation — what is — soldiers' home.

3. A home for disabled soldiers administered by the Federal government through the medium of an incorporated entity is not a municipal corporation.

[See 19 R. C. L. 691.]

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Washington County (Haynes, Chancellor) in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin them from assessing and collecting taxes for county purposes upon a water pipe line owned by the city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George C. Sells for appellant.

Mr. J. Stanley Barlow, for appellee Weeks:

The line of pipe leading from the corporate limits of the city of Johnson City to the Soldiers' Home is subject to taxation by the county and state.

W. 231; Nashville v. Smith, 86 Tenn. 213, 6 S. W. 273, s. c. 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L.R.A. 469, 12 S. W. 924.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of complaint was filed by the city of Johnson City, a municipal corporation, to enjoin the officials of Washington county from assessing and collecting taxes for county purposes upon a water pipe line, owned by the city, that extends from its corporation boundary line to the south gate of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, an institution occupying a park of several hundred acres, partly within and for the most part without the corporate limits.

In the bill it is alleged that the city installed this pipe line for the purpose of disposing of surplus water, not needed or used by the city or its inhabitants, as a supply for the members of the Home adequate to their needs; that the Home has about one thousand five hundred members, a number of whom are citizens of Johnson City; that it is to the interest of the city that such a supply be furnished, as otherwise the water supply of the Home was inadequate and unwholesome, thereby endangering the members and the residents of the city; that the only recourse of the Home for an adequate supply is from the municipal plant; that the rentals collected from that institution are used within the limits of Johnson City for municipal purposes, in extending and improving complainant's water system.

It is alleged that the levy would be void as being on property of complainant that is not subject to taxation, and the bill was filed to have the right of the complainant city and of the county determined.

A demurrer was filed by the county officials, which was sustained by the chancellor, who conceived that, while the pipe line was properly in use for a corporate proprietary purpose, it was not used for a public purpose within the meaning of our Constitution and Revenue Act.

The Constitution, art. 2, § 28, provides: "All property . . . shall be taxed, but the legislature may except such as may be held by . . . cities or towns, and used exclusively for public or corporation purposes."

The Revenue Act undertakes to exempt from taxation all property of cities or towns "that is used exclusively for public or municipal purposes."

The city of Johnson City was authorized to lay a pipe line to supply the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, lying beyond its corporate limits, under the grant of power contained in Acts 1909, chap. 121, to "own and operate a system of waterworks for said city and adjacent territory." Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 89 C. C. A. 205, 162 Fed. 225, 15 Ann. Cas. 498, and same case, 218 U. S. 180, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1084, 54 L. ed. 991, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 615.

The last phrase, "adjacent territory," we take to mean its suburbs not within the limits of another municipality.

adjacent territory.

The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is but a charity of the national government, administered through the medium of an incorporated entity. Overholser v. National Home, 68 Ohio St. 236, 62 L.R.A. 936, 96 Am. St. Rep. 658, 67 N. E. 487; Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U. S. 276, 43 L. ed. 699, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 453; Lyle v. National Home (C. C.) 170 Fed. 846.

That institution is in no sense a municipal corporation, but stands in the same plight as Municipal corporation—what is—soldiers' home. does an institution administered as an agency of the state government, such, for example, as the state normal school located near the same city.

The question to be solved, therefore, is: If a municipality lay a water line from its corporate limits to such an institution, or construct a lighting line for the purpose of supplying water or light (as the case may be) from its plant for such an institution, located in territory adjacent to the corporate boundary, is such line subject to taxation (or to be treated as unexempt) in behalf of the county in which such fragment of line lies?

We had thought that the argument of this court in the case of Knoxville v. Park City, 130 Tenn. 626, L.R.A.1915D, 1103, 172 S. W. 286, fairly demonstrated a negative answer; but the counsel of the county of Washington relies upon that case as one announcing a doctrine to the contrary.

In that case the following language was used: "The court of appeals of Kentucky, in the later case of Com. v. Covington, 128 Ky. 36, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1214, 107 S. W. 231, held that the fact that water was furnished, for compensation, to inhabitants of its suburbs, without its or any corporate limits, does not alter the public purpose or use of its water system so as to make it subject to taxation. But the court took care to distinguish the case it had in hand from the one we have under investigation, saying: 'We do not mean that a city may enter upon the business of maintaining a waterworks system for other cities or towns, but only that the fact that it incidentally furnishes water to a considerable number of persons in proximity to the city, without injury to the rights of the city, does not alter the public character or use of the property or make it subject to taxation.' The ruling in Com. v.

Covington, supra, is in harmony with the decision of many courts to the effect that the fact that water is furnished to inhabitants of unincorporated suburbs is a mere incident to, and not destructive of, the public use."

Later on in the opinion in Knoxville v. Park City, the case of Smith v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L.R.A. 469, 12 S. W. 924, was referred to as drawing the same distinction between a furnishing of water to inhabitants of unincorporated suburbs, and a furnishing by one city to another and distinct municipality, by means of a physical plant owned by the former in the boundaries of the latter.

The argument and the holding in the case of Knoxville v. Park City was that the public character of the property there involved was lost because Knoxville could not serve, even incidentally, its own corporate public purpose by means of a water system owned by it in Park City; that all public municipal powers and purposes exercisable in the borders of the latter city were by legislative act devolved on the municipality of Park City; and that "what is the primary public purpose of Park City may not be an incidental public purpose of Knoxville."

In Perth Amboy v. Barker, 74 N. J. L. 127, 65 Atl. 201, Mr. Justice Pitney delivering the opinion, it was held that the right of a city to exemption from taxation as to property, "when used for public purposes," was not lost by the fact that sales of surplus water were made to parties outside the territorial limits of the city. It was there said: "The sales of water outside of Perth Amboy are merely incidental to the general public purposes for which the waterworks were established and are being maintained and operated by that city. . . . In our view, such use of the surplus water does not take away the right of Perth Amboy to exemption from taxation upon the property that is used primarily and principally for the public purposes of that city.

See State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Verona Twp. 59 N. J. L. 94, 34 Atl. 1060."

See also Henderson v. Young, 119 Ky. 224, 83 S. W. 583; Simson v. Parker, 190 N. Y. 19, 82 N. E. 732; Re Orillia, 7 Ont. L. Rep. 389; 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. 3858.

If we resort, as we did in the case of Knoxville v. Park City, to the law of eminent domain to aid in ascertaining by analogy the import of the phrase, "public purpose," we find the rule there to be that if a city disposes or purposes to dispose of surplus water for such an outside use, that fact does not deprive it of the right to resort to condemnation, nor make the condemnation one for other than a public purpose. State, Slingerland, Prosecutor, v. Newark, 54 N. J. L. 62, 23 Atl. 129; Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. 71; Re New York, 99 N. Y. 569, 2 N. E. 642; Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 142 U. S. 254, 35 L. ed. 1004, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173, and note in 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 538, 543.

As will be noted, the ruling is rested upon the principle that such use is but incidental to the primary use, which is public in character.

The rule is based on consideration of convenience, but convenience that approaches near to necessity. Fringing the boundaries of a city or town, there is nearly always a population that is dependent for advantages of water and light on the initiative and enterprise of the city or town of which it comes so near to being an integral part. Left alone, such a population has not the cohesiveness or the civic strength required to procure such a service for itself. That it should have a supply of water, in order, for example, to the prevention of sickness and epidemics, is a matter of concern to the near-by urban population as well as to itself. It is not a far reach that such a service by the city should be covered by a power thus incidentally public in character, when that public purpose is not delegated to another municipality.

We are unable to appreciate the force of any reasoning which would concede the existence of such a power in a municipality to serve a considerable number of the homes of individuals in the immediate suburbs of a city through its own pipe lines, which is apparently admitted by the appellee county, and yet deny the existence of the power, with a like consequent immunity, in respect of such a supply when furnished by the municipality to an institution that is a public charity, merely because in the same are assembled in barracks and in masses on a government reservation, the wards of the Federal government. These men, because of advanced age and service in the Army and Navy, would seem to be peculiarly subject to the ravages of disease, and in such need of a supply of water from a city's surplus as to be a matter of solicitude to the inhabitants of the city itself.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

NOTE.

The reported case (JOHNSON CITY v. WEEKS, ante, 1431), holding that a water main through which a municipal corporation supplies surplus water to a charitable institution adjacent to its limits is not subject to taxation, presents one aspect of the general subject discussed in the annotation beginning at page 1439, as to "taxation of property owned by public body, but not devoted to public use." The specific phase of the subject presented by the question whether a constitutional or statutory exemption, which is limited to property devoted to public use, embraces property which produces an income incident to public use, is discussed at page 1445 of that note.

TOWN OF HAMDEN
CITY OF NEW HAVEN.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—June 1, 1917.

(91 Conn. 589, 101 Atl. 11.)

Tax — abandonment of public use — effect.

1. Real estate purchased by a municipal corporation for public use, to which it was not devoted, is taxable to the municipality, where devotion of it to public use is no longer contemplated, under a statute exempting from taxation all property held by municipal corporations for public use.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1489.]

— exemption — property of municipality.

2. A statute exempting from taxation all property held by municipal corporations for public use applies to property located within the limits of other municipalities.

— poor farm — benefit to public.

3. Property owned and used by municipal corporations for a poor farm is within a statute exempting from taxation property held by municipalities for public use, although there is no benefit accruing to the public from the use to which the land is put.

Poor — provision for — governmental purposes.

4. The prevention of any person from suffering for the necessities of life is a legitimate exercise of governmental power.

[See 21 R. C. L. 701.]

Municipal corporation — authority — implication.

5. Authority to operate a poor farm is impliedly conferred upon a municipal corporation by empowering it to employ and discharge a manager for such farm.

Poor — statutory duty to care for — how performed.

6. The duty of caring for the poor, imposed by statute upon municipal corporations, may be performed in any reasonable way and by the use of every reasonable means.

[See 21 R. C. L. 708.]

— town farm — reasonableness.

7. A town farm is a reasonable way and means for furnishing support for the poor of the town.

8. The public character of a poor farm is not changed by the fact that the municipality sells some of the surplus products of the farm.

— quantity of land which may be purchased.

9. The extent of the land which a municipal corporation may purchase for a poor farm is not confined to present immediate needs, but it may make reasonable provision for future requirements.

Tax — exemption — land held for use of poor farm.

10. Land necessary for pasturage for a poor farm, and for growing crops for inmates of the poorhouse, and stock kept upon the farm is held for public use and is free from taxation in the hands of the municipality.

11. Express statutory provision that real estate owned by a town for almshouse and farm shall not be exempt from taxation for school purposes is a plain indication that such property shall not be taxed for any other purpose.

12. Where, by statute, real estate must be set by the assessors in the list of the person in whose name the title thereof stands on the land records, an assessment of land owned by and standing in the name of a city of a certain name against a town of the same name is void.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New Haven County in favor of plaintiff, in part, in an action brought to recover taxes assessed on three certain pieces of real estate; defendant appealing from so much of the judgment as held it liable for taxes on the second piece of land; and plaintiff appealing from so much as held the first and third pieces of land exempt from taxation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Fremont County, 36 Colo. 231, 84 Pac. 1113.

Mr. Charles F. Clarke for plaintiff.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The town of Hamden sues to recover for taxes assessed on three pieces of real estate located in Hamden, just over the dividing line between New Haven and Hamden, and adjacent to the Springside farm, which, in connection with the Springside Home, is owned and operated as a town poorhouse and farm for paupers belonging to the town of New Haven.

The first piece, called the Merchant piece, was purchased April 1st, 1885, by the town of New Haven, and ever since has been used in connection with Springside farm for the purpose of pasturage, and was reasonably necessary for that purpose. The third, or Martino piece, was purchased in 1903, by the city of New Haven, and has ever since been used for pasturage and for growing crops for the use of the inmates of the poorhouse, and for stock kept on the farm, and it was reasonably necessary for those purposes. The second, or Thomas piece, was purchased in 1892, by the town of New Haven, for the purpose of providing a water supply for the poorhouse and farm, but, this purpose proving impracticable, it was abandoned, and for twenty years this piece has not been used for any purpose, and has remained rocky woodland covered with scrub oaks.

The city of New Haven, by consolidation with the town of New Haven, became vested with the town's property prior to December 7th, 1897, and liable for all debts which were enforceable against the town.

All of the products raised on the farm were consumed upon the farm, except a small quantity of hay which was used by the department of public works of the city. Some of the live stock raised, in excess of the needs of the farm, was sold. Upon the farm was conducted a piggery, supported by the city of New Haven and maintained for the purpose of consuming the garbage collected in the city. The products of the piggery amounted to $18,000 annually, and about two thirds of these were consumed by the inmates of the poorhouse and one third sold in the market.

The defendant claims that all of these pieces of land were exempt from taxation, because used for public purposes only. The plaintiff claims that none of these pieces were exempt, because their use was not for a public purpose, and could be of no benefit to the town of Hamden, and in effect would compel Hamden to share the support of New Haven's paupers. The trial court held that the first, or Merchant piece, and the third, or Martino piece, were exempt from taxation, and that the second, or Thomas piece, was not exempt.

General Statutes, § 2315, as construed by our court in West Hartford v. Water Comrs. 44 Conn. 360, 368, exempts from taxation all property held by municipalities for public use. And this rule obtains, although the property belonging to —property of

municipality.

one town is located in another town which claimed the right to tax it. In either case the property will be exempt when it is used for, or employed in, a public use. The devotion of the property to a public use is the sole ground of the exemption. Ibid.; New London v. Perkins, 87 Conn. 229, 233, 87 Atl. 724.

Counsel for the town of Hamden advance the theory that the principle behind an exemption from taxation of the property of one town located in another town is a benefit accruing to the public from the public use to which the land is put, and that the absence of such benefit removes the foundation for such exemption. With us, this theory has never had a foothold. The main reliance of the plaintiff is upon the case of Newport v. Unity, 68 N. H. 587, 593, 73 Am. St. Rep. 626, 44 Atl. 704. The point decided related to the statute of New Hampshire. The argument of the opinion supports the principle contended for, but the court expressly notes that our decision in West Hartford v. Water Comrs. holds that the property is exempt from taxation, "because it is used for public purposes."

benefit to public.

This is the principle of our decisions and it conflicts directly with the New Hampshire doctrine.

The plaintiff's appeal is to be decided by ascertaining whether the uses of the Merchant and Martino pieces were for a public purpose. Our statutes providing for the care of the poor were framed in the humane purpose "to prevent, as far as possible, any person, under any circumstances, from suffering for the necessities of life." Gen. Stat. §§ 2476-2492. The charter of New Haven (13 Special Laws, p. 447), § 202, fulfils a similar purpose. Beyond question, this is a public purpose and a legitimate exercise of governmental power.

Poor-provision for-governmental purposes.

The statute, § 2490, expressly authorizes the maintenance of poorhouses for the poor, and the charter of New Haven expressly makes all statutory provisions concerning town poorhouses applicable to the city of New Haven. The town of Hamden contends that New Haven is without authority to own or operate a town farm, and that such operation is consequently not for a public purpose. Assuming that this question is open for consideration in a proceeding to collect a tax, we find ample warrant in the provision of the charter (13 Special Laws, p. 448) § 204: "Said board shall have power to employ and discharge a manager of Spring-side farm and home," etc. Here is an implied authority to maintain this farm. Town farms have been operated in connection with our poorhouses from an early day. The inmates of the poorhouses have worked upon these for the production of food for themselves. This not only gave the inmates healthy work, but it helped make them self-supporting and thus far relieved the town of its burden of support. To provide food for the poor in this way is as much a public purpose as to provide shelter in the poorhouse. The duty of caring for the poor, imposed by our statute upon our towns, may be performed in every reasonable way and by the use of every reasonable means. The town farm is a reasonable way and means of furnishing support for the poor.

The sale of some of the produce of the farm and of the products of the piggery were incidents to the main purpose, the support of the poor. The town and city were not intent on conducting a business for profit. They were merely disposing of their surplus production. What was sold in no way changed the public purpose of the undertaking. Its sale made production cheaper, and enabled the farm to be more thoroughly cultivated and used than it would otherwise have been. The extent of the land which the town might purchase for a farm is not to be confined to present immediate needs, but may include reasonable provision for future requirements; and whatever the town may reasonably own for a farm it may cultivate, and whatever of products it raises thereon beyond its needs it may dispose of. White v. Stamford, 37 Conn. 578; State, Camden County, Prosecutor, v. Collins, 60 N. J. L. 367, 37 Atl. 623.

—quantity of land which may be purchased.

The use of the Merchant and Martino pieces, as a part of the farm for pasturage, was necessary for pasturage for the farm, and the use of the rest of the Martino piece for growing crops for the inmates of the poorhouse, and for the stock kept upon the poor farm, is found to have been reasonably necessary for these purposes. This finding settles the question of their public use.

Tax—exemption—land held for use of poor farm.

We cannot anticipate disaster to the towns, as the plaintiff does, by such withdrawal of property from taxation. Experience has shown that the property owned by one town and located in another town and devoted to a public use is limited. If it were otherwise, the general assembly could, and no doubt would, restrict such ownership; and if, in any instance, the exempt property unreasonably reduced the area of property available for taxation, no doubt the general assembly would correct the public injustice. And so, too, the character of the public use might lead the law-making power to expressly provide for the taxation of land subject to this use in another town. Chapter 247 of the Public Acts of 1907, p. 856, is an instance where land in one town, devoted to sewage disposal for a municipality, is made taxable in the town of its location. For one purpose, only, have we expressly subjected any town almshouse and farm to taxation. General Statutes, § 2416, provides: "When any school district having within its boundaries any town almshouse and farm, shall impose any tax for the purpose of building or repairing its schoolhouse, said real estate owned by said town shall not be exempt from such taxation." The express limitation of taxation of any town almshouse and farm for one purpose is a plain indication that it is not taxable for any other purpose. No statutory indication of an intent to tax land devoted to the public uses of a town poorhouse and farm appearing, the ordinary rule of tax exemption is to be applied. The Merchant and Martino pieces are within the rule of exemption.

The taxes upon the Martino piece are not collectable for another reason. This property was transferred directly to the city of New Haven; it was never owned by the town of New Haven. These were independent municipal entities. The taxes sought to be recovered were assessed in the name of the town of New Haven. Real estate must be "set by the assessors in the list of the party in whose name the title" thereof stood "on the land records." Gen. Stat. § 2299. The assessment against the town of New Haven of land owned by the city of New Haven was void. Hellman v. Burritt, 62 Conn. 438, 26 Atl. 473; Meyer v. Trubee, 59 Conn. 422, 22 Atl. 424.

The defendant appeals from the judgment for taxes accrued upon the second, or Thomas piece. This piece was purchased for a public purpose, but this purpose was soon abandoned, and, so far as the record shows, the city of New Haven has never contemplated any past, present, or future use of this piece. "For more than twenty years," the finding recites, "prior to the bringing of this action, said second piece of land had not been used for any purpose by said Springside Home, or Springside farm, or by the city and town of New Haven." Since the abandonment of the purpose for which it was purchased, this piece of land has not been devoted to a public use, nor during any of the years covered by the taxes, the recovery of which is sought, did the city have or contemplate its devotion to a public use. The trial court was clearly right in holding that this piece was not exempt from taxation during this period.

There is no error on either appeal.

In this opinion the other judges concur.

I. Introductory.

As a general rule property owned by a public body is held to be exempt from taxation as a matter of public policy, or by specific constitutional or statutory provisions, but in order to entitle it to the exemption it must be devoted to uses public in their nature. This note is intended to discuss those cases wherein it appears that, though the property is owned by a public body, the question arises whether the failure to put it to a public use, or the fact that though it is used in part for public purposes it is incidentally used for other purposes, such as producing revenue, etc., deprives it of its public character to such an extent as to render it liable to taxation. Cases dealing with the right of one municipality to tax the property of another located within its borders are excluded, except where the decision as to the right to levy the tax is based on the use to which the property is put, and not on its location.

Property owned by the state or subordinate municipal bodies is expressly exempted from taxation by constitutional provision or statutory enactment in many jurisdictions, and in some of these jurisdictions it is held that, where the exemption is express and unqualified, no tax can be levied against it regardless of the use to which it is put.

In Sumner County v. Wellington (Kan.) supra, it was held that a waterworks plant owned and operated by a city was exempt from taxation under a constitutional provision exempting all property owned by a municipality. In that case it was said: "The statute makes public ownership of property the ground of immunity from taxation, and as the plant in question is absolutely owned by the city it is strictly within the terms of that exemption. . . . If use, rather than ownership, were applied as the test to the right of exemption, the result would be the same. The fact that in establishing and carrying on a system of waterworks the city furnishes water to citizens and consumers for rental charges does not make it a mere business enterprise, nor does it affect the exemption. West Hartford v. Water Comrs. (1876) 44 Conn. 360. The earnings derived from the water furnished for domestic use and to consumers is, as we have seen, paid into the city treasury and used in carrying on the city government, and thus inures to the benefit of the people of the municipality."

Likewise in Anne Arundel County v. Annapolis (Md.) supra, it was held that a municipally owned waterworks plant, located in a county, was not subject to taxation under the Maryland Code, exempting property belonging to any incorporated city or town from taxation.

In San Francisco v. McGovern (Cal.) supra, it was held that a municipal waterworks plant was exempt under a constitutional exemption from taxation of such property "as may belong to" a municipality, the manner of its use being immaterial.

Similarly, in Colorado Springs v. Fremont County (Colo.) supra, it was held that, under a constitutional exemption from taxation of the "property of" a municipality, lands held to secure water rights were exempt.

So, it has been held that under a constitutional provision exempting the property of a municipal corporation from taxation, without qualification, a waterworks plant owned by a city could not be taxed, and the fact that it was a source of revenue to the city was immaterial. Omaha v. Douglas County (Neb.) supra, wherein it was said: "Under the Constitution of this state rightful ownership of property by municipal corporations, such as the city of Omaha, is all that is required or necessary to extend to such property complete exemption and immunity from assessment and taxation."

In the case of Re Orillia (Ont.) supra, it was held that under an act exempting from taxation "property belonging to any county or local municipality," a municipally owned electric plant could not be subjected to taxation. And this was true even though the municipality derived some revenue from the plant. On this point it was said: "If the enterprise pays anything beyond expenses,—an unusual result, I am inclined to think,—the profit must go in relief of the general taxpayer; if the reverse, and a loss is made, the general taxpayer must pay. This being so, it is obvious that for the local municipality to impose a tax upon its property within the municipality would result simply in taking the money out of one pocket to put it into another."

Property held by school trustees, really as agents of the state, which was only used as a means of income, was held in Academy of Richmond County v. Augusta (1892) 90 Ga. 634, 20 L.R.A. 151, 17 S. E. 61, to be exempt from taxation under the statute (Ga. Code, § 598) which declared that "all public property" should be exempt from taxation, as the constitutional provision on the subject, excluding property "used for purposes of private or corporate profit or income," did not apply to public property.

Likewise, in Webster v. University of California (1912) 163 Cal. 705, 126 Pac. 974, it was held that, under a constitutional exemption of such property "as may belong to" the state, a mortgage to the regents of the State University was exempt.

In Walden v. Whigham (1904) 120 Ga. 646, 48 S. E. 159, it was held that a building and a stock of liquors owned by a municipality and operated as a dispensary were public property, and under the statute exempting "all public property" it could not be taxed, even though it was used for the purpose of producing income.

In Springville v. Johnson (1894) 10 Utah, 351, 37 Pac. 577, it was held that property consisting of 900 acres, bought in by a city for taxes and used for pasturage, was exempt from taxation under a statute providing that all property situated in the territory was taxable, "except that owned by this territory, or any county, city, or school district." Construing this provision the court said: "The exemption from taxation of the property of cities is so clear and expressive that there would seem to be no room for doubt, or necessity of resorting to any rule of construction. The exemption is absolute, and depends upon no condition but ownership by the city."

In Black v. Sherwood (1888) 84 Va. 906, 6 S. E. 484, it was held that, under a constitutional provision exempting from taxation "all real estate belonging to any county, city, or town," the land owned by a city and county as a landing for a municipal ferry was not subject to taxation, and that a statute providing that no property, though publicly owned, should be exempt from taxation when used for any private purpose or profit, did not apply to the municipally owned property exempted by the plain language of the Constitution:

However, in at least one jurisdiction, it has been held that although the Constitution or statute in express terms exempts state or municipally owned property from taxation, it will be implied that the intention was to exempt such property only when devoted to a public use. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. v. Carteret County (1876) 75 N. C. 474, wherein it appeared that a tax was levied on the interest of the state in a railroad. Holding that the constitutional exemption did not apply to property of the state held for business purposes, the court said: "Although this language is general, yet we do not think it was intended to embrace this case. The capitol is not taxed, because the state would be paying out money just to receive it back again, less the expense of handling it. And if taxed for local purposes it would to that extent embarrass the state government. Nor is it any hardship upon the locality to have the property exempt, as the advantages from it are supposed to compensate for the exemption. And, as with the capitol, so with other state property. But where the state steps down from her sovereignty and embarks with individuals in business enterprises, the same considerations do not prevail. The state does not engage in such enterprises for the benefit of the state as a state, but for the benefit of individuals or communities—at least, this is generally so—and if the state gets no taxes she may get nothing. Suppose, for illustration, that the plaintiff should declare no dividends and consume the whole earnings in current expenses. In that case the state, as a state, would never derive anything from the road except the taxes. At any rate, we do not think the exemption in the Constitution embraces the interest of the state in business enterprises, but applies to the property of the state held for state purposes.”

For cases determining whether property held by a public body as trustee, or lessor, is exempt from taxation under unqualified exemption provisions, see infra, IV. and V.

III. Exemption limited to property devoted to public use.

a. Property held as adjunct to public service.

As a general rule, property held by a municipality in connection with property used for a public purpose, but in excess of the amount required for proper conduct of such purpose, and not actually so used, is not within tax exemption provisions exempting property used for public purposes. West Hartford v. Water Comrs. (1877) 44 Conn. 360; Norwalk v. New Canaan (1911) 85 Conn. 119, 81 Atl. 1027; Essex County v. Salem (1890) 158 Mass. 141, 26 N. E. 431; Traverse City v. East Bay Twp. (1916) 190 Mich. 327, 157 N. W. 85; Perth Amboy v. Barker (1906) 74 N. J. L. 127, 65 Atl. 201; Clark v. Sprague (1906) 113 App. Div. 645, 99 N. Y. Supp. 304.

Thus, where a city had also acquired a tract of 960 acres of land, in addition to that actually to be used for its electric power plant, to be held solely for use in case of future needs, it was held that it was not exempt under the statute exempting lands used for public purposes.

Traverse City v. East Bay Twp. (1916) 190 Mich. 327, 157 N. W. 85, wherein it was said: “There remains, however, for determination the question whether this large tract of land, purchased and owned by the plaintiff for the purpose of ultimate development as an adjunct to its plant located in the township of Blair, is exempt from taxation under the statute quoted above, which provides for the exemption of all lands owned by a city ‘used for public purposes.’ Can it be said in any proper sense, and within the meaning of the language of the statute, that these lands belonging to the plaintiff in the defendant township are ‘used for public purposes?’ The evidence above set forth distinctly negatives this proposition. The lands not only are not used for any public purpose, but they are not used for any purpose. They lie in a state of nature, and no attempt has, to the present time, been made to utilize them for the development of power, which is the only use of value that can be made of them. . . . We are of opinion that the use which warrants the exemption mentioned in the statute is a present use, and not an indefinite prospective use.”

Similarly, where it appeared that, in addition to 10 acres of land held and actually used for the purpose of supplying water to a city, there had been purchased a tract of 100 acres for the purpose of extending the system, but which had not been so used, it was held that this additional land was not exempt from taxation, under a statute exempting land held for “public purposes.” Perth Amboy v. Barker (1906) 74 N. J. L. 127, 65 Atl. 201.

In Clark v. Sprague (1906) 113 App. Div. 645, 99 N. Y. Supp. 306, it was held that land held by a municipality and not used for public purposes was subject to taxation, even though it was originally conveyed to the city for such purposes. In this case it appeared that the city had acquired the lands in connection with certain contemplated public improvements, but had held the land for thirty years without so using it. Holding the land liable for taxation as not coming within the statutory exemption of lands held for “public purposes,” the court said: “If the lands in question were held by the city of Brooklyn for a public purpose, it may be assumed that the assessments (except, possibly, such as were for public improvements), the tax sale thereunder, and the deed pursuant thereto, were void; but no case has been called to our attention holding that real property owned by municipal corporations, and not held for public purposes, could not be taxed under the tax laws then existing; on the contrary, every case which held that lands so owned were not taxable proceeded upon the distinct theory that the lands were held for public purposes. . . .

Certainly, if a municipality is to be considered a private individual in respect to its ownership of lands not held for public use, no reason can be suggested for saying that it was not the intention of the legislature to include such lands in a general statement, providing in effect that all lands should be liable to taxation, except such as the statute exempted, especially when it is considered that taxes were levied for other than municipal purposes. It is not suggested that the lands in question were held for a public purpose, even assuming that they were originally conveyed to the city for such purpose. It appears by the statutes referred to supra, which respectively authorized and ratified the agreement pursuant to which the conveyance was made, that the transaction had to do with a public improvement, but the city could not, by holding the land for thirty years afterwards, insist that it should continue exempt from taxation as being held for a public use."

In West Hartford v. Water Comrs. (1877) 44 Conn. 360, it was held that land held by water commissioners in excess of the needs of the public service was not exempt from taxation. The court said: "The commissioners purchased the whole of certain tracts of which a part only was necessary for their purpose, for the reason that they could thus obtain the whole for a less price than a part, and they now hold 140½ acres, valued at $2,000, thus bought. Practically this land was a gift to the city. We cannot deny them the privilege of accepting it and turning it to their profit. But they cannot ask, and we cannot concede, the right thus unnecessarily to enlarge the municipal exemption and extend it over land which they did not buy, and have never expected to use, for the public good. They are under no obligation to hold it, and so long as they do they should pay the taxes assessed upon it."

Likewise, in Norwalk v. New Canaan (1911) 85 Conn. 119, 81 Atl. 1027, it was held that land owned by one municipality, but located in another, and not used for reservoir purposes as was other land owned by the foreign municipality, is not exempt from taxation by the town in which it is situated.

In HAMDEN v. NEW HAVEN (reported herewith) ante, 1435, it held that land purchased for use in connection with a poor farm, but not so used for a period of more than twenty years, was subject to taxation.

In Essex County v. Salem (1890) 153 Mass. 141, 26 N. E. 431, the facts were stated by the court as follows: "The evidence shows that the real estate on which the tax has been assessed was purchased by the county of Essex with the intention of some time using it for enlarging the jail and jail grounds in Salem, but that it has not been actually appropriated to this purpose, and whether it will ever be so appropriated is uncertain, and the intention to appropriate it to any public use, if any exists, is indefinite, and dependent upon events which may or may not occur." It was held that while property of a county was exempt from taxation when devoted to public uses, this rule would not apply to property acquired by the county with the intention of putting it to a public use at some future date, but which had not been put to such use when the tax was levied.

But, although the entire amount of land bought by a city for the development of an electric power plant was not directly used for such purpose, it has been held that where it was reasonably necessary for the practical operation of the plant it partook of the public use of the whole, and therefore was exempt from taxation. Traverse City v. Blair (1916) 190 Mich. 313, 157 N. W. 81, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 81, wherein the court set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "It is contended that this property is not all used for public purposes, because it appears that the dam, buildings, and mill pond occupy but about 15 acres of the 60-acre tract. It is shown that the Boardman river, upon which the plant is located, runs irregularly through the whole 60 acres, the dam and power house being on the lower 20, with the pond extending upstream to the farther limits of the upper 40, affecting to a greater or less extent the entire tract through which it meanders. The property was purchased for and devoted to an hydraulic development, the dam of which raised the water upon and necessarily affected the character of the property for the entire length of the river within its limits. Aside from its use for water power the value of the property is relatively small. Without the ownership and control of a sufficient shore acreage along the river beyond the land actually covered by water, such a development would not be practicable.

Under the circumstances shown, the subdivisions acquired by plaintiff cannot be considered unnecessary or excessive for the protection and successful operation of the plant, but can fairly be regarded as an essential part of it, devoted to and used for public purposes."

In State v. Water Comrs. Prosecutors, v. Gaffney (1870) 34 N. J. L. 181, the court, construing a special statute exempting lands held by Jersey City "for purposes connected with the works for supplying said city with water," held that land purchased for use in connection with the city's waterworks was exempt, although not in actual use for such purpose, if held in good faith and reasonably necessary to meet the growing demand for water. On this point it was said: "The land was not held for speculation, or to meet a remote, contingent expectation of necessary use, or for a mere incidental convenience. . . . It is true that the property was not in actual use when the assessment was made, but there was then no indication of any abandonment of the purpose to use it for a reservoir; on the contrary, it is clear that it was held for that necessary purpose, and without being used for any other."

Similarly, in Clinton County v. Lock Haven (1904) 29 Pa. Co. Ct. 641, it was held that property owned by a municipality, necessary and essential to operate properly its waterworks, to protect the purity of the water, and to prevent contamination, though consisting of 2,000 acres, was used for a public purpose and exempt from taxation.

In People ex rel. Hollock v. Purdy (1911) 72 Misc. 122, 130 N. Y. Supp. 1077, the court, construing a statute which exempted from taxation the property held by a municipality for a "public use," held that property acquired by the city by condemnation for rapid transit purposes was not subject to taxation, although not so used, having become unnecessary. In that case it was said: "Where the right of eminent domain is exercised, all that the law requires is that the property taken shall be dedicated to public purposes, and, once ownership of the municipality attaches, the public character attaches during all the time it shall possess it. The mere fact that the property condemned was afterwards found to be unnecessary does not, it seems to me, alter the rule. . . . While it cannot be said that property so obtained is held by the municipality for governmental purposes, it nevertheless belongs to the public, impressed with a trust for its benefit. So that, even if the lands in question were condemned for a specific purpose, and it was later ascertained that it could not be used in whole or in part for the object originally intended, it still remained public property, even though a private ownership is claimed for it. . . . The distinction sought to be drawn between the two separate holdings, at least for taxable purposes, partakes more of the shadow than of the substance; and the logic that would exempt the one class and tax the other, without resultant benefit to the public, must fail of its own feebleness. Some text-writers hold that the private property of a city is in fact subject to taxation by itself, and authorities may be found to sustain such view. I do not think that the conclusions so reached can be upheld. . . . Property of a municipality is not subject to taxation, whether it be employed for public uses or held in a proprietary capacity in trust for the public."

1. Income incident to public use.

Whether the fact that a state or municipality derives an income from property held by it deprives it of its public nature to such an extent as to take it out of the exemption from taxation generally given to state or municipally owned property when devoted to public use necessarily depends on the character of the property and the manner in which the profit or income is earned. As a general rule it may be said that where the primary and principal use to which the property is put is public, the mere fact that an income is incidentally derived from it does not affect its character as property devoted to a public use.

The rule was stated as follows in Traverse City v. Blair (1916) 190 Mich. 313, 157 N. W. 81, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 81: "While in distinguishing the purely governmental powers of a municipality from its authorized business activities in supplying itself and its inhabitants with a certain class of utilities and conveniences for which, in places of concentrated population, there is a general need, and which it is recognized under present conditions of civilization public welfare demands, the latter are sometimes referred to as private business enterprises, perhaps because such wants may be and sometimes are supplied for profit by private parties; yet in the final analysis they are in no true sense private business or private property when operated and owned for public benefit by a municipality, under constitutional or statutory authority. No question of private gain or private support is involved. The benefits, whether in direct profits or in protection of health, property, or life, accrue to and all losses fall upon the public generally. The only underlying support for all such public business activities is taxation, and taxation can only be for public purposes. . . . That, after supplying its own direct municipal needs, the city furnished light or power to private parties, and received a revenue therefrom, in no way detracts from the municipal or public purpose for which such authorized public utility was owned and operated. Neither is it of importance whether the enterprise was in itself profitable or unprofitable; it remained public property, owned and operated as an authorized public utility for municipal purposes and the general welfare, dependent for its credit and existence upon public support by taxation to whatever extent its necessities required."

Accordingly it has been held that a municipally owned lighting plant was not subject to taxation because of the fact that in the operation of the plant the city incidentally derived a revenue therefrom. Frankfort v. Com. (Ky.) Traverse City v. Blair (Mich.); Toledo v. Yeager (Ohio) supra.

In Traverse City v. Blair (Mich.) supra, it was held that the fact that 70 per cent of the income of a municipally owned electric light plant was derived from sales to private individuals did not affect its character as property devoted to a public use, and therefore it was not liable to taxation.

Similarly, in Toledo v. Yeager (Ohio) supra, it was held that the pipes, fixtures, etc., of a plant used to supply natural gas to the inhabitants of a city were property used exclusively for public purposes, under a constitutional provision exempting such property from taxation, and the fact that revenue was received from the sale of the gas was immaterial.

But where a village has no authority under its charter to sell electricity to its inhabitants, it has been held that the use of its plant for that purpose is not such a public use as to bring it within the exemption. Swanton v. Highgate (1908) 81 Vt. 152, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 867, 69 Atl. 667, wherein the court distinguished Stiles v. Newport (1904) 76 Vt. 154, 56 Atl. 662, on the ground that in that case it appeared that the village was authorized by its charter to furnish its inhabitants with water for domestic and other purposes.

Likewise, it has been held that the fact that a city derived a revenue from the rental of ferry property did not affect the public nature of the use of the property, and therefore it was exempt from taxation. People ex rel. New York v. Board of Assessors (1888) 111 N. Y. 505, 2 L.R.A. 148, 19 N. E. 90.

In New London v. Perkins (1913) 87 Conn. 229, 87 Atl. 724, it was held that a municipal ferry franchise was not taxable where the municipality operated the ferry through a lessee and derived its revenue from the rental.

In Galveston Wharf Co. v. Galveston (1884) 63 Tex. 14, it was held that the one-third interest of a city in a wharf was not taxable, because within a constitutional exemption of taxation used for public purposes, and the fact that a revenue was received therefrom was immaterial.

To the same effect, see Com. v. Louisville (1909) 133 Ky. 845, 119 S. W. 161.

It has been held that the fact that revenue was derived from a municipally owned toll bridge did not deprive the property of its character as public property devoted to a public use. Com. v. Newport & C. Bridge Co. (1907) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 196, 105 S. W. 378.

Likewise it has been held that the fact that a public market was a source of revenue to a municipality did not change its character as property "used for public purposes," within the meaning of the constitutional provision exempting such property from taxation. Carlisle School Dist. v. Carlisle (1901) 11 Pa. Dist. R. 294, wherein it was said: "From an early period the public markets of Pennsylvania have been established and controlled by the municipalities in which they are located, and they have been deemed to be a necessity. The fact that they incidentally yield a revenue in the form of tolls, or stall rents, is not material to the question at issue."

In Louisville v. Com. (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624, decided before the enactment of statutory or constitutional exemptions of municipally owned property, wherein it was held that, while a city was not subject to taxation on property used for carrying on its municipal government, market houses, fire engines, and halls were not thus held, and therefore were subject to taxation.

It has been held that a waterworks system owned and operated by a municipality is public property devoted to a public use, and as such entitled to exemption from taxation, and the fact that it is also a source of revenue does not affect its character.

Vermont.—Stiles v. Newport (1904) 76 Vt. 154, 56 Atl. 662.

In Smith v. Nashville (1889) 88 Tenn. 464, 7 L.R.A. 469, 12 S. W. 924, the court said: "It can make no difference whether the water be furnished the inhabitants as a gratuity or for a recompense, the sum raised in the latter case being reasonable and applied for legitimate purposes. So raising a fund to help defray the expenses of operating the waterworks and to keep down the interest on the city's indebtedness, incurred in the construction thereof, is no more engaging in business for gain and profit than would be the assessment and collection of taxes for that or any other legitimate object. To the extent that money is realized by sales of water (if it be so termed), the necessity of laying taxes in the usual way is diminished. If the water were furnished free of charge, then the expense of operating the works and meeting the interest on the debt would have to be met by an increased tax assessment."

In Perth Amboy v. Barker (1906) 74 N. J. L. 127, 65 Atl. 201, it was said: "The sales of water outside of Perth Amboy are merely incidental to the general public purposes for which the waterworks were established and are being maintained and operated by that city. If the sales to outside parties are not authorized by law, the state may complain through the attorney general; but in our view such use of the surplus water does not take away the right of Perth Amboy to exemption from taxation upon the property that is used primarily and principally for the public purposes of that city."

But under the earlier tax laws of New Jersey an exemption from taxation was extended to "the property of the counties, townships, cities, and boroughs of this state," and this exemption was held to be independent of the use to which the property was devoted. State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Verona Twp. (1896) 59 N. J. L. 94, 34 Atl. 1060; State, Camden County, Prosecutor, v. Collins (1897) 60 N. J. L. 367, 37 Atl. 623; State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Belleville Twp. (1897) 61 N. J. L. 456, 39 Atl. 658; State, Hackettstown, Prosecutor, v. Conover (1899) 63 N. J. L. 191, 42 Atl. 838.

In Newport v. Unity (1896) 68 N. H. 587, 73 Am. St. Rep. 626, 44 Atl. 704, the rule was recognized that a waterworks plant owned by a municipal corporation was property used for public purposes, under a statute exempting such property when owned by a municipality. The decision in this case, however, turned on the right of a municipality to tax the property of another municipality within its borders.

Similarly, it has been held that a sinking fund created to meet the bonded indebtedness of a city, incurred for the purchase of a waterworks system, was none the less public property used for public purposes, because of the fact that it had been invested in dividend-paying stocks. Com. ex rel. Albritton v. Lebanon Waterworks (Com. ex rel. Albritton v. Rubel) (1908) 130 Ky. 61, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 224, 112 S. W. 1128.

In Miller v. Fitchburg (1901) 180 Mass. 32, 61 N. E. 277, it was held that where a city acquired property for the purpose of maintaining a city water supply, and entered into an agreement whereby, in consideration of the release of damages by certain mill owners, the city agreed to maintain a reservoir for their use, except under certain circumstances arising from emergencies, it could not be said that the city received any "revenue in the nature of rent," within the meaning of a statute making property owned by a city for waterworks liable to taxation, if any revenue in the nature of rent were received therefrom.

But it has been held that although a city acquired all the corporate stock of a water company, that did not make the corporate property public property, and that, while the shares of stock were exempt under the constitutional provision, the corporate property itself was not exempt until it had actually been conveyed to the city. Bell v. Louisville (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 699, 106 S. W. 862. This case was distinguished in Ryan v. Louisville (1909) 133 Ky. 714, 118 S. W. 992, supra, on the ground that before the decision in that case the city had acquired title to the actual property by valid transfer.

While a city may receive an income from the sale of water, etc., to its inhabitants, or even to those living outside the limits of the city, but adjacent thereto, without losing the constitutional and statutory exemption from taxation, of property devoted to public use, it has been held that supplying other cities and towns with water is engaging in business, and not a use of its property for a public use, and, therefore, that to the extent so used the property is taxable. Knoxville v. Park City (1914) 130 Tenn. 626, L.R.A. 1915D, 1103, 172 S. W. 286; Stiles v. Newport (1904) 76 Vt. 154, 56 Atl. 662; Swanton v. Highgate (1908) 81

In Knoxville v. Park City (Tenn.) supra, it was said: "It is difficult to conceive how the city of Knoxville has any public or corporate purpose to serve within the corporate limits of Park City. All municipal purposes therein are those of Park City, created by legislative act to exercise them. The furnishing of a water supply for itself and its inhabitants is its municipal purpose, and cannot be Knoxville's. Nor may it logically be conceived that the city of Knoxville serves even incidentally its own corporate public purpose by means of the Park City system. What is the primary 'public purpose' of Park City may not be an incidental 'public purpose' of Knoxville. The legislature will be taken to have intentionally lodged the full power and duty in that regard in its local governmental representative, Park City."

In Stiles v. Newport (1904) 76 Vt. 154, 56 Atl. 662, the court, holding that where a city built a branch line of its waterworks to another village, and supplied it with water, it was not devoting its waterworks to a public use, said: "The village of Newport owes no municipal duty to the village of West Derby or its inhabitants, and has no municipal interest there. Its sale of water to that village and its inhabitants is for the revenue obtainable thereby, independent of any connection with municipal duty or interest. Although disposed of for the same purposes, the sale cannot be regarded as a public use, because of this want of municipal relation. . . . Here the village of Newport has built and installed a branch outside its corporate limits, which is devoted wholly to the needs of another village, and can never be made available for its own municipal service; and the question is whether the property so created and circumstanced shall be treated as serving an incidental, and therefore a public, use. It might not be easy to frame a safe and acceptable definition of an incidental use; but we think it may safely be said that the supplying of the municipal and domestic needs of another municipality, through a complete system of distributing pipes and hydrants created for that purpose, is not such a use. The plaintiff has assessed the hydrants located in Derby, and we hold that they are taxable."

Likewise, in Swanton v. Highgate (Vt.) supra, it was held that the supplying of one village by another with electricity was not such a public use of its property as to entitle it to the exemption.

But in West Hartford v. Water Comrs. (1877) 44 Conn. 360, it was held that the property of a municipal water plant was not deprived of its exemption by the fact that water was sold at a profit to an adjacent municipality. The court said: "The board of water commissioners, with the approbation of the city, sells the water which has been stored in West Hartford to consumers both in that town and in Hartford, preferring that method of raising money for interest and expenses to the imposition of a tax, and at the time of the submission thus collected a greater sum than the annual interest and expenses. West Hartford urges that by reason of this fact Hartford has ceased to be in this matter a municipality holding property for the public good, and has descended to the level of a pecuniary corporation using property for profit, and has thus placed itself within reach of taxation. But this, again, is rather in seeming than in reality. The legislature sanctioned this method of raising money at the time when it declared the undertaking to be one for the public good. Besides, the fact that the rents at the present time are sufficient to pay the annual charges may be only a fortunate occurrence; this state of things may not continue. And the town remains liable to taxation for annual deficiencies, and for the ultimate payment of the principal expended in the purchase of the land and construction of the works."

In JOHNSON CITY v. WEEKS (reported herewith) ante, 1431, it was held that the fact that a city supplied water to a soldiers' home lying partly within and partly without the city limits did not alter the nature of its waterworks as public property devoted to a public use, within the meaning of the constitutional and statutory provisions exempting property so used from taxation. The opinion states succinctly and forcibly the reasoning by which the decision is justified.

In Nashville v. Bank of Tennessee (1851) 1 Swan (Tenn.) 269, it was held that the Bank of Tennessee, being owned by the state, was a public corporation, and therefore its property was not subject to taxation by a city, although the bank was a source of revenue to the state.

In HAMDEN v. NEW HAVEN (reported herewith) ante, 1435, it is held that the fact that an income was derived from the sale of produce raised on a city poor farm did not change its character as public property devoted to public use.

2. Income independent of public use.

When an income or profit is derived from municipally owned property, not as an incident to its use as a public agency, but from its use primarily and principally for the purpose of producing revenue, it cannot be said to be devoted to public use, and is, therefore, subject to taxation. School Dist. v. Howe (1896) 62 Ark. 481, 37 S. W. 717; People ex rel. Davis v. Chicago (1888) 124 Ill. 636, 17 N. E. 56; Sanitary Dist. v. Hanberg (1907) 226 Ill. 480, 80 N. E. 1012; Sanitary Dist. v. Gifford (1913) 257 Ill. 424, 100 N. E. 953; Mitchellville v. Board of Supervisors (1884) 64 Iowa, 554, 21 N. W. 31; Wayland v. Middlesex County (1855) 4 Gray (Mass.) 500; Essex County v. Salem (1890) 153 Mass. 141, 26 N. E. 431; State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Clinton Twp. (1887) 49 N. J. L. 370, 8 Atl. 296; Swanton v. Highgate (1908) 81 Vt. 152, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 867, 69 Atl. 667.

Thus, in Swanton v. Highgate (Vt.) supra, wherein it appeared that on the water-power property acquired by a village for the generation of electricity there were situated a gristmill and a lumber mill, which could not be used in connection with its lighting plant, but from which the village derived an income in the shape of rentals, it was held that these mills were not exempt from taxation as property devoted to public use.

Holding that property acquired by a county for the purpose of enlarging a jail yard, but which had not been so used, but on the contrary was rented out to private parties for the purpose of raising income, was not exempt from taxation, the court in Essex County v. Salem (1890) 153 Mass. 141, 26 N. E. 431, said: "If the property is used exclusively for private purposes, and is a source of income to the county, in the benefits of which the other towns share, it is certainly just that out of the income derived from that property there should be paid to the city of Salem such charges as are paid on other similar property, to enable the city to perform its municipal duties, on the proper performance of which the safety and value of such property in some degree depend. Although a county has different and somewhat more limited powers than a town or city, yet it is a municipal corporation capable of being sued, and has power by taxation to raise money to discharge its obligations. We are of opinion that, in the absence of any express exemption of the property of counties from taxation, an exemption can be implied only when the property is actually appropriated to public uses. This is the principle which underlies all our decisions in cases analogous to the present, and we see no ground on which it ought to be extended to the property of a county actually devoted to private uses which are not incidental to the performance of public duties, particularly when income is derived from the property in the same manner as from similar property belonging to private persons."

Similarly, it has been held that, where a city purchased 100 acres of land with a view to using 5 acres of it for a cemetery, it could not claim exemption from taxation on the balance, which it used for farming purposes in order to produce revenue. State, Newark, Prosecutor, v. Clinton Twp. (1887) 49 N. J. L. 370, 8 Atl. 296, wherein it was said: "There is no doubt that public property, whether belonging to a state, a county, a city, a township, or a borough, used for a purpose germane to the objects for which the municipality was created, is not taxable. But to be entitled to exemption from tax, the property must be used for such purpose. If a city purchase a farm of 100 acres, situated in another municipality, on which are a dwelling house and buildings necessary to carry on the farming business, for the purpose of obtaining 5 acres thereof to be used for a graveyard, and use the ninety-five acres so as to derive profit therefrom, either through lease or by cultivation, the whole property will not be exempt from taxation, because the whole is not used for public purposes, or in fulfilment of a public trust. It would manifestly be unjust to withdraw the whole property from assessment, and deprive the municipality in which it is situated from the proportion of tax it should pay."

In Illinois all property owned by municipal corporations is subject to taxation, unless specifically exempted by statute. Re Swigert (1887) 123 Ill. 267, 14 N. E. 32; Sanitary Dist v. Martin (1898) 173 Ill. 243, 64 Am. St. Rep. 110, 50 N. E. 201; Sanitary Dist. v. Hanberg (1907) 226 Ill. 480, 80 N. E. 1012. Accordingly it has been held that a toll bridge owned by a city and situated outside the city limits was not exempt from taxation, as, under the Illinois Constitution (Const. 1870, § 3, art. 9), only such public property as might be exempted by statute was exempt, and as no statute had been passed exempting toll bridges it was liable to taxation. Re Swigert (Ill.) supra. In Sanitary Dist. v. Martin supra, it was held that lands owned by a sanitary district were neither "public lands," nor were they "used exclusively for public purposes" within the meaning of those terms as used in the statute exempting public lands from taxation, and as there was no other statute by which they were exempted they were properly taxed. In People ex rel. Davis v. Chicago (1888) 124 Ill. 636, 17 N. E. 56, it appeared that certain lands owned by a city had been taken in part payment of corporate funds embezzled by a public officer. It was insisted that the lands represented the funds, and as the latter were not taxable the lands were not. Holding that as the lands were not used for any public purpose, but were leased by the city for a profit, and had not been exempted by statute, they were taxable, the court said: "The difficulty with the position of appellee is that the legislature has nowhere provided that a city or incorporated town may acquire a large tract of land and hold it for years free from taxation. There is a necessity for exempting from taxation the public buildings of a city, and the grounds upon which they stand, not exceeding 10 acres; but why a large tract of land located remote from the city should be held by a city free from the burdens of taxation for years, it may be difficult to understand.

. . . It is also suggested that the funds embezzled by the city treasurer were not, and would not be, subject to taxation had they remained in the treasury, and as these lands represent the embezzled funds, they are also exempt. But the funds which were in the treasurer's hands were not placed there to remain as a permanent fund. These funds were raised to be paid out to defray the expenses of the city, and of course it was not a fund liable to taxation; but if a city had the power to accumulate a large fund, and hold it from year to year in its treasury, or keep it at interest, no reason is perceived why such fund might not be taxed. These lands have been held for a number of years. It is not claimed that they are now, or ever will be, needed for any municipal use of the city. On the other hand, they are held for profit,—for the annual increase in price,—and we perceive no reason why the city should not pay taxes where lands are so held, in like manner as an individual who purchases and holds lands as an investment."

In Mitchellville v. Board of Supervisors (1884) 64 Iowa, 554, 21 N. W. 31, it was held that, although the income derived from land owned by a city was devoted to a public use, the land itself was not, but, being used for profit, came within the qualifying clause of the statute exempting from taxation property of a town when "not held for pecuniary profit." In this case it was said: "To be exempt, the property in question in this case must be devoted entirely to public use, and not held for pecuniary profit. Now it appears that the property is not devoted to public use, but an income is derived therefrom. The condition of the trust imposed by the donor is that the property itself shall not be devoted to public use, but the profit arising therefrom shall be. It is, therefore, obvious that a pecuniary profit is derived from the property. It is, therefore, not exempt. It is true, the profits are devoted to public use, but the statute does not, because of this fact, provide that the property is exempt from taxation."

Likewise, in Sanitary Dist. v. Gifford (1913) 257 Ill. 424, 100 N. E. 953, it was held that a water-power electric plant belonging to a sanitary district, but not used in connection with sanitation, and from which the district derived large profits, was not devoted to a public use, and was, therefore, subject to taxation in the absence of a statute specifically exempting it.

In Sanitary Dist. v. Hanberg (Ill.) supra, it was held that lands owned by a sanitary district and leased for a profit could not be said to be used for a public purpose, and were, therefore, liable to taxation.

In Wayland v. Middlesex County (1855) 4 Gray (Mass.) 500, though not directly involved, the court recognized the rule, and said that, if land taken in connection with the establishment of a municipal waterworks system was valuable for and used for purposes other and distinct from those of the aqueduct, the property so used would be liable to taxation to the extent of such use.

In Cornelius v. State (1914) 40 Okla. 733, 140 Pac. 1187, it was held that a mortgage given to secure a loan from the state school fund was the property of the state, and as such exempt from taxation under the constitutional provision exempting "all property used exclusively for schools . . . and all property of this state."

In School Dist. v. Howe (1896) 62 Ark. 481, 37 S. W. 717, it appeared that land had been donated by the United States to a municipality for school purposes, and was held by a school district for sale or rent, the proceeds of the sale or rental to be used for school purposes. It was held that it was not exempt as "public property used exclusively for public purposes." In that case it was said: "It seems clear that the intention was to exempt only that public property which in itself directly subserved some public purpose by actual use, as distinguished from property belonging to the public, but not used by it, and from which a benefit accrues to the public, not by the immediate use thereof by the public, but indirectly, through selling or renting the same to private parties."

But in ROBINSON v. INDIANA & A. LUMBER & MFG. CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1426, it was held that lands which a levee district bid in at a sale by it to enforce delinquent levee taxes, and was holding until it could dispose of them, were not subject to taxation, the court saying: "The levee district only held the lands that it acquired at levee tax sale until it was practical to dispose of them again. They were not held for any purpose of gain or as income-producing property. When sold, the proceeds took the place of the levee taxes, for the enforcement of which and the expenses incident thereto they were sold, and in this way we think the lands were directly and immediately used exclusively for public purposes within the meaning of the Constitution, and were not subject to taxation."

In Gibson v. Howe (1873) 37 Iowa, 168, it was held that lands purchased by a city at a sale, under a judgment formerly obtained by the city against a defaulting officer, and not held for rent or profit, but in order to reimburse itself, were held for a public use, and were exempt from taxation. The court said on this point: "The property of a county, 'when devoted entirely to the public use, and not held for pecuniary profit, is exempt from taxation.' Rev. § 711. The land in question was not acquired for pecuniary profit, but to secure a debt due the county. It was not purchased or held to rent, or for its probable increase in value. It was acquired and held that the just amount due the county from a defaulting officer might be realized. This was the object to which it was devoted, and was, undoubtedly, a public use. It was not, therefore, taxable."

It has been held that indemnity swamp lands owned by a county, not being held for "pecuniary profit," were exempt from taxation. Callahan v. Wayne County (1887) 73 Iowa, 709, 36 N. W. 654.

Under a constitutional provision empowering the legislature to tax property owned by a municipality when not used for municipal purposes, it has been held to be necessary in order to levy a tax on such property, that an act should have been passed providing for its taxation, as the constitutional provision was not self-executing. New Castle v. Lawrence County (1892) 2 Pa. Dist. R. 95, wherein it was said: "If the municipality undertakes to acquire and hold more property than is used or necessary for municipal purposes, the state might interfere, but that right on the part of the state does not affect the question of the right of the taxing authority to assess taxes against such real property. The power to assess taxes is inherent in the state, but, in the absence of a constitutional provision, the legislature must designate what property is subject to taxation and the manner of levying and collecting taxes. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1874 the property in question was not subject to taxation. Under the provision of art. 9, § 1, of the Constitution of 1874, the legislature has the power to tax property held by a municipality, but not used for municipal purposes. These provisions, however, do not execute themselves, and the legislature has not passed any law bringing municipal property, or property held by a municipality, within the scope of the authority of the assessor or collector of taxes. Even if we were to concede that property held by the city, but not for municipal purposes, was subject to taxation, it might be a valid objection in the present case that the taxes are assessed against what is and what is not used for municipal purposes as a whole, and there is no statutory provision for making an apportionment."

For cases determining the effect of a lease of publicly owned property, aside from the fact that it produces revenue, as depriving it of the exemption from taxation, see infra, V.

3. Public and private use intermingled.

Where a village constructed a village hall to be used as a public hall, police-court room, assessor's office, lockup, etc., which when not in actual use for these purposes was leased for lectures and other public entertainments, the income so derived being used to assist in defraying the annual corporate expenses, it was held that the use to which the property was put was primarily public, the so-called private use being only incidental, and not such as to deprive the property of its exemption from taxation. Camden v. Camden Village Corp. (1885) 77 Me. 530, 1 Atl. 689, wherein it was said: "From a careful examination of the facts in the case, and in view of the public nature of this corporation, and the purposes for which it was created, we are led to no other conclusion than that this building, authorized by legislative sanction, is owned by the corporation for public uses, rather than in its 'social or commercial capacity.' The letting of those parts of the building which are not in actual use by the corporation are incidental and subsidiary to the objects for which it was created, and do not take away its character as a public building, or render it liable to taxation by the town, as it would be were this a private corporation, and its building erected for private purposes. Many city and town halls in this state are so constructed that when not in use for strictly municipal purposes they may be let for any proper use. Such fitting up and letting for hire are the incidents, and not the primary objects, of such public buildings."

However, the contrary view has been taken in Columbia v. Tindal (1894) 43 S. C. 547, 22 S. E. 341, wherein it was held that that part of a city hall not used for municipal purposes was not exempt from taxation, under the constitutional provision exempting city halls when "owned and used exclusively for public purposes," but that, since that part of the building used exclusively for municipal purposes was exempt from taxation, the tax collector would be enjoined from selling the building for taxes on that part not exempt.

And it has been held that where the Constitution provided that the legislature might exempt public property, "used exclusively for any public purpose," the legislature was without power to pass a tax law exempting town halls notwithstanding that some part thereof might be leased for profit. Scott Co. v. Athens (1894) 1 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 84. In this case it appeared that the greater part of a town hall erected by a village was leased to others,—a library, postoffice, barber shop, and office of justice of the peace on the first floor, and a hall on the second floor. In holding the property subject to taxation, the court said: "The fact, then, that the rents are paid into the treasury of the municipality does not constitute the renting of the rooms for a public purpose, within the meaning of the Constitution, creating exemptions of property used exclusively for public purposes, and the attempted exemption was beyond the legislative power, and the Act of May 21, 1894, is, in that respect, unconstitutional. Manifestly, it was not the intention of those forming the Constitution to create exemptions from taxation upon property that was used for business purposes, and in competition with the business of individuals engaged in private business. The amended exemption cannot be sustained, either by authority or by reason."

Where the use to which property owned by a municipality was put was partly public and partly private, with no way of ascertaining how much was put to either use, it has been held that the whole was taxable. Swanton v. Highgate (1908) 81 Vt. 152, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 867, 69 Atl. 667, wherein it was said: "For the plaintiff created the situation, and thereby rendered it impossible for the defendant to apportion the property between the uses, and it had to tax all if it taxed any, and the plaintiff cannot say, as it does, that because more was taxed than was put to private use, the tax is void, for that would be allowing it to take advantage of its own wrong."

IV. Property held in trust.

Lands held by a city in trust, the income to be devoted to the upkeep and improvement of its public parks, have been held not to be subject to taxation. Burr v. Boston (1911) 208 Mass. 537, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 143, 95 N. E. 208, wherein it was said: "In the case at bar the property was held by the city in trust to apply the income thereof to the maintenance and improvement of its common and parks. This is a valid public charitable trust. Re Bartlett (1895) 163 Mass. 514, 40 N. E. 899. It supplies funds for a purpose which otherwise must be provided for by taxation, and so far tends to lighten the public burdens. This is strictly a public use."

But in Mitchellville v. Board of Supervisors (1884) 64 Iowa, 554, 21 N. W. 31, it was said that land devised to a town in trust, the income from which was used for the improvement of a public park, did not come within the term, "devoted entirely to public use," as used in a tax exemption statute, but did come within the qualifying clause, "held for pecuniary profit," as used in the statute, and was subject to taxation.

So, in St. Louis v. Wenneker (1898) 145 Mo. 230, 68 Am. St. Rep. 561, 47 S. W. 105, it was held that property held by the city of St. Louis as trustee under a will, for the purpose of aiding emigrants on their way west for bona fide purposes of settlement, was not property owned by a city within the meaning of a constitutional provision exempting "the property of . . . municipal corporations" from taxation. In this case it was said: "We think that the property of a county or city exempted from taxation by the constitutional provisions hereinbefore quoted is that of which such county or city is the beneficial owner, which is held by it 'for its own use,' and not merely in trust. It does not include that in which the only interest of the municipality is as trustee. We therefore hold that this real estate is not exempt from taxation."

Similarly, it has been held that land given to a city to be held in trust and used as a park for the benefit of the owners of the lots adjacent thereto, who should have a voice in its management, was subject to taxation, the court saying that a city could not hold property in trust for the benefit of private persons so as to relieve it from taxation. McChesney v. People (1881) 99 Ill. 216.

In People ex rel. Scott v. Ricketts (1911) 248 Ill. 428, 94 N. E. 71, it was held that land dedicated to a city to be held in trust as a park and tennis court for the benefit of the residents of the section in which it was located was private in its nature, and as such subject to taxation.

V. Property leased to individual.

In some jurisdictions it is held that public lands leased to individuals are subject to taxation, the theory being that the tax is levied against the lessee, and not against the municipality or governing body. Ex parte Gaines (1892) 56 Ark. 227, 19 S. W. 602; State, Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., Prosecutor, v. Haight (1873) 36 N. J. L. 471; Bentley v. Barton (1884) 41 Ohio St. 410; Zumstein v. Consolidated Coal & Min. Co. (1896) 54 Ohio St. 264, 43 N. E. 329; Cincinnati v. Lewis (1902) 66 Ohio St. 49, 63 N. E. 588; Norfolk v. J. W. Perry Co. (1908) 108 Va. 28, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 128 Am. St. Rep. 940, 61 S. E. 867; Scragg v. London (1870) 28 U. C. Q. B. 457; Re Canadian P. Land Co. (1903) 5 Ont. L. Rep. 717, reversing in part (1902) 4 Ont. L. Rep. 134.

In Norfolk v. J. W. Perry Co. (1908) 108 Va. 28, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 128 Am. St. Rep. 940, 61 S. E. 867, it was held that under a lease of municipal property for a period of ninety-nine years, renewable forever, which provided that the lessee should pay all "public taxes," the city could levy and collect taxes against the land and the buildings thereon, as under such a lease the lessee was the virtual owner of the property, aside from the specific covenant to pay taxes.

So, it has been said that lands of the United States on the Hot Springs reservation, which has been leased to individuals for the operation of bath-houses thereon, were subject to state taxation, the tax being deemed to be on the interest of the lessee, and not on the property of the government. Ex parte Gaines (Ark.) supra, wherein the court called attention to a subsequent act of Congress (Act March 3, 1891), specifically permitting taxation of leased lands on the reservation in question.

In Bentley v. Barton (1884) 41 Ohio St. 410, it was held that lands vested by the United States in the state, to be used exclusively for school purposes, were subject to taxation after lease for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, as the property of the lessee, under a statute providing that lands belonging to the state or a municipality, when leased for a term exceeding fourteen years, should be subject to taxation as the property of the lessee.

In Zumstein v. Consolidated Coal & Min. Co. (1896) 54 Ohio St. 264, 43 N. E. 829, it was held that, under the statute, the fee in wharf property belonging to a municipality, when leased for more than fourteen years, was not subject to taxation, but the interest of the lessee was taxable.

In Cincinnati v. Lewis (1902) 66 Ohio St. 49, 63 N. E. 588, it was held that land owned by a municipality and rented from year to year was subject to taxation, as not being within the constitutional provision exempting from taxation lands owned by a city when "used exclusively for any public purpose." The decision in this case was based on the construction of the term, "public use," and no mention was made of the statute subjecting lands owned by a city to taxation, when rented for a longer period than fourteen years.

In State, Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., Prosecutor, v. Haight (1873) 36 N. J. L. 471, it was held that where a statute leasing lands of the state to a corporation provided that the exemption from taxation in the original charter of the company should not apply to the lands conveyed by the act, they were subject to taxation.

In Scragg v. London (1870) 28 U. C. Q. B. 457, it was held that land owned by a municipality, but leased to a private individual, was liable to taxation by the municipality.

In the case of Re Canadian P. Land Co. (1903) 5 Ont. L. Rep. 717, reversing in part (1902) 4 Ont. L. Rep. 134, it was held that where it is shown that in all leases by a city there was customarily embodied a covenant of the tenant to pay taxes, the mere fact that an informal agreement to lease city property made no mention of taxes did not prevent the insertion of such a covenant when the formal lease was executed. In this case it was said: "A covenant to pay taxes is a usual covenant in a lease of land forming part of the municipal property. Therefore, in settling the lease in question, the city is entitled to have a covenant to that effect inserted, unless it is made to appear that, by reason of the circumstances or of the terms of the agreement, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is relieved from the ordinary obligation of a tenant or lessee of city property, to pay the taxes imposed upon it."

The leasehold interest of a tenant, renting lands owned by the state, has been held to be subject to taxation, and liable to be seized under execution and sold. La Salle County Mfg. Co. v. Ottawa (1855) 16 Ill. 418.

In Carrington v. People (1902) 195 Ill. 484, 63 N. E. 163, it was held that a leasehold interest in canal lands was subject to taxation.

Likewise, it has been held that the leasehold interest in lands held for school purposes is taxable. Street v. Columbus (1898) 75 Miss. 822, 23 So. 773; State ex rel. Sioux County v. Tucker (1893) 38 Neb. 56, 56 N. W. 718.

In Moeller v. Gormley (1906) 44 Wash. 465, 87 Pac. 507, construing a constitutional provision exempting from taxation the property of the state without qualification, the court, in holding that the leasehold interest of property leased by the state was subject to taxation, said: "When a lease is given by the state to an individual or private corporation, the lessee thereby obtains for his or its private use certain rights and privileges in, to, and upon such real estate. These rights and privileges constitute private property, over which the lessee has, and may exercise, absolute dominion and ownership within the limitations of his or its lease. Why, as such property, it should not be subject to the general rule of taxation, we conceive of no reason."

But in San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. Los Angeles (1914) 167 Cal. 425, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 991, 139 Pac. 1071, it was held that a leasehold interest in tidelands, or submerged lands belonging to the state, was not taxable under a provision exempting property which "belongs to" the state.

Under a constitutional provision exempting from taxation "property devoted to the exclusive use and benefit of the public," it has been held in Texas that neither lands held by counties for school purposes and leased to individuals, nor the leasehold interest, are subject to taxation. Daugherty v. Thompson (1888) 71 Tex. 192, 9 S. W. 99; Davis v. Burnett (1890) 77 Tex. 3, 13 S. W. 613; Continental Land & Cattle Co. v. Board (1891) 80 Tex. 489, 16 S. W. 312.

As was said in Daugherty v. Thompson (Tex.) supra: "County school lands, when leased to raise an available school fund, are as exclusively devoted to the use and benefit of the public as would they be if covered with schoolhouses; and the Constitution forbids the taxation of the means through which such lands may be made to yield a revenue, without sale, as fully as does it forbid the taxation of the lands. Forbidding the taxation of the lands, it forbids the taxation of an estate less than the fee, whether imposed on the county or its lessee."

In Trammell v. Fought (1889) 74 Tex. 557, 12 S. W. 317, it was held that school lands held under lease from the state with the reservation of the right in the state to sell such lands at any time, and thereby terminate the lease, were not subject to taxation under the provision of a statute making subject to taxation, public lands "held under a lease for a term of three years or more."

In Taylor v. Robinson (1888) 72 Tex. 364, 10 S. W. 245, it was held that where, in pursuance to the provision of a contract for the construction of a state capitol, certain lands were leased to the contractor pending the time when he should be entitled to them in fee as payment on his contract, they were not subject to taxation under the provision of a statute taxing lands "held under a contract for the purchase thereof, belonging to the state."

It has been held that under a provision of a statute requiring that lands of the commonwealth, when leased for business purposes, be taxed by the city, a lessee of state lands, required by a city to pay a tax on such lands, could recover the amount so paid from the state, unless he was prohibited from so doing by the terms of his contract. The court based its ruling on the rule that, where a lease is silent as to taxes, the landlord must pay them. Boston Molasses Co. v. Com. (1907) 193 Mass. 387, 79 N. E. 827.

But where the lands were held by a person under a bond for deed from the commonwealth, it was held that the possessor was not a lessee, and the provision requiring the taxation of certain lands of the commonwealth when leased for business purposes did not apply. Corcoran v. Boston (1907) 193 Mass. 586, 79 N. E. 829.

Under a statute creating a board of water commissioners for a city, and providing that "the property of the board . . . shall be exempt from all taxes," property formerly used by the board for water purposes, but afterwards leased to a dry dock company, has been held to be exempt from taxation. Water Comrs. v. Auditor General (1898) 115 Mich. 546, 73 N. W. 801, wherein it was said: "The language creating the exemption is in itself broad enough to cover the property in question. The provision relating to exemption from taxation is immediately followed by the exemption of the property from legal process, indicating that the same class of property was in the mind of the legislature; and when it is considered that the board is, in the same section, given power to lease property owned by it, and that no limitation is placed upon the exemption, the conclusion is irresistible that the exemption is broad enough in terms to cover the property in question."

In People ex rel. International Nav. Co. v. Barker (1897) 153 N. Y. 98, 47 N. E. 46, affirming (1897) 15 App. Div. 628, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1126, it was held that where, by the terms of a lease of municipal property, it was required that a shed be erected on the premises, and provided that when erected it should become the property of the city, the shed, being municipal property, was exempt. T. T. DALLAS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF FLORIDA.

Florida Supreme Court — August 15, 1918.

(— Fla. —, 79 So. 690.)

Appeal — instructions — presumption of chastity.

1. In a prosecution for having carnal intercourse with an unmarried woman under the age of eighteen years, of previous chaste character, it is reversible error for the court to charge that, "as to the previous chaste character of the prosecuting witness, the law presumes that every unmarried female is of chaste character until she has been shown to be otherwise."

[See note on this question beginning on page 1462.]

Rape — statutory — chastity.

2. In a prosecution for having carnal intercourse with an unmarried woman under the age of eighteen years, of previous chaste character, the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix is a material element of the offense to be alleged and proved.

[See 22 R. C. L. 1190, 1191.]

Evidence — character of prosecutrix.

3. When the state has met the requirement of proving the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix, it is competent for the defendant to introduce evidence that the prosecutrix, prior to the alleged acts of carnal intercourse with the defendant, had associated with persons of low morals, conducted herself in a free and intimate manner with men, or permitted them to take liberties with her.

[See 22 R. C. L. 1208, 1209.]

Appeal — question not in bill of exceptions.

4. A question to a witness which is in the assignment of errors, but not in the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered on appeal, except so far as may be necessary for advice for another trial.

[See 2 R. C. L. 133, 134.]

Evidence — prosecution for rape — lack of chastity.

5. Upon prosecution for rape, where prosecutrix has testified to her previous chaste character, evidence is admissible tending to show lack of chastity, or as affecting her character for chastity.

[See 22 R. C. L. 1211.]

— contradiction of prosecutrix.

6. Where prosecutrix in rape has offered evidence of chastity and that she did not keep company with other men, a letter from her inviting a man to come to see her is admissible in contradiction.

[See 22 R. C. L. 1211.]

ERROR to the Criminal Court of Record for Hillsborough County (Graham, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of statutory rape. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Aronzo Wilder, for plaintiff in error:

It was error for the court to charge that, "as to the previous chaste character of the prosecuting witness, the law presumes that every unmarried female is of chaste character until she has been shown to be otherwise."

Browne, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was convicted of the charge of having carnal intercourse with an unmarried female, under the age of eighteen years, of previous chaste character.

The last assignment of error, based upon the court's denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial, raises the question of the sufficiency of the testimony to support the verdict. It was established that she was unmarried. The woman testified to the carnal intercourse, and her mother testified that the defendant admitted it. All this the defendant denied. The testimony as to her age was not very clear, but as the jury were satisfied with it, and there was some competent evidence as to the carnal intercourse and to her being under eighteen years of age, we will not disturb the verdict because of the insufficiency of the evidence on these points.

The evidence of her previous chaste character we will discuss with other assignments.

The sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments of error relate to the refusal of the trial judge to permit the defendant to introduce testimony to prove acts on the part of the prosecuting witness that would tend to show lack of chastity.

The questions which form the basis of the sixth and seventh assignments were too broad, and objections to them were properly sustained. The questions which form the basis of the eighth and ninth assignments were: "Q. Have you ever seen this girl in any act of familiarity with any man in the last six months?" "Q. Have you seen this girl, Sallie France, sitting in the lap of any man during February or March of this year?"

The last question is in the assignment of errors, but is not in the bill of exceptions, and therefore it cannot be considered by this court, except as indicating what should be done on another trial if this evidence should be offered.

The prosecutrix testified to her previous chaste character, and the testimony sought to be adduced by these questions was proper as tending to show a lack of chastity on her part, or as affecting her character for chastity.

Where, as in this case, the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix is a material fact to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, it is proper for defendant, when the state has met the requirement, to introduce evidence that the prosecutrix had, prior to the alleged act of carnal intercourse with the defendant, associated with persons of low morals, conducted herself in a free and intimate manner with men, or permitted them to take liberties with her. State v. Bige, 112 Iowa, 433, 84 N. W. 518; Creighton v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 101, 51 S. W. 910.

In Safford v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 474, the court said: "But I think the defense is not confined to cases of actual incontinency, but may prevail upon the ground of reputation alone, and that if the jury find the female really had the reputation of being unchaste, the case is not within the statute. The use of the word 'character' is important in this respect, and in such case she does not come within the class described in the act, although illicit intercourse, in fact, cannot be proved."

The first, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth assignments of error raise substantially the same question, the propriety of this charge: "The court instructs you, as to the previous chaste character of the prosecuting witness, that the law presumes that every unmarried female is of chaste character until she has been shown to be otherwise."

The defendant was charged with violating chap. 6974 of the Acts of 1915. This act was amendatory of § 3521 of the Gen. Stat. and the only change in the law was the insertion of the words, "of previous chaste character."

We cannot be unmindful of the fact that, from the time this statute was first enacted until the amendment of 1915, the words, "of previous chaste character," were not part of the law; and, when the legislature inserted these words, they made the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix one of the essential elements of the crime. These are: (1) Carnal intercourse; (2) the female must have been unmarried at the time of the carnal intercourse; (3) she must be of previous chaste character; (4) she must have been under the age of eighteen years at the time of the carnal intercourse.

It is necessary to allege and prove each of these elements beyond a reasonable doubt, but the instruction complained of assumes the existence of one of the material elements of the offense, and relieves the prosecution of the necessity of furnishing any proof thereof.

The only cases cited by the state in support of the soundness of the instruction, where the language of the statutes are the same or of similar import to ours, are from Georgia and New York.

The case from the last-named state is that of Crozier v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 453, the second headnote to which is as follows: "By 'previous chaste character' the statute means personal chastity—actual character—not reputation. In the absence of proof such chastity will be presumed. But the presumption may be overcome by specific acts of lewdness, proved affirmatively on the part of the defendant."

A note by the reporter, however, calls attention to the fact that "from other cases reported in this volume, it will be seen there are differences of opinion upon the last two propositions. See People v. Alger, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 333, and People v. Safford, supra."

And an examination of these cases lessens the effect of the Crozier Case.

In a discussion of this question in State v. Holter, 32 S. D. 43, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 376, 142 N. W. 657, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 193, the court said this about the New York decisions: "Our attention has not been called to any case decided by the court of appeals of New York that turned upon the precise question involved in this case. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 204, 84 Am. Dec. 177, cited by the state, does not support the contention of respondent. It appears from an examination of the opinion of the court in that case that the prosecutrix testified to her being of previous chaste character, and Balcom, J., in his concurring opinion, said it was proper for the state to show this fact."

In those states that hold that in this class of cases the previous chastity of a prosecutrix will be presumed, and no proof is necessary to establish it, the statutes are silent about her previous chastity, and we are not called upon to approve or disapprove of the rule in those cases, as our statute makes the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix a material element of the offense. As has been well said, the rule of the presumption of the chastity of an unmarried woman is a shield of the accused, and not the sword of the prosecution. Thus, where a woman stands charged with an offense where her chastity is challenged, the law humanely presumes her to be chaste. It is but a corollary of the presumption of her innocence.

It is a shield to protect her when she is on trial, and not a sword to be used to destroy the greater presumption of innocence which protects a man from a charge made by a woman scorned, or who, having shared with him the enjoyment of their lascivious conduct, seeks from revenge or other motives, to bring down on him the penalty of the law, which, but for her own uncontrolled passion, he would not have violated.

What has been said by some courts about an unchaste female in our country being a comparatively rare exception is no doubt true where the population is composed largely of the Caucasian race, but we would blind ourselves to actual conditions if we adopted this rule, where another race that is largely unmoral constitutes an appreciable part of the population. As was said by Mr. Justice Woods in Ferguson v. State, 71 Miss. 805, 42 Am. St. Rep. 492, 15 So. 66: "The presumptions of law spring from and rest upon the general knowledge and universal experience of mankind."

The great weight of the authorities, both in number and force, is against the correctness of the instruction complained of.

In West v. State, 1 Wis. 209, the court said:

"The previous chaste character of the female is one of the most essential elements of the offense; made so by the express words of the statute, in conformity with the suggestions of sound reason. A prostitute may be the subject of rape, but not of seduction. It is the chastity of the female which the statute is designed to protect. The pre-existence of that chastity is a sine qua non to the commission of the crime. That is the subject of legal guardianship, provided by this section. It is a substantive matter necessary to be averred and proved.

"If the prosecutrix were to change places, and were she indicted for lascivious conduct, then, indeed, the legal presumption would come to her aid, and her chastity would be presumed. But when the state accuses one of its citizens with the violation of the chastity of another of its citizens by seduction, the law presumes the accused to be innocent of the entire offense until the contrary appears. The state cannot be permitted to presume the immediate pre-existence of that chastity, with the destruction of which the defendant is charged. One act of illicit intercourse affords no presumption that another has not preceded it."

In Zabriskie v. State, 43 N. J. L. 640, 39 Am. Rep. 610, the court said:

"That good repute of the female is a constituent of the crime charged, and that it is an indispensable allegation in the indictment, is not denied. To constitute guilt it is necessary that this good repute should exist; in the absence of it, the statutory crime has not been committed. If all the other facts are proved, still the defendant must be adjudged to be innocent, unless the good repute is proved, or unless, in the absence of proof, it is presumed as a fact in the case.

"Such presumption, it is manifest, would destroy the presumption of innocence, which is ever present as a protection to the accused, and substitute for it the presumption of guilt.

"A woman who comes into court with a bastard child in her arms is not a representative of her sex; happily she represents a very insignificant portion of it. The fact that she has sacrificed that virtue which was her glittering crown casts such a shadow upon her that, in the most charitable view of the case, it should be left without presumption either way, to be determined by competent evidence what her prior repute has been. Her immoral conduct, unless mitigating circumstances are shown, classes her with the vicious and disreputable, and, as to her, negatives the presumption of purity so universally accorded to her sex. The question is not whether the vast majority of females are of good repute, but whether in this case it shall be presumed as a fact against the defendant that the woman with whom the crime is alleged to have been committed, and who carries with her the evidence of her shame, is of good repute. The rule, if well founded, must be of universal application, and involves the broad proposition that, of the entire class of women who bear illegitimate children, it must be presumed that every one who may prefer a charge of this kind is of good repute for chastity. It will be more reasonable to reverse the presumption."

In Marshall v. Territory, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 136, 101 Pac. 139, the court said: "The law, upon the one hand, presumes the defendant innocent until guilt is established by evidence to that degree of certainty reaching beyond a reasonable doubt. On the other hand, the law presumes that every female is chaste and virtuous until the contrary is established, or there is evidence sufficient to create a reasonable doubt upon this issue. There are cases and authorities holding, on each side of the proposition, that in such cases the presumption of chastity prevails over the presumption of innocence. From an examination of the cases the true rule will be found to be, the cases where the law presumes the female is of chaste and virtuous character are those that refer to general reputation and general repute of such female; how she is held in the community where she resides. In such cases the chastity of the female is not an element of the crime investigated. Wherever character is an element of the crime,—that is, where the statutory definition of the crime involves chastity, wherein the act constituting the offense must have been concerning a female having previous chaste and virtuous character,—the law will not presume such character to exist. The burden is upon the state to establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, each material allegation in the indictment, and each material element of the crime charged, one of which is that the female was of previous chaste and virtuous character. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the defendant should prove his innocence."

In State v. Kelly, 245 Mo. 489, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 476, 150 S. W. 1057, the court said: "But in criminal prosecutions the presumption of chastity logically yields to the presumption of defendant's innocence, when the two directly conflict, as in this case. It is suggested there can be no such thing as conflicting presumptions, and, hence the conclusion that the presumption of chastity disappears because of its conflict with the presumption of innocence is unsound. Whether this theory is logical when applied to presumptions arising from facts proved by the evidence in a given case, it is unnecessary to inquire, since the presumption of chastity does not arise on this record in that fashion. Whether the presumption of innocence be called merely the reason for the rule requiring proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or be held to be, of itself, substantive evidence in defendant's favor, it cannot long survive, if general inferences and presumptions not arising out of the facts proved by the evidence in the case are permitted to overthrow it. Whatever may be theoretically true as to the possibility of a conflict of presumptions, the jury's perplexity, when confronted in this case with instructions embodying both the presumption of innocence and that of chastity, and their unavailing effort to secure an explanation as to which presumption took precedence, evidences the possibility of a practical conflict productive of confusion and injustice. The instruction complained of should not have been given."

We might cite many authorities in support of this proposition, but it would serve no useful purpose. It is quite clear that the court erred in giving the charge as to the presumption of the chastity of the prosecutrix.

The eleventh assignment is predicated upon the refusal of the trial judge to allow the defendant to introduce a letter written by the prosecutrix to one Wilson, in which she explained why she could not spend the day somewhere; appealing to him to come and see her when he left the other woman; that she was going to look for him, and he had better not disappoint her, because she would be lonely. This letter tended to show that she was familiar with other men, and to contradict the testimony of herself and her mother that she did not go out, or keep company with any other man. It was part of the evidence sought to be introduced by the defendant, which was rejected by the court, as bearing on her chaste character, and should have been admitted.

ANNOTATION.

Presumption and burden of proof as to chastity under statutes making chastity an ingredient of rape.

Under statutes defining rape and making "previous chaste character" of the female an element of the offense, it has been held, in accordance with the decision in the reported case, and in line with cases involving other sexual offenses, such as seduction, of which chastity is an element (DALLAS v. STATE, ante, 1457), that the state must affirmatively prove as a part of its prima facie case the previous chastity of the prosecutrix; that no obligation rests upon the defendant to introduce evidence showing want of chastity of the prosecutrix until the state has made out a prima facie case of previous chastity on her part; that in the absence of evidence by either party on the question of the previous chastity of the prosecutrix there should be an acquittal.

Thus, in DALLAS v. STATE, a prosecution for having carnal intercourse with an unmarried female under eighteen years of age, the statute makes the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix one of the essential elements of the crime; and it is held reversible error to charge that the law presumes the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix.

So, it is held in State v. Kelly (1912) 245 Mo. 489, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 476, 150 S. W. 1057, that the state must prove chastity, and cannot rely on a presumption of it, in a prosecution under a statute making carnal knowledge of an unmarried female of previous chaste character, between certain ages, rape. In holding erroneous an instruction "that the law presumes that every woman is of chaste character until the contrary appears," the court observed that "on the question whether the presumption of chastity obtains in a case of this kind, and relieves the state of the necessity of bringing forward, in the first instance, evidence of the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix, the decisions in other jurisdictions are not in accord. This court has heretofore indicated (citing State v. McMahon (1911) 234 Mo. 611, 137 S. W. 872; State v. McCaskey (1891) 104 Mo. 647, 16 S. W. 511; State v. Hill (1886) 91 Mo. 427, 4 S. W. 121) its view that the previous chastity of the prosecutrix is an element of the offense, under our statute, which must be both charged and proved. Those text-writers and encyclopedists who have expressed an opinion agree this is the sounder and more logical rule (citing Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 648; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1106; 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2528; 25 Am.

& Eng. Enc. Law, 240); and an examination of the cases tends only to confirm the accuracy of this conclusion. It is undoubtedly true that the practical universality of chastity among women justly gives rise, in most circumstances, to a presumption of chastity on the part of an individual member of the sex; but in criminal prosecutions the presumption of chastity logically yields to the presumption of defendant's innocence, when the two directly conflict, as in this case. It is suggested there can be no such thing as conflicting presumptions, and hence the conclusion that the presumption of chastity disappears because of its conflict with the presumption of innocence is unsound. Whether this theory is logical when applied to presumptions arising from facts proved by the evidence in a given case, it is unnecessary to inquire, since the presumption of chastity does not arise on this record in that fashion. Whether the presumption of innocence be called merely the reason for the rule requiring proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or be held to be, of itself, substantive evidence in defendant's favor, it cannot long survive, if general inferences and presumptions, not arising out of the facts proved by the evidence in the case, are permitted to overthrow it. Whatever may be theoretically true as to the possibility of a conflict of presumptions, the jury's perplexity, when confronted in this case with instructions embodying both the presumption of innocence and that of chastity, and their unavailing effort to secure an explanation as to which presumption took precedence, evidences the possibility of a practical conflict, productive of confusion and injustice. The instruction complained of should not have been given.

In State v. Cook (1918) — Mo. —, 207 S. W. 831, also holding that the chastity of prosecutrix in statutory rape is not to be presumed, but must be proved by the state in the first instance, the court observed that "in many jurisdictions the view is taken that the previous chaste character of the female carnally known is to be presumed, and that no affirmative proof of this fact is required;" but in view of the plain language of the "statute, considered in connection with the universally entertained presumption of defendant's innocence, such a rule is not even respectable nonsense."

In a prosecution for carnally knowing a female of previous chaste character, the court in State v. Volz (1916) 269 Mo. 194, 190 S. W. 307, with respect to an instruction that there is no presumption that prosecutrix was of chaste character prior to the date of the alleged offense, observed that in the case of State v. Kelly (1912) 245 Mo. 489, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 476, 150 S. W. 1057, supra, it was held to be error to instruct the jury, in a case of this character, that the law presumes that every woman is of chaste character until the contrary appears. This, upon the theory, not that such a presumption did not in fact ordinarily exist, but upon the theory that chastity of the prosecutrix was, under the statute, a fact to be both charged and proved, and that such an instruction would, therefore, relieve the state of its duty to "bring forward, in the first instance, evidence of the previously chaste character of the prosecutrix." The court then goes on to say that the instruction offered in the case at bar (State v. Volz (Mo.) supra) was correct as a purely abstract principle of law, so far as it has to do with the question of the burden of proof in the case; but yet we do not think the court erred in refusing to give the same, but, on the other hand, think it very properly refused to so instruct. This, because: (1) The jury were clearly told by other instructions that the law presumed defendant's innocence, and that the burden was upon the state to prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and the fact of previous chaste character was specifically mentioned as one of the facts to be found by the jury before finding a verdict of guilty; (2) the giving of such an instruction on a purely technical phase of the case would have a tendency to mislead the jury into believing that there would likely be a presumption that the prosecutrix was unchaste prior to the alleged offense."

So, in Marshall v. Territory (1909) 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 136, 101 Pac. 139, the prosecution was required to prove that the female was of previous chaste and virtuous character, that being made by statute an element of the rape charged. The court stated: "The law upon the one hand presumes the defendant innocent until guilt is established by evidence, to that degree of certainty reaching beyond a reasonable doubt. On the other hand, the law presumes that every female is chaste and virtuous until the contrary is established, or there is evidence sufficient to create a reasonable doubt upon this issue. There are cases and authorities holding on each side of the proposition that, in such cases, the presumption of chastity prevails over the presumption of innocence. From an examination of the cases the true rule will be found to be, the cases where the law presumes the female is of chaste and virtuous character are those that refer to general reputation and general repute of such female; how she is held in the community where she resides. In such cases the chastity of the female is not an element of the crime investigated. Wherever character is an element of the crime, that is, where the statutory definition of the crime involved chastity, wherein the act constituting the offense must have been concerning a female having a previous chaste and virtuous character,—the law will not presume such character to exist. The burden is upon the state to establish beyond a reasonable doubt each material allegation in the indictment, and each material element of the crime charged, one of which is that the female was of previous chaste and virtuous character. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the defendant should prove his innocence."

In State v. De Witt (1905) 186 Mo. 61, 84 S. W. 956, a prosecution for having had carnal knowledge of a female of previous chaste character, a special verdict omitting the essential finding of the previous chaste character of the prosecutrix was held insufficient to sustain the judgment. The statute in this case made it a felony for any person over the age of sixteen years to have carnal knowledge of any unmarried female of previous chaste character, between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years of age.

But in Diffey v. State (1913) 10 Okla. Crim. Rep. 190, 135 Pac. 942, in answer to the contention that prosecutrix in rape was not shown to have been of previous chaste and virtuous character, the court said: "The law presumes that a female is chaste and virtuous, and this presumption authorizes the jury to assume at the outset that the prosecutrix was chaste and virtuous. If any evidence is introduced tending to show a want of previous chaste and virtuous character, then the state is required to establish the previous chaste and virtuous character of the prosecutrix beyond a reasonable doubt."

In Com. v. Allen (1890) 135 Pa. 483, 19 Atl. 957, a prosecution for rape, the court said: "There was no need for the commonwealth to prove her to be of good repute until her character had been attacked. The law presumes it to be good. If it was not, that was a matter of defense. We think this is the proper construction of the Act of May 19, 1887 (P. L. 128), the proviso of which is as follows: 'That upon the trial of any defendant charged with the unlawful carnal knowledge and abuse of a woman child under the age of sixteen years if the jury shall find that such woman child was not of good repute, and that the carnal knowledge was with her consent, the defendant shall be acquitted of the felonious rape and convicted of fornication only.'" A man who seeks to escape conviction for an offense of this nature upon the ground that the female child he has abused is not of good repute must show it. The law will not help him out with presumptions. See also, to the same effect, under the same statute, Com. v. Howe (1908) 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 554, same case on other appeals in (1909) 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 208, and (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 136.

The decision in Rodgers v. State (1916) 111 Mass. 781, 72 So. 198, a case of statutory rape, the statute on which the indictment was based expressly declares that "it shall be presumed that the female was previously of chaste character, and the burden shall be upon the defendant to show that she was not." CERTIFICATION by the Court of Appeals for Cuyahoga County for determination by the Supreme Court, of questions arising upon the affirmance and reversal of judgments of the Court of Common Pleas, sustaining demurrers to intervening petitions, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage and for the appointment of a receiver. Reversed.

Statement by Jones, J.:

The Superior Savings & Trust Company, as trustee for bondholders, held a mortgage upon property which included an eight-story building on the corner of Euclid avenue and Fifty-ninth street in Cleveland, Ohio. Oliver P. Brown, as administrator, held a mortgage upon the same premises, subject to the priority of the trust mortgage. On March 31, 1916, the trustee for the bondholders brought suit in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county for the foreclosure of its mortgage, and on the same day applied for a receivership of the property. In that suit, on April 29, 1916, Oliver P. Brown, administrator, filed his answer and cross petition, seeking an accounting for the amount due and for foreclosure of his mortgage lien.

The trust mortgage contained a provision that, upon default, the trustee was entitled to take possession of the premises and manage the same, and, in the event of foreclosure, to apply for and obtain a receiver for the property. Under its mortgage covenant the trustee had taken possession of the property on February 6, 1914, pending the appointment of a receiver. The petition of the trustee asked the court that a receiver be appointed "to manage and conserve the property." Thereafter proceedings were had in the foreclosure suit, resulting in a decree on May 17, 1916, ordering the sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds: First, to the payment of costs of suit, taxes, and assessments against the property; second, to the trust company, as prior mortgagee, the sum of about seventy-seven thousand dollars; third, to Brown, administrator, upon his mortgage, the sum of about one hundred eighty-seven thousand dollars. The property was sold on August 4, 1916, to the second mortgagee, and realized the sum of $133,000, an amount which was insufficient to pay the mortgage liens. It is further disclosed by the record that the receiver was carrying liability insurance to protect him against liability for injuries and damages resulting from the operation of the elevator, and that under such policies he was to be reimbursed on account of any money which he might pay out in satisfaction of any judgments secured against him.

Pertinent to the issues here are the following facts as disclosed by the record: On July 3, 1916, Win-terbottom was injured by falling into the elevator shaft of the building, which injury, he claimed, was caused by the negligence of the receiver who had control of and was operating the same. On the 25th day of July, 1916, Winterbottom applied to the court of common pleas, in the foreclosure suit, for permission to sue the receiver, and asked that the receiver hold the funds which might come into his hands for the payment of any judgment he might secure. This authority was granted by the court on that day; and the court also ordered that the receiver be required to hold the funds in his hands to the further determination of the court. Thereupon, on the same day, Winterbottom filed his suit for damages against the receiver. On August 2, 1916, Winterbottom filed his motion to vacate the order of distribution made on May 17, 1916, and on August 3, 1916, served notice that his motion would be heard on the next day. On August 8, 1916, the same day that the sale of the premises was confirmed by the court, Winterbottom filed in the original foreclosure suit a petition styled "Petition for Intervention and for Vacation and Modification of Decree"—the decree of May 17, 1916. Just before this, as a precautionary measure, he also filed an independent suit in equity, seeking the same relief. Both of these petitions contained the facts as herein set forth, and both were demurred to by the parties affected. The common pleas court sustained the demurrers in both cases. Proceedings in error were thereupon taken to the court of appeals, and that court affirmed the action of the court of common pleas in sustaining the demurrer to the intervention pleading in the original foreclosure action, but reversed the common pleas court in the independent equitable action, holding that Winterbottom's petition not only stated a cause of action, but that his independent equitable suit was the proper method of procedure.

On motion to certify the cases, this court sustained the motion of both parties to certify the cases here for review.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In his effort to have the nisi prius court hold the proceeds of the mortgaged property until the determination of his unadjudicated claim for damages for personal injuries, Winterbottom adopted the precautionary measures of filing his petition of intervention in the original foreclosure action and of bringing an independent action in equity seeking the same relief. The questions here involved are presented in two aspects: First, whether or not the corpus of real estate encumbered by mortgage liens may be subordinated to a claim for damages against the receiver of that property, resulting from his control and operation thereof; second, what effect, if any, the action of a lienholder has, when he procures a receivership not only for the purpose of conservation and custody of the property, but also for its control and business management.

The law in relation to the receivership of railways has gradually developed until it is now uniformly held that receivers of that class of corporations may incur obligations of the character here involved, which must be paid out of the current earnings of the corporation, and, in lieu of any deficiency therein, out of the corpus of the property itself. But, even in receiverships of that character, Mr. Justice Brewer, in the frequently cited case of Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. 136 U. S. 89, 98, 34 L. ed. 379, 383, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 953, said: "It is the exception, and not the rule, that such priority of liens can be displaced. We emphasize this fact of the sacredness of contract liens, for the reason that there seems to be growing an idea that the chancellor, in the exercise of his equitable powers, has unlimited discretion in this matter of the displacement of vested liens." Receiver—expenses.

And it is held, as to railway liens, that current operating expenses of a railroad, including damages for personal injuries, may be preferred over the railway mortgage liens. This legal principle is attributed to the fact that these great corporations not only assume to derive their franchises and public functions from the state, but are of such character as to be affected by public interest to an extent that their operation may be required in proper cases, notwithstanding the objections of stockholders and mortgagees, and irrespective of the question whether the latter may have been notified at the time of the original appointment of the receiver. But does the same rule apply to corporations of a private character, which are not affected with such public interest? This feature was clearly recognized by the Justice of the United States Supreme Court who rendered the opinion in the case of Wood v. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. 128 U. S. 416, 32 L. ed. 472, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131, when, in speaking of the case of Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, he said: "The case lays great emphasis on the consideration that a railroad is a peculiar property, of a public nature, and discharging a great public work. There is a broad distinction between such a case and that of a purely private concern. We do not undertake to decide the question here, but only point it out."

Since rendition of the opinion in the latter case, the lower courts of Federal jurisdiction have uniformly held that the principles that apply to railway corporations involving the subordination of vested liens do not apply to individuals and private corporations, where no such public interest attaches. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Grape Creek Coal Co. (C. C.) 16 L.R.A. 603, 50 Fed. 481; Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co. (C. C.) 68 Fed. 623, and Hanna v. State Trust Co. 30 L.R.A. 201, 16 C. C. A. 586, 70 Fed. 2.

This principle has also been adopted by the state courts generally, which have had the question under consideration. Hooper v. Central Trust Co. 81 Md. 559, 591, 29 L.R.A. 262, 32 Atl. 505; International Trust Co. v. United Coal Co. 27 Colo. 246, 254, 83 Am. St. Rep. 59, 60 Pac. 621; Hotchkiss v. Makeel, Receiver, 87 Ill. App. 623, affirmed in 190 Ill. 311, 83 Am. St. Rep. 131, 60 N. E. 524; Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 423, 436, 60 Am. Rep. 456, 13 N. E. 282.

The rule is generally recognized that the cost of the custody and preservation of the property in the hands of the court, as well as the taxes, are, of course, payable out of the corpus of the realty encumbered, either in the case of individuals or private corporations, and are considered part of the expenses and costs of suit. In such cases, when the liens were incurred and accepted by the mortgagees, such costs were impliedly assented to when the mortgages were taken. Further, with relation to railway mortgage liens, when the lienholder obtained that class of security he did so with knowledge of the fact that he was acquiring it upon quasi public corporate property, which might be operated under the sanction of the court. This principle, however, does not affect the vested rights existing between mortgages and individuals or corporations of a private nature. If it did, then any claimant of an insolvent concern, or a partner upon dissolution of partnership, could, on his own motion, divest the security without consent of the lienholder, and possibly without any financial risk to himself.

However, there is another phase to this case which is controlling. The record discloses that the trustee of the bondholders, at the time it filed its petition for foreclosure, affirmatively asked for a receiver, and that on its motion one was appointed, not only to conserve, but to manage, the property. If the receiver was authorized to manage this property as a going concern, it was at the instance ~~negligence~~ and on the motion ~~priority of claim.~~ of the mortgage lienholder. In his operation of the property, it develops from the record, damage ensued by reason of that operation. This damage, when adjudicated, being incidental to the management, became part of the expense of the administration by the court. It does not now lie in the mouth of the lienee, who secured this operation by its express request, to deny the resultant expense accruing therefrom. While the rule of extending protection to mortgagees obtains in ordinary cases, it does not apply where personal injuries have been sustained because of the negligence of a receiver whom the lienee had expressly demanded, for the business management of the property. We think this principle is amply supported by reported cases in state and Federal jurisdictions. People's Nat. Bank v. Virginia Textile Co. 104 Va. 34, 51 S. E. 155, 7 Ann. Cas. 583; Metropolitan Trust Co. v. Tonawanda Valley & C. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 245, 8 N. E. 488; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Holbrook, 19 C. C. A. 385, 41 U. S. App. 33, 73 Fed. 112; Doe v. Northwestern Coal & Transp. Co. (C. C.) 78

Fed. 62; Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. supra.

Any equitable consideration existing in this case between the mortgagees, or between them and the fund procured from liability insurance, need not now be determined. These questions are left to the consideration of the court of first instance. All that is necessary for us to do at this time is to decide whether Winterbottom's pleading stated a cause of action which required the court to hold the proceeds arising from the sale of property until the determination of his suit for personal injuries. We hold that this right exists, and the sole remaining question is: What was his mode of procedure?

As disclosed by the record, Winterbottom not only filed his motion, and his petition for intervention, vacation, and modification of decree in the foreclosure suit, but also, just prior to filing the intervention petition, filed an independent suit in equity, seeking the vacation and modification of the decree of distribution made at the term just preceding. The pleading for intervention in the foreclosure suit was the proper method of procedure, since full and adequate relief could be obtained in that action. The property, or the proceeds therefrom, will be in the hands of the court, together with all the parties interested in the distribution of the proceeds after sale. By its order of May 17, 1916, the court decreed that the costs of suit should first be paid. While this expense of operation cannot technically be termed costs, still it is a part of the administration expense of the court. "Damages for injuries to persons or property during the receivership, caused by the torts of the receiver's agents and employees, are classed as a part of the operating expense of the corporation." 34 Cyc. 354. While the order of distribution may have been an adjudication of the existing rights between the parties, it in no wise affected this expense of the court which accrued after that order. It cannot be claimed that if the expense had been an ordinary administration expense of the receiver, the court would not have had inherent power to protect itself by the payment of the receiver's indebtedness. 34 Cyc. 307. While the petition for intervention was filed at a succeeding term of the court, it was filed at a time when the court still had charge of the property, and before final distribution of the proceeds arising from its sale. This sale was not confirmed until August 8, 1916. Prior to that time, to wit, on July 25, 1916, the receiver and the court were not only advised that this claim existed, but that the same was being prosecuted in a court of law, under an order of court in the foreclosure suit authorizing such action.

—intervention

In cases Nos. 15,698 and 15,706 the judgment of the Court of Appeals, reversing that of the common pleas in the independent equity suit, is reversed, and that of the Common Pleas Court affirmed.

In case No. 15,723 the judgments of the Court of Appeals and the Common Pleas Court are reversed and the case remanded to the Court of Common Pleas, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the petition for intervention.

ANNOTATION.

Priority of claims for damages from operation of railroad during receivership.

Damages from the operation of a railroad in the hands of a receiver are generally held a charge on the earnings of the road, as operating expenses. Cowdrey v. Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. (1877) 93 U. S. 352, 23 L.

ed. 950; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. (1896) 74 Fed. 431; Meyer Rubber Co. v. Georgetown & W. R. Co. (1909) 174 Fed. 731, affirmed in (1910) 101 C. C. A. 84, 177 Fed. 870; Klein v. Jewett (1875) 26 N. J. Eq. 474, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 1; Kain v. Smith (1880) 80 N. Y. 458; Ex parte Brown (1880) 15 S. C. 518.

Thus, in Cowdrey v. Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. (U. S.) supra, it was held that the earnings of a railroad in the hands of a receiver were chargeable with the value of goods lost in transportation, and with damages done to property during his management. The court said: "The earnings received were as much chargeable with such loss and damage as they were chargeable with the ordinary expenses of managing the road. The bondholders were only entitled to what remained after charges of this kind, as well as the expenses incurred in their behalf, were paid."

So, in Klein v. Jewett (1875) 26 N. J. Eq. 474, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 1, it was held that a claim for personal injuries, inflicted while a railroad was under the control of a receiver, might be properly included in the expenses incurred in operating the road, and should be paid out of the current earnings of the road, together with the taxed cost of the proceedings to recover damages therefor.

And where a receiver had income received from the operation of the road under the control of the court, it was held, in Ex parte Brown (S. C.) supra, that claims for personal injuries should be paid from such funds, in the absence of any personal fault making the receiver personally liable, though there were mortgage bonds constituting a lien on the property, which had not been and could not be paid in full.

And, in Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. (1896) 74 Fed. 431, the court, in discussing the right to a lien for damages in the operation of the road before the receivership, said: "Such claims for injuries occurring under the receiver's own management are paid, it is true, in preference to the mortgage debt, not for the reason of their preferential nature, nor because of any superior equity in their favor over claims for damages which arose before the receiver was appointed, but because they are liabilities which were incurred by the receiver in the course of his own operation of the road, and are payable by him as other expenses of the management."

Damages to employees are a part of the operating expenses of a railroad in the hands of a receiver, and should be paid as such. Meyer Rubber Co. v. Georgetown & W. R. Co. (1909) 174 Fed. 731, affirmed in (1910) 101 C. C. A. 84, 177 Fed. 870.

Damages for injury to the person, whether passenger or employee, and for loss of goods in course of transportation or otherwise, are chargeable upon, and payable out of, the fund in court, the same as other expenses of administration. Kain v. Smith (1880) 80 N. Y. 458.

In support of this view, see also Cross v. Evans (1898) 29 C. C. A. 523, 52 U. S. App. 720, 86 Fed. 1; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Davis (1884) 62 Miss. 271; Robinson v. New York & S. I. Electric Co. (1904) 99 App. Div. 509, 91 N. Y. Supp. 153; Ryan v. Hays (1884) 62 Tex. 42; Texas P. R. Co. v. Johnson (1890) 76 Tex. 421, 18 Am. St. Rep. 60, 13 S. W. 463; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Crawford (1895) 88 Tex. 277, 28 L.R.A. 761, 53 Am. St. Rep. 752, 31 S. W. 176; Holman v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1896) 14 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 37 S. W. 464, cited infra.

On the other hand, in Davenport v. Alabama & C. R. Co. (1875) 2 Woods, 519, Fed. Cas. No. 3,588, a judgment for personal injuries was denied priority over a mortgage as a part of the expense of executing the trust, with respect either to the earnings of the road or the proceeds of a sale. The receiver was appointed to take possession of the property, complete the road, procure rolling stock, etc., and the order created a prior lien for money raised or advanced "for the purposes aforesaid," and provided that any fund so raised or received from any other source, which might not be employed for these purposes or allowed for the services of the receiver, should be paid into court for the use of the bondholders. The court said: "The receivers of the court were merely appointed to act instead of the president and directors, except so far as the orders of the court otherwise direct, and the liability stands on the same footing as if it had been created by the president and directors, unless a higher right can be assigned to it under the orders of the court. The object of appointing a receiver is to take care of the property for those entitled to it, and he has no powers except such as are conferred upon him." This language is criticized in Ex parte Brown (1880) 15 S. C. 518, cited supra, where the court said: "The receivership is the transfer of the property to a new owner, who begins his work cut off from the past, with new duties and new obligations. The court could order a sale at once, and let new and absolute owners take the property and assume their proper liabilities to third parties. If, instead of doing this, a receiver is appointed, he represents, technically, the interest of an insolvent corporation, but technically and substantially the interests of creditors, who ought not to be allowed to enjoy the franchises and property of the corporation without its responsibilities."

Under a statute providing, relative to railroads in the hands of a receiver and manager, for the prior payment of the working expenses and other proper outgoings, it was held in Re Wraxham, H. & C. Q. R. Co. [1900] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 436, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 671, 83 L. T. N. S. 49, that a judgment for damages to property, caused by the railway company's failure to keep its plant in repair, was not entitled to such priority.

Claims of this character are also generally accorded priority against the property itself, and its proceeds, where there has been a diversion of current income from the payment of operating expenses, as in the case of the investment of such income in improvements on the property. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Davis (1884) 62 Miss. 271; Ryan v. Hays (1884) 62 Tex. 42;

Texas P. R. Co. v. Johnson (1890) 76 Tex. 421, 18 Am. St. Rep. 60, 13 S. W. 463; Texas P. R. Co. v. Overheiser (1890) 76 Tex. 437, 13 S. W. 468; Texas P. R. Co. v. Griffin (1890) 76 Tex. 441, 13 S. W. 471; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Geiger (1890) 79 Tex. 13, 15 S. W. 214; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Miller (1890) 79 Tex. 78, 11 L.R.A. 395, 23 Am. St. Rep. 308, 15 S. W. 264, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 592; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Comstock (1892) 88 Tex. 537, 18 S. W. 946, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 260; Holman v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1896) 14 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 37 S. W. 464.

Thus, in Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Davis (Miss.) supra, by agreement between a railroad company and its bondholders, a receiver appointed in a foreclosure suit was discharged, and surrendered the property to the company, which executed a new deed of trust. A passenger injured during the operation of the road by the receiver brought suit, alleging that part of the property turned over to the company by the receiver was paid for by the receiver out of earnings. The court said that the road in the hands of the receiver was chargeable with the expenses of operating the road, and injuries to persons or property were included in such expenses; that property purchased and paid for out of the income of the road while in the hands of the receiver was liable in equity, when the rights of third parties had not intervened, for the satisfaction of claims incurred in operating the road, and that it was not competent for the receiver, or the court under which he acted, to divert or invest the earnings in property for the railroad company, and then deliver the property to that company free from claims which were a charge on the earnings, without the holders of such claims having an opportunity to enforce them.

So, in Ryan v. Hays (1884) 62 Tex. 42, it was held that a claim for personal injuries, received while a railroad was operated by a receiver, was entitled to payment out of the current receipts, and that, if the current receipts were used for the betterment of the mortgaged property, then the injured person was entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the sale of such property, to the extent, so far as necessary, that the current expenses were so diverted. So, where the property was sold to bondholders and resold to the company, and, without any payment of the purchase price, the receiver was discharged, and the company's stockholders voted to assume all debts and liabilities of the receiver, it was held that the company was liable if any property in the receiver's hands would have been liable.

A claim for damages, caused by injuries inflicted through the negligence of a receiver while he is operating a railway, is entitled to payment out of current receipts, and if such earnings be invested in betterments which, without sale, are returned to the company with its other property at the close of the receivership, the company receives the property charged with the satisfaction of any claim which the receiver ought to have paid out of the earnings. Texas P. R. Co. v. Johnson, followed in the following cases: Texas P. R. Co. v. Overheiser; Texas P. R. Co. v. Griffin; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Geiger; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Miller; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Comstock, and Holman v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (Tex.) supra.

Where a railroad is in the hands of a receiver, claims arising out of the operation of the road by the receiver, whether in contract or for tort, have a right to payment out of the revenue accruing from the operation of the road, superior to the lien of prior mortgages or other debts; and where the receiver continued operating the road after its sale, and invested the earnings in betterments which, therefore, were not included in the sale price, the purchaser, to the extent of such betterments, was liable for damages for personal injuries sustained during the operation of the road by the receiver. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Crawford (1895) 88 Tex. 277, 28 L.R.A. 761, 53 Am. St. Rep. 752, 31 S. W. 176.

But where the injury occurred subsequent to the sale, the injured person had no claim upon the earnings accruing prior to the sale, and no use of such earnings would be a diversion of a fund to which he was entitled. And, moreover, if the improvements were made before the conveyance, the purchase of the property included the improvements, and the purchasers were not liable, as they received no benefit from the improvements; and plaintiff should, therefore, have alleged and proved that the improvements were made after the sale and conveyance, by the application of earnings arising subsequent to the sale. Crawford v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1895) 89 Tex. 89, 33 S. W. 534.

So, where damages to a shipment of cattle were sustained after such sale, there could be no recovery without pleading and proof that there were earnings after the sale, and while the road remained in the hands of the receiver. Holman v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1896) 14 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 37 S. W. 464.

But in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bath (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 707, 44 S. W. 595, it was held that the receiver, in holding and operating such road after such sale and its confirmation, and after the court had ordered its delivery to the purchaser, was acting at the instance and for the benefit of the purchaser, so that the purchaser was liable for lost shipments, irrespective of any betterments or improvements.

In a few cases, claims of this character have been enforced against the corpus of the property in the hands of a purchaser, because of a purchase subject to liabilities of the receiver. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Holbrook (1896) 19 C. C. A. 385, 41 U. S. App. 33, 73 Fed. 112; Central Trust Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1899) 38 C. C. A. 143, 97 Fed. 239, writ of certiorari denied in 176 U. S. 683, 44 L. ed. 638.

Thus, in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Holbrook (Fed.) supra, where the property was sold under a foreclosure decree, subject to all claims and demands against the receivers incurred in the operation of the road, a judgment for personal injuries inflicted in the operation of the road by the receiver was held a charge on the property. The court said: "When mortgage creditors ask a court of equity to take possession of such property and operate it, they consent to have all the liabilities resulting from such operation take precedence of their prior contract liens, which they are seeking by the proceedings to enforce. . . . As such business must be done from the nature of the case, more or less of such liability must be incurred. It is a necessary part of the running expenses of all railroads, and while such roads are being operated by the mortgage creditors, or by the court in their interest and at their instance, such running expenses must take precedence of their mortgage liens."

So, where a road which had been operated by a receiver was sold under foreclosure, subject to the payment by the purchaser of all liabilities incurred by the receiver, damages sustained by another road in a collision with one of the receiver's trains were allowed against the receiver, in Central Trust Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (Fed.) supra. The court said that such damages were classed as operating expenses of the railroad, under the receivership.

But where the state brought a quo warranto suit to forfeit a railroad company's charter, and a receiver was appointed, who continued the operation of the road for the use of the company pending the suit, it was held in Foreman v. Central Trust Co. (1896) 18 C. C. A. 321, 30 U. S. App. 658, 71 Fed. 776, that a decree vacating the appointment and providing for the return of the property to the company, chargeable with all proper expenses and liabilities incurred by the receiver in operating the road, and a further order that charges on the property in the hands of the receiver were thereby made a lien on the property, did not have the effect of giving a lien on the property, prior to the lien of a mortgage, to a passenger injured while the receiver was operating the road and subsequently recovering judgment for such injury.

Some of the cases take the broad ground that a deficiency of income is in itself sufficient to entitle claims of this character to payment out of the corpus. Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. (1886) 117 U. S. 434, 29 L. ed. 963, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809; Cross v. Evans (1898) 29 C. C. A. 523, 52 U. S. App. 720, 86 Fed. 1; Anderson v. Condict (1899) 35 C. C. A. 335, 93 Fed. 349; South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Carolina, C. G. & C. R. Co. (1899) 93 Fed. 543; Robinson v. New York & S. I. Electric Co. (1904) 99 App. Div. 509, 91 N. Y. Supp. 153; BROWN v. WINTERBOTTOM (reported herewith) ante, 1465; St. Louis Union Trust Co. v. Texas Southern R. Co. (1910) 59 Tex. Civ. App. 157, 126 S. W. 296.

Thus, in Cross v. Evans (1898) 29 C. C. A. 523, 52 U. S. App. 720, 86 Fed. 1, it is said that damages accruing during the time the railroad property is in the hands of a receiver have been held to be part of the operating expenses, and payable out of the income, if there is any, and if not, they must come out of the corpus of the property.

And in Robinson v. New York & S. I. Electric Co. (1904) 99 App. Div. 509, 91 N. Y. Supp. 153, the court, after stating that the rule is established by authority that damages for injuries to person or property during the receivership, caused by the torts of the receiver's agents and employees, are classed as operating expenses, and are accorded the same priority of payment as balances of other necessary expenses of the receivership, says that such claims are paid out of the net income, if any, if that is sufficient; but, in the event of a deficiency, they will be paid out of the corpus. It is further said that such claims, therefore, have priority over mortgage debts, or other debts, existing when the action was brought in which the receiver was appointed.

And in Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. (U. S.) supra, where it was conceded that certain debts incurred by a receiver, including items under the head of "damages," were so incurred, but it was claimed that they were entitled to priority only out of income, the court said: "Of course such items are payable out of the income, if any, before the corpus can be resorted to; but that may be resorted to when the items are proper ones to be allowed for operating expenses."

So, where receiver's certificates were made a first lien on the property of a railroad company and its proceeds and upon all net income derived from the operation of the road after the payment of operating expenses and costs of administration, it was held in Anderson v. Condict (1899) 35 C. C. A. 335, 93 Fed. 349, that, in the absence of sufficient income, operating expenses and costs of administration were to be paid out of the corpus. And that a claim for personal injuries sustained during the operation of the road by the receiver, though not strictly a cost of operation, was an expense incurred in and by reason of the operation, and, as such, entitled to priority over the receiver's certificates and the rights of a purchaser who had purchased subject to claims superior, in equity, to the receiver's certificates and to the mortgage, and subject to all current liabilities of the receiver which should thereafter be adjudged superior to the mortgage and certificates. The court said: "Here, at the request of the trustee, the court assumed, and, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the holders of the receiver's certificates, continued the operation of the railway. They subjected their securities to the expense of operation,—the trustee, by its affirmative act in praying the court to take possession and operate the railway; the holders of the certificates by the provision of the order authorizing the issuance of the certificates, and which was expressed upon their face, making them subject to the payment of operating expenses and the cost of administration. For that purpose, and to that extent, these parties were vicariously in the possession and operation of the railway through the court as their representative. All liabilities of the receiver were imposed upon the corpus of the property, failing income, as certainly as a mortgagee would be personally liable if he possessed and operated the railway."

So, where a railroad company, operating the road of another company under an agreement with its receiver that the operating road should be held harmless and not be accountable for any accident or damages to persons or property, sued to have claims for such damages paid from the proceeds of a sale of the road, the court held in South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Carolina, C. G. & C. R. Co. (1899) 93 Fed. 543, that if such damages were due to mere carelessness or negligence of the company's servants, and not to recklessness or gross carelessness, they constituted operating expenses, and the operating road was entitled to be reimbursed. The court said that, if the receiver had undertaken to operate the road himself, any damages recovered against him on account of the negligence of his servants would have been treated as operating expenses, and ordered paid in priority to the claims of bondholders.

It was likewise held in St. Louis Union Trust Co. v. Texas Southern R. Co. (1910) 59 Tex. Civ. App. 157, 126 S. W. 296, that the court had power, as regarded indebtedness incurred by a receiver as necessary operating expenses of the railway, where the income proved insufficient to satisfy such indebtedness, to direct payment of the residue out of the proceeds of a sale before a distribution was made to creditors and lienholders; but that such a right to be so paid arose from the order of the court, and not by operation of law independent of such order. It further held that damages for injuries to persons or property caused by torts of the receiver's servants were entitled to be classed as operating expenses; and that, where concentration charges prepaid by shippers were used by the receiver in the operation of the road, the court had power and was warranted in classifying the demands therefor as charges of the receivership. In this case the judgment of foreclosure placed operating expenses in the first class to be paid, and certain labor and materialmen's liens in following classes. The property not having been sold for want of bidders, receiver's certificates were issued to pay the labor and materialmen's liens, pursuant to an order which, the court held, preserved the order of priority given by the judgment; and it was accordingly held that operating expenses were entitled to priority over such certificates.

In the reported case (BROWN v. WINTERBOTTOM, ante, 1465), it is said to be the law of railway receiverships that claims of the character under consideration must be paid out of the current earnings of the corporation, and, in case of any deficiency therein, out of the corpus of the property itself, and that current operating expenses of a railroad, including damages for personal injuries, may be preferred over the railroad mortgage lien.

There is a holding to the contrary in Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. (1881) 17 S. C. 219, where it is held that where the road was operated at a loss, and there was no income from which to pay claims incurred by the receiver and a claim for damages to animals from the operation of the road, they would not be ordered paid from the corpus to the prejudice of bondholders. The court says: "As the mortgagor himself could not contract debts to displace liens upon the corpus, it is not clearly perceived how the court can give that effect to debts contracted by the receiver, who has nothing whatever to do with the finances of the company except the money which arises from the 'income,' possibly the court might do so in an extraordinary case where it clearly appeared that the debt was contracted at the instance of the mortgagees and for their benefit, but not in an ordinary case of excess of expenditures over income, without express authority to contract debts upon the faith of the property."

As this note is limited to claims for damages from the operation of the railroad during the receivership, it does not embrace claims arising prior to the receivership; but a case close to the border line is that of Crawford v. Seattle, R. & S. F. R. Co. (1917) 97 Wash. 651, 167 Pac. 44. In that case a claim for personal injuries sustained prior to the receivership, but while the road was being operated by representatives of the bondholders, was denied priority over an earlier mortgage. The court apparently ignored the fact that bondholders were operating the road. A. McT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. J. A. A. BURNQUIST et al.

DISTRICT COURT OF THE STATE OF MINNESOTA in and for the County of Ramsey, et al.

Minnesota Supreme Court — August 9, 1918.

(— Minn. —, 168 N. W. 634.)

Prohibition — injunction against enforcing liquor laws.

1. In an action to enjoin the several members of the Minnesota Public Safety Commission (created by chapter 261, Laws 1917 [Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 117-10 to 117-19]), the village president and sheriff from enforcing the orders of the Commission in closing a licensed saloon, the court, upon ex parte application, granted a temporary restraining order. The relator Burnquist, as governor of the state, ordered the adjutant general, the relator Rhinow, to close the saloon with the military force of the state. The order was carried out; and relators were cited to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt. It is held:

That the trial court is without jurisdiction to proceed against the relator

(— Minn. —, 168 N. W. 634.)

Burnquist, since it appears that, in closing the saloon, he was in good faith discharging a constitutional duty, placed upon him as governor, to take care that a duly enacted law was faithfully executed.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1484.]

— contempt proceedings — state officer.

2. That the same is true with reference to the relator Rhinow, since, as adjutant general, he was a proper agency in the hands of the governor to aid in discharging his said duty.

[See 22 R. C. L. 490.]

Judgment — effect — restraining order.

3. The issuance of a temporary restraining order upon an ex parte application to prevent the Public Safety Commission from closing a saloon cannot be considered an adjudication upon the validity of the orders of the Commission, nor a determination upon the extent or limitation of the powers of that body.

[See 14 R. C. L. 314.]

Courts — control over executive officers.

4. The judicial department will not by mandamus or injunction coerce, direct, or control the executive state officers in the discharge of any constitutional executive duty involving the exercise of judgment and discretion.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to compel respondents to show cause why the writ should not issue, directing them to refrain from proceeding as for contempt against relators. Writ issued.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Clifford L. Hilton, Attorney General, James E. Markham, Assistant Attorney General, William A. Lancaster, and David F. Simpson, for relators:

The governor is not subject to contempt process.

The courts have no jurisdiction over the acts of a governor, whether done and performed by him as governor or as an ex officio member of a state board; and this, too, whether the act in question is an executive or governmental one or purely ministerial.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The district court of Ramsey county was ordered by this court to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, directing said district court and the several judges thereof to refrain from proceeding as for contempt against the relators, the governor and the adjutant general of this state. The respondent Honorable Frederick N. Dickson makes a return in his own behalf, and in behalf of the court and the other judges thereof, except Honorable Hascal R. Brill, who returns that he is disqualified from sitting in the case.

From the petition and the return of respondent Dickson the following may be stated as the material and relevant facts: In December, 1917, and ever since William R. Carroll has had a license to vend intoxicating liquors at Blooming Prairie, a village of some 850 inhabitants in Steele county, Minnesota. It is located about 25 miles south of Owatonna, and nearly the same distance from the southern boundary of the state. No intoxicating beverages can be procured lawfully in the counties to the east, south, or west of Steele county, nor in Iowa, nor in Steele county except in Owatonna and Blooming Prairie. The business of Mr. Carroll was therefore exceedingly lucrative, although the license fee in the village was $1,500 and three other licensed saloons were doing business there, until the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety, on December 5, 1917, by order No. 17, directed the licensed liquor dealers at Blooming Prairie to refrain from dispensing liquor except at retail, to be consumed on the premises where dispensed, and only between the hours of 9 A. M. and 5 P. M. on week days. It appears that this order resulted after the Commission, in the fall of 1917, had caused an investigation to be made as to the effect of the liquor traffic upon the military, civil, and industrial resources of the state, and the peace and public safety of the inhabitants, and particularly the effect of the sale of intoxicating liquor in places located in the midst of large areas of "dry" territory. The liquor dealers of the village complied with the order until in June, 1918, when Carroll and two others began to dispense their goods in open defiance thereof. The Commission then issued order No. 34, directing the president of the village to forthwith close and keep closed the places of business of the offending dealers. This last order was enforced through the sheriff of Steele county. In that situation Carroll commenced an action against the members of the Commission, the president of the village, and the sheriff of the county to permanently enjoin them from closing or interfering with his business. On ex parte application, the respondent Dickson issued a temporary restraining order, June 29, 1918, requiring the defendants in the action to refrain from closing or keeping closed Carroll's place of business, and from interfering therewith, and from instituting any proceeding to enforce the orders of the Commission until further order of the court. Upon being informed of the restraining order, the sheriff, who had kept the saloons closed, withdrew; and Carroll resumed business. Thereupon, and on July 1st, relator Rhinow, the adjutant general of the state, in obedience to the order of the governor, the relator Burnquist, with the aid of the military force of the state, closed Carroll's saloon business. Carroll then obtained from Judge Dickson an order citing relators to answer for contempt, and they immediately procured this order to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue.

The Minnesota Public Safety Commission, created by chapter 261, Laws 1917, consists of seven members; the governor and attorney general being ex officio members, the other five being appointed by the governor and removable at will by him. Extensive discretionary powers are given the Commission, and an appropriation of $1,000,000 is made, to be expended as the Commission deems fit in the performance of its duty. The purpose of the law is therein declared thus: "In the event of war existing between the United States and any foreign nation, such Commission shall have power to do all acts and things not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the state of Minnesota or of the United States, which are necessary or proper for the public safety and for the protection of life and public property or private property of a character as in the judgment of the Commission requires protection, and shall do and perform all acts and things necessary or proper so that the military, civil and industrial resources of the state may be most efficiently applied toward maintenance of the defense of the state and nation and toward the successful prosecution of such war, and to that end it shall have all necessary power not herein specifically enumerated, and in addition thereto the following specific powers" (first part of § 3 [Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, § 117-12]).

Among the specific powers conferred are those contained in subdivision 3 of § 3: "Said Commission shall have power and it shall be the duty of said Commission to co-operate with the military and other officers and agents of the United States government in all matters pertaining to the duties and functions of such Commission and shall aid the government of the United States in the prosecution of any such war and in relation to public safety as far as possible."

In the view we take of the matter for decision many propositions, exhaustively briefed and ably presented in the oral arguments, will not be reached. For instance, we are importuned to determine and define the powers of the Commission to make the orders mentioned, and every question relating to its powers, and what limitations, if any, there be; also, whether the governor may be controlled by injunction, or otherwise, the same as any other member of the Commission. But we think it would be improper for this court to pass upon these matters in advance of a determination by the court below; for the issuing of the temporary restraining order, upon an ex parte application, cannot be considered an adjudication upon the validity of the orders of the Commission, nor a determination upon the extent or limitation of the powers of that body, nor even upon the extent to which the governor, in respect to official duties, may be controlled by the court. Furthermore, relators do not plant their right to the writ upon the validity of the orders referred to, nor even upon that of the law creating the Commission, but insist that, even though the orders be void and the law unconstitutional, the governor acted within the scope of his constitutional powers, and cannot be proceeded against as for contempt. We have therefore not been favored with the arguments that might well be advanced in support of the legality of orders 17 and 34, and it would be manifestly inappropriate for us to consider their legal status, unless clearly made necessary to a decision upon the application for a writ. The same is more patently true with reference to defining the powers and limitations of the Commission.

We reach the conclusion that if it clearly appears that the acts for the doing of which the governor is cited for punishment by the respondent were done in discharge of official duties, requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion, and imposed upon him as chief executive by the Constitution, he is not amenable to punishment. In that event the respondent is without jurisdiction to entertain the contempt proceedings, and the writ of prohibition should issue.

coerce, direct, or control the executive state officers. Rice v. Austin, 19 Minn. 103, Gil. 74, 18 Am. Rep. 330; State ex rel. Mille Lacs County v. Dike, 20 Minn. 363, Gil. 314; St. Paul & C. R. Braden, 40 Minn. 174, 41 N. W. 817, wherein the exception suggested in Chamberlain v. Sibley, 4 Minn. 309, Gil. 228, was disapproved. But the later cases of Hayne v. Metropolitan Trust Co. 67 Minn. 245, 69 N. W. 916; Cooke v. Iverson, 108 Minn. 388, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 415, 122 N. W. 251, and State ex rel. Kinsella v. Eberhart, 116 Minn. 313, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788, 133 N. W. 857, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 785, modify somewhat the earlier statement of the law, the Hayne Case holding that when private property to which the state has no claim is held in trust by a state officer, the court can compel him to turn it over to the proper party; the Cooke Case ruling that, "where duties purely ministerial in character are conferred upon the chief executive or any member of the executive department, as defined by our Constitution, and he refuses to act, or when he assumes to act in violation of the Constitution and laws of the state, he may be compelled to act or restrained from acting;" the Kinsella Case holding on certiorari to review the action of the governor in removing an official that, when a statute invests the governor with a special quasi judicial duty, his performance thereof is subject to review by the court. Each of these cases recognizes to the full the rule that courts cannot, by any process, control or direct a head of the executive department of the state in the discharge of any constitutional executive duty involving the exercise of judgment and discretion. No judicial opinion to the contrary has been noticed. Cases need not be here cited, but a number may be found by consulting the references in 12 R. C. L. § 10, p. 1008, and the notes to State ex rel. Irvine v. Brooks, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 750, and Rice v. Draper, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 355. The authorities seem to agree that under Constitutions similar to that of this state, where all power and authority of government is vested in three distinct, co-ordinate, and independent departments,—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial,—the judicial has not the power to control, coerce, or restrain the action of the other two within the sphere allotted them by the Constitution wherein to exercise judgment and discretion. It would be unthinkable that the courts of this state should attempt to enjoin the legislature from enacting or the governor from approving a statute, no matter how glaringly unconstitutional it might appear or how highly injurious its mere enactment might be to private interests. And it would seem just as unthinkable that the chief executive of the state should be coerced either into enforcing a statute which the courts might deem he should enforce, or be subjected to punishment for enforcing one the constitutionality of which a court may doubt, but has not passed final judgment upon. Where, in a proper action or proceeding, a statute or an order of an executive or administrative commission has been finally adjudged unconstitutional or void, we entertain no doubt that the governor of the state will recognize such decision as binding upon him, and the courts will have no occasion to ever consider the question of contempt relative to the governor's actions with reference thereto. But if, in advance of such adjudication, he may not be coerced into enforcing or not enforcing, it follows that he cannot be punished for proceeding in the manner his judgment may dictate. However, we are not to be understood to hold or to intimate that, if the governor should attempt in good faith to execute a statute adjudged invalid by a trial court, he could be subjected to punishment as for contempt.

Section 4, art. 5, of the state Constitution makes the governor commander in chief of the military forces, and provides that he may call out such forces to execute the laws, and enjoins upon him the duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." To relator Burnquist, as governor, chapter 261, Laws 1917, appeared a duly enacted law; the Commission therein created, by orders duly adopted and promulgated, was attempting to perform the work demanded of it by the act. It was the governor's constitutional duty to take care that this law was faithfully executed in the manner contemplated by the legislature. To enforce these orders of the Commission the governor did the act for the doing of which the respondent now threatens to punish him. It seems clear to us that when the liquor dealers of Blooming Prairie disobeyed the orders of the Commission, the governor was confronted with the proposition whether or not the execution of chapter 261 was being defied, and, if he reached the conclusion that it was, the Constitution required him to exercise his judgment in upholding and enforcing that law by the means at his command.

But it is contended that the law may be invalid, and the orders of the Commission, for that or for other reasons, void. The governor is justified in acting on the presumption that the statute is legally efficient, and the orders of the Commission, created by such statute and given large powers, are valid. And neither this law nor the orders referred to have, up to the present time, been adjudged invalid by any court upon a hearing had; but rather the contrary appears. See Judge Booth's opinion in Cook v. Burnquist (D. C.) 242 Fed. 321. The position of the President under the Federal Constitution in respect to his duty to execute the laws of Congress is precisely that of the governor under our state Constitution in respect to the laws enacted by our legislature. The same similarity exists with reference to the three distinct departments of government, and the limits wherein the one is free to act without interference from the other. In Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437, an unsuccessful attempt was made to enjoin the President from enforcing a law alleged to be unconstitutional and void, the court saying: "It will hardly be contended that Congress [courts?] can interpose, in any case, to restrain the enactment of an unconstitutional law; and yet how can the right to judicial interposition to prevent such an enactment, when the purpose is evident and the execution of that purpose certain, be distinguished, in principle, from the right to such interposition against the execution of such a law by the President? The Congress is the legislative department of the government; the President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance. The impropriety of such interference will be clearly seen upon consideration of its possible consequences. Suppose the bill filed and the injunction prayed for allowed. If the President refuse obedience, it is needless to observe that the court is without power to enforce its process. If, on the other hand, the President complies with the order of the court and refuses to execute the acts of Congress, is it not clear that a collision may occur between the executive and legislative departments of the government? May not the House of Representatives impeach the President for such refusal? And in that case could this court interfere in behalf of the President, thus endangered by compliance with its mandate, and restrain by injunction the Senate . . . from sitting as a court of impeachment? Would the strange spectacle be offered to the public world of an attempt by this court to arrest proceedings in that court? These questions answer themselves."

But we need not go to the full extent of the reasoning in the Johnson Case, nor determine the jurisdictional power of the trial court to issue the restraining order which the governor is charged with violating, although it is not amiss to observe that Carroll's action is against the individuals composing the Public Safety Commission, and not against the governor as such. It has now come to the point where, as suggested in the case quoted from, there is an attempt to assume the power and jurisdiction that may lead to punishing the governor for acts done in the discharge of an executive and political duty placed upon him by the Constitution. Ever since the time Chief Justice Marshall, in the Burr trial, had directed a subpoena duces tecum to be served upon the President, his observation has been accepted as sound law that, if the President should disobey the process because, in his opinion, the document called for should not, for political or governmental reasons, be exhibited, that official could not be punished for contempt. Thompson v. German Valley R. Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 111; Hartranft's Appeal, 85 Pa. 433, 27 Am. Rep. 667. And no court, so far as we have been advised, has held or intimated that the chief executive of the state or nation could be made amenable to contempt proceedings for performing the duty, imposed by the Constitution, to execute a duly enacted law. The able dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Agnew in Hartranft's Appeal, supra, acknowledges this to be the law. We also conclude that Justice Marshall in Ekern v. McGovern, 154 Wis. 157, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 796, 142 N. W. 595, where he takes occasion, in his forceful and eloquent way, to vindicate the power of the court over the executive if the latter acts contrary to law, accepts the rule above stated, for he approves the case of People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, 156 N. Y. 136, 41 L.R.A. 231, 66 Am. St. Rep. 547, 50 N. E. 791. A moment's reflection will make clear that a contrary rule might seriously interfere with the performance of the duties required of the chief executive. Legislative enactments frequently affect private interests injuriously. These laws may be constitutionally questionable or plainly invalid. If every individual affected may, in actions challenging their validity, ex parte obtain temporary restraining orders against their enforcement, and the governor should nevertheless deem it his duty to enforce the law, he could be subjected to contempt proceedings in the different courts where, peradventure, such restraining orders issued, the people might be wholly deprived of the services of the chief executive, or else his time so frittered away in court proceedings that none would be left for the discharge of his official duties, to say nothing of the unseemly clash between two departments of the government.

We cannot accept the contention made that relator's act in closing the offending Blooming Prairie saloon should be regarded as having been performed either as a member of the Commission, or, if the orders of the Commission be for any reason void, as a private individual. It is plain to us that whatever relator Burnquist did in closing the saloons was in the capacity of governor, and in the endeavor to perform the duties imposed upon him as such by the Constitution and the laws; and the character of these acts, in so far as the attempt to punish him for contempt reaches, does not change because of the possible invalidity of the law, or of the orders of the Commission, promulgated under that law. It may well be that a different legal aspect of them should be taken by the court when determining their effect upon private interests; but with that we are not now concerned.

A few words should be said regarding Cooke v. Iverson, 108 Minn. 388, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 415, 122 N. W. 251, and Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, upon authority of which it is claimed that the writ prayed for should not issue. In the former it is said: "If a member of the executive department of the state is subject to the control of the judiciary . . . in purely ministerial duties, it logically follows that he is subject to such direction if he is threatening to execute an unconstitutional statute, to the irreparable injury of a party in his person or property. Rippe v. Becker, 56 Minn. 100, 22 L.R.A. 857, 57 N. W. 331. If a statute be unconstitutional, it is as if it never had been. Rights cannot be built up under it, and, if an executive officer attempt to enforce it, his act is his individual and not his official act, and he is subject to the control of the courts as would be a private individual."—citing Cooley, Const. Lim. 250 [259?], and the Young Case.

The connection in which Chief Justice Start employed the language must be kept in view. The case involved a purely ministerial act, imposed by statute upon the state auditor; and, although the claim to injunctive relief was based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of a statute, it did not involve punishing for contempt for enforcing an unconstitutional statute in advance of its being so adjudged, nor did it relate to a duty imposed by the Constitution. And as to Ex parte Young, it is clear that the question before the court was not similar to the one before us; for the Federal court, in enforcing a violated restraining order against an executive state officer, is not hampered by any constitutional inhibition against interference with a co-ordinate department of government. This is well stated in Bates v. Taylor, 87 Tenn. 319, 3 L.R.A. 316, 11 S. W. 266.

Since the actual closing of Carroll's saloon was accomplished by the adjutant general with the military power of the state, and that power, by § 14, art. 1, of the Constitution, is subject to the civil power, the suggestion may be made that relator Rhinow can be proceeded against. We think not. Rhinow was in duty bound to carry out the order of the governor, his commander in chief. And having concluded that the governor cannot be punished under contempt proceedings for what he caused to be done, it would seem to be a reasonable deduction that the agency which the law placed in his hands for accomplishing that act should likewise be immune. Otherwise the governor might be indirectly coerced by the courts in matters pertaining to his constitutional duties.

In taking leave of the case we wish to make clear that we have not passed upon the merits of the action instituted by Carroll, nor upon the validity of the orders of the Commission therein mentioned, nor upon the propriety of issuing a restraining order therein upon ex parte application. Our decision reaches no further than this: That, in attempting to enforce a law and the orders of a commission created by and acting under that law, the relator Burnquist was performing his constitutional duties as governor and when so doing he is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts in a proceeding as for contempt.

Let the writ of prohibition issue as prayed.

ANNOTATION.

Power to enjoin officers from enforcing liquor laws.

- I. In general, 1484.
- II. Where irreparable injury to complainant's property rights is caused by enforcement, 1485.
- III. Where injunction will prevent a multiplicity of suits, 1487.

I. In general.

The power to enjoin the enforcement of liquor laws differs but slightly from the power to enjoin the enforcement of laws generally. As a general rule, the decisions involving liquor laws turn upon principles governing the same questions in respect to other laws. Thus, it will be observed that the decision in the reported case (STATE EX REL. BURNQUIST V. DISTRICT CT. ante, 1476) turns upon the question of the power of the courts to punish a governor or his assistants

- IV. Where enforcement will result in loss of complainant's license, 1487.
- V. When enforcement proposed is by arrest of complainant, 1487.
- VI. Where complainant has only moral interest in the result of enforcement, 1492.

for the violation of an injunction against the enforcement of a statute alleged to be unconstitutional. Therefore, there are many cases, no doubt, involving other laws, analogous in principle to those cited herein. The slight difference already mentioned, however, makes the question in some liquor-law cases distinctive. The difference arises out of the fact that the privilege of trading in intoxicating liquor is not a property right. See IV, infra. So, when nothing is affected by the enforcement but the complainant's right to sell liquor, he has no standing to enjoin the enforcement. But it has been held that this principle is not applicable when something in addition to a license is involved. Evansville Brewing Asso. v. Excise Commission (1915) 225 Fed. 204.

Since equity will not interfere to enjoin the enforcement of any law without first finding some valid reason (such as unconstitutionality or inapplicability of the statute, etc.) why it should not be enforced, the question here annotated resolves itself into one of whether or not an application for an injunction to enjoin the enforcement of the liquor law is an appropriate method of attacking or obtaining a construction of such law. If, even assuming the validity of the objection to the statute, the injunction will not lie, the court need not decide whether or not the law ought to be enforced.

So far as the reported cases go, it may be said generally that an injunction will lie to enjoin the enforcement of a liquor law where its wrongful enforcement will result in injury to complainant's property rights, for which injury he has no adequate remedy at law, so that the injury may be said to be irreparable, or where the interference of equity will prevent a multiplicity of suits. But relief will not be given where complainant has only a moral interest in the result of the enforcement, or where the enforcement will result only in his prosecution criminally, or in the mere loss of his license.

In the following cases it was either held or assumed that the court had jurisdiction, under the circumstances of the case, to issue an injunction against the enforcement of liquor laws or ordinances by officers: Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (1897) 170 U. S. 438, 42 L. ed. 1100, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674; Tuchman v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 548; M. Schandler Bottling Co. v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 561; Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray (1900) 104 Fed. 258; Busch v. Webb (1903) 122 Fed. 655; Union Distilling Co. v. Bettman (1908) 181 Fed. 419; Evansville Brewing Asso. v. Excise

Commission (Fed.) supra; Canon City v. Manning (1908) 43 Colo. 144, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272, 95 Pac. 537; Union & Mechanics Club v. Atlanta (1911) 136 Ga. 721, 71 S. E. 1060; Wood v. Brooklyn (1852) 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 425; Kennedy v. Warner (1906) 51 Misc. 362, 100 N. Y. Supp. 616; Hall v. Dunn (1908) 52 Or. 475, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193, 97 Pac. 811; McCullough v. Brown (1894) 41 S. C. 220, 23 L.R.A. 410, 19 S. E. 458.

And in the following cases the courts refused, for various reasons, to enjoin the enforcement of liquor laws or ordinances:

II. Where irreparable injury to complainant's property rights is caused by enforcement.

Where the wrongful enforcement of a liquor law will cause irreparable injury to complainant's property rights, equity will enjoin such enforcement. Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (1897)

170 U. S. 438, 42 L. ed. 1100, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674 (and see Rose's Notes to this case); Tuchman v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 548; Chandler Brewing Co. v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 561; Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray (1900) 104 Fed. 258; Busch v. Webb (1903) 122 Fed. 655, appeal dismissed in (1904) 194 U. S. 640, 48 L. ed. 1162, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857; Union Distilling Co. v. Bettman (1908) 181 Fed. 419; Evansville Brewing Asso. v. Excise Commission (1915) 225 Fed. 204; Canon City v. Manning (1908) 43 Colo. 144, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272, 95 Pac. 537; Union & Mechanics Club v. Atlanta (1911) 136 Ga. 721, 71 S. E. 1060; State ex rel. Kenamore v. Wood (1899) 155 Mo. 425, 48 L.R.A. 596, 56 S. W. 474 (a converse holding); Hall v. Dunn (1908) 52 Or. 475, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193, 97 Pac. 811.

That the Federal courts have jurisdiction to restrain the enforcement of the state liquor laws by levying upon or seizing the liquor, upon the ground that the statute is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, was assumed and the principle was acted upon in Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (U. S.) supra. And the same principle is supported by a direct holding in Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray (1900) 104 Fed. 258. The proposition seems to have been also assumed in Busch v. Webb (1903) 122 Fed. 655, but not acted upon for the reason that the court held the statute to be constitutional in respect to all of the parties who might have had any standing to ask for the injunction. In the same way the assumption is made but not applied in Evansville Brewing Asso. v. Excise Commission (1915) 225 Fed. 204.

And, after the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional any state law that prohibits the sale, in the original package, of intoxicating liquors shipped into the state, and the United States circuit court has, on habeas corpus, discharged persons from prison who were charged with violating such laws, the Federal courts have jurisdiction to restrain by injunction state officers who persist in enforcing such laws, from arresting and otherwise molesting citizens of the United States who merely sell intoxicating liquor in the original packages, in disregard of the provisions contained in such unconstitutional statutes. Tuchman v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 548; M. Schandler Bottling Co. v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 561. But this rule will not be applied when the proposed enforcement is merely by the arrest of complainant, and there will follow no irreparable injury. Hemsey v. Myers (1891) 45 Fed. 283. See same case as cited and quoted under V. infra.

But in the McGillivray Case (Fed.) supra, it was also directly held that the court had no such power to enjoin the state officers from commencing criminal prosecutions of the complainant for violations of the unconstitutional statute, while in the Evansville Brewing Association Case the court asserts that this principle will not be extended to cases in which property rights will be violated, even though the acts are done under statutes in the nature of criminal statutes. See V. infra.

And where the Commissioner of Internal Revenue exceeds his authority in making an order in respect to the labeling of different kinds of commodities produced by distilleries, which order, if executed, will result in great loss to a distiller by reason of labeling a large part of his output with the same label as that used on a cheaper and lower grade article, the distiller is entitled to an injunction to restrain the collector and his assistants from executing the order. Union Distilling Co. v. Bettman (1908) 181 Fed. 419.

Where an ordinance regulating the sales of liquor ostensibly gives power to the city to close up club rooms of societies or clubs that violate it, and to exclude the members therefrom, but provides no means whereby there can be a hearing or judicial determination of the question of guilt or innocence, and the city officials threaten to proceed summarily to close the rooms of a club and exclude its members, equity will enjoin them from enforcing the ordinance in any manner, except by some regular form of judicial pro-

And the court will enjoin the enforcement by the city of an ordinance by closing club rooms of a society and keeping out its members after revoking the license, where it appears that the ordinance requiring it to obtain the license and pay a fee therefor is void, as being beyond the powers of the city. Union & Mechanics Club v. Atlanta (1911) 136 Ga. 721, 71 S. E. 1060.

In State ex rel. Kenamore v. Wood (1899) 155 Mo. 425, 48 L.R.A. 596, 56 S. W. 474, it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to issue an injunction enjoining the state beer inspector from inspecting the complainant's output of beer and imposing the tax or enforcing the law as to quality of beer, on the allegation that the statute creating his office and defining his duties and powers is unconstitutional, since the facts fail to show either that the enforcement of the law will work irreparable injury to complainant's business, or that he has no adequate remedy at law. It will be observed that this case is in harmony on the law with the others here cited.

And in M. Schandler Bottling Co. v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 561, supra, the court said: "Without stopping here to consider whether this general rule is limited to criminal proceedings already begun in the court of criminal jurisdiction, it is sufficient to the matter in hand to say, as indicated in the quotation above made, that the rule has its exceptions. One of these is where a threatened criminal proceeding is hostile, vexatious, and unwarranted, and involves the wanton destruction of or injury to property interests of the accused; and especially so under circumstances where, if permitted to proceed, the party injured would have no adequate remedy at law for restitution." See V. infra, on the "general rule" here under discussion.

III. Where injunction will prevent a multiplicity of suits.

To prevent a multiplicity of suits, it has been held that equity will enjoin, at the instance of taxpayers, the board of control from establishing a dispensary at a designated place under the Dispensary Act, on the ground that the act is unconstitutional. McCullough v. Brown (1894) 41 S. C. 220, 23 L.R.A. 410, 19 S. E. 458.

And see Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Superior (1903) 117 Wis. 297, 93 N. W. 1120, discussed under IV. infra.

IV. Where enforcement will result in loss of complainant's license.

As already stated, courts have not regarded the privilege of dealing in intoxicating liquors as a property right, so, where the effect of the enforcement complained of will merely be the loss of complainant's privilege, or the refusal to renew his license, equity will refuse an injunction, and the court will not determine any question complainant seeks to raise. Plumb v. Christie (1898) 103 Ga. 686, 42 L.R.A. 181, 30 S. E. 759; Nims v. Gilmore (1910) 17 Idaho, 609, 107 Pac. 79. But see Kennedy v. Warner and Wood v. Brooklyn (N. Y.) infra.

A citizen who has been doing business under a liquor license has no standing to ask a determination of the constitutionality of the Dispensary Act on a petition for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of the act, on the ground that its enforcement results in the refusal of a new license to him, so the injunction will be refused, there being no property right existing in any person to have a liquor license issued to him. Plumb v. Christie (Ga.) supra. The question of compelling authorities to grant a license, or to otherwise enforce the liquor laws, is not within the scope of this note.

Likewise, the courts will not interfere with the prosecuting attorney's plan to prosecute the holder of a liquor license if the latter sells liquor after the enactment of a local option statute, upon the allegation that the statute has not been adopted by the voters of the county, since, if the allegation is true, that fact may be pleaded as a defense, so that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law. Nims v. Gilmore (1910) 17 Idaho, 609, 107 Pac. 79. And it was also held that the holder of a liquor license has no property rights by virtue thereof, so that interference with his business by the proposed arrest is no ground for the injunction.

But it has been held that a complaint by a brewing company, alleging that it has a considerable business and a valuable warehouse used in the business, that the city threatens numerous prosecutions, under a void ordinance, of complainant's agents for violations of said ordinance in the conduct of the business, and will thus subject complainant to a multiplicity of suits, compel it to pay large sums in fines, and ruin its business, is sufficient in equity to support an injunction restraining the city from enforcing the ordinance if the court finds that the allegation as to the ordinance being void is correct. Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Superior (1903) 117 Wis. 297, 93 N. W. 1120. In this case, however, the court found that the ordinance was valid, and on that ground alone affirmed a decision refusing the injunction.

But it has been held that an injunction will be issued, where a local option election in favor of the "drys" is void on account of vital defects in the petition, against the state commissioner of excise and the county treasurer, restraining them from enforcing the supposed mandate, to complainant's prejudice, the complainant being the lessor of property upon which liquor was being sold, under a license, by the lessee, who had stipulated in the lease that "if it should be voted during said term (which was five years) that the traffic in liquors should not be carried on," etc., the lease might be terminated. Kennedy v. Warner (1906) 51 Misc. 362, 100 N. Y. Supp. 616. This holding appears to be opposed to the weight of authority upon the point, but the question of property rights in a liquor license does not seem to have been raised. It would seem that if the license has no standing, a lessor's rights depending thereon would not be in any better position than a licensee.

And practically the same position is taken in Wood v. Brooklyn (1852)

14 Barb. (N. Y.) 425; so perhaps the New York courts have taken a different position in this respect. The court in this case said: "The plaintiff's papers contain a copy of his license, dated on the 21st day of June, 1852, which authorizes him to keep a tavern in the 11th ward of the city of Brooklyn, for one year from its date. For this the law required him to pay, and he no doubt has paid, a compensation to the city, and he has a vested right to the privileges which it confers, so long as it remains in force. One of the privileges for which he has thus paid is to sell liquors to lodgers and travelers on Sunday. He alleges that it is valuable to him, and no doubt it is so. It is not, nor can it with propriety be made, the question, whether the exercise of the privilege is beneficial to the community. The question is as to the legal rights of the plaintiff, and, if they have been invaded, the appropriate remedy. He complains that he is deterred from vending liquors to lodgers and travelers, and they from purchasing them from him, by the ordinance in question, and that he is thereby deprived of what would otherwise be his lawful earnings, which are requisite for the support of his family. These are undoubtedly the natural results from the ordinance in its present form. It is no answer to this to say (as is stated in the affidavits of the mayor and chief of police) that it has not been enforced to prevent innkeepers from selling according to their license. Attempts may be made at any time to enforce it as it reads, and the uncertainty whether it may be thus enforced creates the injury. The terms used were adopted by the common council, and if they comprehend too much, as they certainly do, the remedy is very easy; and if they will not adopt it, they cannot complain if they should be restrained, so that parties whose lawful rights might be invaded pursuant to its provisions may know that they will be protected in the enjoyment of such rights. The damages which might otherwise result to the plaintiff could not be recovered by him, to their full extent, in any action, for the reason that from their nature they could not be satisfactorily proved; and besides, it is questionable how far the corporation would be responsible, if they are responsible at all, for the consequential damages resulting from an illegal ordinance. The plaintiff complains also that the officers of the corporation, in their attempts to enforce the ordinance, arrest supposed offenders on the Sabbath, and imprison them until the next day, when they are subjected to an immediate trial without allowing them their constitutional privilege of a trial by jury. . . . The other matters forbidden by the ordinance are also prohibited by the laws of the state; and a court of equity ought not to interfere to protect anyone from the consequences that might result from a future violation by him of laws at all events obligatory upon him. It would be granting protection to one who can neither require nor need it, until after he has perpetrated, or resolved to perpetrate, a wrong. But the plaintiff presents a different case when he complains of the interruption of his lawful pursuits. He alleges that the business by which he earns a livelihood for himself and his family is seriously and constantly injured; that he apprehends from the course pursued by the officers of the city, that he may be illegally arrested on a Sunday, while engaged in his lawful pursuits, and confined, without the privilege of procuring bail, until the next day, and then be subjected to a hasty trial, without the benefit of a constitutional privilege, and all under an illegal ordinance. For some of these wrongs the law would afford him adequate redress, but no sufficient compensation could be made for family destitution or disreputable imprisonment."

In deciding the question of enjoining the enforcement of liquor laws, it seems to be the policy of the courts to adhere strictly to the rule that equity will not interfere with the enforcement of criminal laws nor check the activities of the prosecuting officials. So, where the injury inflicted or threatened is merely the arrest and punishment of the complainant, equity will refuse to interfere and will not decide the questions sought to be raised, leaving the complainant free to raise all such questions as the unconstitutionality of the statute, or its applicability, construction, etc., as a defense at his trial. It has been so held in the following cases: Suess v. Noble (1887) 31 Fed. 855; Hemsley v. Myers (1891) 45 Fed. 283; Burnett v. Craig (1857) 30 Ala. 135, 68 Am. Dec. 115; Ex parte State ex rel. Martin (1917) — Ala. —, 75 So. 327; Shellman v. Saxon (1910) 134 Ga. 29, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 452, 67 S. E. 438 (substitute beverage); Nims v. Gilmore (1910) 17 Idaho, 609, 107 Pac. 79; Skakel v. Roche (1888) 27 Ill. App. 423; State ex rel. Kenamore v. Wood (1899) 155 Mo. 425, 48 L.R.A. 596, 56 S. W. 474; J. W. Kelly & Co. v. Conner (1909) 122 Tenn. 339, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, 123 S. W. 622. But see Wood v. Brooklyn and Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Superior, discussed IV. supra.

Equity courts have no jurisdiction to enjoin the seizure of quantities of a beverage and the arrest of the owners or sellers thereof by officers or law-enforcement agencies of the state, acting under authority of the penal prohibitory statute of the state, upon the allegation that the beverage is not of a grade that is prohibited by the statute, and if they attempt to do so the supreme court will issue the writ of prohibition dissolving the injunction. Ex parte State ex rel. Martin (1917) — Ala. —, 75 So. 327. The ground for the holding is well stated by the court as follows: "The original bill's theory and purpose was to restrain the diligence and activity of the sheriff and his deputies in Jefferson county in respect of the enforcement of the state's penal and related laws expressing the state's authority and power to promote temperance and to suppress the evils of intemperance. The case made by the original bill falls squarely within the principle and doctrine of the following of our decisions: Brown v. Birmingham (1903) 140 Ala. 590, 37 So. 173; Old Dominion Teleg. Co. v. Powers (1903) 140 Ala. 220, 37 So. 195, 1 Ann. Cas. 119; Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Montgomery (1915) 193 Ala. 234, 69 So. 428, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 554; Pike County Dispensary v. Brundidge (1900) 130 Ala. 193, 30 So. 451,—which is that, since the jurisdiction of courts of equity is exclusively civil, they are without power to interpose injunctive interference with the agents and instrumentalities of the state or of a municipality in prosecutions for penal offenses, or in their efforts to enforce the criminal laws. The property right sought to be asserted, and protection of which is claimed, in the original bill, does not exempt the complainant's cause from the doctrine of the decisions cited, or bring his cause within the exception to their rule, recognized in the cases noted in Mobile v. Orr (1913) 181 Ala. 308, 318, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 575, 61 So. 920. The fact, if so, that complainant has brought into the state or has in his possession a beverage that, though in fact not prohibited, will subject or has subjected him to arrest and his beverage to seizure, cannot avail to invest the court of equity with jurisdiction in the premises. The issue whether the beverage is within the prohibitory laws can be fully determined by the court in which the prosecution and the proceedings on seizure are heard. The state has a manifest interest in and concern for the observance and enforcement of its criminal laws, and in the freedom of its officers to perform their duty in the detection of offenses and offenders against its laws. To restrain the sheriff and his deputies in that regard impinges upon—brings into question—the powers of the state itself. Fitts v. McGhee (1899) 172 U. S. 516, 43 L. ed. 535, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269.”

The court, in Hemsley v. Myers (1891) 45 Fed. 283, supra, said: “The cases at bar present in a forcible light the inability of a court of equity to deal with criminal prosecutions by injunction or otherwise, and the utter confusion and failure of justice that would inevitably result from the exercise of such jurisdiction. The answers and affidavits filed in some of these cases deny that the plaintiffs' sales were limited to original packages, and aver that they sold otherwise than in original packages, and on the Lord's day, and to minors, and that the business was conducted in such a manner as to make it a nuisance. If the court should assume jurisdiction of the cases, the chancellor, sitting without a jury, would have to hear and determine all these issues. And for what and with what result? If the chancellor should find the plaintiffs had violated the state law, as alleged by the defendants, he would be powerless to punish them for the offense. If he found the averments in the bill to be true, and granted a perpetual injunction in the terms of the temporary injunction in this case, the court could punish the defendants for a violation of the injunction, but it would have no power to punish the plaintiffs for afterwards selling in violation of the state law. Saloons are the source of a large percentage of the lawlessness and crime in the land, and their proprietors and managers are not particularly distinguished for their strict observance of the laws regulating or restricting the business. Suppose an original package vendor, after securing a perpetual injunction, as prayed in this case, sells liquor not in original packages, or otherwise violates the state law, what are the officers of the state court, whose duty it is to prosecute in such cases, to do? Must they apply to this court for leave to prosecute before commencing proceedings in the state court? Undoubtedly, if they should proceed without the previous leave of the court, the plaintiffs would charge them with a violation of the injunction, and ask the court to punish them for contempt; and the chancellor would again be required to try the same issues of fact, with a view to determine whether the state officers, including the judges of the state courts, should be punished for contempt, or whether such officers should graciously have leave to prosecute the plaintiffs for a violation of the criminal laws of the state. It is obvious that, if this court once assumed this jurisdiction, it would speedily draw to itself the supervision and control of all the criminal prosecutions in the state growing out of the traffic in liquor; for it is quite certain, if the court once enters upon this business, that every vendor of liquor in the state will claim to be a dealer in original packages only, and whenever a prosecution is commenced against him he will at once seek the shelter and protection of an injunction from this court. And the extraordinary spectacle would be presented of a United States court of chancery having its whole time taken up in keeping watch and ward over all the saloons in the state, protecting the proprietors and their clerks from prosecutions, until it should be first shown by the state to the satisfaction of the chancellor that the state law had been violated, when the chancellor would make an order granting the state leave to prosecute for that violation."

And in J. W. Kelly & Co. v. Conner (1909) 122 Tenn. 339, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201, 123 S. W. 622, the court, in refusing an injunction to enjoin threatened prosecutions for violating laws forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor, which were alleged to be inapplicable and invalid, even though it was alleged that refusal to interfere would permit a multiplicity of prosecutions which would greatly injure and ultimately destroy valuable property rights of complainants, said: "We are further of the opinion that courts of equity have no jurisdiction to enjoin threatened criminal proceedings under a statute enacted by a state in the exercise of the police power, in relation to which the legislature has complete jurisdiction, although it be charged that the statute is invalid and that a multiplicity of actions thereunder will injure and destroy civil and property rights of the complainants, and that the damages resulting will be irreparable, when the complainant's defense thereto, in a court having jurisdiction of the offense, is adequate and unembarrassed; and we hold that the chancery courts of Tennessee, neither under their inherent nor statutory jurisdiction, have any such power or jurisdiction, whatever may be the exceptions to the general rule in the courts of equity of other jurisdictions." But see quotation from M. Schandler Bottling Co. v. Welch (1890) 42 Fed. 561, under II. supra, upon the question of exceptions to this rule.

Likewise in Skakel v. Roche (1888) 27 Ill. App. 423, supra, the court said: "Appellant had no license for the sale of liquor, and because he persisted in selling intoxicating liquors without such license, he was repeatedly arrested by the police and subjected to fine by the police magistrate. The general rule is well settled, and has been repeatedly announced in this state, that a court of equity will not entertain a bill to restrain prosecutions under a municipal ordinance on the ground of the alleged illegality of such ordinance. The validity of an ordinance of the character involved here can only be tested by appeal from a fine imposed under it. Courts of chancery have no jurisdiction to enjoin criminal or quasi criminal prosecutions. Counsel for appellant admit this general rule, but contend that there are exceptions to it, and insist most earnestly that the facts charged in the bill take this case out of such rule and entitle appellant to relief sought. We have carefully examined the facts as shown by the record, and have considered the authorities cited by counsel in support of their contention, and we are of opinion that no case has been made out which gives appellant a standing in a court of equity. We cannot afford the time which would necessarily be taken to discuss fully the cases cited by counsel, and to distinguish those on which they rely from the case here presented."

In Burnett v. Craig (1857) 30 Ala. 135, 68 Am. Dec. 115, the court, in dismissing a bill for an injunction against the enforcement of an ordinance by city authorities, by fines and imprisonment of the complainant, who was retailing liquors without obtaining the license required by the terms of the ordinance, said: "We have not been able to find any principle or adjudged case which justifies an injunction to stay a prosecution, either criminal or quasi criminal, or to restrain a trespass to the person or personal property. We think such a precedent would be an alarming stretch of equity jurisdiction. In considering this case, simply on the equity of the bill, we have necessarily regarded its averments as true. It is not intended by this to intimate an opinion on the validity or invalidity of the ordinance, or of the fines imposed on the appellant. They will be considered when properly presented."

And in Shellman v. Saxon (1910) 134 Ga. 29, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 452, 67 S. E. 438, supra, where the attempt was being made to enforce, by criminal prosecution, an ordinance forbidding the sale of any "imitation of or substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky or other spirituous or malt liquors which contains more than  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 1 per cent of alcohol," the court, on refusing the injunction, said: "We need not enter into a discussion of whether the ordinances adopted by the municipal authorities were invalid for want of power to enact them, or because they were unreasonable. Under former rulings of this court, and under the facts of this case, we are compelled to differ with our learned brother of the circuit bench as to the mode of testing those questions. The general rule is that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin criminal proceedings; and, in pursuance of this general rule, it has been said that 'chancery takes no part in the administration of criminal law. It neither aids the criminal courts in the exercise of jurisdiction, nor restrains nor obstructs them.' Phillips v. Stone Mountain (1878) 61 Ga. 386, 388; Pope v. Savannah (1884) 74 Ga. 365. This announcement has been codified in § 4914 of the Civil Code of 1895. The rule that a court of equity will not generally enjoin criminal prosecutions has also been commonly applied to proceedings to punish for violations of municipal ordinances which are quasi criminal in their nature. In some decisions the general rule is expressed broadly, and without noting any exception, that courts of equity will not enjoin or prevent the institution of prosecutions for violations of penal ordinances, nor inquire into the validity or reasonableness of ordinances making punishable the acts for the doing of which prosecutions are threatened. But while this is the rule, there are cases where equity will protect property or franchises against invasion by municipalities, although it is sought to enforce or accomplish such invasion by using criminal process. In cases where courts of equity have granted injunctions against prosecutions under municipal ordinances, it will usually be found that this was ancillary to the exercise of some acknowledged equity jurisdiction for the protection of property or property rights against irreparable damage, resting upon grounds other than the mere harassment arising from prosecutions, though repeated."

VI. Where complainant has only moral interest in the result of enforcement.

In Marshall v. Marksville (1906) 116 La. 746, 41 So. 57, it was held that "citizens and taxpayers" have no standing in equity to enjoin the public authorities from issuing licenses to sell liquor, and to annul an ordinance of the town council fixing the license fees for the sale of liquor, on the allegation that the election, which was carried by the "wets," was held too long before, and that the sale of liquor is illegal, the right of such persons to maintain the suit being challenged upon the ground that they had no interest in the matter, such interest as was shown being only a moral interest as members of the public in general.

v.

I. S. HART et al., Respts.

(274 Mo. 600, 204 S. W. 525.)

Will — sale of property — effect — purchase of other property.

1. The sale by testator of lands specifically described in the will operates as an ademption of the will as to such property, and it will not, in the absence of a residuary clause, pass other lands subsequently purchased with the proceeds of the sale.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1497.]

Appeal — objections not raised below — improper party.

2. The objection that an administrator cannot, for want of interest, maintain an action to determine interests in real estate alleged to have passed under the will of testator, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 85, 86.]

Evidence — presumption as to intestacy.

3. The presumption is that a testator does not intend to die intestate as to any part of his property.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Buchanan County (Mayer, J.) in favor of defendants, in a suit to determine interest in two certain tracts of land. Affirmed.

Statement by Faris, J.:

This is a suit to determine interest in two certain tracts of land situate in Buchanan county. On the trial, the court found in favor of defendants, and adjudged them to be the owners in fee of the disputed lands. Plaintiffs thereupon appealed.

Plaintiff R. C. Dunlap is the administrator, cum testamento annexo, of one Susan C. Hart, deceased; the other plaintiffs are the residuary legatees of said Susan C. Hart. Defendants are the heirs at law of one William B. Hart, deceased, who was the husband of the said Susan. William B. Hart executed his will in 1891, and died in 1906. By the terms of this will he gave all of his personal property and two specifically described parcels of real property to his wife, Susan C. Hart. But sometime during the fifteen years which elapsed between the execution of his will and his death, he sold and conveyed the land which the will specifically describes, and subsequently purchased the two tracts of land now here in controversy. It is not proved but merely to be inferred as probable, that the lands in dispute were purchased with the proceeds of the lands described in the will. The whole controversy turns, therefore, upon the terms of, and the effect to be given to, the will of William B. Hart. This will is brief, and barring the formal parts, signatures, and attestation of witnesses, all of which are conventional, it reads thus:

"1. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Susan C. Hart, all of my real estate in fee simple and all appurtenances thereto belonging and described as follows: Ninety-six and 22-100 acres of land in the northeast quarter of section No. three (3) in township fifty-five (55), of range thirty-six (36); also forty-three (43) acres of land at the southwest corner of the southeast quarter of section No. thirty-four (34), of township No. fifty-six (56), of range No. thirty-six (36), all of said land being in Buchanan county and state of Missouri.

"2. I also give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Susan C. Hart, all of my personal property—household and kitchen furniture, beds and bedding, money, notes, and all of my personal effects of every kind and description.

"3. I do hereby appoint my said beloved wife, Susan C. Hart, the executrix of this, my last will and testament, and I hereby direct that she shall not be required to give bond by the probate court."

Susan C. Hart died in 1913, testate, and by the terms of her will she devised all of her personal and real property (which plaintiffs contend includes the lands here in dispute) to the plaintiffs, except Dunlap. She named as executor of her will one James R. Miller, and provided that he should sell all of her real and personal property and divide the proceeds thereof as elsewhere in her will provided. Prior to the death of Susan C. Hart said Miller departed this life, and plaintiff R. C. Dunlap was, by the probate court, duly appointed administrator cum testamento annexo of her estate.

Messrs. Culver & Phillip for appellants.

Mr. James W. Boyd for respondents.

Faris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question in the case, and that which is decisive of it, is whether the will of William B. Hart had the effect to devise to Susan C. Hart, his wife, the real estate which he acquired after he had sold all of the real estate which he devised to her by specific description. If it did, the judgment nisi is erroneous and must be reversed.

On the threshold, we may say in passing, some vague point is made by respondents that Dunlap as administrator has no standing in court as a plaintiff, for that he is not a real party in interest; no part of the title here sought to be determined being, it is averred, in him.

We need not concern ourselves about this contention, since if Dunlap is not a necessary party this question ought to have been raised by demurrer, or specifically by answer. It was not raised by demurrer, or anywhere else in the pleadings, and so defendants cannot be heard now to raise it here for the first time, even should we find ourselves compelled for another reason to reverse the case.

Did the language which we quote from the will of William B. Hart pass to his wife by devise, the lands of this testator which he subsequently acquired after the sale of the lands specifically described and devised to her in the will? We do not think so. There can be no doubt but that the will of William B. Hart (hereinafter called, for the sake of brevity, the testator) devised specific lands to his wife. We quote the whole pertinent parts of the will, and from this will the fact of specificness of devise conclusively appears. We think there was an ademption of the devise when the testator, before his death, conveyed away the land devised. From which it follows that the subsequently acquired real estate of testator passed by inheritance to his heirs.

The rule at common law (pursuant to the Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. however, rather than to the common law strictly speaking) was that a will spoke as of its own date, and not as of the date of the death of the testator, and therefore after-acquired lands could not even be the subject of a devise by will, whatever might be the intent of the testator touching such lands. Re Miller, 128 Iowa, loc. cit. 616, 105 N. W. 105; Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. loc. cit. 134. This harsh rule has been modified in England by the Statute of 1 Vict. chap. 26, and by statutes in most of the states of the American Union. Absent an examination into the legal history of our own enactments on this point, it is a little difficult to appreciate that we too have changed this rule. The statute in this state by which a testator was given the power to devise after-acquired real estate was passed in 1807. Laws of the Territory of Louisiana 1807, chap. 39, § 18, p. 131. It changed the English rule and gave the power of disposition of after-acquired lands by providing in substance that any person of full age could devise by will all real estate then owned, or which he might have at his death. In the revision of 1835, seemingly in an effort to retrench and reform by the excision of words deemed surplusage, the words, "which he or she hath, or at the time of his or her death shall have," were omitted, and the statute was made to read substantially as it now appears (cf. § 1, p. 617, Rev. Stat. 1835; § 535, Rev. Stat. 1909), but conferring the power upon the testator to devise by last will "all his estate, real, personal and mixed, and all interest therein." The Act of July 4, 1807, first above referred to, further provided that the judges of all orphan's courts, and all others concerned in the "execution of any last will," should have due regard to the direction of the will and to the true intent and meaning of the testator in all matters brought before them. Terr. Laws (Mo.) § 48, p. 137. In the revision of 1825 this language was changed to read, "all courts," and so, in substance, has the command to construe a will by the "four corners" ever since remained. Cf. § 24, p. 796, Rev. Stat. 1825; § 583, Rev. Stat. 1909. While § 538, Rev. Stat. 1909, provides the manner in which a will may be revoked, we are of opinion that the latter section refers to revocation in toto, though it forbids, as well, revocation by interlineation (absent republication and reattestation), or by word of mouth. We do not think that any statute in this state has had the effect to change the rule at common law governing revocation by a sale of the devised property. Cozzens v. Jamison, 12 Mo. App.

452. This rule was that a sale of all of the property devised operates as a revocation in toto (Baacke v. Baacke, 50 Neb. 21, 69 N. W. 303; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 652; Ametrano v. Downs, 170 N. Y. 388, 58 L.R.A. 719, 88 Am. St. Rep. 671, 63 N. E. 340; Brown v. Thorndike, 15 Pick. 407; Hawes v. Humphrey, 9 Pick. 361, 20 Am. Dec. 481; Worrell v. Gill, 46 Ga. 482; Webster v. Webster, 105 Mass. 542), and a sale of a part of the devised property, operated as a revocation pro tanto (Moore v. Spier, 80 Ala. 129; Warren v. Taylor, 56 Iowa, 182, 9 N. W. 128; Forney's Estate, 161 Pa. 209, 28 Atl. 1086; Emery v. Union Soc. 79 Me. 334, 9 Atl. 891; Graham v. Burch, 47 Minn. 171, 28 Am. St. Rep. 339, 49 N. W. 697; Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638; Re Miller, 128 Iowa, 612, 105 N. W. 105).

Strictly speaking, and on the theory that the will, perforce the statute, speaks from the death of the testator, it is obviously not entirely accurate to speak of a failure of the will to pass specifically devised property, because such property has been theretofore disposed of, as a revocation of the will. But since such devise fails because of the fact that when the will becomes effective the testator had no property within the terms of the gift, the disposal of the property prior to death operated as a revocation in toto, or pro tanto, according as the whole or only a part of the property was disposed of by the testator before his death. The failure of the devise by a sale is in the nature of an ademption of the devise, which ademption, if it shall, by a sale or disposal, extend to all the property of the testator, obviously operates as a revocation. In the case of Ametrano v. Downs, 170 N. Y. 388, 58 L.R.A. 719, 88 Am. St. Rep. 671, 63 N. E. 340, it was said: "If a testatrix devises real estate and sells the same before the will takes effect, the proceeds of the sale will become personal estate, and no court can substitute the money received by the testatrix for the land devised."

Speaking of this latter point and to others cognate, the supreme court of Iowa in the case Re Miller, 128 Iowa, 617, 105 N. W. 106, supra, said: "The conveyance of the subject of the devise operates as a revocation of the will to the extent of the property thus disposed of. Warren v. Taylor, 56 Iowa, 182, 9 N. W. 128. See also cases cited in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 622, 623. On the theory, however, that the will speaks from the death of the testator and with reference to his estate as it may then exist, it is perhaps not strictly accurate to speak of the result as a 'revocation,' but the devise fails because, when the will becomes effective, the testator has no property within the terms of the gift. Warren v. Taylor, supra; McNaughton v. McNaughton, 34 N. Y. 204. It is equally well settled that upon sale of devised real property by the testator the proceeds of such sale of which he may die possessed will not be substituted for the property itself, unless a direction so to do is found in the will. Adams v. Winne, 7 Paige, 97; Gilbert v. Gilbert, 9 Barb. 532."

But it is ably argued that the well-settled rule (enjoined upon us by the statute itself) of construing a will according to the true intent of the testator compels us to hold that the subsequently acquired lands passed by the will in lieu of those specifically devised, but sold by the testator before his death. We do not think the statute nor the rule stated and bottomed on the statute requires us to go so far. If such was in fact the intention of the testator, we agree that the common law has been so far changed as to have permitted the use of a residuary clause by the testator, explicitly declaring that all his property, without description or reservation, should pass by the will; but, as we have seen, there is no such clause. And so the difficulty we meet upon this contention is that the will made does not express the intent urged on us.

In a case similar, if not on all fours with the instant one, it was held by the supreme judicial court of Maine that, where a testator devises real estate and subsequently conveys it to a person other than the devisee, the devise thereby becomes impliedly revoked, and in such case the proceeds of the sale, absent a specific provision in the will so declaring, do not go to that devisee, but to the residuary legatee. Emery v. Union Soc. 79 Me. 334, 9 Atl. 891. And the above case was so ruled, although the rule of construction according to the true intent of the testator was fully recognized as being in force in Maine.

This precise point is a matter of first impression in this court, so far as our own researches or those of counsel in the case have enlightened us. For they have cited us no local cases in point, nor have we been able to find any precisely apposite. Discussing, however, what we consider the principles involved, it was held by the St. Louis court of appeals that the alienation of devised property by the testator in his lifetime renders the will pro tanto void, notwithstanding our statute providing the methods of revoking wills. Cozzens v. Jamison, 12 Mo. App. 452. In this case the learned St. Louis court of appeals, at page 457, said: "The doctrine runs through all the cases that the devisor must be seised of the same estate at the time of his death that he was seised of when he made his will, to make it a good devise. Ballard v. Carter, 5 Pick. 116, 16 Am. Dec. 377. If there is a subsequent conveyance of the whole estate, the testamentary disposition is defeated wholly. If the conveyance be of a part only, the operation is pro tanto. Toller, Exrs. & Admsrs. 19."

The case of Durboraw v. Durboraw, 67 Kan. 139, 72 Pac. 566, is urged as being precisely in point. We cannot agree to this suggestion. There was in that case what we regard as a fairly plain residuary clause. In fact, the case rode off upon this very point. For the supreme court of Kansas in effect ruled that all of the property passed by what was tantamount to a residuary clause. Hence in our view the Durboraw Case has no compelling, or even appealing, relevancy to the vexing question confronting us in the case at bar.

The presumption that a testator does not intend to die intestate

Evidence— as to any part of presumption as his property is also to intestacy. urged as a reason why we should hold that the after-acquired property passed by this will. We recognize and concede the rule urged. McMahan v. Hubbard, 217 Mo. loc. cit. 637, 118 S. W. 481. But we think it has no application to the condition presented. The proper function of the presumption invoked is to throw light upon the intent of the testator, when that intent is dark and it is sought to ascertain it from the language used in the will. Such a presumption performs but a negligible office when invoked to illuminate a condition arising long after the will was written, and which originated wholly dehors the words of the will, and years subsequent to the execution thereof. In such case it would seem that, since the thing done was tantamount to and operated as a revocation pro tanto, the latter intention is as easily to be inferred from the facts as the former. That the presumption arises in an effort to construe the language used in the will in the light of the circumstances existing when the will was written, seems obvious from the reason given for invoking it at all; for it is said that the presumption is used in order "that the instrument may not perish, and the manifest intent of the parties be not defeated by the palpable error of the scrivener." Ibid. Here there is no suggestion that the scrivener did not write exactly what the testator intended should be written. If the conditions had not changed years afterwards, the language of the will was in all things clear and sufficient. The difficulty is not that the language does not express the intent which was in the mind of the testator when he made the will; the difficulty lies in the fact that years afterwards the testator changed his mind. The language of a will is to be construed in the light of the circumstances existing when the will is written; the will operates, however, upon the property existing when death occurs.

We conclude that the learned trial court took the proper view of the case, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed. Let it be so ordered.

All concur.

ANNOTATION.

Property purchased with proceeds of sale of subject of devise or bequest as passing thereunder.

The present annotation is confined strictly to the subject stated in the title, and consequently does not include cases where there is a mere change in, or alteration of, the subject of the devise or bequest, as distinguished from a substitution of a new thing purchased with the proceeds of the sale of the property specifically devised or bequeathed.

It is, undoubtedly, the general rule, not only that a specific legacy is, in effect, revoked by a sale of the subject-matter by the testator during his lifetime, but that such a legacy is adeemed by a material or radical alteration or change in, or substitution of, something else in place of the subject-matter thereof. Consequently, when a sale of the subject of the devise or bequest is made, and other property is purchased with the proceeds, the question arises whether or not the property so purchased may be substituted for that sold so as to pass under the specific devise or bequest in the will. Upon this question there is practically a unanimity of opinion to the effect that the property into which the proceeds have been converted cannot be substituted, and, therefore, that the devise or bequest fails. The following cases lay down this rule:

United States.—Georgia Infirmary v. Jones (1889) 37 Fed. 750, appeal dismissed in (1893) 149 U. S. 774, 37 L. ed. 966, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047.

Div. 622, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 301, 31 Week. Rep. 426.

Ireland.—Holmes v. Langley [1913] 1 Ir. R. 232.

The cases generally treat the question as one of ademption, and apply the rule that the sale of the subject-matter adeems the devise or bequest so that there is nothing for it to work upon, notwithstanding other property has been purchased with the proceeds, which, therefore, can be traced.

For instance, in the reported case (DUNLAP v. HART, ante, 1493) the court spoke of the sale of the specifically devised property as an ademption, which prevented the passing under the devise of property purchased with the proceeds.

And in May v. Sherrard (1913) 115 Va. 617, 79 S. E. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1131, where a testator adeemed a specific legacy of a certain house and lot by selling the same, it was held that the devisee could not take other real estate in which the proceeds were in part invested, even though the testator, by a subsequent codicil, stated that the house and lot had been sold and a portion of the proceeds invested in other houses and lots. The court said that ademption depends upon a rule of law, and not upon the intention of the testator.

Nor can a mortgage, in which the proceeds of a mortgage which had been specifically bequeathed were invested by testator's agent in his lifetime, be taken in lieu of the bequeathed mortgage, since the bequest in such a case is adeemed. Gardner v. Hatton (1833) 6 Sim. 93, 58 Eng. Reprint, 530.

And it has been held that where a testator purchased corporate bonds with the proceeds of stock which had been specifically bequeathed and later sold by him, the bonds could not be substituted so as to pass under the legacy. Hosea v. Skinner (1900) 32 Misc. 653, 67 N. Y. Supp. 527.

So, in Holmes v. Langley [1913] 1 Ir. R. 232, it was held that a specific bequest of certain bonds had been adeemed by their sale and the investment of the proceeds in consols, and that, as the specific property appointed had ceased to exist, there was nothing upon which the bequest could operate, the court adhering to and applying the general rule that a material change in the character of property specifically bequeathed or devised works an ademption. And again, in Macdonald v. Irvine (1878) L. R. 8 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 101, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 494, 38 L. T. N. S. 155, 26 Week. Rep. 381, it was held that bonds purchased with the proceeds of the sale of bonds which had been specifically bequeathed could not be substituted therefor, but went into the residue.

And in Harrison v. Jackson (1877) L. R. 7 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 339, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142, where corporate stocks were paid off during the testator's lifetime, and the proceeds reinvested, with his sanction, in other securities, it was held that the latter could not be taken under the legacy in lieu of the stocks specifically bequeathed; and this, notwithstanding such result might defeat the testator's intention.

Likewise, in Gardner v. McNeal (1911) 117 Md. 27, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 553, 82 Atl. 988, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 119, it was held that a bequest of corporate stock was adeemed by its sale by testator's agent, whose act was ratified, and the investment of the proceeds in other stock, and that the new stock could not be substituted for the former to answer the bequest.

And it has been held that where corporate stock, which has been specifically bequeathed, is sold under an order in lunacy, and the proceeds reinvested in other securities, the latter do not pass under the legacy, even though the court, in directing the sale, ordered that the proceeds be earmarked. Re Freer (1882) L. R. 22 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 622, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 301, 31 Week. Rep. 426. But, in connection with this case, see Re Vuille [1918] 1 Ir. R. 6, in which, as set out in Mews' Ann. Dig. (1918) col. 410, and Butterworths' Ann. Dig. (1918) col. 594, it was held that, where a testatrix, a partner in a school, bequeathed "my share of the furniture and good will in the F. school, which amount to £600," and thereafter, under an order in lunacy, the continuing partners bought such share for £600, which was invested in consols, it was unnecessary to decide whether the order in lunacy worked an ademption of the legacy, since, as the bequest was of an ascertained sum of £600, the legatee was entitled to the consols in which that amount had been invested.

In Pattison v. Pattison (1832) 1 Myl. & K. 12, 39 Eng. Reprint, 585, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 15, where testator specifically bequeathed certain "long annuities," but afterwards sold the same, and with the produce purchased new annuities having a slightly different time of maturity, it was held that the legacy was adeemed, because the specific thing bequeathed did not exist at the testator's death. In this case it also appeared that, subsequent to the purchase of the new annuities, the testator, by a codicil, in terms "confirmed" his former will, but the court said that there could be no relief upon the ground of mistaken description.

In Tipton v. Tipton (1860) 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 252, where testator specifically bequeathed a certain note, but later sold the same and took the note of the purchaser in payment, it was held that the legacy was extinguished, since "nothing" remained to which the words of the will could apply. And in Tolman v. Tolman (1893) 85 Me. 317, 27 Atl. 184, where notes secured by a mortgage were specifically bequeathed, and later surrendered, and a reconveyance taken, after which the land was again sold to another by the testator, and notes taken which remained unpaid when he died, it was held that the legacy was adeemed, and that the new notes could not be substituted so as to pass under the bequest.

In Georgia Infirmary v. Jones (1889) 37 Fed. 750, appeal dismissed in (1893) 149 U. S. 774, 37 L. ed. 966, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047, it was held that securities purchased with the proceeds of certain claims which had been specifically bequeathed, but had been collected, could not pass, although the purchased securities were sufficient to have paid the legacy; since it must be regarded as adeemed by the collection.

In Georgia, under statutes providing that a legacy is adeemed or destroyed "when the testator conveys to another the specific property bequeathed, and does not afterwards become possessed of the same," but that "if the testator exchanges the property bequeathed for other of the like character, or merely changes the investment of a fund bequeathed, the law deems the intention to be to substitute the one for the other," in which case the legacy shall not fail, it has been held that an absolute sale of land devised constituted an ademption of the devise, and that the personality in which the testator invested the proceeds did not pass to the legatee, there being nothing in the will to show a contrary intent. Lang v. Vaughn (1911) 137 Ga. 671, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 542, 74 S. E. 270, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 52.

In the reported case (DUNLAP v. HAET, ante, 1493), the court also discussed the question under consideration from the viewpoint of revocation, holding that a specific devise of real estate does not pass to the devisee other realty purchased by the testator after selling the devised property, since the sale operated as a revocation of the specific devise. However, the court said that it was not "entirely accurate" to treat the question as one of revocation. And see May v. Sherrard (1913) 115 Va. 617, 79 S. E. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1131 (set out supra), wherein the court said that if the gift in question be treated as a devise of real estate it was "revoked" by the alienation thereof by the testator, but that if it be regarded as a specific bequest or legacy it was adeemed. ## STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

v.

R. L. QUINN et al., Appts.

South Carolina Supreme Court — October 8, 1918.

(— S. C. —, 97 S. E. 62.)

Seizure — absence of warrant — effect.

1. A Constitution securing against unreasonable searches and seizures and providing that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized, does not prohibit a seizure without warrant, where there is no need of a search, but the contraband subject-matter is fully disclosed and open to the eye and hand.

Search — seizing liquor in plain view.

2. No unconstitutional search occurs where a police officer, on approaching the side of an automobile in which some of the occupants are drunk, sees bottles containing whisky in the car, and seizes the liquor and arrests the occupants of the car, although he has no warrant for such procedure.

Definition — search.

3. A search implies invasion and quest, and that implies some sort of force, actual or constructive, much or little.

[See 24 R. C. L. 701.]

Trial — statement of testimony by court.

4. It is not unlawful for a trial court to state testimony about which there is no dispute.

— motion for directed verdict — effect.

5. A motion for a directed verdict is, in its nature, a demurrer to the evidence, and, therefore, a quasi admission of its truth.

Arrest — necessity of warrant.

6. One may, under a Constitution guaranteeing due process of law, be arrested without warrant if he is discovered in the act of violating the law.

[See 2 R. C. L. 452, 453.]

(Watts, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Greenville County convicting them of unlawfully transporting liquor. Affirmed.

The exceptions mentioned in the opinion are as follows:

That his Honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict of not guilty, when the undisputed testimony showed that the evidence upon which the defendants were arrested and convicted was obtained by an unlawful search of the persons and property of the defendants, without due process of law.

Because his Honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict of not guilty, when the undisputed testimony showed that the defendants were stopped, their persons and property forcibly searched under the authority of neither an arrest nor a search warrant, and without due process of law, and when it was admitted by the officers that the arrest was made only after evidence procured by such unlawful search.

That his Honor erred in that he charged upon the facts of the case in violation of § 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895, by the following statement in the presence of the jury: "There is testimony offered in this case to show—now, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen, I don't say it shows; to show—that the witnesses, or rural policemen of the county of Greenville, and of course the law invests them with the power and authority governing such officers,—that upon information communicated to them they went out for the purpose of finding the defendants in this case; that the defendants were in an automobile drunk on the public highway, and at the time running their automobile in excess of the legal rate of speed; that as soon as the opportunity was presented they made a search of the automobile in question, and found the liquor which has been offered in evidence, consisting of 2 quarts, and a quart bottle about half full. Whereupon they were arrested and taken to jail."

That his Honor erred in charging the jury that the law governing the conduct of rural policemen for Greenville county was as contained in § 2 of an act passed in 1914 (Acts of 1914, p. 754) which reads as follows: "Duty to Patrol County:— That it shall be the duty of the said rural policemen, under the direction of the chief, to patrol and police the county, and to prevent or detect offenses against the criminal law, and prosecute all persons for violation of the criminal law of every kind, making arrests upon their own initiation, as well as upon complaint or information, and to seize without warrant, and hold all alcoholic liquors in possession of any person for unlawful use, and . . . if such action be begun and the judgment of the court be adverse to the plaintiff, then such liquors shall be destroyed publicly by the chief of rural police, and such rural policemen shall report all their acts, and all known or suspected violations of criminal law to the chief, who shall make such reports, and give such information as may be requested by the solicitor, the grand jury or the legislative delegation of said county"—since said section is in violation of § 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1895, and of § 1, art. 14, of the amendments of the United States Constitution, and of § 16, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1895.

That his Honor erred in charging the jury that the law governing the conduct of rural policemen for Greenville county was as contained in § 3 of an act passed in 1914 (Acts of 1914, p. 755) which reads as follows: "That said policemen shall have authority for any freshly committed crime, to arrest without warrant, and said policemen shall, while pursuing a criminal, or suspected criminal, have authority to make arrest, or arrests, in incorporated cities and towns, and in pursuit of the criminal to enter homes, or break therein, whether in their own county or in an adjoining county; and they shall have the authority to summon the posse comitatus to assist in enforcing the laws, and any person who shall fail to respond and render assistance, when so summoned, shall be guilty of misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding thirty days, or fine of not exceeding one hundred ($100) dollars"—since said section is in violation of § 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1895, and of § 1, art. 14, of the amendments of the United States Constitution, and of § 16, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina of 1895.

Because the court erred in not granting defendants a new trial upon the grounds of motion for a new trial as set forth in the record.

Further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bonham & Price for appellants.

Mr. J. Robert Martin for the State.

Gage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Indictment for unlawfully transporting liquor in Greenville county; verdict of guilty; appeal by the defendants.

There are five exceptions, reduced to three questions in the appellants' brief: (1) Verdict ought to have been directed for defendants; (2) the court charged on the facts; (3) the Act of 1914 (28 Stat. at L. 754) is in violation of the state and Federal Constitutions. Let the exceptions be reported. The prime contention of the appellants is that liquor was discovered by an illegal search of the defendants, and that the case is thus brought within the late case of Blacksburg v. Beam, 104 S. C. 146, L.R.A.1916E, 714, 88 S. E. 441.

Facts make a case; there is no such thing as law separable from facts. There were two witnesses, both for the state.

The testimony of Gossnell shows this transaction: The place was on the Buncombe road, running north out of the city of Greenville, and where that road and the track of the Southern Railway cross. Gossnell and Beamlett were rural policemen, and had passed north up the Buncombe road about 3 miles, at which point they met the defendants, Quinn, Ballew, Lee, Vaughn, and Beasley, in a Ford car, going south towards the city. The officers turned around and also moved south, following the Ford car. At the crossing of the highway and the railway the Ford car had been halted, as were the policemen, too, by a passing freight train. The policemen alighted from the car and stood, the one on one side, and the other on the opposite side of the Ford car. Ballew was driver of the Ford car, and Quinn sat by him. The three others were on the back seat, and those three were drunk. The officers found on the back seat a full quart of whisky, and Beamlett picked up a full quart of whisky down about the front where Ballew sat. Quinn had something in his hands, holding it down between his legs, and Gossnell pulled it out, and it was a quart bottle of whisky, full. At that stage the arrest was made.

The testimony of Beamlett shows this transaction: The policemen alighted at the crossing and walked, one on one side, and one on the other side of the Ford. The occupants of the Ford car were all under the influence of liquor, save Ballew, and two of them were drunk to helplessness. This policeman found 1 quart in the back of the car, at the feet of Lee.

The defendants offered no testimony. It is true both policemen testified in ipsissima verba that they stopped and "searched the persons" of the occupants of the car, and that they had no warrant issued to them by an officer which empowered them to do so. But whether there was a "search" depends upon what was said and done by the officers at the time and place, and not upon the words with which they have characterized their acts.

The facts which we have recited, and about which there is no dispute, show that there was no arrest made until the liquor was discovered in the Ford car by the officers. And the facts show, also, that there was certainly no "search" of the persons of the occupants of the Ford car to discover the liquor. On the contrary, while the Ford car was at rest, waiting for the passage across the highway of the freight train, the policemen also came to a stop, and, disembarking from their car and looking, saw some of the liquor unconcealed in the Ford car.

It will not be denied that, had the officers come by chance upon the Ford car, manifestly loaded with whisky and being transported for unlawful use, in such a case a seizure of the liquor and an arrest of the conveyors would have been lawful, and that without a warrant to arrest or a warrant to seize. The instant case is essentially none other than that supposed.

The Constitution prohibits absolutely unreasonable searches, and it prohibits any search save upon a warrant duly issued. It requires a warrant to seize only in those instances where the seizure is assisted by a necessary search. It does not prohibit a seizure without warrant where there is no need of a search, and where the contraband subject-matter is fully disclosed and open to the eye and hand. Art. 1, § 16.

There was no search in the instant case, for search implies invasion and quest, and that implies some sort of force, actual or constructive, much or little.

The provision of the Constitution now considered was adopted to save a citizen's person and his house from invasion by some sort of force, except the invasion is had in the most guarded way. See State v. Wimbush, 9 S. C. 313, and the opinion of Simonton, J., in Bound v. South Carolina R. Co. (C. C.) 57 Fed. 485.

We do not find so much in the books; but that some force must be exercised is evident from the history of the constitutional provision; and that is the necessary implication of the words of the Constitution, of the statute, and of the decisions. There is a luminous discussion of the history of search and seizure by Mr. Justice Bradley in Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524. See also Cooley, Const. Law, 4th ed. p. 367.

The undisputed testimony in the instant case shows there was no exercise of any sort of force, but, on the contrary, the condition was manifest to him who had eyes to see. The case is largely governed by what was decided in State v. Byrd, 72 S. C. 109, 51 S. E. 544. It was there held: "Under § 16 of article 1 of the state Constitution which protects the citizen from unreasonable seizure of his person and property, there is no doubt a limit to the power of the general assembly to authorize arrest of the citizen without warrant; but we do not think that limit has been reached when an officer is required to arrest without warrant one whom he discovers in the act of violating the criminal law." (Italics have been supplied.)

The next issue arises out of what the court said, not in the charge, but when it ruled against the formal motion for the direction of a verdict. It has been held more than once that it is not unlawful for a trial court to state testimony about which there was no dispute. In the instant case the court said: "The testimony tends to show . . . that upon information communicated to them they (the policemen) went out for the purpose of finding the defendants; that the defendants were in an automobile drunk on the public highway and at the time using their automobile in excess of the legal rate of speed; that as soon as the opportunity was presented they made a search of the automobile in question and found the liquor which had been offered in evidence . . . whereupon they were arrested and taken to jail."

Definition—search.

Trial—statement of testimony by court.

The motion for a directed verdict was in its nature a demurrer to the evidence, and therefore a quasi admission of the truth.

The third issue made by the appeal involves a testing of the Act of 1914 (28 Stat. at L. 754) when laid by the side of the state Constitution; for, as no Federal question is involved, the Federal Constitution has no relevancy. The suggestion of the appellant is that §§ 2 and 3 of that act violate the due process clause of the state Constitution (art. 1, § 5), and also the search and seizure clause of the same instrument. Art. 1, § 16. These subjects are akin, and the issues will be considered together. The statute is to be judged, of course, with reference only to the facts of the instant case; if, when applied to those facts, it conforms to the superior rule of the Constitution, then no fault is to be found with it.

The second section of the statute deals, inter alia, with seizures, and it does empower police officers "to seize without warrant . . . all alcoholic liquors in the possession of any person for unlawful use." It does not authorize a search of a man's person or his house without a warrant. In the instant case the seizure was made without warrant to seize; but so much was lawful because, as before stated, there was no search necessary and none was made.

The third section of the statute deals, inter alia, with arrests, and it does empower police officers, "for any freshly committed crime, to arrest without warrant." The subject of "arrest of the person" is not mentioned in the state Constitution save in three instances not relevant here. Art. 2, § 14; art. 3, § 13; art. 13, § 2. The due process clause of the Constitution, however, protects the citizen from unlawful arrests.

By the common law (that law which due process guarantees) a citizen may be arrested without warrant who is discovered in the act of violating the law. City Council v. Payne, 11 S. C. L. (2 Nott & M'C.) 475; State v. Sims, 16 S. C. 486. In the instant case the defendants were discovered flagrante delicto; they were in the very act of transporting contraband liquor.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that, when applied to the facts of the instant case, no fault can be found in the statute in the respects indicated.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Gary, Ch. J., and Hydrick and Fraser, JJ., concur.

Watts, J.:

I dissent, and think judgment should be reversed.

NOTE.

The holding of the reported case (STATE v. QUINN, ante, 1500), that a constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizure does not preclude the making of a seizure without a warrant previously procured where no search is required, is in accord with other decisions on the point, as is shown by an annotation of the question: "Constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures, as applied to search for or seizure of intoxicating liquor" on page 1514.

It should be noted, however, that a seizure without a warrant cannot be made, except under the authority of a statute conferring the power so to do. See subd. III. b, of the annotation referred to.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
AUGUST MARXHAUSEN.

Michigan Supreme Court — February 18, 1919.

(— Mich. —, 171 N. W. 557.)

Search and seizure — search for intoxicating liquors.

1. Constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and seizures is violated by police officers entering a man's building without a search warrant, and searching for and carrying away intoxicating liquor there found.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1514.]

2. Constitutional provisions against unreasonable searches and seizures and against compelling one to be a witness against himself secure the individual in his person, his home, and his property from invasion through unbridled and unrestrained executive or administrative will.

[See 24 R. C. L. 703.]

— return of property.

3. Intoxicating liquor seized by police officers in a search of private property without warrant should be returned to the owner by the courts upon his application.

[See 24 R. C. L. 706, 716, 717.]

Evidence — secured by violation of Constitution — effect.

4. The court will not pause in the trial of a criminal case to determine whether or not competent evidence offered against accused was obtained from him by violation of the constitutional provisions against unlawful searches and seizures, or furnishing evidence against oneself, but will order a return of evidence so secured if application is made before trial.

[See 24 R. C. L. 702, 718.]

Statute — construction — use of intoxicating liquor.

5. A statute cannot be held to be limited to prohibition of personal use of liquor, the penal section of which provides for punishment of any person who himself, or by his clerk, agent, or employee, shall violate any provision of the statute.

— construction — intent of legislators.

6. The court cannot, in construing a statute inquire into the intent of the legislators.

— legislative intent.

7. The court in the construction of a statute must determine the legislative intent by what was done by the legislature as an entity.

8. If a later legislative act operates to supersede an earlier one it must be accepted as the latest and final declaration of the legislative will.

— repeal by implication.

9. Repeals by implication are not favored in the law.

10. Where a later act covers the whole subject, contains new provisions evidencing an intent that it shall supersede the former law, or is repugnant to the earlier act, it operates as a repeal.

— regulation of intoxicating liquors.

11. A statute completely covering the field of possession and sale of intoxicating liquors, expressly repealing all acts and parts of acts in conflict with its provisions, repeals an act passed a few days earlier, which is to take effect on the same day provided for it, but which merely prohibits the bringing into, carrying, receiving, or possession in the state of intoxicating liquors.

[See 15 R. C. L. 383, 384.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County (Dingeman, J.) to review a judgment quashing an information charging defendant with violating the Prohibition Law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles H. Jasnowski, Edwin S. Bartlett, and Alexander J. Groesbeck, Attorney General, for the People.

Messrs. James McNamara and George A. Kelly for defendant in error.

Mr. Henry E. Chase, amicus curiæ.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant is the owner of Calf island, consisting of about 10 acres. It is located in the Detroit river, within the confines of Wayne county. It is defendant's home. On August 1, 1918, while defendant was in the state of South Carolina, and was known by the officers to be absent, five inspectors of the food and drug department, the marshal of the village of Trenton, a deputy sheriff of the county, and the justice of the peace, who afterwards conducted the examination of defendant, went to the island. Some of the party effected an entrance to the dwelling house without breaking locks or doors, searched the house, found some liquor there, and also found some liquor in an improvised cellar and at other points on the premises. All the liquor was seized, conveyed to the mainland, and from there to the county building in Detroit, where it was stored. All this was done without a search warrant and without consent of defendant. Two days later a complaint was filed, charging defendant with the violation of Act 161, Public Acts 1917. Upon his return he was arrested, and after a preliminary examination before the justice of the peace, who was one of the party on August 1st, was bound over for trial. In the circuit court the information was quashed, and the liquor ordered returned to him.

To review this judgment the prosecuting attorney sues out this writ of error, under the provisions of Act 159, Public Acts 1917. The following are the errors assigned:

"(1) The court erred in deciding that Act No. 161 of the Public Acts of the state of Michigan for the year 1917 was superseded and repealed by Act No. 338 of the Public Acts of the state of Michigan for the year 1917.

"(2) The court erred in entering an order quashing the information.

"(3) The court erred in directing the liquor seized to be restored to the defendant."

We shall consider these assignments of error in their inverse order.

1. Section 10, art. 2, of the Constitution of the state, provides: "The person, houses, papers and possessions of every person shall be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures. No warrant to search any place or to seize any person or things shall issue without describing them, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation."

This provision is the same as found in the Constitution of 1850, and with the exception of the use of the word "person," in place of the word "individual," the same as found in the Constitution of 1835. It is in effect the same provision found in the 4th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Section 16, art. 2, of the state Constitution, provides: "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

Like provisions are found in the 5th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Similar provisions are found in the constitutions of the various states of the Union. By these provisions the rights of the individual are secured; the provisions of the Federal Constitution securing the citizen from arbitrary, unlawful conduct on the part of the Federal government and its officers, and the provisions of the state constitutions securing the citizen from arbitrary, unlawful conduct on the part of the state and its officers. These provisions not only secure the individual in his person, his home, and his property from invasion through unbridled legislation, but they also secure the individual in his person, his home, and his property from invasion through unbridled and unrestrained executive or administrative will. It ought not to be necessary to recall the fact that it is of the essence of a free government that the individual shall be secure in his person, his home, and his property from unlawful invasion, from unlawful search, from unlawful seizure. The writing of these provisions into the Federal Constitution, into every constitution of every state in the Union, was not an idle ceremony. With a clearness of vision our forefathers provided for a lawful search and seizure, one supported by oath or affirmation, describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized, and in the same section safeguarded the rights of the individual by inhibiting unreasonable and unlawful search. They provided an orderly manner for search and seizure, and prohibited all others.

The substance of the provision found in the 4th Amendment to the Federal Constitution was proposed by Mr. Madison in the seventh subdivision of his first amendment. Others proposed a similar provision, and the final result was the language found in this amendment. That we may better understand this provision, it is well we consider some of the events leading up to its adoption. Obviously we cannot, within the compass of this opinion, detail at length all that preceded and finally culminated in far-reaching decisions by the courts of England. Attention is directed to a footnote which will be found in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. beginning at page 426. It will suffice to say that a practice had grown up in England of issuing so-called writs of assistance, originally by the Star Chamber, and later by the Secretary of State, under color of which messengers of the King entered any and all places agreeable to themselves, searched and seized such papers and evidences as their will dictated. These writs were general in their character, described no premises, and named no persons to be searched. Their justification at that time was the publication of seditious libels, and the end sought the suppression of these seditious utterances. The practice of issuing and serving these writs was of long standing, and the right to issue them was unassailed for many years; indeed this was one of the reasons assigned to sustain their validity in the case to which we shall presently refer. But Lord Camden disposed of this claim in the following language: "But still it is insisted that there has been a general submission, and no action brought to try the right. I answer, there has been a submission of guilt and poverty to power and the terror of punishment. But it would be strange doctrine to assert that all the people of this land are bound to acknowledge that to be universal law which a few criminal booksellers have been afraid to dispute."

The infraction of individual rights, tolerated then as now under the claim of necessity, in order to enforce the law, finally came before the courts for decision. In the case of Entick v. Carrington, 19 How. St. Tr. 1029, Lord Camden, pronouncing the judgment of the court, laid broad and deep the principles which were afterwards crystallized in the 4th Amendment. Of Lord Camden's decision Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court in Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, said: "The law as expounded by him has been regarded as settled from that time to this, and his great judgment on that occasion is considered as one of the landmarks of English liberty. It was welcomed and applauded by the lovers of liberty in the colonies, as well as in the mother country. It is regarded as one of the permanent monuments of the British Constitution, and is quoted as such by the English authorities on that subject down to the present time."

Substantially contemporaneous with this case is that of Money v. Leach, 3 Burr. 1742, 97 Eng. Reprint, 1075. In both cases these general writs were held invalid, and in April, 1766, the House of Commons passed resolutions condemnatory of these so-called general warrants, whether for the seizure of persons or papers. Chatham thus tersely stated: "Every man's house is called his castle. Why? Because it is surrounded by a moat, or defended by a wall? No. It may be a straw-built hut, the wind may whistle around it, the rain may enter it, but the King cannot."

The events bringing about the disuse of these writs in this country, and premising the adoption of the 4th Amendment, are best described by Mr. Watson in his work on the Constitution. We quote (vol. 2, p. 1415): "While officers of the Crown were issuing and serving such warrants in England, they were doing the same in the American colonies, and this contributed much to that public sentiment which eventually demanded the adoption of this amendment. So oppressive had become the practice that here, as in England, it caused great alarm among the people, and here, as there, resistance was made to such writs on the ground of their illegality. These warrants were principally issued and the seizures made in the colony of Massachusetts. The trial which tested their legality occurred in Boston in February, 1761. It proved to be more than a mere trial, as we shall see, for the greatest question which could affect the interests of the colonists was involved. James Otis, a native of Massachusetts, was Advocate General of the Crown at Boston, a legal position of great responsibility and honor; but he was so wrought up at the outrage which had been committed by the arrests under these warrants that he resigned his office, and, though offered a most remunerative fee if he would take charge of the defense, he said: 'In such a cause as this I despise a fee.' He then acted as one of the counsel in resisting the arrests. He spoke for five hours, and it is doubtful if any legal argument ever made on this continent produced a more profound or lasting impression. He set fire to a torch which is still burning, and which will continue to burn, for in that masterful effort he impressed upon the American heart the great lesson of resistance to tyranny and outrage. As the result of the trial the writs were never afterwards served by judicial sanction."

A portion of Mr. Otis's speech will be found in Life and Works of John Adams, vol. 2, p. 523. In this speech Mr. Otis pronounced these general writs "the worst instrument of arbitrary power, the most destructive of English liberty and the fundamental principles of law, that ever was found in an English law book," since they placed "the liberty of every man in the hands of every petty officer." In a letter to William Tudor, written March 29, 1817 (Life and Works of John Adams, vol. 10, p. 244), John Adams most graphically described this trial which he attended. In the course of his letter he said: "Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born."

These events, which we have but given in outline, occurred within the memory of the men who formulated and adopted the 4th Amendment. In clear and unmistakable language these men wrote into the fundamental law of the nation, to be afterwards incorporated into the fundamental law of the various states of the Union, the safeguard against unlawful and unreasonable search and seizure of the person and property of the citizens, irrespective of whether such unlawful and unreasonable search and seizure had the sanction of legislative approval or rested in the arbitrary will of the executive and administrative arm of the state. Does the search of de-defendant's premises and the seizure of his property in the instant case offend the rights secured to him by this provision of the fundamental law of the state? These officers had no search warrant issued upon oath or affirmation; no search warrant of any kind. They entered the home of defendant by command of no court; they searched his premises by virtue of no process. They justify, if at all, under administrative will and mandate, not recognized by the Constitution and unauthorized in a government of law. That "the end justifies the means" is a doctrine which has not found lodgment in the archives of this court. The search and seizure detailed in this record was an unauthorized trespass and an invasion of the constitutional rights of this defendant.

These rights of the individual in his person and property should be held sacred, and any attempt to fritter them away under the guise of enforcing drastic sumptuary legislation (no matter how beneficial to the people it may be claimed to be) must meet with the clear and earnest disapproval of the courts.

Did the trial judge commit error in ordering the return of the liquor thus seized? It must be borne in mind that we are not here dealing with the search by a jailer of one lawfully under arrest upon warrant duly issued, before placing him in a cell, and the retention of the proceeds of such search; nor are we considering a case where, under a lawful search warrant duly issued, a search and seizure has been effected; here we are dealing with the right to retain the liquor taken without any search warrant. that the rule announced by that court will be reached by careful consideration of three cases decided by that court, and only three; that by a careful consideration of these three cases we will be able to clearly understand the rule laid down by that, the court of last resort of the nation, and the reason for the rule. These cases are Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524; Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585, 48 L. ed. 575, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372; and Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 58 L. ed. 652, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177. A brief statement with reference to each of these cases will aid in understanding the discussion which follows.

In the Boyd Case an information was filed to forfeit thirty-five cases of polished plate glass. It was charged that the plate glass was imported by the owners in fraud of the Customs Laws. By the terms of the act under consideration such owners were liable to heavy fines and imprisonment. Pursuant to the provisions of the act the district attorney obtained an order of the court requiring the importers to produce their invoices of the shipment. It was held in an able and exhaustive opinion written by Justice Bradley that the proceedings were criminal, and that the act and the proceedings taken thereunder offended both the 4th and 5th Amendments. The opinion of Lord Camden in the case of Entick v. Carrington, supra, together with the circumstance surrounding the adoption of the amendments, were fully considered by the court. Considering the compulsory production of papers it was said: "And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime, or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power; but it cannot abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

The Adams Case brought up for review the decision of the court of appeals of the state of New York. People v. Adams, 176 N. Y. 351, 63 L.R.A. 406, 98 Am. St. Rep. 675, 68 N. E. 636. The state court had held that upon the trial the manner in which competent evidence offered against the defendant had been obtained could not be inquired into. The state court had said: "The underlying principle obviously is that the court, when engaged in trying a criminal cause, will not take notice of the manner in which witnesses have possessed themselves of papers or other articles of personal property, which are material and properly offered in evidence. In the case before us, if there has been any illegal invasion of the rights of this defendant, by reason of alleged unlawful searches and seizures of private papers, his remedy is in an independent proceeding, not necessary to be considered at this time."

The Supreme Court of the United States adopted this view and affirmed the case; Mr. Justice Day, speaking for the court, saying: "The question was not made in the attempt to resist an unlawful seizure of the private papers of the plaintiff in error, but arose upon objection to the introduction of testimony clearly competent as tending to establish the guilt of the accused of the offense charged. In such cases the weight of authority as well as reason limits the inquiry to the competency of the proffered testimony, and the courts do not stop to inquire as to the means by which the evidence was obtained."

In the Weeks Case the defendant had been arrested at his place of employment. Other officers without a search warrant went to his house, and, learning from a neighbor where the key was kept, obtained it, entered the house, searched it, and took away certain property, including letters there found. Before the trial, defendant filed a petition praying the return of such property thus taken. The trial judge ordered the return of such property as was not desired to be used as evidence, but as to this property he denied defendant's petition. Before any evidence was offered, defendant again moved for the return of the property so taken, which motion was also refused, and the papers taken were received in evidence over defendant's objection. The conviction was reversed. Mr. Justice Day, who wrote the Adams Case, also wrote this case. Speaking for the court he said:

"The effect of the 4th Amendment is to put the courts of the United States and Federal officials, in the exercise of their power and authority, under limitations and restraints as to the exercise of such power and authority, and to forever secure the people, their persons, houses, papers, and effects against all unreasonable searches and seizures under the guise of law. This protection reaches all alike, whether accused of crime or not, and the duty of giving to it force and effect is obligatory upon all intrusted under our Federal system with the enforcement of the laws. The tendency of those who execute the criminal laws of the country to obtain conviction by means of unlawful seizures and enforced confessions, the latter often obtained after subjecting accused persons to unwarranted practices, destructive of rights secured by the Federal Constitution, should find no sanction in the judgments of the courts, which are charged at all times with the support of the Constitution, and to which people of all conditions have a right to appeal for the maintenance of such fundamental rights. . . .

"The accused, without awaiting his trial, made timely application to the court for an order for the return of these letters, as well as other property. This application was denied, the letters retained and put in evidence, after a further application at the beginning of the trial, both applications asserting the rights of the accused under the 4th and 5th Amendments to the Constitution. If letters and private documents can thus be seized and held and used in evidence against a citizen accused of an offense, the protection of the 4th Amendment declaring his right to be secure against such searches and seizures is of no value, and, so far as those thus placed are concerned, might as well be stricken from the Constitution."

There has been some criticism of the Boyd Case by courts and writers, who have regarded it as not in accord with a long line of cases in state courts, of which the following will be found to be illustrative, although but a fragmentary list: Gindrat v. People, 138 Ill. 103, 27 N. E. 1085; State v. Flynn, 36 N. H. 64; Com. v. Dana, 2 Met. 329; State v. Griswold, 67 Conn. 290, 38 L.R.A. 227, 34 Atl. 1046; State v. Burroughs, 72 Me. 479; State v. Miller, 63 Kan. 62, 64 Pac. 1033; Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 39 L.R.A. 269, 28 S. E. 624; Com. v. Tibbetts, 157 Mass. 519, 32 N. E. 910. And after the decision in the Adams Case was handed down it was thought by some that the holding in the Boyd Case was modified thereby, notwithstanding it was expressly stated by Justice Day that "the case [Boyd Case] has been frequently cited by this court, and we have no wish to detract from its authority."

We are impressed, however, that a careful consideration of the Boyd Case, in connection with the Adams Case and the decisions of the state courts, some of which are cited above, but many of which are not, taken in the light of what was said by the court in the Weeks Case, demonstrate that in the main the United States Supreme Court and the courts of last resort of the various states are in accord, and that the Boyd Case does not conflict, as its critics claim, with the holdings of the many state courts. The Adams Case and many state cases along the line of that case belong to one class of cases, while the Boyd and Weeks Cases belong to another class of cases. In the Adams and similar cases the question of the legality of the search and seizure was sought to be raised collaterally, not by direct proceedings. In these cases the objection was not made until the article or paper unlawfully seized was offered in evidence. It must be patent that upon the trial of a criminal case the court cannot pause in the trial, when a bit of evidence, admissible under general rules, is offered, to engage in a collateral inquiry as to how the prosecution became possessed of such evidence. That would be the trial of a collateral matter. And as a general proposition the courts have so held, and, where the evidence offered was competent, have not paused in the trial to determine the collateral issue of whether the evidence was legally secured or not. We say as a general proposition, because a few states are not in accord with this view. See State v. Slamon, 73 Vt. 212, 87 Am. St. Rep. 711, 50 Atl. 1097, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 686; Wright v. State, 9 Ga. App. 266, 70 S. E. 1126; State v. Height, 117 Iowa, 650, 59 L.R.A. 437, 94 Am. St. Rep. 323, 91 N. W. 935; State v. Sheridan, 121 Iowa, 164, 96 N. W. 730; these cases holding that the question may be determined on the trial.

In the Boyd and Weeks Cases the question was not raised collaterally, but in both cases by a direct proceeding—in the Boyd Case by an affirmative order of the court requiring claimant to produce the invoice, which order was directly assailed in the review of the case in the Supreme Court, and which order was held to invade the claimant's rights under the Federal Constitution; in the Weeks Case by a negative order refusing the return of the property taken by the unlawful search and seizure, and which order was directly assailed upon review in the Supreme Court, and which order was held by that court to have denied defendant his constitutional rights.

From this consideration of these cases it is obvious that the rule underlying them is that, when defendant in a criminal case for the first time upon the trial objects to the admission in evidence of articles taken by unlawful search and seizure, and they are admissible under general rules governing the admissibility of proof, the court will

secured by violation of

not pause in the trial of the case to determine the collateral question of whether the prosecution became lawfully possessed of such articles; but that where it is made to appear before the trial that articles have been taken from the possession of the defendant in violation of his constitutional rights, and by unlawful search and seizure, and without any search warrant at all, it then becomes the duty of the trial court to order the return to the defendant of the articles thus unlawfully taken. The rule is thus stated in 10 R. C. L. 933: "The principle underlying the decisions admitting the evidence is that an objection to an offer of proof made on the trial of a cause raises no other question than that of the competency, relevancy, and materiality of the evidence offered, and that consequently the court, on such an objection, cannot enter on the trial of a collateral issue as to the source from which the evidence was obtained. But, since there is a right, there must of necessity be a remedy, and the remedy is to be found in the making of a timely application to the court for an order directing the return to the applicant of the papers unlawfully seized. On such an application, the question of the illegality of the seizure may be fully heard, and if the court erroneously refuses to order a return of the papers, and thereafter receives them in evidence against the applicant over his objection, it is an error for which a judgment of conviction must be reversed."

Turning, now, to our own cases, we find them in strict harmony with the rule announced. This court has held that the courts will not pause in the trial of a cause to open up a collateral inquiry of whether a wrong has been committed in obtaining information which a witness possesses. Cluett v. Rosenthal, 100 Mich. 193, 43 Am. St. Rep. 446, 58

N. W. 1009; People v. Campbell, 160 Mich. 108, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 58, 136 Am. St. Rep. 417, 125 N. W. 42; People v. Aldorfer, 164 Mich. 676, 130 N. W. 351. But this court has also held upon an application made before trial for mandamus to set aside an order of the circuit court permitting the police department to take possession of property of the citizen, pending investigation for crime, and depriving the owner of its possession, that the order should be vacated and set aside, resulting in the return of the property thus unlawfully withheld. Newberry v. Carpenter, 107 Mich. 567, 31 L.R.A. 163, 61 Am. St. Rep. 346, 65 N. W. 530.

In the instant case the evidence taken before the magistrate and returned to the circuit court conclusively established the invalidity of the search and seizure and the invasion of defendant's constitutional rights. The circuit judge did not err in directing the return of the liquor to the defendant.

2. We shall consider the first and second assignment of error together, as they involve but one question. The trial judge was of the opinion that the act under which the information was filed was superseded by a later one, and for this reason quashed the information. Act No. 161 of the Public Acts of 1917, under which this information was filed, was approved May 2, 1917. It will hereafter be called the "Damon Act." Act No. 338, Public Acts 1917, was approved May 10, 1917. It will hereafter be called the "Wiley Act." Both acts by their terms became effective on and after May 1, 1918.

We shall first consider the argument, advanced on behalf of the people, that the Wiley Act was passed to prohibit the dealing in intoxicating liquors, the business, except for the permitted purposes; while the Damon Act was passed to prohibit and prevent its private use. This is the foundation of the argument at the bar by the learned counsel for the people. It was forcefully presented, and the people's case largely rests upon its soundness. A reading of § 4, however, convinces us that it cannot be maintained. This section provides: "Any person, who, himself or by his clerk, agent or employee, shall violate any of the provisions of this act," etc.

Clearly, if the legislature by the Damon Act solely designed to prohibit and prevent the personal use of intoxicating liquors, there would be no occasion to use the words "clerk, agent, or employee." The use of these words in the 4th section of this act, the penal section, eliminates the argument that the Damon Act was designed to cover and apply only to a field not contemplated by the Wiley Act.

The Damon Act simply prohibits, with a penalty for its violation, the bringing into, carrying, receiving, or possessing of intoxicating liquors, except for the permitted purposes, and by reference adopts applicable laws pertaining to search and seizure. It makes no attempt to provide for the lawful sale of liquors for medical, mechanical, chemical, scientific, or sacramental purposes, recognized in the constitutional amendment (art. 16, § 2). Its absence of detail and definiteness might well have prompted the thoughtful legislator, desiring to carry out the mandate of the constitutional amendment, to insist upon a complete, comprehensive act, superseding it and covering the entire field. While we may not inquire into the intent of the legislator, we are bound to ascertain the legislative intent; and this we must determine by what was done by the legislature as an entity. If the subsequent act of the legislature operates to supersede the earlier —superseded statute.

act, the later act must be accepted as the latest and final declaration of the legislative will.

The Wiley Act is a comprehensive measure of 61 sections, completely covering the field, and expressly repealing all acts or parts of acts in conflict with its provisions. It shows careful thought in its preparation—a recognition of constitutional rights, without detracting from its virility. It provides in detail and definiteness the manner of sale of liquors for medical, mechanical, chemical, scientific, and sacramental purposes, both by wholesale and retail, and prohibits all others.

Repeals by implication are not favored in the law. But where the later act covers the whole subject, contains new provisions evidencing an intent that it shall supersede the former law, or is repugnant to the

—what constitutes repeal.

In Shannon v. People, 5 Mich. 85, the rule was quoted, with the citation of a large number of authorities, in the following language: "That where a subsequent statute covers the whole ground occupied by an earlier statute, it repeals by implication the former statute, though there be no repugnance."

In Breitung v. Lindauer, 37 Mich. 217, it was said by this court, speaking through Justice Marston: "The rule is that the later act operates to the extent of the repugnancy, as a repeal of the first, or, if the two acts are not in express terms repugnant, yet if the latter covers the whole subject of the first, and contains new provisions showing that it was intended as a substitute, it will operate as a repeal."

In Atty. Gen. v. Railroad Comr. 117 Mich. 477, 76 N. W. 69, it was said: "While repeals by implication are not favored in the law, yet it is a rule of construction, followed by this court and other courts, that a statute revising the whole subject of a former statute, and intended as a substitute, operates as a repeal of the former law, though it contains no words to that effect."

Chief Justice Long, writing for the court in Porter v. Edwards, 114 Mich. 640, 72 N. W. 614, said: "The rule is well settled that a new statute, covering the same ground as the former act, supersedes it for all further cases, without the necessity of repealing words."

In Graham v. Muskegon County Clerk, 116 Mich. 571, 74 N. W. 729, it was said by Mr. Justice Montgomery "that a later act, which covers the whole subject, repeals prior acts repugnant thereto, is established doctrine."

See also People v. Bussell, 59 Mich. 104, 26 N. W. 306; Feige v. Michigan C. R. Co. 62 Mich. 1, 28 N. W. 685; People v. Furman, 85 Mich. 110, 48 N. W. 169; Atty. Gen. v. Parsell, 100 Mich. 170, 58 N. W. 839; Saginaw County v. Hubinger, 137 Mich. 72, 100 N. W. 261, 4 Ann. Cas. 792.

In the Wiley Act we have an act carefully prepared, covering the field with minuteness of detail in many particulars, expressly repealing all former acts inconsistent with its provisions, passed to put into effect the mandate of the people, declared in the constitutional amendment but recently adopted, and fresh in the minds of the members of the legislature, dealing with the same subject-matter as the former act, that of intoxicating liquor, complete in itself, containing the latest expression of legislative will.

We are constrained to hold, in view of the former decisions of this court, that the learned circuit judge correctly held that it superseded the Damon Act. <sup>-regulation of intoxicating liquors.</sup>

3. Upon the argument it was insisted that by the so-called Reed amendment (§ 5, Act March 3, 1917, chap. 162, 39 Stat. at L. 1069) Congress had legislated upon the question of interstate commerce in intoxicating liquor, and that, Congress having occupied the field committed to it by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, all legislation by the state upon the subject of interstate shipments of intoxicating liquor must fail. We do not find it necessary to consider this question. Upon this record it is undisputed that defendant purchased this liquor within this state when and where its sale and possession were lawful.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

Bird, Ch. J., and Kuhn, Stone, Brooke, and Moore, JJ., concur with Fellows, J.

Steere, J.:

I concur in the conclusion that the Damon Act is repealed by the Wiley Act, which is the controlling question involved.

ject for public regulation under the police power, it follows that, in the exercise of its power to enact preventive as well as remedial legislation, the legislature may authorize a search for and seizure of liquor unlawfully kept, subject only to the limitations upon the issuance of search warrants contained in the Constitution.

The decisions appear to warrant the generalization that a search and seizure is "unreasonable" within the meaning of the constitutional provision, where, as in the reported case (PEOPLE v. MARXHAUSEN, ante, 1505), it is not authorized by statute; or where the statute under which the warrant is issued does not conform to the conditions under which the Constitution permits such warrants to issue; or where the conditions prescribed by the statute have not been met; or where the warrant is not executed within a reasonable time; or where the search is made in an unreasonable manner; or where the seizure is of property other than that connected with the offense charged.

In Santo v. State (1855) 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487, it is said that the term "unreasonable" in the constitutions of the states has allusion to what had been practised before the Revolution, and especially to general search warrants in which the person, place, or thing was not described; and that no such warrant is unreasonable, in the legal sense, when it is for a thing obnoxious to the laws, and of a person and place particularly described, and is issued on oath of probable cause.

The provisions of the Federal Constitution against unreasonable searches and seizures relate only to action by officers of the Federal, and not of the state, government. See Kansas v. Bradley (1885) 26 Fed. 289, and many other cases not coming within the scope of this note.

II. Intoxicating liquor as proper subject of search and seizure.

In Gray v. Kimball (1856) 42 Me. 299, it is said that "certain articles which are treated as property while used for lawful purposes may be subjects of forfeiture and destruction, under proper statutory provisions, if their use is deemed pernicious to the best interests of the community. And when such articles are attempted to be used for unlawful purposes, or in an unlawful manner, and the attempts are so concealed that ordinary diligence fails to make such discovery as to enable the law to declare the forfeiture, statutes authorizing searches and seizures have been held legitimate."

In State v. Stoffels (1908) 89 Minn. 205, 94 N. W. 675, the court, in holding that the legislature may provide for the search and seizure of intoxicating liquor kept for sale in violation of the laws of the state, says: "The police power of the state concededly extends to the search, seizure, and destruction of property which is either the subject of crime or the means of perpetrating it. Now, when intoxicating liquors are kept for sale in a prohibition district, they are, with all implements to facilitate their sale, the subject of crime or the means for committing it. No one questions the validity of laws providing for the issuing of warrants for the search, seizure, and destruction of implements of gaming, lottery tickets, and obscene books, and other similar articles and means of crime. But it has been questioned by some courts whether intoxicating liquors are property of such character as to be subject to the application of this rule. They do not, per se, fall within the rule; but on principle, and the great weight of judicial authority, it must be held that when they are kept for sale in violation of the laws of the state, and are intended to be used as the subject or means of crime, it is a question solely for the lawmaking power to determine whether they ought to be subjected to the rule we have stated. Therefore, statutes authorizing the issuance of search warrants to search for intoxicating liquors illegally kept for sale, and directing their seizure when found, and their forfeiture or destruction, are constitutional. Cooley, Const. Lim. 306; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 52, 351."

And in State v. Hanson (1911) 114 Minn. 136, 130 N. W. 79, a statute providing for the search of an unlicensed drinking place, and seizure and forfeiture of intoxicating liquors and other property used in their unlawful sale, found therein, was held to be a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and constitutional.

In Lincoln v. Smith (1855) 27 Vt. 340, the court said: "It is no new thing to extend the police power of a state to the search, seizure, and destruction of property; and when this principle is attempted to be applied to intoxicating liquors, I apprehend much of the opposition has its source in a settled conviction that this species of property is not of that character which ought to be subjected to the application of such a principle; which, as it seems to us, is purely a question with the lawmaking power. Nuisances may be abated in the most summary manner; dogs found chasing sheep may be shot down; bucks running at large within a given period, without the marks of the initials of the owner's name, may become the property of the captor, and race horses may be declared forfeited; gambling implements may be destroyed; lottery tickets and obscene prints may be prohibited; and, under the Quarantine Laws, the health officer of a city, to prevent the spread of infection or contagion, may destroy bedding or clothing, or any part of the cargo of a vessel, subject to quarantine, and which 'he may deem infected.' Gunpowder kept in improper places may be seized and confiscated; and the exercise of these powers is a power of prevention, highly conservative in its character, and essential to the well-being of the body politic, and ought not to be characterized as arbitrary or despotic. So the 12th section of the act under consideration is eminently preventive in its provisions, as well as remedial in its character. The power to seize and confiscate private property for the violation of municipal laws, and as a means of preventing infractions thereof, has long been exercised by the general government; and I am not aware that the existence of that power has ever been denied; and it is a familiar principle that the long exercise of a power by a government, without objection, furnishes the strongest, if not conclusive, evidence that it was rightfully exercised."

Although there may be a right of property in intoxicating liquors and their use is not by law prohibited, yet, when kept and intended for unlawful use, such liquors fall at once under the ban of the law, and become subject to seizure and confiscation by such methods as are provided by the law, in conformity with the Constitution. State v. O'Neil (1885) 58 Vt. 140, 56 Am. Rep. 557, 2 Atl. 586, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 319.

It is competent for the state to provide for the abatement of liquor nuisances, and the issuance of the writ of seizure in aid thereof. Re State ex rel. Atty. Gen. (1912) 179 Ala. 639, 60 So. 285.

III. Conformity to constitutional requirements.

The obliging reader is requested to note that the question as to what procedure conforms to the conditions prescribed by the Constitution upon which warrants for search and seizure may issue is not affected (save in the matter of sufficiency of the description of the property to be seized) by the character of the subject of the search. The cases herein reviewed are, therefore, not to be taken as completely defining the effect of such requirements, but merely as a convenient collection of the cases involving searches for and seizure of intoxicating liquor.

a. Necessity of warrant for search.

The constitutional provision is violated by a statute which practically authorizes all officers to visit houses and business places without other authority, and make searches and arrests, and close up places of business on their own well or ill founded notion that the law has been violated. Robison v. Miner (1888) 68 Mich. 549, 37 N. W. 21.

It has been held that one cannot be convicted of illegally transporting liquor in his trunk upon evidence of the fact secured by opening the trunk with a key obtained by forcible search of his person, without warrant (Blacksburg v. Beam (1916) 104 S. C. 146, L.R.A.1916E, 714, 88 S. E. 441); but, in so far as this case holds that evidence obtained by an unlawful search is inadmissible, it is opposed to the great weight of authority, which supports the rule followed in the reported case (PEOPLE v. MARXHAUSEN, ante, 1505).

Seizure cannot be made without statutory authority.

Under the settled principles of the common law, and the constitutional provisions for the security of person and property, and immunity from unreasonable searches and seizures, a seizure cannot be made except under authority of a statute conferring the power so to do. Re Swan (1893) 150 U. S. 687, 37 L. ed. 1207, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225.

—but may be made without warrant previously procured, where no search is required.

A statute, which provides that "in all cases where an officer may seize intoxicating liquors or the vessels containing them upon a warrant, he may seize the same without a warrant and keep them in some safe place for a reasonable time until he can procure such a warrant," does not contravene the constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizures, since it merely authorizes the seizure without a warrant when such seizure can be made without the unreasonable search which is prohibited by the Constitution. State v. McCann (1871) 59 Me. 383; State v. Le Clair (1894) 86 Me. 522, 30 Atl. 7; State v. Bradley (1912) 96 Me. 121, 51 Atl. 816.

A statute which authorizes officers, without a warrant, to arrest any person whom they may find in the act of illegally selling, transporting, or distributing intoxicating liquor, and seize the liquor, vessels, and implements of sale in the possession of such person, and retain them in some place of keeping until warrants can be procured for the trial of the person and the seizure of the liquors, is constitutional. Jones v. Root (1856) 6 Gray (Mass.) 435; Mason v. Lothrop (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 354.

A constitutional provision which prohibits absolutely unreasonable searches, and prohibits any search save upon a warrant duly issued, requires a warrant to seize only in those instances where the seizure is assisted by a necessary search, and does not prohibit a seizure without warrant where there is no need of a search, and where the contraband subject-matter is fully disclosed, and open to the eye and hand. State v. Quinn (1918) — S. C. —, 97 S. E. 62.

The constitutional provision against unlawful searches and seizures is not violated by a statute which gives an officer the power to seize without warrant, liquor found "under circumstances warranting the belief that it is intended for sale or distribution" contrary to law, but which does not purport to confer the power of search. State v. O'Neil (1885) 58 Vt. 140, 56 Am. Rep. 557, 2 Atl. 586, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 319.

A statute providing that, "if any person shall make an affidavit . . . that such affiant has reason to believe and does believe" that liquors are unlawfully kept in a certain place, a search warrant shall issue, does not violate a constitutional provision that no search warrant shall issue "but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." Rose v. State (1908) 171 Ind. 662, 87 N. E. 103, 17 Ann. Cas. 228.

The requirement of the constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizures, that "no warrant shall issue but on probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons and things to be seized," is satisfied by an affidavit upon information and belief. Koch v. District Ct. (1911) 150 Iowa, 151, 129 N. W. 740.

A statutory provision that any place suspected of being a blind tiger shall be searched by an officer designated in a search warrant, issued on an affidavit that the affiant believes the place to be a blind tiger, and on such additional evidence as the court may require to make out a prima facie case, and that any intoxicating liquors found therein shall be seized by the officer and brought before the court, along with all persons found in the place, is not violative of the constitutional guaranty against unreasonable search and seizure and the issuance of a warrant without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. State v. Doremus (1915) 137 La. 266, 68 So. 605; State v. Nejin (1917) 140 La. 793, 74 So. 103.

"The question whether a constitutional requirement that a search warrant shall not issue without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, is contravened by a statute which not only authorizes but requires the issuance of the writ upon no better showing of cause than an affidavit of belief, is discussed in Dupree v. State (1909) 102 Tex. 455, 119 S. W. 301, in which the court, after reviewing the conflicting authorities, remarked: "The legislature has thus, in effect, determined that such oaths, in themselves, show probable cause, and we are confronted by the question whether or not it had power to do this. It is obviously true that the legislature cannot dispense with the requirement of the Constitution that probable cause be shown, and that, therefore, it cannot evade this limitation upon its power by an attempt to make that probable cause which plainly is not such. But have we such a case? In determining a question like this, we must take into consideration the history of the subject, and what has been regarded as probable cause, and when we find that that which the legislature has, in this instance, treated as being sufficient, has been thus long and extensively so regarded here and elsewhere, by both legislative and judicial authority, it would be difficult to say that there is such a plain and palpable violation of the Constitution as to justify the courts in declaring the statute void; and if this were the only objection to the act in question, we should hesitate long before reaching such a conclusion."

The constitutional provision that no warrant shall issue but on complaint in writing upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and describing as nearly as may be the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized, does not require the complaint to describe "as nearly as may be" the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized, such requirement having reference to the warrant only." Re Horgan (1889) 16 R. L. 542, 18 Atl. 279.

In order to avoid a constitutional guaranty against unreasonable searches and seizures, the writ must not be general; it should not leave the place to be searched to the discretion of the officer executing it; it must confine the search to one place or building. Toole v. State (1910) 170 Ala. 41, 54 So. 195.

But a separate warrant for each suspected place to be searched is not called for, either by the letter or spirit of the Constitution. Gray v. Davis (1858) 27 Conn. 447.

Under a constitutional provision that no warrant to search any place, or seize any person or thing, shall issue "without a special designation of the place to be searched," the locality must be definite, certain, and fixed, and must be capable of being described and specially designated; hence, a statute authorizing search for and seizure of intoxicating liquors lawfully kept cannot properly be construed as warranting the search for and seizure of liquors in a valise, alleged merely to be in the possession of the defendant, but not alleged to be in any definite and fixed locality or place. State v. Fezzette (1908) 103 Me. 467, 69 Atl. 1073.

Such constitutional requirement is not met where the designation of the place to be searched, if used in a conveyance, would not convey it, and would not confine the search to one building or place. State v. Brann (1912) 109 Me. 559, 84 Atl. 266.

The constitutional requirement that no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person or thing, shall issue without describing them as near as may be, is contravened by a statute which requires as a basis for the issuance of a search warrant only that it describe a place where the affiant believes intoxicating liquor is being sold, or is being kept or possessed for the purpose of being sold, in violation of law, and confers authority upon the officer to enter and search not only the place described in the affidavit, but any place where the affiant has good reason to believe any such person has placed or secreted any such liquor, thus empowering the complainant to determine, upon a mere belief not even previously sworn to, what places, in addition to those described in his affidavit, shall be entered and searched. Dupree v. State (1909) 102 Tex. 455, 119 S. W. 301.

A complaint in which the place where the liquor was alleged to be deposited was "in the dwelling house of Russel H. Lincoln of Shrewsbury, in the county of Rutland," sufficiently describes the place to be searched. Lincoln v. Smith (1855) 27 Vt. 328.

And a description of the premises to be searched as "a place at 14 Jefferson street in the city of Montgomery, to wit, a stable or storehouse in the rear of a residence at said 14 Jefferson street," is sufficient. Toole v. State (1910) 170 Ala. 41, 54 So. 195.

A search warrant not describing and designating some particular house, building, or place for search, but authorizing the search of a "certain suit case, trunk, or other container in the possession of" a person named, "in the roads, streets, alleys, or rooms in said county," is void. State v. Ensweller (1916) 78 W. Va. 214, 88 S. E. 787.

f. Description of property to be seized.

The constitutional requirement that no search warrant shall issue but on complaint, describing as nearly as may be the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized, is satisfied by a description not necessarily particular or precise, but varying according to the nature of the thing to be described. State ex rel. Potter v. Snow (1854) 3 R. I. 64.

It is not necessary to state with mathematical accuracy the character or quantity of the article to be seized, inasmuch as the only description which it is possible to give in such cases must be a somewhat general one. Re Horgan (1889) 16 R. I. 542, 18 Atl. 279.

The purpose of the constitutional requirement that the thing to be seized shall be described "as near as may be" being only to put proper restrictions upon the power to be given by the process, no very precise or technically accurate description is required. Dupree v. State (1909) 102 Tex. 455, 119 S. W. 301.

The constitutional provision that "no warrant shall issue except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized," does not necessarily require a minute and detailed description of the place to be searched or the property to be seized, but merely requires that such place be designated with sufficient accuracy to prevent the officer from searching the premises of one person under a warrant directed against those of another, while the description of the property to be seized will vary according to whether the identity of the property, or its character, is the matter of concern. "Thus, where the purpose of the search is to find specific property, it should be so particularly described as to preclude the possibility of seizing any other. On the other hand, if the purpose be to seize not specified property, but any property of a specified character which, by reason of its character, and of the place where and the circumstances under which it may be found, if found at all, would be illicit, a description, save as to such character, place and circumstances, would be unnecessary, and ordinarily impossible." State v. Nejin (1917) 140 La. 793, 74 So. 103.

In Lincoln v. Smith (1855) 27 Vt. 328, it is held that a description of the property as "intoxicating liquor" satisfies the constitutional requirement that it shall be described "as nearly as may be."

The principle and spirit of the constitutional provision that "every subject has a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of his person, his houses, his papers, and all his possessions. All warrants, therefore, are contrary to this right, if the foundation of them be not previously supported by oath or affirmation; and if the order in the warrant to a civil officer to make search in suspected places, or to arrest one or more suspected persons, or to seize their property, be not accompanied with a special designation of the persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure,"—are violated by a statute providing for the search and seizure of intoxicating liquors, which does not require the persons who are to make complaint to state that they have reason to believe and do believe that intoxicating liquors are kept or deposited and intended for sale by any person named, or require the magistrate to state in the warrant the name of any person believed to be the owner or keeper of such liquors, or the name of any person having the custody or possession thereof, or of any person having the intention to sell the same, and which does not limit the officer's authority and right of seizure to the articles described in the complaint, nor to those intended for sale, but directs them to seize any liquor found in the place described in the complaint. Fischer v. McGirr (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381.

A statute which requires neither the giving of the name nor the description of the owner, keeper, or possessor of the liquor, nor any description of the liquor itself, other than that it is intoxicating liquor intended for sale in violation of law, and which authorizes and requires, upon an affidavit merely that intoxicating liquors are being sold, or kept for sale, in a described place, in violation of law, a warrant to issue, under which it shall be the duty of the officer to seize all intoxicating liquors found in that or any other place where the affiant believes them to be kept or secreted, and which, therefore, virtually authorizes the issuance of a general warrant for the seizure of intoxicating liquors wherever found, and for whatever purpose kept, violates the constitutional requirement that the thing to be seized shall be described "as near as may be." Dupree v. State (1909) 102 Tex. 455, 119 S. W. 301.

The court in the foregoing case goes on to explain that it does not mean to hold that it is not in the power of the legislature to provide that seizures may be made of liquors unlawfully kept, in a proceeding in rem, without naming therein any person as owner or keeper, but that the reference made by them to the absence of the name or description of the owner or keeper of the liquor was for the purpose of demonstrating the absence of description, and of everything by which the writ might be limited to liquors properly seizable under it.

g. Time for execution of warrant.

The constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizures is violated where the search warrant is not executed within a reasonable time; and what is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court to determine in each case, according to its circumstances. An unexplained delay of three days in the execution of such a warrant may be unreasonable. State v. Guthrie (1897) 90 Me. 448, 38 Atl. 363.

But in Farmer v. Sellers (1911) 89 S. C. 492, 72 S. E. 224, it was held that the question whether the search warrant has been executed with reasonable promptness is for the jury, and that a delay of forty-eight days in serving, could not be said, as a matter of law, to be so unreasonable as to destroy the force of the warrant.

h. Manner of executing warrant.

In Buckley v. Beaulieu (1908) 104 Me. 56, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 819, 71 Atl. 70, it is said that whether the conduct of the officer making the search was reasonable or unreasonable must be determined by all the circumstances of the case. "No definite line can be drawn. The division is rather by a zone within which reasoning men might reasonably differ, but outside of which there would be a general concurrence of reasoning, thinking men. The general principle, however, is that while the officer should search thoroughly in every part of the described premises, where there is any likelihood that the object searched for may be found, they should also be considerate of the comfort and convenience of the occupants, should mar the premises themselves as little as possible, and should carefully replace, so far as practicable, anything they find it necessary to remove."

The constitutional right of a property owner against unreasonable searches is violated by officers who, in the execution of a warrant to search for liquor alleged to be illegally kept upon the premises, remove the laths and plastering for a space 2 to 4 feet wide around all the rooms of the lower floor of his dwelling, and then leave the owner to restore the house to a habitable condition, where the object of the search could have been attained by the use of some slender probe, with comparatively little injury. Ibid.

—re-entry upon premises after executing warrant.

The constitutional guaranty against unreasonable searches and seizures is violated where an officer, who has made an arrest for a violation of the Intoxicating Liquor Laws, after executing a warrant of arrest, though before its return, re-enters upon the premises to remove therefrom, to be used as evidence, liquors inadvertently left on the premises by him at the time of making the arrest. Gamble v. Keyes (1915) 35 S. D. 644, 153 N. W. 888.

IV. Miscellaneous.

A constitutional provision that all warrants to search suspected places or arrest a person for examination or trial, in prosecutions for criminal matters, are contrary to the right to be secured from all unreasonable searches and seizures if the cause or foundation of them be not previously supported by oath or affirmation, requires the warrant which authorizes a search for and seizure of liquor, for the purpose of forfeiting it, to be founded on a complaint charging that the liquor is kept for sale in violation of law. State v. Spirituous Liquors (1894) 68 N. H. 47, 40 Atl. 398.

A search and seizure cannot be deemed reasonable where nothing further appears than that the person whose premises are searched has liquor in his possession, although it is within the power of the legislature to declare the possession of intoxicating liquor for the purpose of sale as quasi a nuisance, and to enact that such possession shall be prima facie evidence of unlawful intent. Sullivan v. Oneida (1871) 61 Ill. 242.

The provisions of the Constitution guaranteeing citizens against unreasonable searches and seizures are not violated by the Alabama Prohibition Law, Special Act 1909, pages 70-74, authorizing a writ of seizure to abate the nuisances declared by the act. Fitzpatrick v. State (1910) 169 Ala. 1, 53 So. 1021; Jones v. State (1912) 4 Ala. App. 159, 58 So. 1011.

In State v. Miller (1859) 48 Me. 576, the provisions of a statute which do not appear in the report of the case, authorizing the seizure of intoxicating liquors upon warrants duly issued therefor, were held not to be in conflict with the Constitution.

The question whether a constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizures was violated by a municipal ordinance prohibiting the keeping of intoxicating liquors, the terms of which do not appear in the report, was somewhat discussed in Bessemer v. Eidge (1909) 162 Ala. 201, 50 So. 270; but in view of the grounds upon which the various members of the court put their decision, it cannot be said to have been definitely passed upon.

A statute authorizing an attachment of the goods and chattels of the defendant in an action to recover a penalty for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors does not violate the constitutional provision against unreasonable search or seizure, there being in such case no search or seizure within the meaning of such provision. State v. Marshall (1911) 100 Miss. 626, 56 So. 792, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 434.

Statute requiring person found intoxicated to disclose where liquor was obtained.

A constitutional declaration "that the people have a right to hold themselves, their houses, papers and possessions, free from search or seizure; and therefore warrants, without oath or affirmation first made, affording sufficient foundation for them, whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search suspected places, or seize any person or persons, his, her or their property, not particularly described, are contrary to that right and ought not to be granted," is directed against general warrants, and general search war-ants in particular, not specifically describing the persons, places, or property to be searched or arrested, and has no reference to a statute providing for the apprehension of any person found in such a state of intoxication as to disturb the public or domestic tranquillity and his detention until he shall disclose the place where, and the person of whom, the liquor so producing intoxication was obtained, and that, on his refusal or neglect to do so, he may be committed to jail, until he shall make such disclosure, or be discharged by the justice before whom he was examined. Re Powers. (1853) 25 Vt. 261.

E. S. O.

P. C. JENKINS, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961.)

Evidence — other crime — identity.

1. Upon trial of persons for injury to a person in consequence of a conspiracy, evidence is admissible of similar occurrences in the locality about the same time at which accused are shown to have been present, in connection with evidence of an organization of accused and others for the purpose of committing such outrages, as tending to show accused were members of the organization, and thus aiding in identifying them as responsible for the injury inflicted in the instant case.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1540.]

Appeal — motion to set aside indictment.

2. Where by statute the action of the trial court upon motion to set aside an indictment is not subject to exception such questions cannot be reviewed on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 211.]

Jury — grand — excusing members of panel.

3. The court may, in selecting members for a grand jury, excuse those who have been or will be intimidated by threats of an organization against members of which an indictment is sought.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1018.]

Venue — change — right of state — joint indictment.

4. A change of venue may be had by the state as to part of those jointly indicted for a felony, if the state had a right to separate trials of the several defendants.

Criminal law — joint indictment — separate trials.

5. The state may at its election try separately parties jointly indicted for a felony.

[See 8 R. C. L. 167.]

Venue — change — discretion.

6. A court does not abuse its discretion in removing to another county for trial an indictment against a member of a secret organization whose operations have terrorized the community in which they were carried on and where the indictment was found.

[See 2 R. C. L. 214.]

Criminal law — trial on copy of indictment — change of venue.

7. The statutory provision for trial upon a copy of the indictment in case some of several jointly indicted secure a change of venue to another county may be followed in case the change is secured by the state, although change by the state is not directly provided for by the statute.

Continuance — denial — abuse of discretion.

8. There is no abuse of discretion in overruling a motion for continuance on the ground of surprise upon the introduction by the state of evidence as to another crime than that for which accused is on trial, which is based merely upon the affidavit of accused stating that he can show an alibi, which mentions the name of no witness so that it cannot be read as the deposition of a witness.

Statute — construction — conspiracy to injure — punishment.

9. An injury to person as well as injury to property is embraced within a statute providing imprisonment of from one to fifteen years in case injury to the person or property results from unlawful acts designated by the "preceding sections" of the act, and the section immediately preceding relates to conspiracy to injure property alone if the second preceding section relates to conspiracy to injure the person, and all three sections are part of the same act.

Conspiracy — failure to indict some conspirators — effect.

10. That all those engaged in a conspiracy to injure were not known to the grand jury, and that some of them were therefore not indicted, does not prevent conviction of those members of the conspiracy who were known, even though they are shown to have conspired with persons not indicted.

— punishment of persons not present.

11. The legislature may provide that all participating in a conspiracy which results in injury to a person shall be punished, although some of the conspirators were not present at the time of the injury.

[See 5 R. C. L. 1063, 1067.]

Evidence — identity — relaxing rules.

12. Where the sole issue in a case is as to the identity of the accused, the evidence on that issue by the state may properly be permitted to take a wide range, and in a measure the rigid rules of evidence will be relaxed.

[See 8 R. C. L. 188 et seq., 201.]

— conspiracy — scope of evidence.

13. Great latitude must be given the state in the production of its evidence in proof of a criminal conspiracy.

[See 5 R. C. L. 1087.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County convicting him of conspiring with others to injure certain persons. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. T. W. Thomas, R. C. P. Thomas, W. A. Helm, and W. R. Gardner for appellant.

Messrs. James Garnett, Attorney General, Robert T. Caldwell, Assistant Attorney General, and John H. Giliam for the Commonwealth.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the February term, 1915, of the Butler circuit court the following indictment was returned, to wit: "The grand jury of the county of Butler in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky accuse Silas Gardner, J. A. Gardner, Dock Gardner, Bunk Haws, Marion Drake, Andrew

Drake, Ben John Penrod, P. C. Jenkins, J. E. Mayhugh, Harry Grubb, Doss Peay, Joseph Drake, and Elzie Pendley of the offense of unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously banding and confederating themselves together for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, disturbing, and injuring another, and did injure and wound said others, to wit, Katherine Webster, Louella Webster, and Estil Webster, and the said defendants herein mentioned, and others whose names are to the grand jury unknown, did go forth in the nighttime with guns and other weapons for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, disturbing, and injuring and whipping said Katherine, Louella, and Estil Webster, and did in the nighttime, as aforesaid, go to the house of James Webster and seize and lay hold of said James, Katherine, Louella, and Estil Webster, and did take them from their house and from their beds, and tie them to a tree, and with blindfolds over their eyes and ropes around their necks did beat, bruise, stripe, whelp and injure, intimidate and scare, said parties, and defendants being armed and having weapons drawn upon said parties at said time."

At the same term of the court the commonwealth's attorney filed his statement, as provided by statute, and entered his motion to change the venue of the action, but before it was acted upon withdrew the same, except as to P. C. Jenkins and Marion Drake. The court, from evidence heard and personal knowledge, as recited in the order, granted a change of venue upon the ground that there was such a state of lawlessness and such a prevalent bias for and against the charge in the indictment in Butler county that a fair and impartial trial could not be had therein, and the case was, as to Jenkins and Drake, removed to the Warren circuit court for trial. The court directed the clerk to copy the indictment, orders, motions, notices, etc., and to make a complete transcript of the record, and directed that the same be delivered to the clerk of the Warren circuit court, all of which was done. At the April term of the Warren circuit court the defendants entered a motion to quash the indictment because the names of the grand jurors drawn from the jury wheel in the Butler circuit court, and which had been furnished by the clerk to the sheriff in a list showing the order in which they were drawn, had not been called by the sheriff in the order their names came on the list, but that the sheriff, instead of so calling the jurors' names, in violation of law selected twelve names out of the said list without regard to their order thereon, and it was done for the purpose of securing a jury that would indict the defendants. This motion was overruled by the court, and the order overruling it shows that the sheriff in calling the names from the list in the manner set out had acted under the direction of the court. Appellant Jenkins, being put on his separate trial, was found guilty, and the verdict fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than four years nor more than four years and one day. His motion for a new trial having been overruled, he has appealed.

The evidence for the commonwealth is that on the 22d of August, 1914, at Union Chapel in Butler county, there was a meeting to which numerous men in the neighborhood had been invited, and at which there appeared a man named Clark, claiming to be the representative of a secret order known as the Amalgamated Workers of the World, and claiming to be the organizer of local lodges of that order. He made a speech to those present, giving the name of the order, but saying they were sometimes called "Possum Hunters." That among other objects of the order was that its members should stand by and help each other, and if any of them got into court they were to aid each other, and that if any of their members got on the jury when a member was being tried, he was to hang the jury or clear him. After this, and possibly other speeches, appellant Jenkins, assuming to act with authority, directed that a line be drawn on the floor, and all of those who desired to join were to cross on one side of the line, and that after this division was made those who did not join were directed to "go home and hold their tongues." That shortly after this organization of the local lodge at Union Chapel there were certain night raids in various parts of the county, at which persons were whipped, beat, and bruised by bodies of masked men. On the 27th or 28th of October, at some time during the night, a body of masked men went to the home of James Webster, broke the doors open, seized James Webster, Katherine Webster, his wife, a woman of sixty-five years of age, Louella Webster, and Estil Webster. They took them about 300 yards from the house, and after first tying the aged woman to a tree with her arms around the tree and her face towards it, lifted her clothes above her head, and with a leather strap whipped her unmercifully on her naked body. They then duplicated this proceeding with the younger woman, Louella Webster, and finally placing a rope around the neck of Estil Webster, drew him up and let him down at least twice, and finally compelled him to falsely state to them that two men named Bradley were the persons who had shot into the raiders, and after that proceeded to give him an unmerciful whipping on his bare body. The masked men had firearms and flashlights, and not only whipped both of the women, as stated, but put ropes around their necks, cursed them, and otherwise terrorized them. While they did not offer personal violence to the old man, he was taken from the house and forced to witness the fiendish punishment administered to his aged wife, his daughter, and his son.

Each of the Websters positively identifies appellant as one of the party, and each of them testified to recognizing at the time different ones who were jointly indicted with Jenkins. They also stated that Jenkins seemed to be the leader of the party and gave all orders; that the members of the party said to the wife of Estil Webster that they were her friends, and that she need not be afraid, and gave as a reason for their treatment of the other Websters that they had been guilty of some mistreatment of Estil Webster's wife, and warned them thereafter to treat her as a lady.

There is also evidence to the effect that about the time these outrages were being perpetrated in Butler county Jenkins, in conversation with at least two persons, while denying that he was a member of the organization known as "Possum Hunters," professed to give what he understood to be their mode of procedure in dealing with persons who had, for any reasons, incurred the displeasure of the order. He stated that he was informed that they would summon a jury and witnesses in the order and try the case, and if the parties needed "attending to," they went and attended to them, and if not, they let them alone. On the trial of this case, however, Jenkins admitted on the witness stand that he was not only a member of the local chapter of this order, but was its president or leader.

Conditions became so bad in the latter part of 1914 that it was generally rumored that an extra session of the grand jury was contemplated for the purpose of investigating these raids, and, as the record discloses, a special term of the court was actually called, but later called off. About that time appellant manifested great interest in the proposed special term of court, and, it may be inferred from circumstances in the record, went to the county seat to find out what he could about the same. Knowing the county court clerk, Moats, he went to see him, and in discussing this proposed special term of the court, among other things, said to Moats, as shown by the latter's testimony:

He told me that it wouldn't do for it to be called, and said if it was called it might be that 300 or 400 men might come in there and sweep the town off the map, and if the judge and commonwealth's attorney did come, it might make them swim the river backwards home, and he went ahead to tell about the organization, that they had the very best of guns that would shine like electric lights, and was talking about the order; said the Masons and Odd Fellows was nothing to compare with the Possum Hunters, and that the organization was for the good of the community, and before the organization existed he told about how it was around Huntsville, that the boys would stay out in the yard, and after this occurred there was no laughing out in the yard, that even the chickens were afraid to crow, the cows were afraid to low, and the cats were afraid to mew after the sun would go down.

Q. Anything else?

A. He asked me the question, he said: "Say they got them up and convicted them, what are they going to do with them? The jails won't hold them and the penitentiaries won't hold them; they are about 80 per cent strong over the state."

This witness, upon being recalled by the commonwealth and asked, if he had omitted in his former testimony anything which Jenkins had said, to state it, answered:

A. Yes, sir. I remember one thing very distinctly that I omitted. In his conversation, referring to the bravery of them, he said they didn't no more care for being shot into than a brick wall; that they demonstrated that fact down at Webster's; to be shot into on the road didn't frighten them a bit; that they went right on and got their possum, and dressed it up right nice, and went on about their business.

The evidence in the whole case revolves around the organization of this order, the purpose of its organization, and the connection of Jenkins with it, and although the indictment in this case only charges a conspiracy against the Websters, yet an investigation of that charge inevitably involves reference to similar outrages perpetrated in the county about the same time. Under these circumstances the trial court permitted the commonwealth to prove other similar happenings in the county prior to and about the time of the whipping of the Websters, and in one instance to prove a whipping which occurred about nine or ten days thereafter, and was permitted to show that upon some of these occasions appellant was present and acting in the capacity of a leader.

It is not denied that the Websters were whipped, and it is admitted that appellant was not only a member of, but the local leader of, this organization.

Six grounds for reversal are relied upon, to wit: (1) That the grand jury was improperly selected, and that appellant's motion to quash the indictment for that reason should have been sustained. (2) That the court erred in granting a change of venue as to a part only of the defendants jointly indicted. (3) That the trial was held and conviction had only on a copy of the indictment. (4) That after the admission of evidence as to other offenses the court should have sustained appellant's motion to discharge the jury and continue the case. (5) The instructions were erroneous: (1) Because they authorized the infliction of a greater penalty than was authorized by law; and (2) because they authorized a conviction if appellant had formed a conspiracy with others than those named in the indictment; (3) and because they authorized a conviction even though appellant was not in fact present at the whipping of the Websters. (6) Because the evidence as to raids other than the Webster raid was incompetent.

Upon the first question little need be said, as it is expressly provided in § 281 of the Criminal Code that the action of the trial judge upon motion to set aside an indictment shall not be subject to exception, and it has often been held by this court that such questions cannot be reviewed by it. Com. v. Goulet, 140 Ky. 843, 132 S. W. 151; Com. v. Simons, 100 Ky. 164, 37 S. W. 949.

It is proper, however, to say in this connection, in justice to the trial judge, that he explains, in an opinion handed down by him on the motion for a new trial, that in directing the sheriff not to call certain persons as grand jurors he was acting upon information that those persons had been or would be intimidated because of fear of the "Possum Hunters" organization, and that some of them had indicated to him that they were afraid to serve as grand jurors.

Whether the commonwealth may ask for, or the court grant, a change of venue as to a part only of the defendants who are jointly indicted for a felony, has not, so far as we are aware, been passed upon in this state. In this case the change of venue was originally asked for by the attorney for the commonwealth as to all of the defendants, but before the motion was passed upon it was withdrawn as to all of them except appellant and one other, so that when the court acted there was no motion for a change of venue except as to the two. From the nature of the question it would seem to depend upon whether or not the commonwealth, as a matter of right, might have a severance and demand separate trials of the several jointly indicted defendants, for, if this right existed upon the part of the commonwealth, it could not possibly matter to any of the other defendants whether the change of venue was granted to a specific one; while, on the other hand, if the commonwealth had no such right, and the defendants, as a matter of right, might demand that they all be tried together, it was necessarily beyond the power of the court to compel them to be tried separately by transferring the case as to a part of them to another court.

Under § 237 of the Criminal Code, any defendant who may be jointly indicted with another, or others, for a felony, is granted a right to a separate trial, but nothing is said in that section about the right of the commonwealth to a separate trial of such indictments. Under the common law, however, a defendant had no such right, and the section of the Criminal Code referred to changed the common-law rule in so far as it applied to such defendant, but did not undertake to change or alter the common-law right of the commonwealth in the premises. That is to say, the right of the commonwealth to a separate trial of persons jointly indicted for a felony must still be controlled by the common law. In the case of Hoffman v. Com. 134 Ky. 726, 121 S. W. 690, this question was fully gone into, and it was held that at common law the commonwealth, in case of joint indictments, had a right of election, subject to the discretion of the court, whether to try persons jointly indicted for a felony separately or jointly, and that the provisions of § 237 of the Criminal Code had not abrogated or altered this right. The commonwealth, therefore, having this right of severance, the whole question reverts to the proposition whether the court, in changing the venue of appellant's case to Warren county, abused its discretion; for when it removed the case to Warren as to part of the defendants, it necessarily exercised its discretion upon the question whether there should have been a severance, for of course, if the case was in one court as to part of the defendants and in another court as to another part, there must necessarily be separate trials.

There is no claim in this case that the court abused its discretion in the ordinary sense in removing this case as to appellant to Warren county, and if there had been such contention, the facts of the case, already detailed, would be conclusive, not only that the court had not abused its discretion, but that he would have been grossly derelict in his duty if he had not done so.

Section 1115, Ky. Stat. provides that when there is a change of venue and a prosecution is removed to another county, the clerk of the court shall transmit the original papers, together with a transcript of the orders pertaining thereto, to the clerk of the court to which the removal is ordered, and from this it is argued by appellant that he was entitled to a trial in the Warren circuit court on the original indictment, and not on a copy of it. From the language of the section referred to it is apparent that it does not contemplate that two prosecutions under the same indictment may be pending at one and the same time and in different courts, as was the case here; but the very next section of the statute (§ 1116) provides that where one, or some only, of several defendants charged in the same indictment, be granted a change of venue, the original indictment shall be retained and a certified copy sent, which shall serve in lieu of the original. It is true that the last-named section seems to refer to cases only wherein change of venue is granted upon the application of defendants who are jointly indicted with others, and does not prescribe the same mode of procedure when such change of venue may be granted upon the motion of the commonwealth. But in any event the last-named section points out a common-sense mode of procedure for the commonwealth in such circumstances, and that method has been strictly followed in this case. There is no pretense or suggestion that the copy of the indictment under which appellant was tried was not in every respect a true and correct copy of the original, and in no event could his substantial rights have been affected.

After the introduction by the commonwealth of certain evidence about other raids in that county, and particularly after the admission of the evidence as to the whipping of one Jim Ray, which occurred after the whipping of the Websters, the appellant filed his affidavit and entered a motion to set aside the swearing of the jury and to continue the case on the ground of surprise. The affidavit states, in substance, that the evidence showing that he had been connected with and was present at the whipping of Ray was a surprise to him, and that he had been advised by his attorneys that such evidence would not be competent on his trial in this case, and that, if given an opportunity, he could show by divers persons, without naming them, that he was not present and did not participate in the whipping of Ray. His affidavit did not show, however, where he was at the time Ray was whipped, or the name of any witness by whom he could show his whereabouts, but merely stated in a general way that, if given an opportunity, he could establish a complete and satisfactory alibi. Manifestly, this affidavit could not be, in any event, read as the deposition of any witness, for the name of no witness was mentioned in it, and the court, under these circumstances, did not abuse its discretion in overruling the motion for a continuance, and particularly when it is considered that this evidence did not bear directly upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant on the charge involved, but had been admitted by the court only for the purpose of showing that appellant was a member of the organization known as "Possum Hunters."

The instructions in this case authorized the jury to inflict a penalty of not less than one nor more than fifteen years' confinement in the penitentiary if they found the defendant guilty, and it is the contention of the appellant that this is unauthorized by the statutes, and that the penalty fixed by the statute for this crime is not less than one nor more than five years. This contention involves an interpretation of § 1241a, Carroll's Stat. (Ky.) 1915, dealing with the offense of criminal conspiracy, and the three subsections of that statute. In so far as they relate to this question, they are as follows:

"1. If any two or more persons shall confederate or band themselves together for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, disturbing or injuring any person or persons, or to rescue any person or persons charged with a public offense from any officer or other person having the lawful custody of any such person or persons with the view of inflicting any kind of punishment on them, or with the view of preventing their lawful prosecution for any such offense or to do any felonious act, they, or either of them, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.

"2. If any two or more persons shall confederate or band together and go forth, for the purpose of molesting, injuring or destroying any property, real or personal, of another person, persons or corporation, whether the same be injured, molested or damaged or not, they shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.

"3. If any injury shall result to the person or property of any person or persons, by reason of any unlawful acts denounced in the preceding section of this act, the person or persons engaged or participating, or any one of them, or anyone aiding or abetting such unlawful act, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be confined in the state penitentiary not less than one nor more than fifteen years, unless death should result, in which case the penalty for such offense shall be as now prescribed by law."

Subsection 1 of the statute quoted relates wholly to offenses against the person, and subsection 2 deals only with offenses against property, and the two offenses were evidently described and denounced by different subsections because it was intended to make a conspiracy to injure the person a complete offense without a "going forth," while it is an essential element, where the injury of property only is the object of the conspiracy, there should be a "going forth." Subsection 3 then provides that, when there actually results injury either to the person or property of any person or persons by reason of the conspiracy denounced in the preceding section, the penalty shall be not less than one nor more than fifteen years, it evidently being the purpose of the legislature to raise the maximum of five years to a maximum of fifteen years where there is actually injury to person or property. Appellant's whole argument on this point is that the use of the singular "preceding section" in subsection 3 refers only to conspiracies to injure property, and does not embrace conspiracies to injure the person denounced by subsection 1. To adopt this construction would be to say that the legislature had done an absurd thing; that is to say, that it had fixed a maximum punishment of five years for entering into a conspiracy to injure the person, and executing that conspiracy, and at the same time and in the same act had authorized the infliction of a maximum punishment of fifteen years for entering into a conspiracy to injure property only, and executing that conspiracy. We entertain no doubt that it was the legislative purpose in subsection 3 to embrace in its provisions the conspiracies denounced by both subsection 1 and subsection 2, and to provide that, when either injury to the person or property should result from such conspiracies, the maximum penalty should be fifteen years. If the contemplation of appellant was correct, there would have been in subsection 3 no reference whatsoever to an injury "to the person," and the very context of that subsection is inconsistent with any other interpretation than that the words "preceding section" were intended to be "preceding sections."

Statute—construction—conspiracy to injure—punishment.

A further objection to the instructions is that they authorized a conviction if appellant had entered into a conspiracy with others than those jointly indicted with him to injure the Websters. It is quite true that the indictment only charges that the persons named therein entered into the conspiracy, but it does charge that the defendants named, and others whose names are unknown, did go forth in the nighttime armed for the purpose of carrying out the conspiracy. The instructions, however, did authorize a conviction if the defendant Jenkins and the other named defendants, or any of them, or other person or persons, banded and confederated themselves together. The evidence of the Websters disclosed that a large number of other persons were present, besides the named defendants, who were not recognized; but one of the Websters did claim to have recognized one man as a member of the party who was not named in the indictment, to wit, Hal Brown. There is no contention that there was not evidence of conspiracy between Jenkins and some of the others named in the indictment, but only that the instructions authorized the conviction of Jenkins if he was in a conspiracy with any others than those named in the indictment. The fact, however, that all the conspirators were not known to the grand jury, but only part of them, and that only those named were charged with the conspiracy, does not prevent the conviction of those so charged. From the evidence it might well have been found that the indictment did not embrace all of the conspirators, but it was amply sufficient to sustain the charge of conspiracy against those who were charged. If an indictment charges a conspiracy by two or more persons, naming them, and the evidence discloses there were others in the conspiracy, those charged may be convicted just as if all the conspirators had been charged.

Conspiracy—failure to indict some conspirators—effect.

It may be admitted in this case that the instructions did not closely follow the charge in the indictment, but the evidence of conspiracy between those who were charged is so convincing and the motive is so clearly shown,—Jenkins being the leader of the Possum Hunters, and Silas Gardner being the father of the wife of Estil Webster, who was supposed to have been mistreated by the Websters,—it is so perfectly apparent that the jury found the conspiracy to exist between those charged, that the error could not have been prejudicial.

It is suggested in appellant's brief, but not urged, that the second instruction is erroneous because it authorized the conviction of appellant even though he was not present in person when the whipping was executed. The very language of subsection 3, quoted above, authorizes such an instruction. It contemplates, from its very language, that <sup>—punishment of person not present.</sup> if any injury shall result to the person or property from the original conspiracy, even though part of the original conspirators may not be present when it is carried out, they shall be guilty under its terms.

And, finally, we have the question as to the admissibility of the evidence of similar raids occurring in that locality at about the same time, all, except one of them, before the Webster whipping. The commonwealth first showed the organization of this order at Union Chapel on the 22d of August, 1914, and showed that appellant was a member of that order. It then showed, to some extent, the nature and purpose of that organization. It also showed that shortly after its organization bodies of armed and masked men began to commit in that locality outrages similar to the Webster whipping. It showed that the members of this organization met in the nighttime at isolated places; it showed their mode of procedure upon these occasions by the statements of appellant himself. It unmistakably showed by many facts and circumstances that all of these occurrences were traceable to this organization. It showed by the evidence of the four Websters that appellant and several of those mentioned in the indictment as co-conspirators were present at the house of James Webster and participated in the whipping. It was after the introduction of all this evidence that the commonwealth, evidently anticipating an effort to prove an alibi, the customary defense in such cases, was permitted to show that other and similar occurrences had taken place in that locality, and that, at least in two instances, appellant was present and participated in those occurrences, and that upon other occasions when similar things happened appellant was recognized late at night with bodies of armed men going toward or coming from the direction where the whipping occurred. Upon each occasion, when such evidence was admitted, and the defendant was shown to have participated in them or to have been present, or to have been seen on the road, the jury was admonished that the evidence was admitted only for the purpose of showing that appellant was a member of this organization, and was not admitted to show his guilt or innocence of the whipping of the Websters. Not only did the court take this precaution at all times during the trial, but in its written instructions to the jury it reiterated the same. In such cases of organized outlawry usually the most carefully planned arrangements are made in advance, either to hide or destroy all evidence of guilt. The parties wear masks, turn their clothes inside out, as in this case, and adopt what they conceive to be the surest method of concealing their identity. Not only so, but experience has taught that in such cases it has almost grown to be a custom that a carefully considered and arranged alibi, prepared in advance, is ready for any occasion. It was under these circumstances and under these conditions that the court, in a case where the only issue was as to the identity of the appellant, permitted evidence to go to the jury as to other crimes of a similar nature, committed about the same time, in the same locality, and in practically the same way, solely upon the issue of identity. The evidence was admitted solely for the purpose of fixing with greater certainty the identity of these disguised outlaws, by showing their membership in and connection with this unlawful organization, the similarity of their mode of procedure in other raids about the same time; and it may well be doubted that, but for the admission of such evidence, in the light of these carefully considered and prepared-in-advance alibis, a conviction could ever be had in such cases.

Where the sole issue in a case is as to the identity of the accused, the evidence on that issue by the commonwealth may be properly permitted to take a wide range, and in a measure the rigid rules of evidence will be relaxed. The case of Morse v. Com. 129 Ky. 294, 111 S. W. 714, was where the defendant had sold warehouse receipts for whisky, and had embezzled the proceeds. It was conceded that the sale had taken place, and that the proceeds had not been accounted for, the only defense being that another, and not the defendant, had committed the crime, as in this case. In that case it was held proper to admit evidence of similar transactions by the defendant with other persons, under a name which he had assumed, in order to identify him as the man who had sold the receipts for which he was being tried. The court in that case said: "When the defense of a person is that it was not himself, but another, who committed the crime, the evidence in behalf of the commonwealth may be permitted to take a wide range for the purpose of developing the past life and history of the accused and the names he has crime—identity.

—identity—
relaxing rules.

assumed, to the end that he may be identified under those assumed names as the person who committed the offense under investigation; but if, in the course of the evidence brought out in the elucidation of these facts, it should appear that the accused had been guilty of some other offense, the court should, at the time, admonish the jury that they should not consider evidence of other offenses as even tending to show his guilt of the crime for which he was being tried, but that it was only competent for the purpose of establishing the identity of the accused and to illustrate that at different times he had assumed various names."

From the nature of the crime itself it is difficult to prove a criminal conspiracy by direct evidence, and such conspiracies are most always proved by circumstantial and "piecemeal" evidence; and in consideration of this fact, in such cases great latitude must, of necessity, be given the commonwealth in the production of its evidence. Cyc. vol. 8, p. 678, in discussing the admission of evidence in cases of conspiracy, says: "In the reception of circumstantial evidence great latitude must be allowed. The jury should have before them every fact which will enable them to come to a satisfactory conclusion. And it is no objection that the evidence covers a great many transactions and extends over a long period of time, provided, however, that the facts shown have some bearing upon, and tendency to prove, the ultimate fact at issue. But much discretion is left to the trial court, in a case depending on circumstantial evidence, and its ruling will be sustained if the testimony which is admitted tends even remotely to establish the ultimate fact."

And again, the same work, under the same head, at page 684, in dealing with the introduction of evidence in conspiracy cases, says: "Where the guilt of a party depends upon the intent, purpose, or design with which an act is done, or upon his guilty knowledge thereof, collateral facts in which he bore a principal part may be examined into for the purpose of establishing such guilty intent, design, purpose, or knowledge. It is sufficient that such collateral facts have some connection with each other as a part of the same plan or as induced by the same motive, and it is immaterial that they show the commission of other crimes. The evidence in a conspiracy is wider than perhaps in any other case. Taken by themselves, the acts of a conspiracy are rarely of an unequivocally guilty character, and they can only be properly estimated when connected with all the surrounding circumstances."

We are not unmindful of the wisdom of the general rule that evidence of one crime is not admissible to prove another, but we are of opinion that under the circumstances of this case, where the only issue was one of identity, the evidence was admissible with the proper admonition by the court. The enormity of the crime is to be considered from more than one aspect. Not only does the inhuman, cruel, heartless beating of this old woman 65 years of age—to say nothing of the younger woman and man—merit even a severer punishment than the maximum fixed by the statutes; but when we contemplate this organized effort to supplant the courts in the administration of justice, this defiance of the established order of things, this substitution of mob rule for government by law, these farcical secret trials, had in the absence of the intended victim, these bold efforts to intimidate public officials, the case becomes one of all-absorbing public interest, and raises the question whether there is in fact a government by law in this state.

If we are to return to a state of savagery in which men are deterred from indulging their vicious tendencies only by a fear of the hereafter, then, and not until then, will such brutal organizations be permitted to defy organized society; then, and not until then, will we be compelled to admit that our whole social fabric is builded upon sand and must sink. But as long as we have honest, faithful, and fearless public officials such as brought appellant to the bar of justice in the face of great difficulties, and even personal danger to themselves, we may confidently indulge the hope that this cancerous growth upon the body politic will be speedily and permanently eradicated, and that this organized mob will soon realize that the law is yet supreme in Kentucky.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The decision in the reported case (JENKINS v. COM. ante, 1522), that the evidence of other similar crimes was admissible for the purpose of identifying defendants as the persons who committed the offense under prosecution is an application of a well-established exception to the general rule against the admissibility of evidence of other offenses. This exception is the subject of the annotation beginning at page 1540, under the title, "Admissibility of evidence of other offenses in criminal prosecution to prove identity of defendant."

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals — January 16, 1918.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 200 S. W. 167.)

Evidence — other crime — identity.

1. Upon the question of identity of a robber, evidence of another robbery on the same night with nothing to connect the two transactions is not admissible merely because there was some similarity in the appearance of the robbers in both cases.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Milam County convicting him of robbery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. H. Evetts and Chambers & Wallace, for appellant:

The testimony of the witnesses Harris and Smith did not show or tend to show that the persons who robbed them were the same persons who committed the robbery charged in the indictment, and no other evidence establishing or tending to establish such fact was offered; hence the testimony of said witnesses was inadmissible.

Mr. E. B. Hendricks, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of robbery, his punishment being assessed at six years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The state's case, in brief, is that appellant and another party, in the town of Cameron, Milam county, committed robbery upon the person of Dave Watson. It was at night near the Santa Fe depot. The two parties who, the witnesses testify, committed the robbery upon them, were identified by such facts and circumstances and descriptions as the two parties could give, they all being strangers to each other. From one of the parties was taken some money and a pocket knife, described in a particular way. Later on, and during the same night, the appellant and his companion were arrested, and on the person of appellant was found a knife which was identified by one of the parties who claimed to have been robbed near the Santa Fe depot. It is unnecessary to go into a detailed statement of these two witnesses. They gave as accurate description as perhaps they could have done under the circumstances, of the two parties they claimed to have held them up. Later during the same evening, between the time of the alleged robbery at the Santa Fe depot and their arrest, two other parties were introduced as witnesses, claiming also to have been held up by two men and robbed. This was something like a half hour after the first alleged robbery. This evidence was introduced over the objection of appellant, as being an independent offense and in no way connected with the first alleged robbery. Various objections were urged and overruled, and after the testimony had been introduced appellant again urged by a written charge that the testimony be withdrawn from the jury. It is unnecessary to take up these different grounds of objection and reasons assigned. The court seems to have admitted it upon the theory of identity. We are of opinion that the evidence was not introducible upon such theory under the facts of the case. The two robberies were in no way connected with each other, and the fact the second robbery occurred did not serve to identify these parties as the parties who committed the first robbery. There was no fact or circumstance which undertook to connect the two transactions, except the fact that they occurred on the same night, and that there was evidence showing some similarity in the appearance of the two robbers in both cases. This did not serve to identify appellant as being the robber in the first instance. This matter has been the subject of quite a number of decisions, and it is not the purpose here to review the authorities or discuss the matter at length. See Hill v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 603, 73 S. W. 9; Herndon v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 556, 99 S. W. 558; Barnett v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 541, 99 S. W. 556; Saldiver v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 178, 115 S. W. 584, 16 Ann. Cas. 669.

Evidence—other crime—identity.

There is a bill of exceptions reserved to some remarks of the prosecuting officer. Without discussing the matter, we believe this will not occur upon another trial. There was no necessity for these statements. They were, in substance, that the district attorney did not see any use in arguing cases on such facts to the jury, and that there had been some conversation between himself and counsel for appellant looking to the submission of the case without argument, and he now challenged defendant's counsel to submit the case to the jury without argument. Such matters should not occur. The Constitution and law guarantee the trial—challenge without argu-

defendant may be heard by himself or counsel, or both.

This right is guaranteed him unimpaired by any criticisms or remarks of the character indulged. He may exercise the right to argue or not to argue. With this the state has no concern. It is a matter purely within the discretion of appellant and his counsel, or both. This may have had some effect upon the jury, and was not warranted. We trust this character of argument will not be again indulged.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Prendergast, J., dissenting:

The witnesses herein who were robbed could but meagerly identify appellant and his companion. They, however, took a knife from one of them. The other party, whom they robbed just a very short time afterwards, could and did positively identify them. Just after the second robbery they were arrested, and this knife found on them. Therefore clearly the second robbery was admissible to identify them. The case should be affirmed.

I dissent.

NOTE.

It will be noted that the decision in the reported case (LANCASTER v. STATE, ante, 1533) that the evidence of another robbery was not admissible to prove identity was upon the ground that there was nothing to connect that transaction with the one under investigation except that they were committed the same night, and the evidence showed some similarity in the appearance of the robbers.

The general subject of the admissibility of evidence of other offenses in criminal prosecution to prove identity of defendant is treated in the annotation beginning at page 1540, and see especially page 1556 of that annotation for the robbery cases.

J. F. BATEMAN, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals—March 21, 1917.

(81 Tex. Crim. Rep. 73, 193 S. W. 666.)

Evidence — identity — general rule.

1. Where the identification of accused is not definite as connected with the offense on trial, evidence of extraneous occurrences may be introduced to identify him with the cause on trial.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1540.]

Appeal — error in sending up statement of facts — effect.

2. That the statement of facts in a criminal case was included in the transcript instead of being sent separately to the appellate court, as required by statute, will not prevent its consideration if the error could be cured by certiorari or agreement of counsel.

[See 2 R. C. L. 154, 158.]

Evidence — other crime — identity.

3. Upon the question of identity of one who committed a robbery at a barn where he was not recognized, evidence is admissible that accused, with others, hired a conveyance to take him to a social function, and stopped at the barn on the way at about the time of the robbery, and subsequently at the function about a half hour later committed a robbery upon another person.

[See 8 R. C. L. 201.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Kaufman County convicting him of robbery by the use of firearms. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles Ashworth and Ross Huffmaster for appellant.

Mr. E. B. Hendricks, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of robbery by the use of firearms, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The assistant attorney general moves to strike out and not consider the statement of facts because not brought before this court in the manner provided by statute, which provides the statement of facts in felony cases must be brought up separate from the transcript. It seems that this motion is well taken. The statement of facts was transcribed in the record and certified as part of the transcript. It should not have been included in the transcript, but the original statement of

Appeal—error
in sending up statement of facts—effect.

facts should have been sent up independent of the transcript of the proceedings. The statement of facts has, however, been read, and in view of the fact that this matter would be cured by certiorari, or by agreement of counsel, we have concluded to look at the case as if the statement of facts was properly before us.

Bills of exception were taken to the action of the court permitting the introduction of testimony not immediately connected with the offense charged. Viewed in the light of the qualification of the judge, the case could be affirmed without reference to the statement of facts; but viewed in the light of the statement of facts and qualification of the judge, for the judge refers to the statement of facts in his qualification, there seems to have been no error in admitting this testimony, viewed in any light.

Briefly, the case is that there was a negro social function several miles from Crandall, in Kaufman county. A jitney driver took defendant and three others from the town of Crandall to this negro meeting. Just before reaching the place where the function was in vogue, and about a mile distant, the car was stopped. The four got out of the car and took a drink. One of the parties got back in the car while the other three went to a barn about 100 yards distant; they were gone a few minutes and returned. The party who is alleged to have been robbed testified that he was one of the parties in the barn when three men entered and "held them up." They robbed witness of about three dollars. This incident is the basis of this prosecution. He did not recognize any of the parties. They had a small light, which the three robbers extinguished. Upon returning to the jitney these parties got in and the car went on about a mile to where the negroes were assembled at the function, and began a series of acts, exhibiting and shooting their pistols, and robbed at least one party of something like seven dollars. The jitney driver sufficiently identified defendant as one of the parties he took in his car, and as one of them who left and went to the barn where the witness said he was robbed of $3 by the exhibition of a pistol. He was not present at that robbery and knew nothing about it otherwise than the fact the three parties left the jitney, and were gone fifteen or twenty minutes and returned. The parties at the barn did not recognize any of the parties, but at the social function appellant was recognized as one of those engaged in that robbery. Some of the witnesses who saw the defendant and his crowd at the social function were carried to the jail the next day after the arrest of appellant, and circumstantially recognized the defendant as one of them. His identity at the social function, over appellant's objection, was properly admitted.

The objection urged to the introduction of this testimony was that it was developing another crime, which, it is contended, was illegitimate, and the evidence inadmissible. We would be inclined to agree with this proposition if appellant had been clearly identified at the time as one of the parties to the transaction relied upon by the state for conviction, but as this was not the case we are of opinion the court did not err in admitting the evidence of identification at the other times and places mentioned. These two transactions occurred within thirty or forty minutes of each other, and at night.

Evidence—other
crime—identity.

Where the identity of the party is not definite as connected with the offense on trial, extraneous offenses may be introduced to connect and identify with the case on trial. See Wyatt v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 73, 114 S. W. 812, and Wright v. State, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 353, 120 S. W. 458. Under this view of the case we are of opinion that, even considering the statement of facts, there was no error in the ruling of the court.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case (BATEMAN v. STATE, ante, 1535) held that the evidence of the other robbery was admissible as tending to prove the identity of the defendant as one of the persons who committed the robbery which was the subject of the prosecution. The general subject of the admissibility of other offenses in criminal prosecution to prove identity of defendant is discussed in the annotation beginning at page 1540. The robbery cases will be found cited at page 1556 of that annotation.

APPEAL by the people from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of the County Court for Bronx County, convicting defendant of the crime of assault in the second degree. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edward J. Glennon with Mr. Francis Martin, for appellant:

Evidence of the occurrence which took place in complainant's place of business on the 2d day of September, 1914, was admissible.

People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286; Bauder v. Bryan, 20 Kan. 369; Johnson v. Com. 115 Pa. 369, 9 Atl. 78; People v. Rolfe, 61 Cal. 541; People v. Harris, 136 N. Y. 423, 33 N. E. 65; People v. Place, 157 N. Y. 584, 52 N. E. 576; People v. Barobuto, 196 N. Y. 293, 89 N. E. 837; People v. Rimieri, 180 N. Y. 163, 72 N. E. 1002; People v. Loose, 199 N. Y. 505, 92 N. E. 100; People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 450, 32 N. E. 138; State v. McCahill, 72 Iowa, 111, 30 N. W. 553, 33 N. W. 599.

The acts and statements of both September 2, 1914, and September 15, 1914, were all in furtherance of one object. The sole purpose of all the acts of the defendant was, by force, fear, and threats, to prevent the complaining witness from doing work for a nonunion shop.

Pontius v. People, 82 N. Y. 339; People v. Daily, 73 Hun, 16, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1050, affirmed in 143 N. Y. 638, 37 N. E. 823.

Messrs. Abraham Levy and Leo H. Klugherz, with Mr. Max S. Levine, for respondent:

It was error for the trial court to receive in evidence the acts and declarations of September 2, 1914.

People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286; People v. Romano, 84 App. Div. 318, 82 N. Y. Supp. 749; People v. Flanigan, 42 App. Div. 318, 59 N. Y. Supp. 101; People v. Duffy, 212 N. Y. 57, L.R.A.1915B, 103, 105 N. E. 839, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 176;

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment charged the defendant with having assaulted one Samuel Schaletskey (whose true name appears to have been Samuel Skiletsky) in the borough of The Bronx on the 15th day of September, 1914, by striking him with a bottle. The defense was an alibi. The people were permitted to introduce testimony, over the objection and exception of the defendant, tending to prove that he had visited the complainant's place of business about two weeks before (to wit, on the 2d day of September, 1914) with a large number of other persons, accompanied by a walking delegate, so-called, who warned the complainant against working for a nonunion shop; and that on this occasion the defendant destroyed about $50 worth of garments belonging to the complainant, by pouring ink upon the goods out of a bottle which he had brought with him. The appellate division has reversed the judgment of the county court upon the conviction of the defendant, on the ground that it was error to admit evidence of this occurrence on September 2, 1914. In the opinion it is said that there was no question of identity in the case; that the evidence was not admissible as bearing upon the motive with which the assault was committed; and that the two occurrences were so dissimilar that the proof had no tendency to establish a common intent.

We are unable to agree with the learned court below on any of these points.

The defense of an alibi raised in the most direct manner possible an issue as to the identity of the person who assaulted the complainant on the 15th of September. Any fact tending to show that the complainant was not mistaken in alleging that that person was the defendant was relevant to that issue. If the defendant, to the knowledge of the complainant, had visited his shop within a fortnight, and had then criminally destroyed some of his goods, that fact would be likely so to impress the mind of the complainant as to lessen the probability that he was mistaken concerning the identity of his assailant on the 15th of September.

While it may not have been necessary for the prosecution to establish a motive for the assault alleged in the indictment, it was entirely proper for the people to prove a motive if they could; and it seems quite clear to us that the occurrences of the 2d of September had a tendency to show that such a motive existed in the objection, on the part of the defendant and his associates, to the conduct of the complainant in working for a nonunion shop. The learned judge who wrote for the appellate division says that it does not appear that the complainant did work or ever had worked for a nonunion shop. The testimony of the complainant, however, indicates clearly that the delegate who came to his place of business with the defendant on the 2d of September believed that the complainant was working for nonunion shops, and justifies the inference that the defendant shared that belief. Otherwise, it is difficult to account for his action in pouring ink upon the complainant's goods. It seems to us that the occurrences on both occasions, as narrated by the witnesses for the prosecution, were so similar that they tended to establish a common intent, and hence that the evidence as to the occurrences of September 2d was admissible on that ground also.

The rule which excludes evidence of other crimes than that which is charged in the indictment unless the evidence is relevant to the issue or issues on trial should be strictly enforced.

On the other hand, where the evidence is relevant, the trial court should not hesitate to receive it, notwithstanding the fact that it tends to prove the defendant guilty of another offense. The proper practice in cases of this kind was well stated by Mr. Justice Brewer (afterward a distinguished associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States) in State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 311, 319, where he said: "It is clear that the commission of one offense cannot be proved on the trial of a party for another, merely for the purpose of inducing the jury to believe that he is guilty of the latter because he committed the former. You cannot prejudice a defendant before a jury by proof of general bad character, or particular acts of crime other than the one for which he is being tried. And, on the other hand, it is equally clear that whatever testimony tends directly to show the defendant guilty of the crime charged is competent, although it also tends to show him guilty of another and distinct offense. . . . A party cannot, by multiplying his crimes, diminish the volume of competent testimony against him. A man may commit half a dozen distinct crimes and the same facts, or some of them, may tend directly to prove his guilt of all; and on the trial for any one of such crimes it is no objection to the competency of such facts as testimony that they also tend to prove his guilt of the others." In People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 62

-intent.

-evidence of other crimes—exclusion.

Evidence—other crimes—identity.

L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286, this court, speaking through our lamented associate Judge Werner, declared that evidence of other crimes is competent to prove the specific crime charged in the indictment when it tends to establish (1) motive; (2) intent; (3) the absence of mistake or accident; (4) a common scheme or plan, embracing the commission of two or more crimes so related to each other that proof of one tends to establish the others; and (5) the identity of the person charged with the commission of the crime on trial. In the present case we think that the evidence which the appellate division deemed objectionable was properly received as tending to establish motive, a common scheme or plan, and the identity of the person charged with the crime specified in the indictment.

We may add that an apt illustration of the relevancy of evidence tending to establish another crime than that charged in the indictment, where the defense is an alibi, is to be found in the case of Reg. v. Briggs, 2 Moody & R. 199. There the prisoner was indicted for the robbery of one Sladden; the defense was an alibi, and in order to show that the prisoner was near the place of the robbery at the time it was committed the prosecution was allowed to prove that one Makinson had been accosted by the defendant on the road, shortly before the complainant was robbed, and had also been robbed by the party who accosted him. Here the testimony of Makinson tended to show that the defendant had committed another crime; but it was nevertheless held that the evidence was properly admitted.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the judgment of the County Court of Bronx County affirmed.

Hiscock, Chase, Collin, Cardozo and Seabury, JJ., concur.

Hogan, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion of the chief judge in this case, particularly from that part of it which holds that the defense of an alibi raised in the most direct manner possible the identity of the person who assaulted the complainant on the 15th day of September, for the reason that, before any defense was offered by the defendant, the people were permitted to introduce the testimony referred to in the opinion as a part of the people's case. We cannot assume that the people then knew the grounds of defense which would be offered by the defendant, and the evidence criticized was admitted as original proof in the case, at the opening thereof. I concur with the opinion of Mr. Justice Scott of the appellate division, and vote for affirmance of the order of the appellate division.

there are several exceptions, which are as uniformly accepted by the courts as the rule itself. Among these exceptions is that, where evidence tends to aid in identifying the accused as the person who committed the particular crime under investigation, it is admissible, in spite of the fact that it tends to show the guilt of the accused of other crimes for which he is not on trial.

As was said in People v. Jennings (1911) 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077: "One of the well-known exceptions to the settled rule as to the admission of evidence as to collateral crimes is when evidence of an extraneous crime tends to identify the accused as the perpetrator of the crime charged. . . . When an alibi is disputed it is admissible to prove a collateral offense, to prove that at the time the accused was in the vicinity."

In Demons v. State (1916) 17 Ga. App. 480, 87 S. E. 690, the court, in an official syllabus, said: "There was no error in admitting the testimony to the effect that the defendant served a sentence on the chain gang at a time stated, which was admitted for the sole purpose of establishing his whereabouts at the time the alleged crime was committed, and tended to rebut the statement of the defendant as to his presence in the chain gang, away from the place of the crime, at the time the crime was committed."

Where it is sought to prove the identity of a person on trial for a criminal offense, by the similarity of another crime committed by him, such evidence must show that the other offense was, in fact, criminal. People v. Byrnes (1915) 27 Cal. App. 79, 148 Pac. 944. In that case, a prosecution for larceny by inducing a person to make bets on a fake horse race by means of a fraudulently equipped pool room, evidence that the same man was engaged in the operation of an apparently similar pool room at another place, where the witnesses lost a sum of money, was held to be inadmissible, in the absence of proof that the pool room was a blind and not in actual connection with race courses.

In order, however, for evidence of another crime to be admissible to prove the identity of the accused, there must be such a logical connection between the crimes that the proof of one will naturally tend to show that the accused is the person who committed the other. Boyd v. United States (1892) 142 U. S. 450, 35 L. ed. 1077, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, reversing (1890) 45 Fed. 851.

The mere fact that similar offenses are committed by the same person does not, alone, so connect them that evidence of one may be admitted in the trial for the other, to prove the identity of the accused. Thus, in Effier v. State (1913) 4 Boyce (Del.) 62, 85 Atl. 731, it appeared that the accused had induced the prosecuting witness to contribute a sum of money toward the purchase of a ~~day~~ goods business, and, while the money was on a table with money contributed by the accused and others, pretended detectives entered the room and seized the money, mixing it all together, and, claiming that it was counterfeit, carried it off. It was sought to introduce evidence of a similar offense committed against another person about three months afterward for the purpose of proving identity. The court, holding the offenses to be so far unconnected as to preclude the admission of evidence of one on a trial for the other, said: "To prove identity, . . . there must be some connection between the two offenses, and it is not sufficient that they be similar offenses committed by the same person. Almost if not quite the same stringency of proof is required to prove identity of party by this kind of testimony as is required to show system or plan. We do not find the two offenses to be connected in such a manner as would make competent and relevant the proof of the similar offense to prove identity of the accused. Applying the law as we believe it to be, in respect to the general rule in relation to the admissibility of proof of other offenses and the exceptions to that rule, to the facts of the case now under consideration, we are of the opinion that the court below was in error in admitting the proof of a similar offense, as testified to by Silberman, for any of the purposes for which it was admitted."

And in People v. Romano (1903) 84 App. Div. 318, 17 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 385, 82 N. Y. Supp. 749, wherein it appeared that the robbery for which the accused was convicted was committed by throwing snuff in the eyes of the prosecuting witness at the time of the robbery, the prosecution, for the purpose of establishing the identity of the accused, offered proof to show that three weeks prior to the commission of the offense for which he was on trial, he had committed another robbery at the same place on another person, by use of the same means. Holding the admission of such evidence to be erroneous, the court said: "The prosecution does not claim that it can support the ruling in the present case unless it be upon the ground that the prior crime tended to establish the identity of the defendant. Two facts are advanced in this regard in support of the theory that the testimony was admissible upon such question, i. e., that the prior crime was committed at the same place and in a similar manner. The defense was an alibi; consequently, evidence tending to identify the defendant was vital to the case, as that was the issue litigated. It is persuasive to say that a robbery committed a short time before, at the same place, by similar means and by the same person, tends to identify the defendant as the person who committed the crime at the same place and by the same means for which he is being tried. If the first crime be satisfactorily established, the mind is easily convinced of the guilt of the defendant as to the second, and yet it is common knowledge that numerous crimes of the same character have been committed by other individuals, and by the use of the same means. There is always more or less of similarity between the commission of independent crimes of this class, and in many instances features that are common to one are found in the other; and yet it has never been supposed that, where there was separation as to time and no connection established, beyond that of place and similarity, the first crime was admissible to establish any of the elements which constituted the other."

Nor is it proper to admit in evidence the details of separate and distinct crimes for the purpose of showing the identity of the accused. Boyd v. United States (1892) 142 U. S. 450, 35 L.

ed. 1077, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, reversing (1890) 45 Fed. 851.

Where the identity of the accused is established by other evidence, and therefore is no longer in issue, it is improper to admit evidence of other crimes for the purpose of proving identity. Gibson v. State (1916) 14 Ala. App. 111, 72 So. 210; Billings v. United States (1914) 42 App. D. C. 413; State v. Spray (1903) 174 Mo. 569, 74 S. W. 846, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 603; Kelley v. State (1916) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 185 S. W. 570.

In Dabney v. State (1903) 82 Miss. 252, 33 So. 973, it was said: "It will be noted that proof of the other crime should not be admitted for the purpose simply of identifying the defendant, unless it be absolutely necessary for his identification. The learned circuit judge, when the objection was first made, sustained it, but later on overruled it, and permitted the testimony to go to the jury. We presume that he must have done this for the purpose of identifying the defendant, but it was wholly unnecessary for this purpose, since the other proof in the case abundantly identified the defendant."

II. Prosecutions for particular offenses.

a. Arson.

It has been held, in a prosecution for arson, that evidence of other fires set by the accused was admissible to show his identity as the person who set the fire under investigation. Thus, in Kramer v. Com. (1878) 87 Pa. 299, it was held to be proper to admit evidence, on a trial for arson, of a subsequent attempt to burn the same building, as tending to show the identity of the accused as the person who set the first fire, the court saying: "The offer was not to prove an independent offense on the trial of a case having no connection with it, as in Shaffner v. Com. (1872) 72 Pa. 60," but it was to prove acts immediately after the first attempt to burn the hotel, which tended to show a guilty purpose in Kramer's mind, such as would make it quite probable that he was the same person who had made the former attempt. It was a circumstance in the chain of proof. The fact that it indicated an attempt to fire the building again did not weaken the proof of purpose, because, if accomplished, it would be a distinct offense. The purpose of the first attempt failed because of the extinguishment of the fire, and though it had burned sufficiently to constitute the offense of arson as a complete crime, yet the purpose was not complete, for that was to consume the building entirely. Being saved, it was clearly the subject of a renewed purpose, and the evidence of this renewed purpose tended strongly to show that the person was the same who made both attempts."

Likewise, in State v. Thompson (1887) 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921, it was held that in a prosecution for the burning of a barn it was proper, as tending to identify the accused, to admit evidence that, at the same hour when the barn was burned, an attempt was also made to fire the dwelling house by means of pieces of wood tied up with a rope which was shown to belong to the accused.

In Mitchell v. State (1903) 140 Ala. 118, 103 Am. St. Rep. 17, 37 So. 76, the facts and holding of the court were set out as follows: "The defendant was convicted on an indictment charging her with burning the house of Sue Harris. On the trial, after the introduction of circumstantial evidence having a tendency to show that the house of Harris was, in the nighttime, set on fire by defendant and partially burned, the state was, against objection, allowed to introduce evidence to show that on the same night and near the same time of that burning, the house of one Murphey, which stood about 450 yards from the house of Harris, was intentionally burned, and to show, further, that after that fire tracks of a woman's shoes of the number worn by defendant were found leading from Murphey's. A rule applicable in criminal prosecutions generally renders inadmissible evidence of any offense other than that for which the prosecution is had. To this rule there are exceptions such as are mentioned in Gassenheimer v. State (1875) 52 Ala. 313, and in Curtis v. State (1884) 78 Ala. 12, in which latter case it was said: 'When it is material to show the intent with which the act charged was committed, to illustrate its criminality, or to identify the accused as the person who committed the act, such evidence is admissible.' The jury was instructed 'not to consider the evidence as to the burning of Murphey's house, except so far as it might tend to show a guilty agency or intent in the burning of the house of Harris,' and there was evidence that defendant, having enmity towards Murphey and Sue Harris, had said she would 'fix both him and his sister Sue Harris.' Such utterances of defendant, if made, may have implied a threat to injure both of the persons at whom it was directed, and the burning of Murphey's house, if attributable to her, might by the jury have been considered as done in execution of that threat; and, therefore, the evidence in question was, in connection with the evidence of the threat, admissible as tending to identify defendant as the person who fired the house of Harris."

In People v. Murphy (1892) 135 N. Y. 450, 32 N. E. 138, the court, holding it to be proper to admit evidence of the malicious destruction of property to show the identity of the accused on a trial for arson, set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "The defendant had been in the employ of the owner of the burned barn as coachman and gardener, and was discharged some three months before the fire because of the ill feeling between him and the servant girl. He was familiar with the location and arrangement of the barn and other buildings upon the premises, and knew that a poisonous preparation, called London purple, was kept on a cupboard in the barn, and he had used it in spraying vines and for the destruction of insects in the garden. The people were permitted to prove, under defendant's objection, that upon the night of the fire, and before it occurred, a span of horses and a pony and cow, kept in the barn and belonging to the owner, were poisoned with London purple, and all died shortly afterwards; that his carriage in the same barn was hacked and the curtains and cushions cut into shreds; that his carriages and cutters in the adjoining carriage house were cut and damaged; but his brother's carriages and cutters in the same barn were not injured. The evidence was sufficient to support the inference that the malicious injury to the personal property was done upon the same night that the fire occurred, and by the incendiary, and as a part of the same criminal scheme which resulted in the destruction of the barn. Under such circumstances the evidence was competent. . . . It very clearly tended to prove that the fire was not accidental; that its origin was instigated by malice and not from the desire to gain; that it was kindled by some person having the intimate knowledge of the defendant in regard to the situation of the property, and it was properly received, even though it may have tended to establish the defendant's guilt of another crime than the one set forth in the indictment on trial."

b. Burglary.

On a prosecution for burglary, evidence of other similar burglaries committed about the same time and in the same locality has been held to be admissible, as tending to show that the person who committed the prior offenses was the same as the one who committed the particular burglary charged. Com. v. Griffin (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 497.

In Frazier v. State (1893) 135 Ind. 38, 34 N. E. 817, it was held that, in a prosecution for burglary, it was not improper to permit the state to prove that burglaries other than the one charged in the indictment were committed on the same night, in connection with the proof that one of the tracks at each of the houses burglarized corresponded with the track made by the accused. It was held that this evidence tended to establish the identity of the accused as one of the participants in the burglary, and was clearly admissible.

Likewise, in State v. Harris (1911) 153 Iowa, 592, 133 N. W. 1078, the court, holding that evidence of other burglaries was admissible on the question of identity, set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "The defendant was tried on an indictment charging him with breaking and entering the home of Charles F. Luburger, in the nighttime, while armed with a dangerous weapon. The burglary was committed in the early part of the 22d day of May, and the defendant was identified as the burglar by two witnesses who saw him while he was in the house. A watch was taken from the Luburger home, and this was afterwards found with property that was taken from the home of Isaac B. Smith during the night of May 19th, and with property that was taken from the home of Father Donnelly on the night of May 23d, and the evidence tended to show that all of said property had recently been in the possession of the defendant, and was, in fact, under his control at the time of his arrest for this crime. The state was permitted to show that some of the articles so found were taken from these other homes, and members of the Smith family were permitted to testify that the defendant was the man who entered their home and took the property therefrom, and that he was at that time armed with a dangerous weapon. This evidence was competent, we think, for the purpose of identifying the defendant as the man who committed the crime charged. While it is the general rule that it is not competent to prove that the defendant has committed another crime wholly independent of that for which he is being tried, there are exceptions to this rule, and one of the exceptions is that evidence which tends to identify the defendant as the person who committed the crime with which he is charged is competent, although it may incidentally tend to prove that he has committed another and independent crime."

In Richardson v. Com. (1915) 166 Ky. 570, 179 S. W. 458, a prosecution for breaking into a railroad depot with intent to steal, it was held to be proper on the question of identity to admit evidence of a confession that the accused had broken into the same depot during the previous month, and had taken certain property, which was afterwards found at his home. The court said: "The necessity for establishing the identity of appellant as the person, or one of the persons, who broke into the depot in August, did exist, and the confession he made to Lunsford of his participation in the first crime, namely, the breaking into the depot in July, as well as that of the August breaking, for which he was under trial, made it permissible for the commonwealth to prove in corroboration of Lunsford's testimony as to the confession, and of the confession itself, the facts appertaining to the first offense as well as the last. This corroboration was furnished by the finding at his house of the flour, and, at the place where he had discarded them, of the sacks in which he confessed to have taken it from the depot at the time of the August breaking; and also by the finding in and near his house of the overalls, meat, tobacco, and other property which, in his confession to Lunsford, he admitted taking from the depot at the time of his breaking therein in July."

In People v. McGilver (1885) 67 Cal. 55, 7 Pac. 49, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 106, it was held that evidence that at the time of the arrest the accused was attempting a burglary, and that burglar's tools and part of the proceeds of the burglary for which he was being tried were found in his possession, was admissible to identify the accused as one of the persons engaged in the first burglary.

In State v. Fitzsimon (1893) 18 R. L. 236, 49 Am. St. Rep. 766, 27 Atl. 446, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 343, it was held that on a trial for burglary it was proper to admit evidence that the accused broke into the same house about two hours before the breaking for which he was on trial, since it tended to show where the accused was during the night in question, and thus to identify him as the person guilty of the crime charged.

In State v. Leroy (1911) 61 Wash. 405, 112 Pac. 635, a prosecution for the burglary of the house of one Plemmons, it was held to be proper to admit evidence of another burglary occurring about the same time and in the same vicinity, the fruits of which were found on the accused when arrested, as tending to identify him as the person guilty of the second burglary. The court said: "The purpose of the testimony was to show that the appellant was in the vicinity of the Plemmons house a short time before the commission of the crime charged. Brewster is about 10 miles from the Plemmons house. A stage road extends northerly from Brewster to Conconully and passes near the Plemmons house. As we have seen, the house was entered between the morning of November 5 and the evening of November 6. On November 6 the appellant took passage on the stage north of the Plemmons house, and was carried to Conconully the same day. On the morning of November 8 he was arrested at that place. He had in his possession, when arrested, a number of the articles taken from the Plemmons house, and also a set of burglar's tools. The case was tried on circumstantial evidence, and the purpose of this testimony was to fix the whereabouts of the appellant about the time the Plemmons house was entered. In short, its purpose was to show that the appellant was in the vicinity and had the opportunity to commit the crime charged. The matter of the burglary, the key, the knives, and the wedge, tended to identify and locate him. If the appellant left a trail of crime behind him, the misfortune is his, and that fact cannot defeat the right of the state to connect him with the crime charged by proofs of all relevant circumstances."

It has been held that, in a prosecution for burglary, evidence that the accused knew that the owner had a sum of money in the house at the time that the offense was committed, and had committed an assault on him in order to get it, was admissible to show the identity of the accused, the court saying: "The circumstances show very clearly, we think, that the principal intent with which the building was entered was to commit the crime of larceny or robbery. The fact then that defendant knew that there was money in the house was a proper circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether he is the person who broke and entered it. And when the fact that the particular crime charged in the indictment is proven, evidence which tends to identify the defendant as the person who committed it is relevant to the issue, and is admissible, even though it tends also to prove the commission of a distinct crime from that charged in the indictment, or a different motive from that alleged." State v. Kepper (1885) 65 Iowa, 745, 23 N. W. 304, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 594.

In Barton v. State (1908) 4 Ga. App. 649, 62 S. E. 99, wherein the accused claimed to be a railroad conductor and produced a pass and a card showing membership in a railroad brotherhood, the court admitting in evidence the testimony of the owner thereof that the articles had been stolen from him, said: "The objection to the testimony of Conductor Eaker, that the pass, membership card, letters, etc., found in the possession of the defendant Thompson, were his, and that they had been taken surreptitiously from his possession, on the ground that this tended to embarrass the defendant before the jury, by showing his complicity in another and independent crime, is not well taken. Thompson having used these papers in an attempt to establish an identity asserted by him, it was permissible for the state to show that he was thereby asserting a false identity to aid his escape, even though by its doing so another crime was indicated."

In Mason v. State (1868) 42 Ala. 532, a prosecution for burglary, it was held proper to admit in evidence, as tending to prove identity, that on the two nights preceding the particular burglary charged other burglaries had been committed, and that some of the property stolen was found in the possession of the accused when arrested.

c. Homicide.

It is well settled that, where the identity of the accused is in issue in a prosecution for murder, evidence of other crimes committed by him is admissible when logically connected with the crime charged, and reasonably tending to show his identity as the perpetrator of the crime charged. Thus, in State v. Barrett (1889) 40 Minn. 65, 41 N. W. 459, it was held to be proper to admit evidence that the pistol with which the crime was committed was one taken from a third person by the accused at the time of a previous felonious assault, as tending to identify the accused.

In People v. Rogers (1887) 71 Cal. 565, 12 Pac. 679, the evidence objected to was set out by the court as follows: "The prosecution was allowed, over his objection, to introduce evidence which tended to show that, prior to the night on which he is alleged to have murdered Kimball, the deceased, while burglarizing the latter's house, another burglary had been committed of a saloon belonging to Knight and Pardee, situated some 12 miles distant from the place of Kimball's murder, and that from the saloon a pistol, a small nugget of gold, with some other articles, were then and there stolen; that the nugget of gold was found in a box with a piece of cloth around it, other jewelry being also in the box; that the pistol was found in the woods with a sack, which contained articles of food and a cup, and that near the spot where the pistol was found was also discovered a quilt, which the evidence tended to show was the property of the defendant. . . . Evidence was also allowed to be introduced notwithstanding his objection, to the effect that the house of J. S. Connick had been burglarized the night previous to the killing of Kimball, and articles of food, a small sack, and shirt taken therefrom, and that the defendant had been seen in that neighborhood about the time of the commission of the burglary. It appeared in evidence, in addition to the matters just stated, that the box containing the jewelry and nugget of gold was found by the witness, Peterson, near by the spot at which the defendant was arrested, in a certain road; that this box had been, on the next morning, delivered to one T. M. Brown; that after such delivery he asked the defendant where he got 'that jewelry,' or 'the jewelry that is in the box,' to which the defendant answered that he got it from Dan (who Dan was not being shown); that Mr. Knight identified the pistol as being one taken from the burglarized saloon, and Mr. Pardee identified the nugget of gold which was in the box when delivered to Mr. Brown as having been taken at the same time with the pistol. It was also shown that the person who entered Kimball's dwelling, and killed him, used to effect his burglarious entrance a knife and a chisel, and that said articles, some food, a cup, a shirt, and a sack had been taken from the burglarized house of Connick, and belonged to him; that around the box containing the jewelry and nugget of gold was a piece of cloth similar in color, texture, and general appearance to the shirt of Connick thus taken. The evidence also strongly tended to make it apparent that Kimball was killed with a pistol, and that in accomplishing his murder three shots were fired; that the pistol ball taken from the body of the deceased was the same in size as those carried by the pistol produced in evidence, and that such weapon, when stolen from the saloon, had five chambers thereof loaded, and when found had but two." Holding that this evidence was relevant and competent to show the identity of the accused, the court stated the rule as follows: "As a general proposition, the point contended for might be well taken. But it must be borne in mind in this case the evidence objected to tended directly to show that the defendant had committed the crime of which he stood charged, and must, therefore, have been relevant and competent; and if it also tended to induce the belief that he had been the perpetrator of other crimes, he cannot be heard to complain, since his own acts in multiplying his offenses against the laws of the land ought not to be permitted to diminish the volume of competent evidence."

In People v. Jennings (1911) 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077, wherein it appeared that the accused was arrested a short time after the murder for which he was on trial, but denied that he was in the vicinity of the place at which it was committed, the court, in holding that evidence of neighbors that, on the same night as the murder, a man resembling the accused had broken into their houses and had attempted assaults on different women, was admissible on the question of identity, said: "In view of plaintiff in error's statements, after his arrest and before the trial, as to his whereabouts on that night, it was competent for the state to prove that shortly before the crime was committed he was near the scene of the crime, even though, when seen by some of the witnesses, he was engaged in the commission of other crimes. The evidence objected to tended strongly to contradict his statements as to his whereabouts at that time."

Similarly, in State v. Lewis (1904) 181 Mo. 235, 79 S. W. 671, it was held that evidence of the alleged participation of the accused in the robbery of a bank, in connection with the fact that a large sum of money found on accused, when arrested, was identified as that stolen from the bank, was admissible to prove the identity of the accused as the person who killed an officer, who was attempting to make an arrest for the bank robbery.

In Brown v. Com. (1874) 76 Pa. 319, it was held that in a prosecution for the murder of a woman it was proper, as tending to prove identity, to admit proof that her husband was murdered at the same time, and that coin taken from him was found in the possession of the accused.

In State v. Brooks (1851) 1 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 407, it was held that, in a trial for murder by placing a board on a railroad track so as to cause a derailment, evidence that the accused had previously placed other obstructions on the track, and had wantonly destroyed property of the contractors constructing the road, was properly admitted, as tending to identify the accused as the person who placed the board on the track.

In Washington v. State (1880) 8 Tex. App. 377, a prosecution for murder, the court, in holding that evidence of a prior assault by accused on deceased was admissible as tending to identity the accused, said: "Some two or three weeks prior to the killing, the deceased had been waylaid and shot through the wrist, or hand, by some unknown person. On the trial, several exceptions were reserved to the rulings of the court in permitting the prosecution to inquire into this previous shooting. Floyd Williams, one of the witnesses whose testimony was objected to, said, among other things, detailing a conversation he had with defendant about this shooting: 'I asked defendant if he shot Jap. At first, defendant said nothing; but after, I asked him again, and I asked him to tell me and that I would not tell it, then defendant, laughing, said: 'The man who shot Jap would do it again.' Defendant then said, after I asked him to tell me who shot Jap, that he shot Jap. And the witness, Joe Temple, gave an account of this previous shooting of Jap through the wrist, and stated that he saw the defendant shortly afterwards, some half a mile from the place of shooting, and that defendant asked witness for a cartridge. All the testimony with regard to the first shooting was admissible, both as strongly tending to identify the perpetrator of the homicide, and as showing the animus of the prisoner towards deceased."

In Leeper v. State (1890) 29 Tex. App. 63, 14 S. W. 398, affirmed in (1891) 139 U. S. 462, 35 L. ed. 225, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577, it appeared that several persons living in the same community had been to town to sell their cotton. On returning along a country road one of them was killed and robbed, and that, a few moments later, others returning along the same road were held up and robbed. Answering the objection that evidence of the second robbery was not admissible on the trial for murder, the court said: "The assaults upon Bates and the two Harveys were almost simultaneous with the previous assault made upon Mathis, and were made at the same place. Robbery was manifestly the motive actuating the assailants. They had deliberately planned the robbery of the parties assaulted, and had lain in wait for them at the place where the assaults were committed. Each of the assaults was a part of the general scheme,—a part of the conspiracy to rob the persons assaulted. They were so closely connected with, related to, and illustrative of each other as to make each res gestæ of the other. This testimony was essential to identify the parties who assaulted and shot Mathis, and to show the motive and intent of such assault. It bore directly upon the main issue in the case, and was not extraneous matter within the meaning of the rule which requires that the jury should be instructed to restrict their consideration of extraneous matter adduced in evidence, to the specific purpose for which it was admitted."

In Logston v. State (1872) 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 414, it was held that in the proof of murder by circumstantial evidence, proof that other members of the family were found dead in the house where the body of the person for whose murder the accused was on trial was found was admissible, as tending to negative the hypothesis of the guilt of such persons, and thereby aiding in identifying the accused as the guilty person.

In McCue v. State (1914) 75 Tex. Crim. Rep. 137, 170 S. W. 280, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 674, it was held that on a trial for murder, where the accused denied being at the scene of the crime, and introduced witnesses to prove that on the night of the murder he was at home for the entire night, it was proper to introduce evidence that on that night he was seen and recognized at a house of ill fame, as tending to disprove his claim of alibi, and to aid in identifying him as the person who committed the crime charged.

In Miller v. State (1900) 180 Ala. 1, 36 So. 379, a prosecution of two men for the murder of two policemen who had attempted to arrest them in connection with the burglary of the Standard Oil Company plant on the night before, it was sought to introduce evidence of the burglary in order to prove the identity of the prisoners. In holding the evidence to be admissible, the court said: "The evidence of the witness Clayton, watchman at the Standard Oil Company's place, that he saw the defendants at the Standard Oil Company's office on the outside of the fence on the Sunday or Monday afternoon before the murder, that a party of seven or eight men came there between 9 and 10 o'clock that night, and that two of said party were about the size and general appearance of the defendants. The further testimony that these men took a pistol from the witness was competent in connection with other testimony that this pistol was found in the room where Duncan was arrested at Chattanooga, and was then claimed by Duncan as his pistol, that it was a 38-caliber pistol, but carried a ball different from the 38-caliber ball of Smith & Wesson pistol, that on the night of the killing Miller had a 38-caliber Smith & Wesson, that one of the officers was shot with a bullet of that caliber such as is used in Smith & Wesson pistols, and that the other was shot with a bullet of that caliber differing from the Smith & Wesson bullet in being heavier, like the bullets used in the pistol taken from Clayton, and recovered from Duncan. Similarly, it was competent for Clayton to testify that one of the men at the Standard Oil Company's place wore a light overcoat like the coat which, other evidence showed, was worn by one of the persons who did the shooting, and which he took off and laid down on the street in his flight. And, there being evidence that in the pockets of this coat was found a bottle which contained a fluid resembling nitroglycerine in appearance, that the bottle was not full, and that the fluid found in the bottle was a very powerful explosive, testimony tending to show that the Standard Oil Company's safe was blown open with a fluid explosive by the party of men, of which there was yet other evidence that defendants were members, was properly admitted on the question of identity. And upon the same considerations, the further testimony of Wofford that a pocketbook containing certain papers, which was also found in a pocket of that overcoat, had been left by him in the Standard Oil Company's safe and had been taken therefrom on that night by said party of men, was properly received. And so of any other testimony as to what occurred that night at the Standard Oil Company's office, tending to identify these defendants as having been at that place on the night of and two or three hours before the shooting."

But where the evidence of another offense has no tendency to identify a person on trial for homicide, it is inadmissible on the ground of proving identity. Thus, the court in Miller v. State (Ala.) supra, set out the evidence sought to be introduced and its holding as follows: "There was, however, some testimony received as to occurrences at the Standard Oil Company's place which has no tendency to show that the defendants, or either of them, were there on the occasion in question, and which, therefore, throw no light upon their identity with the men who killed Adams and Kirkley. For instances: The state's counsel, referring to what occurred at that place on the occasion when Clayton's pistol was taken, the safe was blown open, and Wofford's pocketbook was removed therefrom and carried away, asked Clayton this question: 'Well, was anything done to you the night of the 27th of March?' And he replied: 'Well, I was knocked in the head and shot in the foot.' And this question and answer: 'Now, Mr. Clayton, just tell all about it, all that happened that night?' 'Well, I have told all that happened that night. I was assaulted and knocked in the head and my pistol taken away, and the keys, and I was put in a room—the closet—locked up.' And this question to the same witness: 'If anything was said about killing you, tell the jury what it was.' To which he replied: 'I can't say what was said. I noticed one of the men waved his hand and said something, and stopped them from shooting me.' The witness Wofford was asked: 'Was there any money missing from the safe?' Reply: 'Yes, sir.' He was asked: 'How much money was taken from the safe, Mr. Wofford?' And to this he replied: 'Three hundred and thirty odd dollars.' Clayton also testified, as we have seen, that, having knocked him in the head and shot him in the foot, they took his pistol away from him. This testimony of Clayton and Wofford went to prove four separate felonies against the defendants as constituting, in part, the gang who were at the Standard Oil Company's place that night; an assault on, with intent to murder, Clayton, the robbery of the pistol from Clayton, burglary in breaking into, and grand larceny in taking the money from, the safe. The taking of the pistol was, as we have seen, competent on the question of identity. But the admission of the testimony of Clayton and Wofford as to the assault upon Clayton, the burglary and the larceny of the money, must find justification upon another ground, if it was admissible, since it has no bearing upon identity."

In Boyd v. United States (1892) 142 U. S. 450, 35 L. ed. 1077, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, reversing (1890) 45 Fed. 851, the court, in holding that evidence of other crimes in no way connected with the crime charged was inadmissible, set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "This evidence tended to show, and for the purposes of the present discussion it may be admitted that it did show, that in the night of March 15, 1890, Standley, under the name of Henry Eckles, robbed Richard C. Brinson and Samuel R. Mode; that in the afternoon of March 17, 1890, he and Boyd robbed Robert Hall; that in the night of March 20, 1890, Standley, under the name of John Haynes, together with Davis, robbed John Taylor; and that, in the evening of April 5, 1890, Davis, Boyd, and Standley robbed Rigsby's store. In relation to these matters, the witnesses went into details as fully as if the defendants had been upon trial for the robberies they were, respectively, charged by the evidence with having committed. The admissibility of this evidence was attempted to be sustained, in part, upon the ground that Martin Byrd and his crowd, having the right to arrest the parties guilty of the robberies, were entitled to show that the robberies had been, in fact, committed by the defendants. While the evidence tended to show that Martin Byrd had information, prior to April 6, 1890, of the

Taylor robbery, and of Taylor having offered a reward for the arrest and conviction of the guilty parties, there is nothing to show that he or his associates had ever heard, before the meeting at the ferry, of the robberies of Brinson, Mode, Hall, and Rigsby. It is said that the evidence in chief as to what occurred at the time of the shooting left the identity of the defendants, or at least of Standley, in some doubt, and that the facts, connected with the robbery of Rigsby, showing that the defendants and Davis were all engaged in it, and were together only the night before Dansby was shot, tended not only to identify Standley and Boyd, but to show that they came to the ferry for the same purpose with which they went to Rigsby's house, namely, to rob and plunder for their joint benefit; and, consequently, that each defendant was responsible for Dansby's death if it resulted from the prosecution of their felonious purpose to rob. . . . If the evidence as to crimes committed by the defendants, other than the murder of Dansby, had been limited to the robberies of Rigsby and Taylor, it may be, in view of the peculiar circumstances disclosed by the record, and the specific directions by the court as to the purpose for which the proof of those two robberies might be considered, that the judgment would not be disturbed, although that proof, in the multiplied details of the facts connected with the Rigsby and Taylor robberies, went beyond the objects for which it was allowed by the court. But we are constrained to hold that the evidence as to the Brinson, Mode, and Hall robberies was inadmissible for the identification of the defendants, or for any other purpose whatever, and that the injury done the defendants, in that regard, was not cured by anything contained in the charge. Whether Standley robbed Brinson and Mode, and whether he and Boyd robbed Hall, were matters wholly apart from the inquiry as to the murder of Dansby. They were collateral to the issue to be tried. No notice was given by the indictment of the purpose of the government to introduce proof of them. They afforded no legal presumption or inference as to the particular crime charged. Those robberies may have been committed by the defendants in March, and yet they may have been innocent of the murder of Dansby in April. Proof of them only tended to prejudice the defendants with the jurors, to draw their minds away from the real issue, and to produce the impression that they were wretches whose lives were of no value to the community, and who were not entitled to the full benefit of the rules prescribed by law for the trial of human beings charged with crime involving the punishment of death."

In People v. King (1916) 276 Ill. 138, 114 N. E. 601, the court, while recognizing the rule that evidence of other crimes is admissible to prove the identity of the accused, held that, on a prosecution for the murder of a police officer who was attempting to arrest the accused on suspicion of participation in a series of holdups and robberies that had occurred on the same evening, it was improper to bring out such evidence on cross-examination of an accomplice, where there was no evidence of the robberies brought out on his direct examination. It was further held in that case that the court erred in allowing evidence of the details of the robberies to be given.

d. Larceny.

In a prosecution for larceny, it is proper to admit evidence of other property found in the possession of the accused, and which is shown to have been stolen from third persons, as tending to prove that the accused was the thief who stole the property described in the indictment and which was also found in his possession. Johnson v. State (1897) 148 Ind. 522, 47 N. E. 926.

Thus, it has been held that, in a prosecution for the larceny of a horse and buggy, it was proper to admit, on the question of identity, evidence that two mules had been stolen from the same place and on the same night, and were afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner. Yarborough v. State (1868) 41 Ala. 405, wherein it was said: "Although it is not material in general, and is therefore inadmissible, to inquire into any other stealing of goods than that specified in the indictment; yet, for the purpose of ascertaining the identity of the person, it is often important to show that other goods, which have been upon an adjoining part of the premises, were stolen on the same night, and afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner."

In Reed v. State (1891) 54 Ark. 621, 16 S. W. 819, a prosecution for the theft of a saddle, it was held proper to admit evidence of the theft of saddle pockets, girth, and stirrups found with the saddle in the possession of the prisoner, in order to prove his identity.

In Satterwhite v. State (1879) 6 Tex. App. 609, a prosecution for the theft of a horse, the court set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "The mare alleged to have been stolen was, before she was missed, running on the range with a colt of hers and a gray ridgeling belonging to a man named Damon. At the time the mare was missed, the colt and the gray ridgeling also disappeared from the range. On the trial, it was proved that these animals were found in Polk county, having been sold there by the defendant, who called himself and was passing under the name of Baker. The exceptions saved were to the admissibility of any and all of the testimony relating to the colt and the ridgeling, because defendant was charged alone with, and on trial alone for, theft of the mare. This evidence was directly connected with the main fact, and, as such, was properly admitted. Evidence of independent crimes is admissible when it is necessary to establish identity in developing the res gestæ, or in making out the guilt of the defendant by a chain of circumstances connected with the crime for which he is on trial."

In Long v. State (1882) 11 Tex. App. 387, on second appeal (1882) 13 Tex. App. 211, which was a prosecution for the theft of cattle, the court, in holding it to be proper to admit in evidence the possession by the accused of other stolen animals as tending to identify the defendant, said: "The court, over objections of defendant, permitted proof that other stolen cattle were in the bunch with which the cow charged to have been stolen was driven to Seguin. In this there was no error, in view of the peculiar facts of this case. The most difficult thing on the part of the prosecution was to connect defendant with the possession of the cow charged to have been stolen. To do this, it was necessary to describe and identify the herd with which she was when taken to Seguin. To do this, evidence that other cattle from the same range were taken at the same time was proper. Some of the state's witnesses were able to identify the herd, but not the cow in question; others the herd, and stated the fact that the cow charged to have been stolen was with it. The herd being thus identified, the state attempted to connect the defendant with it (the herd); thus showing his connection with or possession of the animal charged to have been stolen. We are of the opinion that under the circumstances of this case, these facts were admissible."

And in People v. May (1917) — Mich. —, 165 N. W. 832, a prosecution for the larceny of certain articles from a store, it was held to be proper to admit evidence that, when the stolen articles were found in the trunk of the accused, other articles were found which had also been stolen from the same store, as tending to identify the accused with the particular crime charged.

In Watters v. State (1906) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 94 S. W. 1038, it was held that in a prosecution for the theft of cattle, where the evidence against the accused was circumstantial, it was proper to admit evidence that hides of other cattle were found buried in his field, as tending to identify him as the one guilty of stealing the cattle charged.

However, evidence of other larcenies is not admissible unless there is a logical connection between them, so that evidence of one tends to identify the person committing it as the same person who committed the other. Thus, in State v. Wackernagel (1902) 118 Iowa, 12, 91 N. W. 761, the court, in holding the larcenies to be insufficiently connected, set out the evidence and its ruling as follows: "On the evening of March 2, 1901, five hogs belonging to one R. C. Beamer were taken from the stockyards at the town of Clearfield, and placed in the stockyards at the town of Lennox, some 10 miles distant. Defendant and his brother Frank were jointly indicted for the larceny of these animals, and at defendant's request he was given a separate trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment of guilty. That the hogs were conveyed from one place to the other by a team and wagon belonging to the father of the defendant, and that whoever drove it was also guilty of the larceny of some harness on the same evening, is so well settled as to be beyond the pale of reasonable discussion. The only difficulty in the case lies in the lack of evidence tending to connect defendant with either larceny. The harness which was stolen was found in a barn owned and controlled by defendant's father, and to which either the father or the brother had as ready access as the defendant. The only evidence, then, which tends to connect defendant with the larceny, is that of several witnesses, who said they saw two men in the wagon on its way from Clearfield to Lennox, and at Lennox; and of one who said that one of the men he saw would compare favorably with the defendant. No one pretends to identify defendant as being one of the men who were in the wagon, or at Lennox where the hogs were left. Evidence of similar crimes committed at the same time and by the same person is sometimes admissible; but where offered, as in this case, to show defendant's connection with the main offense, it should sufficiently appear that defendant was connected with the subject of the larceny. In the instant case there is no evidence, other than the finding of the stolen property, tending to connect defendant with the crime. It was not found in defendant's possession, and had no more of a tendency to connect defendant with the larceny than his brother or his father. Indeed, the presumption is that the father was in control of the premises where the harness was found, and there is nothing to rebut this presumption. Because the stolen harness was found in a barn owned and controlled by the father of the defendant, there being no evidence that defendant himself was ever in the possession thereof, testimony as to the stealing of the harness should not have been admitted against the defendant, or, if admitted, should not be considered in determining his guilt or innocence. Had there been any connection between the two offenses, and evidence to show that defendant stole the harness, doubtless such evidence would not only be competent, but controlling. But, in the absence of a showing that defendant was guilty of stealing the harness, the evidence should not have been received, nor should it be considered against him. Evidence as to the possession of stolen property should be such as to indicate that the defendant, and not someone else, took the same."

It has been held that, in order for evidence of the possession of other stolen property to be admissible on the question of the identity of the accused, it must be shown that the other property was stolen at about the same time and from approximately the same place. Parker v. United States (1898) 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858, wherein the rule was stated as follows: "In cases of larceny, if properly connected, the proof that other stolen property was found in the possession of the defendant, with the property charged to have been stolen, is admissible . . . to identify the defendant. . . . In all . . . cases, however, it must not only be shown that the defendant was found in possession of the property, and that it was stolen; but, in addition thereto, it must appear from the proof that there was some connection between it and the property charged in the indictment to have been stolen. If nothing be shown but that it was in the defendant's possession, then it is inadmissible in every case, because it tends to prove nothing but another, and a separate and independent, larceny. If, in addition to the fact that the stolen property was found in the possession of the defendant recently after the alleged larceny, it be shown that it had been stolen at or about the same time and place as that charged to have been stolen, then it is admissible in all of the cases, because, under the circumstances of each case, it tends to prove the matter in controversy. . . . Cases . . . are generally those where the larceny is admitted or established, and the defendant has been seen with the alleged stolen property, but under such circumstances as that he was not recognized by the witness; as, if he were a stranger to him, or was in disguise, or seen in the nighttime; or it may occur in cases where no one has seen the defendant in possession of the property alleged to have been stolen, but the circumstances point to his guilt, without clearly identifying him. In such case, proof of other stolen property having been found in his possession shortly after the theft, taken about the same time and place, is admissible for the purpose of identifying him. . . . If the larceny of the alleged stolen property be proven, but the identity of the defendant is in doubt, then, if the fact that other property which had been taken was stolen at the same time and place, and was found in the possession of defendant shortly after the larceny, be established, inferentially he is the man who took it all." It was held in that case that it was improper to admit in evidence, to prove identity in a prosecution for the larceny of cattle, the fact that the accused had in his possession other cattle stolen about the same time, where the state failed to show that they were stolen from about the same place.

In Musgrave v. State (1889) 28 Tex. App. 57, 11 S. W. 927, a prosecution for the theft of a bay mare, it was sought to introduce evidence that a gray pony was also found in the possession of the accused, the witness testifying that the pony had been stolen from his brother in Frio county a short time before. In holding this evidence to be inadmissible to prove identity, the court said: "Brown's mare was stolen early in March, 1885. Early in March Harkness went to Atascosa and found the gray pony. He says the pony had been stolen from his brother a short time before this, but he does not tell us from what place or part of the county the pony was taken. He states that it was taken in Frio county. Now, if the pony and mare had been taken at the same time this fact was competent evidence, but in the absence of such proof we cannot possibly perceive what bearing the theft of the pony has upon this case. It certainly develops no criminative fact; nor does it explain a competent fact; nor even yet is it a relative fact, constituting a link in a chain of facts tending to establish the guilt of the appellant. Hence, it could serve but one purpose, which was to unjustly prejudice the case of the appellant in the estimation of his triers."

In State v. Gordon (1913) 253 Mo. 510, 161 S. W. 721, a prosecution for larceny committed by one who boarded the platform of a crowded street car, jostled through the crowd, and picked the pockets of the passengers, it was held proper to admit evidence that the same person had been seen on other recent occasions to board a crowded car and, after riding a short distance, alight and return to the point where he first boarded the car, and then to repeat the performance, as tending to identify him as the one guilty of the offense charged.

e. Liquor law offenses.

In a prosecution for a violation of the Liquor Laws, where the question of identity of the prisoner as the one making the illegal sale is in issue, it is competent to show that he had made other illegal sales at about the same place and time, as establishing his identity. Scott v. State (1907) 150 Ala. 59, 43 So. 181; Abrams v. State (1908) 155 Ala. 105, 46 So. 464.

In Untreinor v. State (1906) 146 Ala. 133, 41 So. 170, a prosecution for a violation of the Liquor Laws, it appeared that the sale was made on the premises of the defendant and in her presence, but by another person. In holding that evidence of other illegal sales made by the defendant was competent to establish her identity as the guilty person, the court said: "It was competent for the state, for the purpose of showing ownership of the beer, and that the person making the sale was authoritatively acting for defendant, thus to establish her identity as the person who in reality made the sale of the beer, to prove other sales by her, notwithstanding these latter sales constitute separate and distinct offenses."

f. Robbery.

Where a series of robberies occur at about the same time and place, and are so connected as to indicate that the person guilty of one is also guilty of the other, it is proper, in a prosecution for a particular robbery, to admit evidence of the other robberies as tending to identify the accused. Nash v. State (1915) 120 Ark. 157, 179 S. W. 159; State v. Balch (1896) 136 Mo. 103, 37 S. W. 808.

In Bateman v. State (1917) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 193 S. W. 666, the court, in holding that evidence of one robbery was admissible to identify accused as the person committing the robbery charged, set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "There was a negro social function several miles from Crandall, in Kaufman county. A jitney driver took defendant and three others from the town of Crandall to this negro meeting. Just before reaching the place where the function was in vogue, and about a mile distant, the car was stopped. The four got out of the car and took a drink. One of the parties got back in the car, while the other three went to a barn about 100 yards distant; they were gone a few minutes and returned. The party who is alleged to have been robbed testified that he was one of the parties in the barn when three men entered and 'held them up.' They robbed witness of about $3. This incident is the basis of this prosecution. He did not recognize any of the parties. They had a small light which the three robbers extinguished. Upon returning to the jitney, these parties got in, and the car went on about a mile to where the negroes were assembled at the function and began a series of acts, exhibiting and shooting their pistols, and robbed at least one party of something like $7. The jitney driver sufficiently identified defendant as one of the parties he took in his car, and as one of them who left and went to the barn where the witness said he was robbed of $3, by the exhibition of a pistol. He was not present at that robbery, and knew nothing about it, otherwise than the fact that the three parties left the jitney, and were gone 15 or 20 minutes, and returned. The parties at the barn did not recognize any of the parties, but at the social function appellant was recognized as one of those engaged in that robbery. Some of the witnesses who saw the defendant and his crowd at the social function were carried to the jail the next day after the arrest of appellant, and circumstantially recognized the defendant as one of them. His identity at the social function, over appellant's objection, was properly admitted. The objection urged to the introduction of this testimony was that it was developing another crime, which it is contended was illegitimate and the evidence inadmissible. We would be inclined to agree with this proposition if appellant had been clearly identified at the time as one of the parties to the transaction relied upon by the state for conviction; but as this was not the case, we are of opinion the court did not err in admitting the evidence of identification at the other times and places mentioned. These two transactions occurred within 30 or 40 minutes of each other, and at night. Where the identity of the party is not definite as connected with the offense on trial, extraneous offenses may be introduced to connect and identify appellant with the case on trial."

In State v. Williams (1916) — Mo. —, 183 S. W. 308, the court, in holding the circumstances to be sufficient to justify the admission of evidence of other robberies, said: "The testimony of the witness Thomas, the second-hand dealer, that the cap, coat, sweater, and shoes worn by the defendant when arrested were the witness's property, and had been stolen from him the night of the robbery, was not inadmissible. When considered with other facts and circumstances in the case, it constitutes evidence to show the presence of the defendant at or near the scene of the robbery a short time before its commission, and thus tended to establish the identity of the defendant. . . . The rule that the testimony of other offenses is not admissible in a prosecution for a particular crime is not without its exceptions. One of these is that testimony of this character, when taken in connection with other facts proven in a case, may afford a strong circumstance tending to show the guilt of the defendant. . . . The witness Auer saw the defendant immediately after the robbery, and subsequently identified him, at which times he was clothed in the apparel the witness Thomas states was stolen from him. When arrested at Lexington Junction a short time after the robbery, he was wearing these clothes. The relevancy, therefore, of Thomas's testimony, in view of these facts, is beyond question, although it did tend to establish a different offense than that for which the defendant was on trial."

In Davis v. State (1898) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 44 S. W. 1099, it was said: "A number of other robberies were introduced in evidence, and the proof on the part of the state tended to show that appellant committed them at the same time and place, and about the same time he committed the robbery in question. All this testimony was admissible for the purpose indicated in the court's charge, and, in our opinion, the court properly guarded the purposes for which the jury could consider such testimony, and in so doing avoided charging upon the weight of the testimony. He did not tell them, even, that the testimony tended to show that appellant committed such other robberies, but left it to them to say whether or not said testimony tended to show that fact, and, if they should believe that such was the case, that then they could use the testimony for the purpose of identifying appellant as the perpetrator of the robbery for which he was then on trial."

In Coble v. State (1876) 31 Ohio St. 100, it was said: "The admission of the mayor's record of former convictions of the defendant below for violations of the city ordinance was clearly erroneous. . . . We suppose, . . . that this testimony was offered and admitted, in the court below, under a false construction of § 189 of the Criminal Code (66 Ohio Laws, 308), which provides that 'no person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal prosecution by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his conviction of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility.' The conviction referred to in this section, which may be shown for the purpose of affecting credibility, is such, and such only, as, before the enactment of the section, would have disqualified the person from testifying as a witness. Convictions for violations of city ordinances never disqualified a person from testifying in any cause, and, therefore, such convictions cannot be shown under favor of this section for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness. . . . Upon the trial of a person charged with an assault with intent to rob, it is not competent for the state, in aid of the prosecution, to prove other assaults committed by the defendant, whether with or without like intent. In so far as the testimony admitted tended to show that the defendant was in the vicinity at the time the offense charged in the indictment was committed, it was clearly admissible; but, in so far as it tended simply to show an attack of like character committed by him upon another person, and at another time and place, it was clearly inadmissible."

In State v. Becton (1874) 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 138, it was held that a witness might, in order to make this identification of a defendant on trial for robbery more explicit, give in evidence that he was the same man that he saw only a short time afterwards, threatening another person with a gun with the apparent intention of robbery.

In Nash v. State (1915) 120 Ark. 157, 179 S. W. 159, a prosecution for the robbery of one Williams, the court, in holding that evidence of other robberies occurring within a short time of the one charged was admissible to prove identity, said: "In admitting proof of the other robberies, the court stated to the jury that such proof could be considered only as bearing upon the question of defendant's presence at the time Williams was robbed, and of appellant's participation in that crime. The three robberies committed on the night of March 3 were committed within a few hundred yards of each other, and the last occurred not more than an hour after the commission of the first, and all were committed by three men, one of whom was Hilliard, whose participation in each instance is reasonably certain. Schuh identified Hilliard as one of the men who had robbed him, but could not positively identify appellant as another. Neither could the officers who killed Hilliard while the third man was being robbed positively identify appellant as one of the three robbers participating in that crime, although they did testify that his general appearance resembled one of the robbers who fled on their approach. We think this evidence was clearly competent for the purpose for which the court admitted it. While this evidence does not show the commission of another crime than the one charged in the indictment, it also tends to show that appellant participated in the commission of the crime charged in the indictment, and refutes appellant's proof of an alibi."

In Collins v. State (1915) 77 Tex. Crim. Rep. 156, 178 S. W. 345, in a prosecution for assault with intent to rob, it was held to be proper to admit in evidence the fact that the accused had sought to persuade the wife of the prosecuting witness to put some powders in his coffee, it further appearing that the accused was enamored of the witness's wife, such evidence strongly tending to identify the accused as the one who assaulted and robbed the prosecuting witness.

And it has been held that letters written by the accused in which he connected himself with an attempt to commit a robbery on the prosecuting witness, a short time previous to the robbery for which he was on trial, were properly admitted in evidence, as tending to identify the person who committed the robbery charged. State v. Martin (1917) 49 Utah, 346, 164 Pac. 500.

In Lancaster v. State (1918) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 200 S. W. 167, wherein it appeared that the accused was one of two men charged with the robbery of the prosecuting witness, it appeared that after their arrest certain property was found in their possession, which was identified by the prosecuting witness, who testified that it had been taken from him by the robbers, and that the men on trial resembled the men who had robbed him. As a further means of identification, the state sought to introduce evidence of a second robbery occurring shortly after the one charged, and during which the two men were recognized. In holding the evidence of the second robbery to be inadmissible, the court said: "The court seems to have admitted it upon the theory of identity. We are of opinion that the evidence was not introducible upon such theory, under the facts of the case. The two robberies were in no way connected with each other, and the fact that the second robbery occurred did not serve to identify these parties as the parties who committed the first robbery. There was no fact or circumstance which undertook to connect the two transactions, except the fact that they occurred on the same night, and that there was evidence showing some similarity in the appearance of the two robbers in both cases. This did not serve to identify appellant as being the robber in the first instance." In this case there was a dissenting opinion holding that the facts brought the case within the rule admitting evidence of connected robberies, for purposes of identification.

g. Other offenses.

In Cross v. People (1868) 47 Ill. 152, 95 Am. Dec. 474, a prosecution for forging the name of one Beckwith to a check, the court, in holding that evidence of other similar forgeries was admissible on the question of identity, said: "The evidence in regard to the check on Gardner & Co., which the witness refused to take, and which aroused his suspicions that the Beckwith check was not right, and which caused the development of the whole transaction, and of the character of the prisoner, was competent, as identifying the party and the transaction, and as res gestæ. The mode of operating was at the time explained by the prisoner to the witness; how he obtained a genuine check from Beckwith by purchasing a small quantity of tobacco, giving a bank bill of $100 in payment and, at his own suggestion, taking a check for the difference. The prisoner then had in his possession a check forged on F. B. Gardner & Co. for $3,000, and a genuine one for $80, and he went on to explain to the witness in what manner he got the Gardner check, and getting a new stamp, which accorded with the mode he pursued in getting the Beckwith check. This evidence was not for the purpose of proving the prisoner guilty of another felony in forging the check of Gardner & Co., but for the purpose of identifying him, and giving character to the entire transaction."

In Leslie v. State (1898) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 47 S. W. 367, it was held that, on a trial for passing a forged instrument, evidence that the prisoner had attempted to pass the same instrument on another was admissible to prove identity, the court saying: "It is insisted that the judge should have instructed the jury with reference to the testimony of J. M. Foy, and that he should have limited the effect of this testimony to the particular purpose for which it was introduced, to wit, as to the intent with which appellant may have passed the forged instrument charged in the indictment. Foy testified that he saw appellant in Sweetwater late on the evening of the 10th of December, and that he attempted to pass the alleged forged instrument on him. This evidence was certainly legitimate for the purpose not only of showing the intent with which the appellant may have subsequently passed the forged instrument to William Wright, if there was any question about that intent, but it was admissible for another purpose. This was the same instrument that he subsequently passed to Wright. Appellant denied any knowledge of said instrument, or any connection therewith, and he also denied being in it to him. So this testimony was admissible at the time when Wright says he passed it to him. So this testimony was admissible for the purpose of identifying appellant with said forged instrument, and for the purpose of showing that he was in Sweetwater before the time he admits that he was. This testimony was, therefore, pertinent to other issues in the case besides the question of intent, and the court would have had no right to deprive the state of its use for such other purposes."

In Dean v. United States (1917) 158 C. C. A. 538, 246 Fed. 568, a prosecution for raising a postoffice money order, wherein the defendant denied that he purchased the order and claimed that he was not at the place of issuance, Macon, Georgia, when the application for the order was made, it was held to be proper to admit in evidence the testimony of a witness that he had seen the defendant in Macon on the morning of the day of the issuance of the money order, and was able to identify him because he had seen him again a few days later in Atlanta, when he was on trial for raising an express money order.

In State v. Hetrick (1911) 84 Kan. 157, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 642, 113 Pac. 383, a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses from a bank by impersonating the payee of a check and indorsing his name, receiving therefor a cash sum and a certificate of deposit for the balance, it was held proper to admit evidence of a similar offense against another bank on the same day, as tending to identify the accused. In that case it was said: "Objection was . . . made to the testimony showing the transaction in the national bank. Counsel frankly say that evidence of statements to other persons, similar to those upon which the money was obtained, are competent, but that it was error to allow proof 'of the fruits of such statements,' viz., of the giving of a certificate of deposit by the other banker. This was admissible, in connection with the evidence that the two certificates were found by the roadside together on the same day, and soon after they were obtained, as a circumstance tending to show that the same man made the representations at both banks. Proof of a collateral offense may be relevant in order to identify a defendant. . . . It is relevant to show that the defendant has made similar pretenses at another time and place. . . . Facts relevant to the issue are not excluded merely because they tend to prove another offense. . . . The admission of the evidence did not conflict with the familiar rule that proof of another crime, having no connection with the one for which the accused is being tried, is inadmissible."

In Ledford v. State (1917) 19 Ga. App. 610, 91 S. E. 924, the prosecution was for defacing and destroying the record of a deed whereby certain property was reconveyed to the accused by a grantee, to whom the land had been previously conveyed for the purpose of enabling the grantee to secure a loan thereon, and which was actually done, the grantee giving a mortgage therefor. Over the objection that it was admitting evidence of a separate and distinct offense, the court allowed the state to prove that the record of deed from the accused to the grantor in the deed for the destruction of which the accused was being prosecuted was also destroyed, as tending to prove the identity of the accused, the probability being strong that the destruction of the two records was done by the same person.

In Morse v. Com. (1908) 129 Ky. 294, 111 S. W. 714, it was held that in a prosecution for embezzlement, by means of selling under an assumed name the product of a concern for which the accused was an agent, and retaining the proceeds, it was proper to admit in evidence testimony that the accused had been indicted and convicted under another assumed name, for fraudulent use of the mails, as tending to prove his identity.

And in Hope v. People (1880) 83

N. Y. 418, 38 Am. Rep. 460, it was held that, in a prosecution for an assault on a night watchman at a bank, it was proper to admit evidence of the connection of the accused with a robbery of the bank on the same night, as tending to identify him as one of the persons who had assaulted the watchman.

In Stanfield v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 10, 62 S. W. 917, a joint prosecution of two men for placing an obstruction on a railroad track, it was said: "Evidence was introduced showing that on the same evening, and shortly after the obstruction was placed upon the track mentioned in the indictment, another obstruction was placed upon the same track some distance from the first. This was objected to for several reasons, none of which, we think, are well taken. This was a case of circumstantial evidence. Smith testified positively that he had no connection with the first transaction, while the evidence for the state strongly tended to show that he did. The foot tracks and other indications in and about the first obstruction strongly tend to show that two persons engaged in placing the obstruction upon the track. It was contended by Smith that, if Stanfield placed the first obstruction upon the track, it was inadvertently done by him; that in extricating his leg from the stock gap into which he had fallen he pulled the planks or timber out, and by this means they were thrown across the railroad track; and that he [Smith] had nothing to do with it. The immediate facts attending the second obstruction are very analogous to those attending the first, and this testimony could be used to connect defendant Smith with the first transaction, as well as to show his intent."

In Perkins v. Jeffery [1915] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 702, W. N. 221, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1554, 113 L. T. N. S. 456, 79 J. P. 425, 31 Times L. R. 444, a prosecution for indecent exposure, wherein the accused denied that he was the man who committed the offense, it was held proper to admit evidence of the prosecuting witness that accused had been guilty of the same offense at the same place at a previous time, as showing that she was not mistaken in her identification.

In Jenkins v. Com. (1915) 167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961, a prosecution for criminal conspiracy in violation of a statute, forbidding the banding of persons together for the purpose of intimidating or injuring any person, the court, in holding that evidence of other similar crimes was admissible to prove identity, set out the facts and its ruling as follows: "The commonwealth first showed the organization of this order at Union Chapel on the 22d of August, 1914, and showed that appellant was a member of that order; it then showed to some extent the nature and purpose of that organization; it also showed that, shortly after its organization, bodies of armed and masked men began to commit in that locality outrages similar to the Webster whipping; it showed that the members of this organization met in the nighttime at isolated places; it showed their mode of procedure upon these occasions by the statements of appellant himself; it unmistakably showed by many facts and circumstances that all of these occurrences were traceable to this organization; it showed by the evidence of the four Websters that appellant and several of those mentioned in the indictment as co-conspirators were present at the house of James Webster, and participated in the whipping. It was after the introduction of all this evidence that the commonwealth, evidently anticipating an effort to prove an alibi, the customary defense in such cases, was permitted to show that other and similar occurrences had taken place in that locality, and that, at least in two instances, appellant was present and participated in those occurrences, and that upon other occasions when similar things happened appellant was recognized late at night, with bodies of armed men, going toward or coming from the direction where the whipping occurred. Upon each occasion when such evidence was admitted and the defendant was shown to have participated in them or to have been present, or to have been seen on the road, the jury was admonished that the evidence was admitted only for the purpose of showing that appellant was a member of this organization, and was not admitted to show his guilt or innocence of the whipping of the Websters. Not only did the court take this precaution at all times during the trial, but in its written instructions to the jury it reiterated the same. In such cases of organized outlawry, usually the most carefully planned arrangements are made in advance, either to hide or destroy all evidence of guilt. The parties wear masks, turn their clothes inside out, as in this case, and adopt what they conceive to be the surest method of concealing their identity. Not only so, but experience has taught that in such cases it has almost grown to be a custom that a carefully considered and arranged alibi, prepared in advance, is ready for any occasion. It was under these circumstances and under these conditions that the court, in a case where the only issue was as to the identity of the appellant, permitted evidence to go to the jury as to other crimes of a similar nature, committed about the same time, in the same locality, and in practically the same way, solely upon the issue of identity. The evidence was admitted solely for the purpose of fixing with greater certainty the identity of these disguised outlaws, by showing their membership in and connection with this unlawful organization, the similarity of their mode of procedure in other raids about the same time; and it may well be doubted that but for the admission of such evidence, in the light of these carefully considered and prepared-in-advance alibis, that a conviction could ever be had in such cases. Where the sole issue in a case is as to the identity of the accused, the evidence on that issue by the commonwealth may be properly permitted to take a wide range, and, in a measure, the rigid rules of evidence will be relaxed. . . . We are not unmindful of the wisdom of the general rule that evidence of one crime is not admissible to prove another; but we are of opinion that under the circumstances of this case, where the only issue was one of identity, that the evidence was admissible, with the proper admonition by the court."

In People v. Burke (1912) 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435, a prosecution for an attempt to injure a person by exploding dynamite against her house, it was held to be proper to admit evidence of a subsequent attempt on the part of the accused to take her life, as tending to identify him as the one who committed the original offense.

But in Leach v. State (1916) 80 Tex. Crim. Rep. 376, 189 S. W. 733, a prosecution for riding on a railroad pass belonging to another, the indictment charged the accused with using the pass on a trip from Greenville to Emory on December 13, 1914. The auditor of the road identified accused positively as the person who used the pass on that trip, and it was sought further to identify him by proving that he had used the pass on other occasions. Holding such evidence to be inadmissible, the court said: "This testimony is not admissible for any purpose under this record. It could serve but one purpose, so far as the writer can see, and that is to show that appellant was riding on this pass on different occasions. The writer does not understand, however, that the mere fact that defendant is identified fully as being the man by the state's witness with a transaction occurring a month before in a different part of the state could be used to identify him on the date relied upon for conviction."

In the reported case (PEOPLE v. THAU, ante, 1537) it is held that on a trial for assault, where the defense is an alibi, it is competent for the prosecution to show that two weeks before the assault the accused, accompanied by a number of other persons, including a so-called "walking delegate," had warned the prosecuting witness against working in a non-union shop, and had destroyed certain goods belonging to him. APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City (Dawkins, J.) sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a bill filed to have defendant's marriage declared null and void. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Samuel Want, for appellant:

In a proper case, upon proper pleadings, and instituted by proper parties, a court of equity is the appropriate tribunal for the determination of the validity of a marriage in an application for annulment.

Pattison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order or decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing the bill, filed by the appellant against the appellee, asking that the marriage of the appellee with one Charles Burk, now deceased, be declared null and void.

The bill alleges that the appellant is a nephew and one of the heirs at law of said Charles Burk, who died on the 17th day of October, 1913, leaving surviving him as his nearest relatives one sister, Hanna Rothschild, and eleven nephews and nieces, including the appellee Selma R. Burk. That prior to the 17th day of January, 1913, the said Charles Burk had in his possession his last will and testament, by which his estate was distributed among his nephews and nieces, including the appellant, and that at such time he was about seventy years of age and was suffering from a complication of diseases and from the general infirmities, mental and physical, of old age. That for a long time prior to the last-named date the appellee had been the stenographer of the firm of Burk-Fried & Company, of Baltimore city, of which Charles Burk, as well as the appellant, was a member, and while so employed she lived in the house in which Charles Burk resided, that she was an object of his bounty and affection, and was treated by him "as if she had been one of his own children," and as a result of their relation she exercised great influence over him, and sought thereby to secure a large part of his estate. That in pursuance "of the said fraudulent purpose she resolved to induce him to go through a marriage ceremony with her, for the purpose of placing him in a position where he would be compelled to make a will leaving her a substantial portion of his estate so as to prevent her from otherwise claiming a dower interest therein."

The bill then alleges that as the laws of Maryland prohibited their marriage, because related as uncle and niece, she employed counsel and inquired of him if there was any state in the Union by the laws of which an uncle and niece could be lawfully married, and was advised that such a marriage could be entered into in the state of Rhode Island, and that he "was prevailed upon by her to accompany her to the city of Newport, Rhode Island, where, after remaining for several days, they went through a marriage ceremony," and immediately afterwards returned to the city of Baltimore, where they continued to reside until his death.

The bill further alleges that if the marriage be "allowed to stand, it will deplete his estate by taking therefrom for the benefit of the said Selma R. Burk, the statutory widow's allowance, and also the dower and personal estate to which a widow is entitled under the laws of the state of Maryland, and it likewise entitles the said Selma R. Burk to a preference under the laws of the state of Maryland in the administration of the estate of said Charles Burk, so that the proprietary interest" of the appellant as an heir at law and as devisee of Charles Burk, in the event that the aforementioned will be declared to be his last will and testament, will be substantially affected. That upon his death it developed that the will above referred to could not be found, but that another was produced "wherein the greater portion of the estate of said Charles Burk was devised to the said Selma R. Burk, while no provision at all was made therein for the complainant," although he was a favorite nephew.

It is then alleged "that at or about the time of the institution of this suit a caveat will be filed in the orphans' court of Baltimore city" to the last-mentioned will, upon the ground of his incapacity to make it.

The bill further alleges that the marriage in Rhode Island was in pursuance of a fraudulent plan to evade the laws of the state of Maryland, and therefore not entitled to recognition under the laws of this state. It is then charged in the bill that the laws of the state of Rhode Island "prohibit the marriage of an uncle and niece, and render such a marriage absolutely null and void, but there is a further provision in the said laws upon which the said respondent apparently relied, to the effect that the prohibitions of the law shall not apply to members of the Jewish faith, where the marriage of the particular parties is permitted under the terms and regulations of their religion; that while this exception purports to sustain the validity of the said marriage, as far as the state of Rhode Island is concerned, the same is absolutely null and void, both under the Constitution of the state of Rhode Island and the Constitution of the United States."

The statute of Rhode Island upon the subject of marriage is filed as an exhibit with the bill. It is chapter 243 of the General Statutes of 1909. In § 1 it prohibits a man from marrying his niece, and in § 2 a woman is prohibited from marrying her uncle, and by the third section a marriage between such parties is declared to be null and void, and their issue deemed and adjudged illegitimate.

The 4th section provides that "the provisions of the preceding sections shall not extend to, or in any way affect, any marriage which shall be solemnized among the Jews, within the degrees of affinity or consanguinity allowed by their religion."

The 9th section provides that "any marriage which may be had and solemnized among the people called Quakers, or Friends, in the manner and form used or practised in their societies, or among persons professing the Jewish religion according to their rites and ceremonies, shall be good and valid in law."

And in the 22d section is found the following provision: "No marriage solemnized . . . among persons professing the Jewish religion according to their respective rites and ceremonies shall be deemed or adjudged to be void, nor shall the validity thereof be in any way affected by want of jurisdiction or authority in such person or society nor by reason of noncompliance with any of the requirements of this chapter, if the marriage is in other respects lawful and has been performed with a full belief on the part of the persons so married, or either of them, that they have been lawfully joined in marriage."

The bill alleges that the parties went to Newport, Rhode Island, to be married, and that a marriage was celebrated at that place. It, however, alleges that under the law of that state marriages between uncles and nieces are forbidden, except those of the Jewish faith, "where the marriage of the particular parties is permitted under terms and regulations of their religion." It is the 4th section of the act that creates the exception, and it is clear in its provisions that the preceding sections which contain the prohibition against such marriages shall not extend to or in any way affect any marriage which shall be solemnized among the Jews within the degrees of affinity or consanguinity allowed by their religion. It is then alleged, not very directly, but with sufficient clearness, that the contracting parties were of the Jewish faith, and this being alleged, with no allegation that they were not within the degrees of affinity or consanguinity allowed by their religion, the invalidity of the marriage for such cause is not alleged. Therefore, if the contracting parties, being of the Jewish faith, fall within the aforesaid exception or provision of the act, and there is no allegation that they do not, the marriage of these parties was not in violation of the Rhode Island law, unless, as contended for by the appellant, the exception or proviso was in contravention of the Constitution of Rhode Island or the Federal Constitution.

After a very careful research we have been unable to find any case in Rhode Island or elsewhere, and the counsel have cited no case, where the constitutionality of this act has ever been raised and passed upon by the supreme court of Rhode Island, or by any other court in any other jurisdiction, although this statute of Rhode Island has been recognized as valid and has been so acted upon for a half century and more.

It is § 3 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of Rhode Island, adopted in 1842, that the appellant contends is violated by the aforesaid exception or proviso contained in § 4 of the above-quoted statute. The section of the Constitution is as follows: "That no man shall be compelled to frequent or to support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatever, except in fulfilment of his own voluntary contract; nor enforced, restrained, . . . or burdened in his body or goods; nor disqualified from holding any office; nor otherwise suffer on account of his religious belief; and that every man shall be free to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and to profess and by argument to maintain his opinions in matters of religion; and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect his civil capacity."

The appellant contends, as we understand him, that the civil capacity of a member of the Jewish faith is, within the meaning of the Constitution, enlarged by reason of this statute, and thus the constitutional provision is violated, but just how the statute has this effect he does not attempt to point out, or, if so, not with that clearness that is required by courts before striking down a statute because unconstitutional.

This court has said, in passing upon the constitutionality of acts of our own state, that a legislative act should not be pronounced unconstitutional or invalid in a doubtful case.

Constitutional law—validity of statute—doubt.

It is an exercise of a judicial power of a grave and delicate nature, which can only be warranted in a clear case. Harrison v. Harrison, 22 Md. 491, 85 Am. Dec. 658; University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 383, 31 Am. Dec. 72; Doyle v. Baltimore County, 12 Gill & J. 484; Public Schools Comrs. v. Allegany County, 20 Md. 449. And we should be still more reluctant in pronouncing unconstitutional the act of a sister state, where the same has never been passed upon by the highest court of that state.

In this case, after a careful consideration of the objections made to the validity of the statute, we do not feel warranted or justified in saying that it violates either the state or Federal Constitution.

Marriage—prohibited degrees of relationship—exceptions—validity.

Treating the statute of Rhode Island as constitutional, the marriage, in that state, is valid; but how is such marriage to be regarded in Maryland?

As Judge McSherry said in speaking for this court in Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 29, 34 L.R.A. 773, 33 Atl. 318: "In general, a marriage valid where performed is valid everywhere. To this broad rule there are, however, exceptions. These exceptions or modifications of the general rule may be classified as follows: First, marriages which are deemed contrary to the law of nature, as generally recognized in Christian countries; second, marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity. . . . To the first class belong those which involve polygamy and incest; and, in the sense in which the term incest is used, are embraced only such marriages as are incestuous according to the generally accepted opinion of Christendom, which relates only to persons in direct line of consanguinity, and brothers and sisters. The second class,—i. e., those prohibited in terms by the statute,—presents difficulties that are not always easy of solution, and have led to conflicting decisions. This class may be subdivided into two classes: First, where the statutory prohibition relates to form, ceremony, and qualification, it is held that compliance with the law of the place of marriage is sufficient; and its validity will be recognized, not only in other states generally, but in the state of the domicil of the parties, even when they have left their own state to marry elsewhere, for the purpose of avoiding the laws of their domicil. Instead of being called a subdivision of the second class of exceptions, it would be more accurate to say that it is an exception to the exception, and falls within the operation of the general rule first announced, 'if valid where performed, valid everywhere.' To the second subdivision of the second class of exceptions belong cases which, prohibited by statute, may or may not embody distinctive state policy, as affecting the morals or good order of society. Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 10 Am. St. Rep. 648, 10 S. W. 305, s. c. with copious notes in 2 L.R.A. 703; Georgia v. Tutty (C. C.) 7 L.R.A. 50, 41 Fed. 753; Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, 11 Eng. Reprint, 703, 7 Jur. N. S. 422, 4 L. T. N. S. 93, 9 Week. Rep. 461; Com. v. Graham, 157 Mass. 73, 16 L.R.A. 580, 34 Am. St. Rep. 255, 31 N. E. 706.

The provision contained in the statute of this state (Act of 1777, chap. 12), prohibiting the marriage of uncles and nieces, does not, we think, fall within any of the enumerated exceptions to the general rule. It is not incestuous, "according to the generally accepted opinion of Christendom." Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage and Divorce, vol. 1, § 861, says: "An incestuous marriage, within the meaning of our exception, is generally stated to be not every one forbidden, on account of consanguinity or affinity, by the legislative enactments of the country in which its validity is drawn in question, for a state may prohibit, from motives of policy or from religious considerations, matrimonial connections between persons related in blood or affinity, not incestuous by natural law."

Nor do we think such a marriage comes within the "second" exception to the rule, to wit: Marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity, such as those affecting the morals or good order of society.

In Harrison v. Harrison, supra, our predecessors held a marriage between uncle and niece was not, by the laws of this state, void, but voidable, the effect of which was to hold that such marriage did not fall within the class that was not to be allowed any validity; if so, it would have been void and not voidable.

It is said in Bishop, §§ 258 and 259, that "a marriage is termed void when it is good for no legal purpose and its invalidity may be maintained in any proceeding, in any court, between any parties, whether in the lifetime or after the death of the supposed husband and wife, and whether the question arises directly or collaterally." And: "A marriage is voidable when in its constitution there is an imperfection which can be inquired into only during the lives of both of the parties, in a proceeding to obtain a sentence declaring it null. Until set aside, it is practically valid; when set aside, it is rendered void from the beginning."

The decision of the court in Harrison v. Harrison, supra, holding that the marriage was voidable, in effect held that the marriage did not fall within that class of marriages that was not to be allowed any validity.

Holding as we do that this case does not fall within any of the exceptions to the general rule, the marriage, being valid in Rhode Island, is valid in this state. Therefore, the order or decree sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's bill will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of marriage statutes as affected by discriminations or exceptions.

The reported case (FENSTERWALD v. BURK, ante, 1562) seems to be a case of first impression on the question of the constitutionality of a statute, excepting from the prohibition against marriage between persons within certain degrees of consanguinity, those of a religious faith allowing such marriages. However, the holding therein to the general effect that the exception does not render the statute violative either of the Federal or the Rhode Island Constitution, as well as the specific holding that it does not violate a constitutional provision that religious opinions shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect civil capacity, are supported by other cases, which have involved the constitutionality of marriage statutes which contained exceptions or worked a discrimination.

Thus, in Peterson v. Widule (1914) 157 Wis. 641, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 778, 147 N. W. 966, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1040, it was held that the Wisconsin "Eugenics Law," requiring men, but not women, to obtain and file a certificate of freedom from venereal disease as a condition to marriage, was not unconstitutional as an unreasonable restriction on the inalienable right of marriage, or as granting special privileges or immunities, or as impairing the inherent right to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, or as violative of the right to religious liberty. The court upheld the classification as against the contention that it was unreasonable, arbitrary, and discriminatory, as between men and women, on the ground that the regulation was within the police power as a health measure, and was not discriminatory, because it was generally the unmarried men, and not the women, who were affected with the diseases against which protection was sought. And, as regards the objection that the act interfered with the constitutional right to religious liberty, Winslow, Ch. J., in speaking for the majority of the court, said: "We have not been able to appreciate the force of the contention that the law interferes in any respect with religious liberty. We know of no church which desires its ministers to profane the marriage tie by uniting a man afflicted with a loathsome disease to an innocent woman."

And again, in the Connecticut case of Gould v. Gould (1905) 78 Conn. 242, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 581, 61 Atl. 604, a statute making it a criminal offense for an epileptic under forty-five years of age to marry was held not to be violative of the constitutional guaranty of equality, under the law, in the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," the court maintaining that marriage is a right that can only be exercised under such reasonable conditions as the legislature may see fit to impose, and that the legislature may, in the interest of public health, reasonably enact that a class of persons, such as epileptics, must not marry under circumstances which may result in offspring. The court, among other things, said: "To impose such a restriction upon the right to contract marriage is not intrinsically unreasonable; it is no invasion of the equality of all men before the law, if it applies equally to all, under the same circumstances, who belong to a certain class of persons, which class can reasonably be regarded as one requiring special legislation, either for their protection, or for the protection from them of the community at large. It cannot be pronounced by the judiciary to be intrinsically unreasonable, if it should be regarded as a determination by the general assembly that a law of this kind is necessary for the preservation of public health, and if there are substantial grounds for believing that such determination is supported by the facts upon which it is apparent that it is based. . . . There can be no doubt as to the opinion of the general assembly, nor as to its resting on substantial foundations. The class of persons to whom the statute applies is not one arbitrarily formed to suit its purpose. It is certain and definite. It is a class capable of endangering the health of families, and adding greatly to the sum of human suffering. Between the members of this class there is no discrimination, and the prohibitions of the statute cease to operate when, by the attainment of a certain age by one of those whom it affects, the occasion for the restriction is deemed to become less imperative. . . . Laws of this kind may be regarded as an expression of the conviction of modern society that disease is largely preventable by proper precautions, and that it is not unjust in certain cases, to require the observation of these, even at the cost of narrowing what, in former days, was regarded as the proper domain of individual right."

And see Kitzman v. Werner (1918) 167 Wis. 308, 166 N. W. 789, wherein Minnesota and Wisconsin statutes, prohibiting epileptics to marry, were held not contrary to public policy, and were enforced. G. J. C.

Criminal law — changing date of sentence after expiration of term.

1. The naming of a date when a sentence shall be executed or a period of imprisonment begin is not a part of the sentence proper, and such date may be changed after expiration of the term.

Knapp, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 11, 1916, the appellant Bernstein, convicted in the court below of violating certain provisions of Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9585, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 509, was sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000, and to be imprisoned "in the penitentiary at Atlanta, in the state of Georgia, for the period of eighteen months from this date." He sued out a writ of error, and was released on bail pending review by this court, which affirmed the judgment in the following December.

151 C. C. A. 657, 238 Fed. 923. In the meantime, and presumably upon conviction of some other offense, he was sent by the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri to a prison or jail in that state for a term which did not expire until nearly two years after the date when he was sentenced to Atlanta for eighteen months. Upon his discharge from confinement in Missouri, he was taken into custody by the marshal for the eastern district of Virginia under the prior sentence. He at once demanded to be released on the ground that the time specified in that sentence had long before expired, and he could not be further detained or imprisoned thereunder. At the same time he presented to the court below his petition for a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in which he sets forth his contention as follows: "Your petitioner contends and insists that such judgment and sentence is now inoperative and void because the time therein specified, to wit, eighteen months from the date thereof, has now expired, petitioner, after such sentence and until lately, having been confined in prison under sentence of another Federal court, to wit, the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, at St. Louis, the confinement being in the Missouri jail at St. Charles, and he cannot, therefore, be held for further confinement or imprisonment thereunder, the time of the imprisonment pronounced by such sentence having actually run out and expired on the 11th day of October, 1917, and there being no further imprisonment ordered or set forth in said judgment and sentence, and the court being without authority or power to re-sentence petitioner, the term at which he was convicted and sentenced having long since expired."

The court below refused the writ prayed for, and thereupon "resentenced" Bernstein to pay a fine of $1,000 and to be imprisoned "in the penitentiary at Atlanta for the period of eighteen months." He appeals from the refusal to grant the writ, and from the resentence.

The question raised by appellant is not new and has been frequently answered. It may be assumed, as he contends, that a court is without power, in the absence of statutory authority, to alter or amend a final judgment in either a civil or criminal case after the expiration of the term at which the judgment was rendered, unless during that term there was some reservation of subsequent control. But it has been repeatedly held that the naming of a date when the sentence shall be executed, or the period of imprisonment begin, is not a part of the sentence proper, and therefore such date may be changed after the term expires.

of sentence
after expiration of term.

In a legal sense, the sentence is the punishment fixed for the offense of which the accused has been convicted, and any order respecting the time of its infliction is but the award of execution or a direction to the clerk for framing the mittimus. Such an order of direction is said to be not a judicial, but merely a ministerial, act, to which the rule invoked by appellant does not apply. In 12 Cyc. 784, the distinction is thus stated: "After the term is passed at which the original sentence was imposed, the court has as a general rule no power to modify, amend, or revise it, particularly if the new punishment is in excess of the original sentence. Changes in the sentence, however, which do not alter the punishment, but only change the time and place of its infliction, may be made at a subsequent term."

In 16 C. J. 1304, it is said: "As a general rule, the time for imprisonment to commence or to be inflicted is no part of the judgment or sentence proper, and according to the weight of authority, in the absence of a statute requiring it, the time when the imprisonment is to begin or end need not be specified in the sentence; it being sufficient to state merely its duration."

The Supreme Court says, in Hollden v. Minnesota, 137 U. S. 483, 495, 34 L. ed. 734, 738, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143, 148: "The order designating the day of execution is, strictly speaking, no part of the judgment, unless made so by statute."

And again, in Schwab v. Berggren, 143 U. S. 442, 451, 36 L. ed. 218, 224, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, 528: "Besides, it is well settled that the time and place of execution are not strictly part of the judgment or sentence, unless made so by statute."

True, these were capital cases, as was Nicholas v. Com. 91 Va. 813, 22 S. E. 507, where the death penalty was fixed by statute, and the court had no discretion. But as respects the power of a court, after the expiration of the term at which sentence was imposed, to change the date of its execution, or the date when its execution shall be commenced, we perceive no difference in principle between the case where a specific penalty is fixed by statute, and the case where limits are named within which the court may exercise its discretion; and for the reason that when sentence has once been pronounced in the latter case it becomes the same in legal effect as though that sentence had been prescribed by statute, and no other could be imposed. As was said in Hollon v. Hopkins, 21 Kan. 638: "The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all."

The essential portion of a sentence is the punishment, including the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, without reference to the time when it is to be inflicted."

Directly in point, for the facts are strikingly similar, is State v. Cockerham, decided in 1842, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 204, in which the supreme court of North Carolina said: "The time at which a sentence shall be carried into execution forms no part of the judgment of the court. The judgment is the penalty of the law, as declared by the court, while the direction, with respect to the time of carrying it into effect, is in the nature of an award of execution. In this case the judgment was that the defendant be imprisoned two calendar months, and the words which follow in the record, 'from and after the 1st of November next,' direct the time of executing the judgment. The entry, indeed, would have been more formal, had the judgment and the mandate for carrying it into effect been separate and distinct. But, however informal, it can be understood, in conformity to the law, as consisting of distinct parts, and therefore ought to be so understood. Upon the defendant appearing in court and his identity not being denied, and it being admitted that the sentence of the court had not been executed, it was proper to make the necessary order for carrying the sentence into execution."

It follows from these decisions, with which we are in accord, that the court below had full power to make the order of April 8, 1918, which requires ap~~pellant to serve the~~ <sup>-lapse of time</sup> ~~sentence imposed~~ <sup>-effect.</sup> upon him two years before. Although the order so recites, we think it inaccurate to say that he was "re-sentenced," since the court made no change in the original sentence, but merely changed the previous direction as to the time when imprisonment should begin. When the order is so considered, as properly it should be, the other contentions of appellant are made to disappear.

General rule.

It is generally held that the date fixed by a sentence for the punishment to commence is no part of the sentence, and if for any reason the sentence is not carried into effect at the prescribed time, the accused may be brought before the court on motion, and a new period designated.

The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all. Hollon v. Hopkins (Kan.) supra.

"The date fixed by a sentence for the punishment to commence, or to be inflicted, is directory merely, and forms no part of the sentence itself, as has been uniformly held from the earliest times. Hence, if, from any cause, it is not carried into effect at the period named, the party may be brought before the court again upon motion, and a new period be prescribed. There are frequent instances in the books where men have been sentenced to be hung upon a day named, who have escaped before the time arrived, and been absent for years, but who, when finally arrested, have been, by a new order of court, executed under the old sentence." Ex parte Bell (1879) 56 Miss. 283.

Application of rule.

In the case of Re Collins (1908) 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 Pac. 188, it appeared that the defendant had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for vagrancy. This sentence was suspended, and subsequently, more than six months after the judgment was rendered, the defendant was arrested and committed for the term of the original sentence. It was held that the court had authority to commit the defendant, since the time at which a sentence is to be carried into execution forms no part of the judgment, and where a convicted defendant is at liberty without having served his sentence, he may be arrested as an escaped convict and ordered into custody on the unexecuted judgment.

In Terrell v. Wiggins (1908) 55 Fla. 596, 127 Am. St. Rep. 196, 46 So. 727, it appeared that a convicted person had been sentenced to twelve months at hard labor, and, at the time the twelve months were up, he had served only two months of this time,—being out on his recognizance the remainder of the time. It was held that the court had power to remand him to serve the remainder of the original sentence, the particular time of the execution of a sentence not being one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, not being a part of the sentence at all.

In Neal v. State (1898) 104 Ga. 509, 42 L.R.A. 190, 69 Am. St. Rep. 175, 30 S. E. 858, the defendant was sentenced to six months in the chain gang, the time of the running of the sentence to be counted from the time of his reception into the chain gang, and in addition should pay a fine of $300. The sentence of imprisonment was suspended until the further order of the court. The defendant paid the fine and costs; and was discharged. A year later, the court ordered the execution of the sentence that the defendant should serve six months with the chain gang. It was held that the court had power to make this order, as the provision in the original sentence that sentence was suspended until the further order of the court was void, and the sentence should be read as if it did not contain that provision. It was also held that the defendant could not be said to have served out the time of the sentence, merely because the time of the original sentence had elapsed. The time did not begin to run until the defendant actually started to serve with the chain gang, as the original sentence contained that provision.

In Bland v. State (1851) 2 Ind. 608, it was held that the court had power at a subsequent term to carry out a sentence of death previously imposed upon the defendant, who had escaped from jail before the original sentence could be executed.

In Hollon v. Hopkins (1879) 21 Kan. 638, the accused had been sentenced to three years' imprisonment for perjury, but on the way to prison he escaped from custody, and was not recaptured until after the entire term of his sentence had elapsed. It was held that he could be imprisoned for the term originally imposed without being resentenced, as the original sentence was still in force. The court said: "The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all."

In Ex parte Bell (1879) 56 Miss.

283, the defendant was convicted of assault and battery with intent to kill, and was sentenced to serve one year in the penitentiary. He entered into a recognizance for his appearance, and was released pending the result of an appeal of the case. This recognizance was illegal and void. The appeal was stricken from the docket, as it had not been properly taken, and thereupon the defendant was arrested and placed in jail by the sheriff. He had been at large on the recognizance for nine months. When the full twelve months had expired he sued out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that his term of imprisonment had expired, although he had never been in the penitentiary at all. The court held that the fact that the term of his original sentence had expired did not entitle him to a discharge, the court saying: "The date fixed by a sentence for the punishment to commence, or to be inflicted, is directory merely, and forms no part of the sentence itself, as has been uniformly held from the earliest times. Hence, if from any cause it is not carried into effect at the period named, the party may be brought before the court again upon motion, and a new period be prescribed. There are frequent instances in the books where men have been sentenced to be hung upon a day named, who have escaped before the time arrived, and been absent for years, but who, when finally arrested, have been, by a new order of court, executed under the old sentence. Our statute on that subject (Code 1871, § 2820) is simply declaratory of the common law. So also, where the punishment is imprisonment for a certain term, and from any cause the time elapses without the imprisonment being endured, the convict can be brought before the court at a subsequent term, and a new date specified at which the term shall begin."

In Re Lujan (1912) 18 N. M. 310, 137 Pac. 587, the defendant was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment at hard labor, this sentence, however, not to go into effect if the defendant should leave the territory of

New Mexico and remain absent from the said territory. Several years thereafter, the defendant violated the terms of this judgment, and was taken into custody and sent to the penitentiary. The defendant sued out a writ of habeas corpus. It was held that the court had the right to commit the defendant, and the fact that the time for which the original sentence had been made out had elapsed did not act as a bar to prevent the carrying out of the sentence.

In State v. Cockerham (1842) 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 204, the defendant was sentenced to serve two months for assault, and was allowed to be at liberty on his recognizance. The time specified in the sentence had elapsed, but the defendant had not been imprisoned. At the next term of court, sentence was pronounced for the same length of time as that originally fixed. It was held that, as the time at which a sentence should be carried into execution formed no part of the judgment, the court had the power to make the order changing the time of the commencement of the sentence.

In State v. Cardwell (1886) 95 N. C. 643, the defendant was sentenced to death, but was set at liberty by some men who forced the jail, and was not recaptured until after the date set for his execution, which had been previously postponed by the governor. It was claimed on behalf of the prisoner that the court was without power to set a date for his execution on the original sentence, as the date fixed was already passed. It was held that the original sentence was still in force, and it was proper for the court to direct that it be carried into execution on some designated day.

In Ex parte Eldridge (1910) 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 499, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 625, 139 Am. St. Rep. 967, 106 Pac. 980, the defendant was sentenced to thirty days at hard labor, and to pay a fine of $50 and costs. He appealed and was allowed to go on bail. The appeal was not perfected within the time allowed by law, and the defendant was ordered to be arrested and confined in jail in accordance with the judgment.

The defendant claimed the sentence had expired by lapse of time. It was held that the date fixed by a sentence for the punishment to commence was merely directory, and was no part of the sentence itself; so that if, for any cause, it was not carried into effect at the period named, the party might be brought before the court again upon motion, and a new period be prescribed.

In State v. Kitchens (1835) 20 S. C. L. (2 Hill) 612, 27 Am. Dec. 410, wherein the defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by hanging, but the sentence was not carried out on the day specified in the sentence, owing to the death of the sheriff, it was held that the court was authorized to designate another time at which the sentence should be executed. Kentucky Court of Appeals—March 7, 1919.

Will — proceeds of insurance policy — effect of change of beneficiary.

1. A provision in a will directing payment of a debt of a policy of insurance is not revoked by change of the beneficiary in the policy, if the will expressly stated an intention to assign the policy to the new beneficiary, notwithstanding which the payment was to be made.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1579.]

Insurance — effect of change of beneficiary.

2. A change of beneficiary in an insurance policy is tantamount to an assignment of the policy.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1389.]

— burden of trust.

3. A substituted beneficiary in an insurance policy takes the policy, charged with the trust imposed by the will of the insured upon the policy for payment of a debt, if in the will the intention is expressed of assigning the policy to the new beneficiary, subject to payment of the debt.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1377.]

Parent and child — allowance of support out of child's estate.

4. A parent cannot be allowed anything out of the estate of his child for its support and maintenance unless the parent is in such needy financial circumstances as to be unable to furnish them himself, notwithstanding a statute permits the use of the ward's estate for its maintenance when it is best for the ward to do so.

Equity — jurisdiction over person under disability.

5. Courts of general equity jurisdiction within the limits prescribed by statute, if any, have general supervisory authority and jurisdiction over the person as well as the property of all citizens who are under any disability.

[See 10 R. C. L. 340.]

Incompetent person — authorizing expenditure out of estate.

6. A chancellor may direct expenditures for the benefit of an infant ward out of its estate, if the circumstances are such that he would approve the expenditure after it is made.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1158.]

Evidence — judicial notice — expense of living.

7. The court takes judicial notice that the expenses of living are now extraordinarily high, and that $58.75 per month cannot be considered, under present conditions, as excessive allowance for the support and education of an infant ward and for maintaining him in the way and manner in which he should be reared. [See ante, p. 605.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to obtain directions from the Chancellor with respect to the disposition of the proceeds of a life insurance policy mentioned in testator's will, and to obtain permission to expend a certain amount of the income of plaintiff's ward in payment of his maintenance and education. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. O. Carter for appellant.

Messrs. F. M. Vinson and Hager & Stewart, for appellee:

The operation of a trust upon a particular fund is not affected by a change in form of the property upon which the trust is impressed.

Graham v. English, 160 Ky. 375, 169 S. W. 836; May v. Smith, 177 Ky. 707, 198 S. W. 2; Allen v. Russell, 78 Ky. 105.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

M. G. Watson died testate on December 26, 1914, a resident of Lawrence county, Kentucky. On July 14 and 15, 1913, he executed two papers, which were probated by the county court of Lawrence county after his death as his last will and testament. His widow, the appellee, was made executrix of the will, and since her husband's death she has been duly appointed and qualified as guardian for her only child, the appellee, Morton Wall Watson, who, at the time of the rendition of the judgment herein, was about six years of age.

The appellee, as guardian for her infant child, as executrix of her husband's will, and in her individual capacity, filed this suit against her ward to obtain directions from the chancellor with reference to the disposition of the proceeds of a $10,000 life insurance policy mentioned in the will, and to obtain permission from the chancellor to expend a certain amount of the income of her ward in payment of his board, maintenance, and education. Perhaps other relief was also sought in her individual capacity, but no question relating to that is involved in this appeal. The judgment rendered upon final submission approved the expenditure of the proceeds of the life insurance policy as made by the executrix, and directed and authorized her as guardian to expend as much as $58.75 per month in maintaining, caring for, and educating the ward, until the further orders of the court. Calling in question the correctness of the judgment, the guardian ad litem, who was appointed for the ward, prosecutes this appeal.

From the record it would seem that the testator held a number of insurance policies on his life, but the exact number of them, or their amounts, does not appear. It is shown, however, that at the time of the execution of his will he held a policy in the Home Life Insurance Company of New York for $10,000, payable to his estate. He also held a policy in the New York Life Insurance Company, which, upon his death, paid $25 per month for a period of twenty years. He held stock in quite a number of undeveloped companies engaged in mining enterprises of different natures, some of which were oil companies, others coal companies, and something more than $17,000, par value, of stock in the Olive Hill Clay Products Company, a concern which, we conclude from the record, was organized for developing and manufacturing clay products. To pay for the stock in the Clay Products Company the testator had borrowed $1,000 from his sister, Mrs. Stewart, for which he had executed his note, and $5,000 from his mother-in-law, Mrs. Pennypacker, for which he had also executed his note, and to secure which he pledged his stock in that company, making thereon this indorsement:

This stock is security for a collateral note of $5,000, and when the note is paid by insurance of my son, Morton Wall Watson, then he is to become the owner of same.

M. G. Watson.

Whether that indorsement was made before or after the execution of the will is not shown, but in the will the infant son is devised that stock. The will also includes this clause: "Further, I will later assign ten thousand dollars ($10,000) of life insurance (now payable to my estate) to my son, which insurance I wish to have applied, in part, to the payment of a debt against my clay stock, and such a part of the remainder as is necessary to the purchase of the corner store or brick building of the Gunnell Block and the vacant lot and the lot and barber shop below that, with such room as necessary for ingress and egress for the convenience of said store, which store is located on the corner north of the Louisa National Bank in Louisa, Kentucky."

Later on, in speaking of the same $10,000 policy, the will says: "Then of the residue of the ten thousand dollars ($10,000) such an amount as remains, to and including the amount of a note which I owe my sister (Mrs. F. L. Stewart) of one thousand dollars ($1,000) I would want paid. This ten thousand dollars ($10,000) namely, from the Home Life Insurance Company policies; and in the event the ten thousand dollars ($10,000) above referred to should not be sufficient to completely liquidate the indebtedness of the two properties," etc.

The two pieces of property referred to in the last quotation were property in which the testator owned only a one-fourth undivided interest. He directed his executrix to purchase the other three-fourths' interest in one of the pieces, and to sell his one-fourth interest in the other, and to pay the difference out of the proceeds of the $10,000 policy. As will be seen, he also placed the proceeds of that policy in trust for the discharge of the balance of the indebtedness which he owed to his mother-in-law and sister, as well as expressly placing in trust such proceeds for the payment of his mother-in-law's debt by the indorsement which he made upon the stock. After executing the will, and before his death, instead of assigning the policy to his son, as he stated in his will he would do, he changed the beneficiary in the policy from his estate to his son, and, conceiving that there might be some question as to her right to pay the proceeds of that policy as directed in the will after the change of beneficiary, the executrix is now asking the advice of the chancellor.

To state the proposition we think is sufficient to settle the right of the executrix to appropriate the proceeds of the policy toward the extinguishment of the two notes of the mother-in-law and sister, which at the time of the trial aggregated $5,857.35.

If the testator in his will had said nothing about his contemplated assignment of the policy to his son, burdened with the trust which he placed upon it in his will, there could be but little question that the change of beneficiary in the policy afterward was a change of his intention, and a pro tanto revocation of the will. But having stated in his will his intention to assign that policy to his son, when he did so it was but a carrying out of the terms of his will, and may be considered a part of it. So that when he subsequently changed the beneficiary in the policy, so as to make it payable to his son (and which is tantamount to an assignment of the policy, having no greater force than an assignment), he was conforming his will to what he had therein stipulated he would do. We, therefore, have but little difficulty in concluding that the son, as the new beneficiary in the policy, took it burdened with the trust imposed by the will.

Under this view the judgment approving the expenditures by the wife of the proceeds of the policy as the will directs was fully authorized.

Will—proceeds of insurance policy—effect of change of beneficiary.

Insurance—effect of change of beneficiary.

—burden of trust.

As heretofore stated, a large portion of the testator's property was and is nonproductive. The income from all his productive property, including the $25 per month from the New York Life Insurance Company, amounts to $117.50 per month, and this income was devised by the will to the wife and son jointly for their maintenance and support. The testator owned no residence, but lived with his mother-in-law, where his widow and son are now living.

Section 2032 of the Kentucky Statutes provides, in substance, that the guardian shall have the custody of his ward and the possession, care, and management of his estate, and out of such estate shall provide for the necessary and proper maintenance and education of the ward. Section 2034 of the Statute reads:

"No disbursements shall be allowed the guardian for the maintenance and education of the ward beyond the income of the estate, except in the following cases, unless authorized by the deed or will under which the estate is derived:

"1. When the ward is of such tender years or infirm health that he cannot be bound out as an apprentice, or no suitable person will take him as such.

"2. When it is best for the ward that the principal of his personal estate shall be applied for his board and tuition, and the court, upon settlement of the accounts, shall deem such application to have been judicious and properly made. But neither the ward nor his real estate shall be liable for any such disbursement."

Notwithstanding such provisions it is the settled rule that, since there is imposed upon parents the natural duty to support and maintain their children, they may not, as guardians for them, be allowed anything out of the ward's estate for such purposes, unless the parent is in such needy financial circumstances as that he is unable to do so. Hug-hart v. Spratt, 78 Ky. 313; Overfield v. Overfield, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 313, 30 S. W. 994; Davis v. Richards, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 590, 58 S. W. 477; Hedges v. Hedges, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2220, 73 S. W. 1112; Harper v. Payne, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2301, 73 S. W. 1123; Clay v. Clay, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 1020, 87 S. W. 807.

The needy circumstances of the mother in this case are shown by uncontradicted testimony, and that this is true there can be no question. It is likewise established by the most convincing proof that the ward's one half of the income ($58.75) is barely sufficient to meet his necessities in the way of board, clothing, education, and other supplies which one in his social circumstances needs and requires.

Courts of general equity jurisdiction within the limits prescribed by the statutory law of the forum, if there be any such law upon the subject, have general supervisory authority and jurisdiction over the persons as well as the property of all citizens who are under any legal disability. Equity—jurisdiction over person under disability.

Keegan v. United States Trust Co. 182 Ky. 330, 206 S. W. 486, and Fielder v. Harbison, 93 Ky. 482, 20 S. W. 508. And if the chancellor would approve of an expenditure by the fiduciary for the benefit of the ward after it was made, upon the ground that it was authorized by the local law, he may direct such expenditure in advance, if the facts authorizing it are made to appear. Thus, in the Fielder Case, supra, this court says: "A guardian may exceed the income of the ward's estate when the ward is of such infirm health, or of such tender years, as requires the expenditure. This is a provision of the statute; but when authorized to make such an expenditure, it is only so much of the income as is required on account of the condition of his ward." Incompetent person—authorizing expenditure out of estate.

Parent and child—allowance of support out of child's estate.

less the parent is in such needy financial circumstances as that he is unable to do so. Hug-

Further along in the opinion, after referring to the case of Withers v. Hickman, 6 B. Mon. 292, in which it was held that the guardian could not encroach upon the capital of the ward's estate in any event, the court said: "This rule has been, to some extent modified by the statute referred to, and in Withers v. Hickman, already cited, it was held that if the expenditures by the guardian would have been allowed by the chancellor, if called on, then the guardian should be credited by it; and, while this rule is equitable, it is best always to consult the chancellor before making extraordinary expenditures."

It will thus be seen that the court not only recognized the rule that the ward might consult the chancellor in advance as to the propriety of expenditures, but, further, that it is the better rule in all cases to do so. Furthermore, in the instant case the sum asked for expenditures for the ward might well be considered as needed only for ordinary expenses, since it is shown by the proof—a fact which we know from current history—that the expenses of living are now extraordinarily high, and the small amount of $58.75 cannot be considered, under present conditions, as an excessive allowance for the support and education of the ward, and to maintain him in the way and manner in which he should be reared. We, therefore, conclude that the court had the authority to direct the guardian to expend the present income of the ward for the purposes indicated, and the judgment so directing was correct. That judgment, according to its terms, is subject to modification at any time, to be governed by the changed circumstances.

Wherefore the judgment appealed from in its entirety is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Subsequent change of beneficiary as affecting provisions of will in relation to proceeds of insurance.

With the exception of the reported case (WATSON v. WATSON, ante, 1575), there seems to be no case bearing on the question whether a change of beneficiary in a life insurance policy, subsequent to the execution of a will disposing of the proceeds of the policy, affects the provision of the will. In that case it appeared that the testator held two policies of life insurance, payable, on his death, to his estate. In his will he bequeathed the insurance to his son subject to a designated charge, and made reference to an intention to assign the policy to him. Subsequently, he made the son beneficiary of the insurance policy, not making any declaration as to a charge on it. The son refused to pay the charge, claiming that the provision in the will was revoked by the subsequent change made in the policy. The court holds that the change of beneficiary did not act as a revocation of the provision of the will, but was in furtherance of it, saying that, had the testator, in his will, said nothing about his contemplated assignment of the policy to his son, burdened with the trust which he placed on it in his will, there would have been but little question that the change of the beneficiary in the policy indicated a change of his intention, and was a pro tanto revocation of the will; but that, his intention having been expressed in the will, the provision would be upheld.

Libel — information as to credit.

1. Merchants have the right to organize for their own protection, and enter into mutual agreements for the purpose of giving each other the benefit of their knowledge about those in the community who meet their obligations promptly, and those who do not; and a communication on this subject, made by a member of the association to the other members, is privileged, if made in good faith and in such a manner and on such an occasion as to properly serve the purposes of the association.

Browne, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. E. Inman sued J. A. Putnal in the circuit court of Taylor county for libel. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant took writ of error to this court.

The defendant was a member of the Perry Merchants' Protective Association, composed of a number of the merchants of the town of Perry, having a constitution and by-laws, and an agreement, signed by all its members, which contained these recitals: "Whereas, past experience has taught the undersigned that there are those who visit and for a time live in a growing town like Perry, who are inclined to live on the confidence that the merchants have in humanity," and "by reason of such confidence the merchants of the town of Perry have time and again extended credit to those who were not worthy of such credit," and "in the past it has been possible for persons to obtain several months' support from all the merchants, on account of the lack of organization on the part of the merchants, by trading with one merchant for a short while and then with another, etc., until he had completed the round."

The purpose of the association, set out in the constitution, was "the protection of its members against loss by reason of extension of credit to those unworthy of trust." The constitution provided for the appointment of an attorney, one of whose duties was "to furnish each member of this association with a list of all accounts placed in his hands for collection for any member of this association." The agreement also provided that "when any member of this association shall give notice by and through the attorney of this association that any person has failed to pay his or her account, together with the amount of such account, and that the notifying merchant is no longer willing to carry the account of such defaulting person, that none of the members of this association shall thereafter extend credit to such defaulting person and should any member of this association thereafter credit such defaulting person, said member so selling and crediting such defaulting person agrees to assume the account and accounts due the other members of this association, of which such member so crediting had notice: Provided, however, that it shall be the duty of the attorney to notify each member of this association when any person is reported in default, together with the amount of the account and to whom it is due, and, further, if such account should thereafter be paid by the defaulting person or satisfactorily arranged, then it shall be the duty of the attorney to so notify the members of this association, and all members shall thereafter be released from any liability on account of extending credit to such party who had theretofore been in default."

The constitution provided that "each member should use discretion in making reports, and should not report any person to the attorney of this association, unless the person, firm, or corporation making the report is no longer willing to carry the account of the person so reported on his or her books."

The declaration contains extracts from the agreement, and from the constitution and by-laws, which were attached to the declaration and by apt words made a part thereof. It alleges among other things that the defendant presented plaintiff with a bill for $14, which he claimed he did not owe, and that subsequently the defendant "reported the plaintiff's name to the attorney of said association, as provided for in rule 1 of the discretionary rules of the by-laws, rules, and regulations of said association, hereinbefore alleged and set forth as a part of this declaration; that the said attorney of said association thereupon, in accordance with the provisions of § 10 of article V. of the constitution and by-laws of said association, also made a part of this declaration, furnished the several members of said association with a list containing plaintiff's name as being in default in an account with the defendant, and the said attorney then and there entered plaintiff's name upon the blacklist, or list of delinquents or persons in default in their accounts, in the hands of said several members of said association; and the defendant then and there and thereby caused to be published to various persons, members of the said Perry Merchants' Protective Association, . . . that the plaintiff was 'a person who was inclined to live upon the confidence that the merchants had in humanity;' and, further, that the plaintiff was a person 'not worthy of such credit;' and, further, that the plaintiff was a person who would 'obtain several months' support from all the merchants, by trading with one merchant a while and then with another,' etc., 'until he had completed the round;' meaning thereby that plaintiff would not pay his debts, but obtained support for himself and family by dishonorable and dishonest methods; that plaintiff was a deadbeat; and, further, that the plaintiff was a person 'unworthy of trust.'

We do not think that the innuendoes are supported by the alleged libelous act of the defendant. The agreement set out several methods by which the merchants of Perry had sustained losses, and the constitution stated that the purpose of the organization was to protect its members against loss by reason of extending credit to those unworthy of trust. "Trust," in the sense here used, means "to give credit to," and relates to a person's financial ability to pay his debts.

It is claimed that when the attorney of the association gave notice in writing to members of the association that he held for collection a claim from Putnal to Inman, that it was a publication, and that Putnal was responsible for the attorney's act, because when he gave him the claim he knew the constitution required the attorney to give notice thereof to all the members. This is quite true, but was it a publication to the effect that the plaintiff belonged to all the objectionable classes that the association sought to protect its members from? We do not think so.

The act of the attorney, in order to be the act of the defendant, must relate to some act required by the constitution, when a member gives a claim to the attorney for collection, and also to what the attorney was thereupon required to do. The constitution provided that when "any person has failed to pay his or her account," and the "merchant is no longer willing to carry the account of such defaulting person," he may turn the account over to the attorney for collection, and it then becomes the duty of the attorney to notify all the members of the association. He is not required to notify all the members that the plaintiff was such a person as described in the innuendoes, but merely that the plaintiff was "in default, together with the amount of the account, and to whom it is due." According to the agreed statement of facts this was all that he did.

The matter of extending credit is a large part of modern business, and merchants have the right to organize for their own protection and agree to report to each other the name of a person to whom credit has been extended, who has failed to pay his account, and agree that they will not extend credit to such person without assuming his indebtedness. This is not the same as blacklisting or boycotting by refusing to trade with him, but is only an agreement not to extend him credit without assuming whatever indebtedness he may owe to any other member of the association.

In the case of Woodhouse v. Powles, 43 Wash. 617, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 783, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1079, 86 Pac. 1063, 11 Ann. Cas. 54, the court said: "Counsel for the appellant, however, as we understand his argument, takes the position that the association was in itself unlawful, and that the act of the respondents in notifying their fellow members that the appellant was delinquent on one of his purchases, when he was not so delinquent, was an act libelous per se, from which malice is presumed, and entitles him in itself to recover substantial damages, without proofs of any other fact. As to the first position, we do not think it tenable. Courts, it is true, uniformly hold it libelous for a person, or association of persons, to attempt to coerce the payment of debts by holding the debtors out to the world as being dishonest and unworthy of credit, or to publish their names in circulars, pamphlets, and books for distribution among dealers, as persons who have contracted debts and failed to pay them; but no court, so far as we are advised, has held it unlawful for dealers in a common line of goods to agree among themselves not to extend credit to a person who had defaulted in a payment to some one of them. The right that each one has to protect his legitimate interests justifies such an agreement. And it being lawful to enter into such an agreement, it is, of course, lawful, and hence not libelous, for one party to the agreement to report to the others the names of such of his customers as have become delinquent; and especially is this so where, as in this case, the purchaser is informed in advance of his purchases that a denial of further credit will be the consequence of his failure to pay at the required time."

In the case at bar the plaintiff was informed in advance, by a communication from defendant, that the plaintiff was "under obligation to report to the association's attorney the name of every person who does not pay his or her bill promptly," and that defendant "would dislike very much to turn your name over to the association, as it would probably affect your credit in the town of Perry," and he was asked to "come to see us, and let us have a satisfactory understanding of the matter."

In noting the distinction between the case of Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 9 L.R.A. 86, 20 Am. St. Rep. 115, 46 N. W. 123, and the one under consideration, the court in the case of Woodhouse v. Powles, supra, said: "But the principle upon which the case rests differs from that involved in the case before us. Public policy forbids the resort to this method for the purpose of collecting debts, but no rule of public policy forbids a wholesaler to refuse to credit a retail dealer who has made default in his payments to another wholesaler, and it follows, as of course, that he may resort to any legitimate method for ascertaining who is in default. As we hold that the method pursued in this case was a legitimate one, no action can be found on that act alone."

The pivotal question in this case is the nature of the communication made by the defendant to the other members of the association through their attorney. If it was a privileged communication no action will lie.

The rule governing privileged communications is thus laid down by this court: "A communication, although it contains criminating matter, is privileged when made in good faith upon any subject in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a right or duty, . . . and made upon an occasion to properly serve such right, interest, or duty, and in a manner and under circumstances fairly warranted by the occasion and the duty, right, or interest, and not so made as to unnecessarily or unduly injure another, or to show express malice." Abraham v. Baldwin, 52 Fla. 151, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1051, 42 So. 591, 10 Ann. Cas. 1148.

In order that merchants may prudently do a credit business, it is expedient for them to know those in the community who meet their obligations promptly, and those who do not, and they have the right to organize and enter into mutual agreements, for the purpose of giving each other the benefit of their knowledge on these subjects, and a communication made by a member of the association to the other members, is privileged, if made in good faith, and in such a manner and on such an occasion as to properly serve the purpose of the association.

It does not appear from the agreed statement of facts that the defendants charged the plaintiff with dishonesty or dishonorable dealings, or imputed to him any questionable transaction, but only that "defendant claimed an account due by plaintiff which plaintiff refused to pay," and "that thereupon the account was placed with E. C. Calhoun for collection," and that Calhoun "entered plaintiff's name, together with the defendant's name and the amount claimed by the defendant against plaintiff, in a book kept by B. P. Blanton, a member of said association," and furnished P. F. Bloodworth in writing with plaintiff's name and the amount of his account with defendant.

The agreed statement of facts also shows that Calhoun would swear that he did not notify all the members of the association that the defendant had given him a claim against the plaintiff for collection, and that the only persons notified by him were Blanton and Bloodworth, both of whom were members of the association, and were also his private clients, and that he gave them the information about the claim at their request and as their attorney. This is not contradicted.

Even if Calhoun, when he notified these parties, was acting as the attorney of the association, and notified them in accordance with the requirements of the constitution, such notice was a privileged communication, and it does not appear that the privilege was abused by giving it undue publication by proclaiming it to persons other than members of the association.

There is nothing in the agreed statement of facts, nor in the declaration itself, to show malice on the part of the defendant, nor did the attorney of the association disregard the restraints and qualification imposed by law upon the publicity to be given to such communications, nor did he exceed reasonable bounds in making the communication. As the communication made by Calhoun to the members of the association was privileged, there can be no recovery, and it is needless to discuss the many questions presented by the assignments of error on the pleadings.

The judgment is reversed.

All concur.

NOTE.

The reported case (PUTNAL v. INMAN, ante, 1580) is of interest in connection with TURNER v. BRIEN, infra, as solving a similar problem in a different way. Both cases involved the question of listing a nondealer as unworthy of credit as libel. In TURNER v. BRIEN, the publication under consideration was regarded as libelous per se, and no question of privilege was raised; but, in the PUTNAL CASE, the listing of plaintiff's name was held privileged upon the theory that merchants have a right to organize for their own protection against those unworthy of credit, wherefore a list circulated among the members of the association is privileged, provided the same is done in good faith, and to further the ends of the association. This particular phase of the question is treated in subdivision III. of the annotation following TURNER v. BRIEN, post, 1592.

Evidence — burden of proof — libel.

7. One seeking damages for publications not actionable per se must show falsity, malice, and special damage.

[See 17 R. C. L. 264, 311.]

Libel — construction.

8. In ascertaining the thought intended to be conveyed by a publication alleged to be libelous, the court cannot disassociate the circumstances under which the publication was made from the libel itself, or the purpose that prompted it.

[See 17 R. C. L. 313.]

Appeal — failure to instruct — right to complain.

9. Defendant in a libel suit cannot complain of the court's failure to instruct the jury that the publication was libelous per se, and that malice and damage were presumed.

[See 2 R. C. L. 261.]

Pleading — libel — damages.

10. Special damages need not be alleged to warrant recovery for a publication which is libelous per se.

[See 17 R. C. L. 391.]

Libel — interpretation — scope of inquiry.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Municipal Court of Des Moines (Meyer, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Dunshee, Haines, & Brody, for appellant:

The words published were not libelous per se, and there was no proof of special damages.

O'Connell v. Shontz, 126 Iowa, 709, 102 N. W. 807; Hollenbeck v. Hall, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L.R.A. 734, 64 Am. St. Rep. 175, 72 N. W. 518; Sterling v. Jugenheimer, 69 Iowa, 210, 28 N. W. 559; Achorn v. Piper, 66 Iowa, 694, 24 N. W. 513; Homer v. Engelhardt, 117 Mass. 539; Newbold v. J. M. Bradstreet & Son, 57 Md. 38, 40 Am. Rep. 426; Nichols v. Daily Reporter Co. 30 Utah, 74, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 339, 116 Am. St. Rep. 796, 83 Pac. 573, 8 Ann. Cas. 841.

The question of whether words are libelous per se is one of law, not fact.

Sheibley v. Ashton, 130 Iowa, 195, 106 N. W. 618; Hollenbeck v. Hall, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L.R.A. 734, 64 Am. St. Rep. 175, 72 N. W. 518; Mosnat v. Snyder, 105 Iowa, 500, 75 N. W. 356; Wallace v. Homestead Co. 117 Iowa, 348, 90 N. W. 835.

If the matter published is not libelous per se upon its face, it cannot be made so by innuendo.

Wallace v. Homestead Co. supra.

Where words are not actionable per se, such matters as mental distress, illness, worry, and the like do not usually constitute special damage.

Newell, Libel & Slander, p. 863; Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 1218; Achorn v. Piper, 66 Iowa, 694, 24 N. W. 513; Prime v. Eastwood, 45 Iowa, 640.

The publication is not libelous per se, for the reason that the words carry no necessary imputation that plaintiff is dishonest.

W. 568; Windisch-Muhlhauser Brewing Co. v. Bacon, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 928, 53 S. W. 520.

Mr. S. B. Allen, for plaintiff:

The malicious defamation of a person, made public by any printing or writing, tending to provoke him to wrath or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse, "is libelous per se."

Morse v. Times Republican Printing Co. 124 Iowa, 707, 100 N. W. 867; Hughes v. Samuels Bros. 179 Iowa, 1077, L.R.A. 1917F, 1088, 159 N. W.

589; Sheibley v. Ashton, 180 Iowa, 195, 106 N. W. 618; Call v. Larabee, 60 Iowa, 212, 14 N. W. 237; Halley v. Gregg, 74 Iowa, 564, 38 N. W. 416.

A publication which imputes an unwillingness or refusal to pay just debts is libelous per se, as tending to destroy the party's reputation for integrity and fair dealing. So, it is generally held libelous per se to publish, or cause to be published, one's name as a delinquent debtor, or as one unworthy of financial credit.

W. 518; Sheibley v. Ashton, 180 Iowa, 195, 106 N. W. 618.

Gaynor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for libel. Plaintiff is a laboring man. Defendant runs a grocery store. During the years 1914 and 1915, plaintiff became indebted to the defendant for groceries, and appears not to have been able, or not to have been willing, to pay. Thereupon defendant refused him further credit, and plaintiff went elsewhere for his groceries. Plaintiff claims that his failure to pay was due to the fact that the defendant had overcharged him, and was insisting on $20, when there was in fact but $16 due; that he offered to pay the $16, but refused to pay the $20; that the defendant insisted on the $20, threatened him with personal violence, and also threatened to see that plaintiff lost his job. The record shows a clear dispute between the parties as to the amount due, and there is controversy as to the reasons assigned by the plaintiff for refusal or neglect to pay. While this controversy was on, the defendant caused to be published in a pamphlet issued by a certain trust book and credit company, the following:

Turner John. R., pkr., 802 e
23d .....37—$20.00

This was afterwards superseded by a bound volume, which was issued on the 24th day of November, 1915, and in the bound volume appeared:

John Turner. Watch, 802 23d
Court .....MSR

The publication contained a key which explained the language used as follows: "M—Medium Pay. S—Slow Pay. R—Party reporting would require cash in future dealings."

The figure "37," appearing in the first report before the figure "$20," indicates the party conveying the information to the credits company for publication, and this record shows that the person so indicated was the defendant in this suit. The explanation given by a witness who had knowledge of the internal workings of this credit company is that the report indicates that on the 23d day of February, 1915, the defendant reported that the plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $20. The letter "R" indicates that the defendant reported that he would not extend further credit to the plaintiff; that he would require cash. This publication was made by the company for the enlightenment of retail dealers from whom plaintiff might desire to make purchases. Each subscriber to this company receives one of these publications, with a key explaining the meaning of the entries opposite the name of each party complained of. In the fall of 1915, the plaintiff made arrangements with the defendant to pay this account, and completed his payment in the month of January, 1916. He paid the sum of $16 in full of the account. These publications still appeared in the bound volume, unchanged, after the arrangements had been made for payment and after payment was made. Plaintiff claims that after these publications were made he was refused credit by various merchants; that said publications were intended to, and did, provoke the plaintiff to wrath, and did deprive him of the benefit of public confidence and intercourse, and exposed him to public hatred and ridicule, and that said publication was made for the purpose of disgracing this plaintiff among the retail dealers of Des Moines, and that it had the effect intended; that after said publication he applied to several firms for credit, and was refused; that some of said parties, after reference to this book, refused credit to him.

This statement is sufficient for the purpose of an intelligent review of the matters complained of on this appeal. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $250, which was reduced by the court to $75, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff for $75. From this judgment defendant appeals, and complains:

(1) That the court erred in its ruling on the admission of evidence; but as no exceptions were preserved to these rulings they will not be considered.

(2) That the court erred in overruling a motion made by the defendant at the conclusion of all the evidence, for an instructed verdict. No exceptions were preserved to this, and it is not, therefore, considered.

(3) The court erred in refusing to give certain instructions asked by the defendant. As to this we have to say that, in so far as the instructions asked were pertinent to the issues tendered, they were given substantially by the court in the instructions given to the jury, and, therefore, the refusal was without prejudice.

The other complaints are bot-tomed on the thought that the publication is not libelous per se, and that, therefore, special damages must be alleged and proved before plaintiff is entitled to recover. It is further urged that the court should have said to the jury that the words are not actionable per se, and that no recovery could be had except on proof of special damages. It is to these last propositions that we address ourselves.

The plaintiff in his petition alleges that the publication was false and untrue, and known to be false and untrue by the defendant herein when he caused the same to be published and circulated; that he caused the publication to be made with the intent to provoke the plaintiff herein to wrath, and to deprive him of the benefit of public confidence, and for the sole purpose of disgracing this plaintiff among retail dealers in Des Moines; that the same was published wilfully and maliciously, and for the purpose and intent aforesaid; that the effect of said publication was to deprive plaintiff of the benefits of public confidence in the city of Des Moines, and that he has been damaged thereby.

Criminal libel is defined by our statutes to be "the malicious defamation of a person, made public by any printing, writing, . . . tending to provoke him to wrath . . . or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse." Code 1897, § 5086. And this definition has been accepted as applicable to civil actions. See Stewart v. Pierce, 93 Iowa, 136, 61 N. W. 388.

It has been the general holding by this court that any publication which comes within the statutory definition of libel is actionable per se; that is, upon the proof of such publication, the law will presume the falsity of the matter charged, that the publication was with malice, and that some damage follows. In this it differs from publications which are not actionable per se. In such publications the burden of Appeal—absence of exceptions.

—refusal to instruct verdict.

—refusal of instructions—error.

Libel—statutory definition.

—presumptions raised by.

Evidence—burden of proof—libel.

proof remains upon the plaintiff in respect to all these matters, and recovery can be had only upon the allegation of proof of special damages.

It seems to be the thought of the defendant that in construing this publication we are confined to a literal interpretation of the language used, disassociated from the purposes and intent and consequences that may follow from the thought which is suggested by the language used. If the publication is made maliciously, and for the purpose and with the intent of injuring the plaintiff, and would, in its ordinary meaning and purpose, tend to expose one to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or deprive him of public confidence or esteem, it is actionable per se; that is, if, upon the face of the publication, this would be the usual and ordinary effect upon the minds of other people to whom it comes, it must be presumed that it had that effect,—the effect that it usually and ordinarily has upon the mind. It is the thought conveyed to the minds of others by the publication that produces the poison which defames the good name and character of the person assailed. If the effect of such publication is usually and ordinarily to convey to the mind the existence of an assumed fact that affects prejudicially one about whom the publication is made, or tends to provoke him to wrath, or to expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of public confidence or esteem, the law presumes that it worked that effect, and the burden is on the defendant to negative these presumptions. The jury could well find the thought conveyed and intended to be conveyed was that the plaintiff was not worthy of credit. It was a warning to the public not to trust him. Such publications usually and ordinarily have the effect of depriving one of public confidence and esteem. The general rule is that any publication concerning a person or his affairs, which, from its nature, necessarily must or presumably will, as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, is libelous per se. To say of one, "I have trusted him, he has failed me; I would not trust him again," and to publish this, is to say to the public: "This one is not worthy of your confidence or your credit. You should require cash of him in your dealings." The record shows a clear dispute, not only as to the account, but as to why the account was not paid.

In ascertaining the thought intended to be conveyed by this publication, we cannot disassociate the circumstances under which the publication was made from the publication itself, or the purpose that prompted it. The jury could well find that, while the credit company published the information for the good of its patrons, this was not the purpose of the defendant. The purpose was to expose plaintiff to contempt, and to deprive him of the confidence and esteem of the public, and to affect his credit and standing among the retail business men of Des Moines. This the jury could well have said under this record. This is the purpose which the plaintiff charges the defendant with having intended to accomplish by the publication. There is evidence that the purpose was accomplished. The words were actionable per se as charged. The evidence supports the allegations of the petition. Damages are presumed.

It is true the court should have told the jury in its instructions that the words were actionable per se, and that malice and damages were presumed, but its failure to do this did not prejudice any right defendant had in this suit, and of this it cannot complain. Special damages are required to be alleged and proved only when the publication, with its attending facts and circumstances, is such that damages do not naturally arise from the publication. If the publication, with its attending circumstances, is such that the court can presume legally that injury followed as a natural and inevitable consequence of the act complained of, then there is no occasion that the plaintiff allege and prove special or peculiar damages. If the publication complained of usually, ordinarily, and naturally detracts from the reputation and standing of the plaintiff, and tends proximately and naturally to deprive him of public confidence and esteem, and is maliciously made, then it is libelous per se, and special or peculiar damages are not required to be alleged or proved. The injury, however, must flow from the publication, but not necessarily from a literal interpretation of the words used in the publication.

—statement that one is unworthy of credit.

Appeal—failure to instruct—right to complain.

Libel—interpretation—scope of inquiry. It is the thought conveyed, not the words, that does the harm. One who is charged with refusing to pay an honest debt is charged with dishonesty,—a charge which, if believed, affects his good name, fame, and reputation among his fellows, and deprives him of public confidence and esteem. We say, therefore, that the plaintiff charged a publication which was libelous per se, and that the proof supports the charge.

It is contended that the publication was true. In its literal interpretation we may assume that this contention is right, but in the broader scope and purpose of the publication it is not shown to be true. It may be true that the plaintiff owed the defendant a sum of money. It may be true that the defendant would not thereafter trust him, but it is not true or shown to be true that the plaintiff was not worthy of credit, and that others, dealing fairly with him, could not trust him; and this is the thought which the jury could well find the defendant intended to convey, and did convey, by the publication made. As supporting these conclusions, see Codner v. Central Credit Rating Agency, 180 Iowa, 188, 161 N. W. 657; Hughes v. Samuels Bros. 179 Iowa, 1077, L.R.A.1917F, 1088, 159 N. W. 589; Sheibley v. Ashton, 130 Iowa, 195, 106 N. W. 618; Morse v. Times-Republican Printing Co. 124 Iowa, 707, 100 N. W. 867; Halley v. Gregg, 74 Iowa, 564, 38 N. W. 416; Call v. Larabee, 60 Iowa, 212, 14 N. W. 237.

Upon the whole record we find no ground for interfering with the judgment of the court below, and the cause is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Libel: listing nontrader as unworthy of credit.

- I. Scope, 1590.
- II. In general, 1590.
- III. Privileged communications, 1592.
- IV. Sufficiency of pleadings, 1593.

I. Scope.

The present annotation is confined strictly to the question whether the publishing or listing of the name of a person other than a dealer or a trader, in a merchants' credit book or list, as unworthy of credit, is libelous.

This limitation, of course, excludes the class of cases illustrated by Muetze v. Tuteur (1890) 77 Wis. 236, 9 L.R.A. 86, 20 Am. St. Rep. 115, 46 N. W. 123, where the complaining party was in business, and his credit as a dealer was impugned.

II. In general.

The listing or publishing of one's name as a delinquent debtor may be libelous, notwithstanding the publication is of him as an individual, and not in relation to any business or profession carried on or practised by him; since the charge may be such as naturally tends to injure his standing in the community, and lower him in the esteem and respect of the public. It was expressly so held in McDermott v. Union Credit Co. (1899) 76 Minn. 84, 78 N. W. 967, on rehearing in (1899) 76 Minn. 88, 79 N. W. 673. In this case the court, upon the original argument, held that a false publication of plaintiff's name on a merchants' credit list, as "slow" pay, was libelous per se within the above-stated rule; but, upon reargument, reached a different conclusion, saying that the publication, when construed in connection with the full key to the list, indicated merely that the plaintiff did not always pay promptly, weekly or monthly, or even on demand, but that he did pay without being "pushed," and without the necessity of taking legal proceedings against him; and that he did not dispute his bills, refuse payment, or break his promises to pay; wherefore, the publication did not appreciably injure his reputation for integrity or honesty, or destroy the esteem and respect of his neighbors, and was not actionable per se. And in TURNER v. BRIEN (reported herewith) ante, 1585, it was held that the false listing in a merchants' credit book of a nontrader as one who refuses to pay a debt (the amount of which was in dispute), and a poor credit risk, is libelous per se in that, upon the face of the publication, the ordinary effect upon the public mind would be to make them regard him as unworthy of credit. So, in Werner v. Vogeli (1901) 10 Kan. App. 536, 63 Pac. 607, where a nontrader, who owed defendant nothing, was listed in the credit book of a merchants' association as "bad pay," and "unworthy of credit," it was held that such publication was libelous, the law presuming that such a false publication is malicious. In Tuyes v. Chambers (1919) 144 La. —, 81 So. 265, it was held that the printing and publishing of a nontrader's name on a list of delinquent debtors as part of a plan to extort money claimed to be due, and with the intent to impute a refusal to pay just debts and destroy plaintiff's reputation for integrity, is libelous per se. And, in Georgia, the rule is that if a merchants' association falsely and maliciously blacklist and publish a person as a delinquent debtor, when in fact he owes nothing, the publication is libelous per se, since it tends to some extent to injure his reputation, render him in some degree odious, and expose him to public contempt. See White v. Parks (1894) 93 Ga. 633, 20 S. E. 78, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pritchett (1899) 108 Ga. 411, 34 S. E. 216.

On the other hand, some lists have been held not to be libelous per se. Thus, in McDonald v. Lee (1914) 246 Pa. 253, L.R.A.1916B, 915, 92 Atl. 135, it was held that it was not libelous per se for a member of a medical association to contribute the name of a slow-pay patient to a confidential list prepared by the association for the benefit of its members, there being nothing upon the face of the publication to indicate its purpose, and the list being printed in such a manner that no one but a member would know its meaning. And in Fry v. McCord Bros. (1895) 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568, it was held that the publication in an abstract of unsettled accounts issued by a commercial agency, of a memorandum that one not a merchant or trader was indebted in a certain sum, in connection with a special notice to the effect that the information was furnished in strict confidence, for the exclusive use and benefit of the subscribers, was not libelous per se, since the publication on its face was not injurious. The court said: "Words which upon their face, and without the aid of extrinsic proof, are injurious, are libelous per se; but if the injurious character of the words appear not from their face, in their usual and natural signification, but only in consequence of extrinsic circumstances, they are not libelous per se. . . . Looking alone to the words used in the pamphlet, we are of opinion that, taken in their ordinary and usual and natural sense and meaning, they are not libelous or injurious on their face, or per se."

However, in some cases falling within the scope of the present annotation, the courts have applied the rule that, where the words published are capable both of a harmless and an injurious meaning, it is a question for the jury which meaning the reader would, on the particular occasion in question, have reasonably given to the words. Thus, in Getchell v. Merchant Tailors' Exch. (1892) 26 Ohio L. J. 233, where a protective association published a list of judgments held by members against customers, and applied the word "delinquent" to each judgment debtor, it was held that the question whether the publication was, under all the surrounding facts and circumstances as to such a debtor, open to the innuendo that he had dishonestly and dishonorably evaded and refused to pay such claim, and was not entitled to the confidence and respect of the community, etc., so as to constitute a libel, was one for the jury. And in Cleveland Retail Grocers' Asso. v. Exton (1899) 18 Ohio C. C. 321, 10 Ohio C. D. 145, it was held that the language used in a "delinquent book," purporting to have been "compiled from the reports of delinquent customers" furnished by members of the association, and to contain "the names of people who in the past have failed to pay their grocery bills, and are unworthy of credit," was susceptible of being construed as tending to expose the listed debtors to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and deprive them of the benefit of public confidence and social intercourse, so as to entitle one so listed to have the question whether or not the list was a libel submitted to the jury. And again, in Traynor v. Sielaff (1895) 62 Minn. 420, 64 N. W. 915, it was held that the mere listing of a delinquent debtor's name on a merchant association's "special reference list of unsettled claims," with a cipher rating, is not, standing alone and unexplained, libelous, yet the words used are reasonably susceptible of a defamatory meaning, and the complaint alleges and the proof tends to show the connection in which the words were used, their meaning, and how they were understood by the persons to whom the publication was sent, and that the same were defamatory, the question whether the publication was libelous was for the jury. In Masters v. Lee (1894) 39 Neb. 574, 58 N. W. 222, it was held that the court should have instructed the jury to the effect that if a person's name (a case of a non-trader) was placed in a merchants' credit book to stop his credit and to compel payment of an alleged debt, and that thereby the plaintiff's credit was injured, the defendant should be found liable.

It should be noted, in connection with the cases which hold that the question of libel is one for the jury under the facts, that, according to the general rule of libel, where the publication under consideration does not amount to libel per se, the question is not one for the jury in the absence of allegation and proof of special damages; since such damages are essential to a recovery for a publication which is not libelous per se. In other words, the court ordinarily should dismiss the action, if the publication is not regarded as libelous per se, unless special damages have been alleged and proved. For cases which illustrate such a state of facts, see McDonald v. Lee (1914) 246 Pa. 253, L.R.A.1916B, 915, 92 Atl. 135, and Fry v. McCord Bros. (1895) 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568. In the latter case it was also held that the question whether a publication is libelous per se is one of law for the court.

III. Privileged communications.

In a few cases, the question under consideration has been treated as one of privileged communication.

Thus, in PUTNAL v. INMAN (reported herewith) ante, 1580, the court laid down the rule that merchants have a right to organize for their own protection, against "extension of credit to those unworthy of trust," by entering into agreements to give each other the benefit of their knowledge about those who do not meet their obligations, as well as not to extend credit to a person listed as a delinquent; in consequence of which, the listing of a delinquent debtor's name for circulation among the members of the association is privileged, when made in good faith and for the purpose of serving the ends of the association.

But it seems that the listing of a nondealer's name as unworthy of credit is not privileged, when done for the purpose of coercing payment, rather than as a mere protective measure. Thus, in Traynor v. Sielaff (1895) 62 Minn. 420, 64 N. W. 915, it was held that the listing of one's name as a delinquent was not privileged, where it was shown that the real purpose of publication was to coerce plaintiff to pay a disputed bill, rather than for the protection of the defendant's private interests. And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pritchett (1899) 108 Ga. 411, 34 S. E. 216, a similar conclusion was reached, it having been held that a written communication, which in effect "blacklisted" plaintiff as a delinquent debtor of the writer, when he in fact owed the writer nothing, was not privileged on the ground that it was made to protect the writer's interest in a matter where it was concerned, by expectations of similar notifications from the addressee, under an agreement to exchange confidential information as to their respective delinquent debtors.

IV. Sufficiency of pleadings.

The elements essential to libel need not be specifically charged in so many words, if by fair implication and reasonable interpretation the language used has that effect. This was expressly ruled in Tuyes v. Chambers (1919) 144 La. —, 81 So. 265.

And in Traynor v. Sielaff (1895) 62 Minn. 420, 64 N. W. 915, a complaint which alleged the false and malicious publication of plaintiff's name on the delinquent list of a Merchants' Protective Association, and set out the formula used, alleged an intent to thereby impute insolvency and dishonesty in business, and that the list was so understood by its readers, was held to state a cause of action in libel.

And in Cleveland Retail Grocers' Asso. v. Exton (1899) 18 Ohio C. C.

321, 10 Ohio C. D. 145, it was held that a petition in libel which alleged that defendant published a book entitled "A Delinquent Book," that the book expressly stated that it was "compiled from the reports of delinquent customers . . . who in the past have failed to pay their grocery bills, and are unworthy of credit," and that the quoted words meant that the listed persons, including the plaintiff, were dishonest, deceitful, and unworthy of credit, and had been found guilty of fraudulently and dishonestly evading and refusing to pay their just debts, stated a cause of action sufficient to warrant the admission of evidence and the submission of the case to a jury.

In Ingraham v. Lyon (1894) 105 Cal. 254, 38 Pac. 892, a complaint in libel which, in effect, alleged that defendant members of a Merchants' Protective Association placed plaintiff's name upon the association's "blacklist," that such publication was intended to charge, and have it understood and believed, "that plaintiff was a person engaged in making accounts which he never paid or intended to pay, and was dishonest and wholly unfit and unworthy of credit," that the publication was understood by those to whom it was made as conveying such meaning and charge against the plaintiff, and that such publication was made without cause "and out of pure malice," was held to state a cause of action good as against a general demurrer, especially since the California statutes require that the allegations of a pleading, for the purpose of determining its effect, shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties.

So, in White v. Parks (1894) 93 Ga. 633, 20 S. E. 78, a declaration in libel which alleged in substance that the defendants, members of a merchants' association, published and caused to be published a false and malicious libel of and concerning the plaintiff, by placing his name upon a list of delinquent debtors, thereby representing that he was indebted to such defendants, when in fact he owed them nothing, was held good as against a general demurrer.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a petition filed to recover damages for an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. John E. Shepard and Bert J. King for appellee.

eight dollars and ninety-five cents ($8.95).

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff Mary Thompson brought this suit against Adelberg & Berman, a corporation, to recover damages for libel. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and the petition dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

The petition is as follows:

"Plaintiff, Mary Thompson, says that she is a widow, residing at No. 35 Lincoln avenue, Latonia, Kentucky, where she keeps house with her children. She says she is compelled during the daytime to go out to work, in order to maintain herself and children.

"Plaintiff says that on or about April, 1916, she purchased for her son a suit of clothes from defendant company's store in Covington, Kentucky, known as the Union Store, for the sum of fifteen dollars and ninety-five cents ($15.95), which sum she was to pay in partial payments, and all of which sum she paid, as she was able, excepting "Plaintiff says that defendant, Adelberg & Berman, Incorporated, is a corporation organized under the laws of New York, and conducts stores in various cities in the United States, and is conducting a clothing store at No. 710 Madison avenue, Covington, Kentucky, under the name of the Union Store, where plaintiff made the purchase aforementioned.

"Plaintiff says that on or about the — day of November, 1916, defendant, through its officer or agent, without right or authority of law, and unlawfully, wickedly, and maliciously, did circulate and publish of and concerning her the following libelous matter in the following manner (meaning that she was a person who did not pay her debts): Came upon her home grounds, in her use and occupation, and placed numerous yellow cards in the apertures and crevices of the front door of her residence at No. 35 Lincoln avenue, Latonia, Kentucky, also in the windows of the dining room on the Thirty-fifth street side, and the front room windows on the Lincoln avenue side, and the windows on the railroad side, and in the dining room windows in the rear yard, and placed one in a stick which was driven in a flower mound about 2 feet from the sidewalk on the Lincoln avenue side, which cards read in large type, and each word in capital initial letters, 'Please Take Notice,' and then, in larger capital letters, 'OUR COLLECTOR,' and then, in smaller letters, 'was here for payment. We would save you the annoyance of his further calls, if you will pay at the store.' Then, in large capital letters, 'THE UNION CLOTHING STORE.'

"Plaintiff says that, she being away at her work, said cards remained in said door and windows, and on the stick described, visible to the public, for a long time, most of the day, and until she returned at about 6:30 o'clock P. M., causing her great mental pain and humiliation, and affecting her good name injuriously, to her damage in the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000).

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant in the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000), and for her costs and all other just and proper relief."

There is a broad distinction between verbal slander and a written or printed publication. In determining whether written or printed words are libelous per se, it is not necessary that they should impute to the person concerning whom they are published the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, or an infectious disease, or unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment, or prejudice him in his profession or trade, or tend to disinherit him. It is sufficient if they have a natural and reasonable tendency to degrade or disgrace him, or to render him odious, ridiculous, or contemptible in the estimation of the public. Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co. v. Evening Post

It is argued for the defendant that such is not the reasonable effect of the publication in question, and that the natural import of the words employed cannot be extended by innuendo. It must be remembered, however, that the cards in question were put in several conspicuous places about plaintiff's residence, so that they could be easily seen by the public from almost any angle. If the sole purpose of the defendant had been to notify plaintiff that its collector had called, and to request her to come to its store to pay the account, the mere placing of the card inside the door would have been sufficient. Hence, some effect must be given to the studied effort of the defendant's agent to give the publication as wide and as effective publicity as the circumstances would permit. Viewing the transaction in the light of this fact, it cannot be doubted that defendant's real purpose was to coerce the payment of its debt by publishing plaintiff's delinquency, and thus disgracing her in the eyes of the public. That being true, it cannot be said that the natural meaning of the words was enlarged by the innuendo.

In the case of Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 9 L.R.A. 86, 20 Am. St. Rep. 115, 46 N. W. 881, it was held that the sending of a red envelop through the mails, addressed to a merchant, and indorsed for return to the organization "For Collecting Bad Debts," these words being in very large type, so as to attract special attention, constituted a libel. In the case of State v. Armstrong, 106 Mo. 395, 13 L.R.A. 419, 27 Am. St. Rep. 361, 16 S. W. 604, it was held that the words "Bad Debt Collecting Agency," printed in large, bold type on envelopes mailed to a debtor, especially when mailed to him in care of his employers, constituted a criminal libel, under Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3869, as tending to "expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or deprive him of the benefit of public confidence." These cases cannot be distinguished from the case under consideration. In the former, the publication was through the mails, and necessarily confined to few persons. In this case the publication was by means of cards so artfully placed as not only to attract the attention of those who were naturally curious, but to lure the gaze of those whose proneness to pry had long since lost its edge. We, therefore, conclude that the words in question were libelous per se. It follows that the demurrer to the petition should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Placarding debtor as libel.

It has been held that placards are libelous per se if they have a natural and reasonable tendency to degrade or disgrace the person toward whom they are published, or to render him odious, ridiculous, or contemptible in the estimation of the public.

This rule was applied in the reported case (THOMPSON v. ADELBERG & BERMAN, ante, 1594), where large yellow cards reading, "Please Take Notice, OUR COLLECTOR was here for payment. We would save you the annoyance of his further calls, if you will pay at the store. THE UNION CLOTHING STORE," were placed in the door and windows of plaintiff's house, and on a support near the front sidewalk, the court holding that the placing of the placards in such conspicuous places, and in so artful a manner, showed a studied effort to coerce the payment of a debt by publishing plaintiff's delinquency, and thus disgracing her in the eyes of the public, and, therefore, that they were libelous per se.

So, in Green v. Minnes (1891) 22 Ont. Rep. 177, where large yellow posters advertising a number of accounts for sale, including that of the plaintiff, were posted by a collection agency conspicuously in several parts of the city where plaintiff lived, it was held, in accordance with plaintiff's contention, that such posters were intended to force and compel payment, and that the necessary and intended consequences of such posting were to injure and defame the plaintiff's reputation, and to degrade and subject him to annoyance, ridicule, and disgrace, and to make him guilty of fraud and dishonesty, and appear unworthy of trust or credit, which implied that he was a cheat and swindler,—that the posters were libelous, Armour, Ch. J., arguing that, since the poster was striking in color and unusual in character, reasonable men reading it would understand from it that the debtors referred to therein were persons from whom the accounts which they were therein alleged to owe could not be collected by process of law, and were insolvent or dishonest debtors, and being so understood by reasonable men, the poster would have the effect of bringing discredit upon the debtors therein mentioned, and of lowering them in the estimation of their neighbors. It was further held in this case that, since the action was a civil one, the defendant could justify only by showing the truth of the whole matter published, and that he had not done so, since the amount stated in the poster was in excess of that actually owed by plaintiff.

And in Woodling v. Knickerbocker (1883) 31 Minn. 268, 17 N. W. 387, it was held that the placing on furniture standing on the sidewalk in front of a store, of a placard, reading, "This was taken from Dr. Woodling, as he would not pay for it; for sale at a bargain," and of another placard but 2 feet from it, worded, "Moral: Beware of dead-beats," was a publication of a gross libel, since, when read together, as they were undoubtedly intended to be, they were clearly defamatory.

And again, in Wolfenden v. Giles (1892) 2 B. C. 279, where a commercial agency printed a large yellow placard containing the names of a number of well-known and well-to-do persons, with alleged debts of small amounts set opposite their names, with the nature of the debts, and announced a sale of such debts at auction, taken together with a circular demanding payment by a certain date, in which case the debtors' names would be removed from the placard, it was held that such placard and circular constituted a libel, the court maintaining that the method adopted was not the ordinary one provided by law for the collection of debts, and that the placard, under the circumstances, was in fact a black list, since it implied to any reasonable man looking at it that all ordinary efforts to obtain payment had failed, and that the debtors either would not, or could not, pay for it, and were either dishonest or insolvent; especially since it did not appear that any usual method of collection had been resorted to, and had failed. The question in this case arose on a motion for an injunction to restrain further publication of the alleged libel, and the court, in granting a restraining order, took the position that it could only be granted if it clearly appeared that the alleged wrongful matter was libelous.

But the placarding of a mere offer to sell an alleged debt is not criminal libelous, where it does not necessarily imply inability to pay, and it does not appear to be false. Reg. v. Coughlan (1865) 4 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 316. The publication consisted of a placard reading as follows: "W. Gee, solicitor, Bishop Startford. To be sold at auction if not previously disposed of by private contract, a debt of the above, amounting to £3,197, due upon partnership and mortgage transactions."

Where a plea of justification is entered against a declaration in libel based upon the posting of placards, the plea, which by its nature is in confession and avoidance, admits a prima facie case for the plaintiff, so that any evidence in support of the plea, of whatever amount or weight, necessarily raises a question of preponderance, and makes a question for the jury, thereby precluding for the from directing a finding for either party absolutely. Thus, in Gault v. Babbitt (1878) 1 Ill. App. 130, where a landlord posted upon and in front of the premises occupied by his tenant, signboards and cards upon which were conspicuously painted the words, "Waiting for Tom Gault's house rent for lower story . . . several months due," which were alleged to thereby charge a fraudulent withholding of such rent, it was held that any evidence, however slight, in support of the plea, made a case for the jury as to the real meaning of the words used on the placards, as well as to whether the whole charge, substantially as made, was justified.

In Woodling v. Knickerbocker (Minn.) supra, it was held that the question whether or not the words on a placard affixed to furniture standing in front of a furniture store, "Taken back from Dr. Woodling, who could not pay for it; to be sold at a bargain," were libelous, was for the jury since they were reasonably susceptible of a defamatory meaning, as well as an innocent one, according to the circumstances. In other words, "what meaning, whether injurious or not injurious to plaintiff, they would convey to ordinary men who read them without a knowledge of the transaction to which they referred, was for the jury to determine, in view of the circumstances under which they were exposed to the public perusal."

In Spall v. Massey (1819) 2 Starkie (Eng.) 559, an action on the case for setting up near the plaintiff's door a board inscribed, "Beware of bad houses," etc., the defendant pleaded justification in that plaintiff did keep a disorderly house, and, having made out a strong case, the plaintiff elected to be nonsuited.

See also Davis v. Weltner (city court of New York, February, 1889) in which, as cited in Townshend, Libel and Slander, p. 211, note 1, it appeared that a barber, claiming that a customer was in his debt, put in his store window a cup with the customer's name on it, inscribed, "This man owes this shop, for shaving, $1.15 since 1885," and in which the customer, denying owing anything, recovered a verdict as for a libel. G. J. C.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Crawford County overruling a demurrer to a petition charging him with defrauding plaintiff of money, by alleged false representations. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. L. Burton and Denison & Kirkpatrick for appellant.

Mr. S. L. Walker for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Kethi Robar Orozem brought an action against C. A. McNeill, charging him with having retained too large a portion of a collection made for her through him. A demurrer to her petition, on the ground that the action was one for relief on the ground of fraud and was barred by the two-year Statute of Limitations, was overruled. The defendant appeals.

The petition set out substantially these facts: The plaintiff had a claim against a railroad company on account of the death of her husband. She made a contract with a lawyer to undertake the collection thereof for a contingent fee of 40 per cent. The lawyer arranged with the law firm of which McNeill was a member to assist in the prosecution of an action against the company for one half of the fee, after the deduction of expenses. Such an action was brought in a Missouri court. A verdict for $7,000 was returned for the plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered. While a motion for a new trial was pending, McNeill negotiated a compromise with the company, by which the claim was to be satisfied by the payment of $6,000. He then induced the plaintiff to give him a power of attorney to effect a settlement, and to agree to an adjustment by which she should receive $2,650. To accomplish this he concealed from her the fact that the agreement with the company on a $6,000 basis had already been made, and represented to her that, unless she consented to accept the $2,650 as her share of the claim, an appeal would be taken and a new trial had, and that delay and a net loss to her would result. The company paid McNeill $6,000, of which he turned over to the plaintiff $2,650, retaining the rest. This action is brought for $950, on the theory that she was entitled to 60 per cent of the amount collected, and that her consent to the acceptance of $2,650 in full of her claim was obtained by the false representations already set out.

The money was paid and divided in November, 1913. No allegation is made that the fraud alleged to have been practised upon the plaintiff was not at once discovered. This action was begun in January, 1916. The defendant maintains that it is one for relief on the ground of fraud, and is barred because not brought within two years; no tolling of the statute through a delay in the discovery of the real facts being alleged. Young v. Whittenhall, 15 Kan. 580. The plaintiff contends that it is her privilege to sue upon the implied contract arising from the defendant's duty to pay her the amount claimed, and that such an action may be brought at any time within three years, since the statute fixes that period as the limitation for "an action upon contract, not in writing, express or implied." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 6907, subd. 2. This court has held that "wherever one person commits a wrong or tort against the estate of another, with the intention of benefiting his own estate, the law will, at the election of the party injured, imply or presume a contract on the part of the wrongdoer to pay to the party injured the full value of all benefits resulting to such wrongdoer." Fanson v. Linsley, 20 Kan. 235.

And such is the general rule (note in Ann. Cas. 1913D, 230), which extends to cases where one has been fraudulently induced to part with his money (same note, p. 237; note in 134 Am. St. Rep. 194, 195, 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1107). The courts do not agree in their statements of the precise grounds of the rule, or of its scope. It is not merely an expression of the thought that, if a contract exists, the ordinary remedy for its violation is not cut off because the act complained of also amounts to a tort or fraud. Cases illustrating that phase of the matter are collected and discussed in the note first referred to, at pages 228, 229. In such cases the plaintiff is not required to prove the tort in order to obtain a judgment, and the defendant is not allowed to prove it in order to defeat it; the contract actually exists by the agreement of the parties, and does not result from a legal fiction. But in the broader form in which the rule is stated in the Kansas decision quoted from, it is based, at least in part, upon the principle that the fact that property has been wrongfully obtained from another creates an obligation to return it, which may be treated as the result of an implied promise. Therefore, to show the existence of the fictitious contract or quasi contract sued upon, the plaintiff not only may, but (where this phase of the rule is relied on) must, allege and prove the tort or fraud. It is often said that the person aggrieved may waive the tort and sue upon the implied contract, but this expression is open to some misapprehension. What he waives is the right to seek relief through a procedure peculiar to actions founded on tort. Having the privilege of pursuing either remedy, he elects to declare upon an implied contract, instead of upon the tort. He does not waive the wrong or fraud that has been practised upon him, by which the defendant has obtained his money or property; but he alleges in effect that, because it was so unlawfully obtained from him, a promise to restore it is implied.

"The tort is, however, waived only in the sense that a party having a right to sue in tort or assumpsit will not, after he has elected to sue in assumpsit, be allowed to sue in tort. By such an election that which was before the election tortious does not cease to be so. In fact, when the assumpsit is brought, it is only by showing that the defendant did a tortious act that the plaintiff is able to recover. There being no contract between the parties, unless the defendant is guilty of some wrong the plaintiff can establish no cause of action against him." Keener, Quasi Contracts, 159, 160.

According to this view, the circumstance that the plaintiff is required to prove the fraud or other tort in order to recover does not prevent the maintenance of his action as one upon an implied contract. In a number of cases it has been held that the fact that a right of action upon a tort has been barred by the Statute of Limitations does not ordinarily prevent a suit being maintained upon the resulting implied contract, where the situation is such as to make that remedy otherwise available. Note in Ann. Cas. 1913D, 238. This doctrine has been criticized on the ground that "there is no conceivable reason why, in the case of a particular wrong, one form of action should be available after another is barred; the purpose of the statute is that upon the expiration of the specified period no action shall be brought for the redress of the wrong." Woodward, Quasi Contracts, § 294.

In jurisdictions where the common-law forms of action have been abolished, the nature rather than the form of an action is regarded as determining what Statute of Limitations is applicable. Note in 12 Ann. Cas. 175. Adherence to that view is indicated by a decision of this court, the scope of which is shown by this language of the opinion: "It may be objected that this was not an action for relief on the ground of fraud; that it was simply a proceeding against a garnishee. But legal proceedings, like things, are what they are in essence and not what they may be named. The essential thing in this proceeding was that the plaintiff desired to be relieved from the legal consequences of the execution of these conveyances, and for this purpose he charged that they were fraudulently made. That he charged this by his evidence, rather than by a formal petition, could make no difference in the nature and essence of his action, nor limit the right of the party against whom the relief was sought, to urge the bar of the Statute of Limitations." Nelson v. Stull, 65 Kan. 585, 591, 68 Pac. 618.

In the present case, according to the allegations of the petition, an adjustment was had between the plaintiff and the defendant, by which she agreed to accept $2,650 in full of her claim. She cannot recover in any form of action, unless she in effect succeeds in having that settlement set aside on the ground of fraud; to accomplish that purpose is essentially the object of her proceeding. The statute declares that "an action for relief on the ground of fraud" must be brought within two years from the discovery thereof. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 6907, subd. 3. By its terms this provision might apply to an action nominally based upon an implied contract, as well as to one avowedly founded upon a tort. Inasmuch as the fraud must be shown in order to warrant a recovery, the action is literally one "for relief on the ground of fraud." The contract feature of the case is a mere fiction growing out of the fraud. This provision of the statute is fairly to be regarded as entitled to preference over the one relating to the time within which actions upon contracts must be brought, because of being more specific in its nature.

Another reason exists for giving it the greater effect. In enacting this law the legislature had before it the question as to how long, as a matter of public policy, a person who has been defrauded, and who knows of the fraud, ought to be allowed to wait before invoking a judicial examination of the facts. Consideration must have been given to the argument that the peculiar difficulty in meeting a charge of fraud—in establishing the good faith of a transaction which, upon its face, is conclusive of the rights of the parties—may be greatly increased by delay, and that the accused ought in fairness to be called to account within a reasonable time, short enough so that his means of showing the true facts would not be likely to have been impaired. Inasmuch as the lawmaking body, presumably upon this reasoning, has decided that a charge of fraud as a basis for relief to the injured person should not be entertained unless made within two years of its discovery, it may well be thought that for the courts to permit substantially the same result to be achieved by bringing an action upon an implied contract to restore the fruits of the fraud would be to allow the legislative purpose to be defeated by indirection.

The court concludes that, whatever may be the rule as to other torts, an action upon an implied promise, resulting from the fraudulent obtaining of the plaintiff's money, must be brought within two years after the discovery of the fraud.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the petition.

Marshall, J., dissents.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Mason, J., on November 9, 1918, handed down the following additional opinion (103 Kan. 694, 176 Pac. 106):

The plaintiff has filed a petition for a rehearing, in which the legal questions passed upon are further discussed. The court, however, remains of its original view.

The plaintiff also contends that the opinion is based upon an erroneous conception of her petition, especially in that the court assumed that the allegations of the pleading showed that a settlement had been effected between the plaintiff and the defendant, by the terms of which she was to accept $2,650 in full of her share of the sum paid by the company. She asserts that this assumption is unfounded, and maintains that, considered as a whole and properly interpreted, her petition shows that an arrangement existed between her and the defendant, by which the latter was to receive 40 and the former 60 per cent of any amount collected from the railroad company; and that while this arrangement was in force she agreed with him that an adjustment might be made with the company, such that 60 per cent of the amount paid (which would have to be $4,416.66) would amount to $2,650. If this were the actual situation, and the plaintiff received that sum ($2,650), while she was entitled to $960 more, because of the company having paid $6,000, then, of course, she would be entitled to recover from McNeill the difference (or $950) irrespective of any question of fraud. If the petition shows such a state of facts, and the allegations of fraud

actions—fraud—
implied contract
—concealment—

are ignored, it sets out a good cause of action on contract.

To determine whether it fairly bears this construction requires a consideration of its exact language. The portion of it affecting this question reads as follows: "That immediately after the acceptance of the said $6,000 settlement of said judgment, the said C. A. McNeill caused this plaintiff to be sent for, and brought from her then home in Ross township to his office in the city of Columbus, Kansas, and the said C. A. McNeill then and there failed, neglected, and refused to notify and inform the plaintiff that a settlement of said case and judgment for the sum of $6,000 had been agreed upon, but then and there falsely stated and represented to the plaintiff that, if she did not accept the sum of $2,650 as her share of said claim and judgment, there would be an appeal taken in said case from said judgment, and that there would be much more expense added, and a long time before she got any money, and that she would not get as much as $2,650 in the end, and she would have to make another trip to the state of Missouri, and take her witnesses, and have another trial of said case, and the said C. A. McNeill then and at all times failed, neglected, and refused to notify her of said settlement, and that by virtue of the terms of the contract of employment with said attorneys she was entitled to the sum of $3,600, and that there was then due and owing her the sum of $3,600, as her share of said compromise settlement, but by the false statement aforesaid led her to believe that no settlement had been made, but that one could probably be made for such sum and amount that her share, 60 per cent thereof, would amount to $2,650, and that if she did not accept said sum of $2,650 another trial would be had, and she would have to make another trip to the state of Missouri for such trial, and take witnesses to Missouri, and the expense would be large, and that she would not then receive as much as $2,650, and, relying on such false representations and statements of said C. A. McNeill, and believing them to be true, and not knowing of said settlement for $6,000, the plaintiff informed him that under such conditions she would rather accept $2,650, and authorized him to make a settlement accordingly."

The petition does not show that any contractual relations whatever existed between the plaintiff and defendant until the time of the conference between them referred to. The plaintiff's agreement, providing for a 60-40 division of the amount collected, was made with the other attorneys, and the fact that they employed McNeill to assist them did not make him the plaintiff's attorney, nor create any contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. 2 R. C. L. 968, 969. There seems never to have been any negotiation between the plaintiff and the defendant, fixing his fee at 40 per cent of the recovery.

Attorney and client—employment of assistants—relation to client.

The petition alleges that McNeill had effected a settlement with the railroad company before his conference with the defendant. This could not be literally true as a legal proposition, for up to that time the defendant had not authorized him to bind her by an agreement; the allegation should doubtless be construed as meaning that he had ascertained that the company was willing to pay $6,000 for a full release. The allegation is also made that McNeill told her that for various reasons it would be wise for her to agree to an adjustment by which she should receive $2,650 in full of her claim; that she understood from this that the settlement contemplated would be made on such a basis that 60 per cent of the amount paid by the company would amount to $2,650. It is not alleged that McNeill said so, but that, by what he did say as to the wisdom of her accepting such sum, she was led to believe this to be the case. The part of the petition relating to the adjustment winds up by the statement that the plaintiff informed McNeill that, under the conditions he had stated, she would accept that sum and "authorize him to make a settlement accordingly." This seems clearly to mean, not that she authorized him to settle with the company for such an amount that 60 per cent would be $2,650, but that she authorized him to make an adjustment which would include a settlement with himself, she to receive $2,650 in full satisfaction of her claim. If this interpretation is correct, the pleading shows a settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant, which interposes a bar to her recovery, unless it is set aside for fraud, and the action is not one upon contract, except in the sense in which an action for fraud resulting in a benefit to the tort-feasor's estate may always be so regarded. In that case the conclusions stated in the original opinion control, and require an affirmation.

settlement—
effect.

An argument is made to the effect that the petition should be interpreted as showing that the plaintiff did not at once learn of the falseness of the representations made to her. If she claimed that she did not learn the real facts until within two years before the commencement of the action, she could have set the matter at rest by so alleging. The case cited in the original opinion (Young v. Whittenhall, 15 Kan. 579) is decisive of the proposition that such an allegation is necessary.

It may be added that Mr. Justice Porter and the writer of the opinion were inclined to agree with Mr. Justice Marshall, who dissented therefrom, that the three-year Statute of Limitations applied, but acquiesced in the decision of the majority; the question being one of the construction of a local statute, the meaning of which seems open to doubt, and the conclusion reached by the court not being one likely to produce unjust results.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

All the Justices concur.

ANNOTATION.

Action on implied contract arising out of fraud as within statutes of limitation applicable to fraud.

A search has disclosed only two cases other than the reported case (OROZEM v. MCNEILL, ante, 1598) as to the applicability of the Statute of Limitations relating to actions for fraud, to an action brought on an implied contract arising out of fraud. In each of these cases it was held that an action on an implied contract arising out of fraud was not barred, where the remedy in assumpsit was not barred by the Statute of Limitations, even though the statute had run against an action for the fraud, the court holding that the form of the action determined what Statute of Limitations was applicable. Bates v. Bates Mach. Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 619, 82 N. E. 911, 12 Ann. Cas. 174; Lamb v. Clark (1827) 3 Pick. (Mass.) 193.

In Bates v. Bates Mach. Co. (Ill.) supra, the action was for fraud in the violation of a contract, whereby the defendant had agreed to assign to the plaintiff certain patents for the manufacture of woven wire fence. The defendants set up the Statute of Limitations as a defense. It was held that the action, having been brought for fraud, within the statute relating to such actions, was barred, although, if the action had been on the written contract, it could not have been barred.

In Lamb v. Clark (Mass.) supra, it appeared that the defendant had come into possession by fraud of certain promissory notes of the plaintiff's testator. The plaintiff brought suit in assumpsit for the amount of the notes. The defendant claimed that the proper form of action was for fraud, and that an action in that form was barred by the Statute of Limitations. It was held that the plaintiff had the right to elect his remedy, and could waive the tort and sue in assumpsit, and that the fact that one remedy was barred did not bar the other.

In the reported case (OROZEM v. MCNEILL, ante, 1598), however, it is held that the nature of the cause of action, and not the form of the action, determines which Statute of Limitations applies, and that therefore, where the action is based on fraud, the Statute of Limitations governing actions arising out of fraud applies, whether the action is in form on an implied contract or ex delicto for fraud.

EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK OF ATCHISON, KANSAS, Appt.,

v.

ESTATE OF J. B. BETTS, Deceased.

Kansas Supreme Court — December 7, 1918.

(103 Kan. 807, 176 Pac. 660.)

Executor and administrator — contract by executor — who bound.

1. The doctrine that the only effect of contracts made by an executor or administrator is to bind himself individually applies to a contract made by the personal representative, in attempting to carry on and complete a building contract entered into by the decedent in his lifetime.

— duty to complete contract.

2. Notwithstanding the contract survives, the personal representative is not obliged to complete it; in case he does elect to carry on, he and those who deal with him are charged with knowledge of the law, which declares that the estate is interested in the business only to the extent of the profits.

— notes for material — who bound.

3. A decedent in his lifetime held a contract for the erection of a building, actual construction of which had been in progress about a month, when he died. The widow, who was the executrix of the estate, executed notes to a bank, signed by her as executrix, and applied the proceeds toward payment for labor and material which had been used in the construction of the building. She afterwards abandoned the enterprise, and the building was completed by the surety of the decedent. Held, that the notes were not a valid claim against the estate.

— authority to borrow money.

4. An executor has no general authority to borrow capital or funds with which to carry on or complete a contract made by his testator.

[See 11 R. C. L. 171.]

APPEAL by the bank from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County affirming a judgment of the Probate Court disallowing its claim against the estate of decedent, for an amount alleged to be due on promissory notes given to secure loans made by the bank to the executrix.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

liss, G. L. De Lacy, Walter E. Brown, W. A. S. Bird, and J. D. M. Hamilton, for appellant:

Contracts which are not personal survive the promisor's death and constitute a binding obligation upon the estate, for a breach of which it will be held liable.

Messrs. Clay Hamilton and Hazen & Gaw also for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question for determination is whether, under the particular facts in this case, the estate of the decedent is liable upon a contract made by his executrix.

J. B. Betts in his lifetime held a contract for the erection of a building for the Y. M. C. A. at Atchison; actual construction of the building had been in progress about a month at the time of his death. His widow was made executrix by his will, and some time after letters of administration issued from the probate court of Shawnee county she went to Atchison and arranged with the owner of the building to allow an estimate of the work already done, the estimate to be sent to the surety company (which had guaranteed the faithful performance of the contract), presumably in order to obtain its approval of the payment of the amount allowed. Without waiting to hear from the surety company, the executrix arranged with the Exchange National Bank of Atchison to make her a loan of $980 on two promissory notes, which she executed to the bank and signed "Lulu M. Betts, Ex." The proceeds of these notes went in partial payment for labor and material used in the construction of the building. The surety company never approved the allowance of the estimate, and, a week or ten days after the money was obtained from the bank, Mrs. Betts turned over the contract to the surety company, which completed the building with a loss under the original contract. The estate is insolvent; it is said the general creditors will receive from 10 to 15 cents on the dollar of their claims. The bank's claim for the amount due on the promissory notes was presented and filed against the estate. The probate court disallowed the claim. The district court held that the notes are not a valid claim against the estate, and rendered judgment against the bank, and from the judgment the bank appeals.

The plaintiff concedes the force of the general rule that the executor or administrator cannot bind the estate by a new contract, and that the only effect of contracts made by him is to bind himself individually. Shrigley v. Black, 59 Kan. 487, 53 Pac. 477; Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760; Brown v. Quinton, 80 Kan. 44, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 71, 102 Pac. 242, 18 Ann. Cas. 290; Milbourne v. Kelley, 93 Kan. 753, 759, 145 Pac. 816, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 389.

The contention is that an exception arises in cases of building contracts entered into by the decedent during his lifetime, which remain uncompleted at the time of his death, and which the executor or administrator elects to complete.

The plaintiff contends that the rule upon which it relies has been the law since Chief Justice Coke, as early as 1615, in the case of Quick v. Ludborrow, 3 Bulstr. 30, 81 Eng. Reprint, 25, used this language: "If a man be bound to build a house for another before such time, and he which is bound dies before the time, his executors are bound to perform this."

Plaintiff also quotes from Woerner on the American Law of Administration, 2d ed. § 328, as follows: "Thus, if one agrees to build a house before a given time, and dies before that time, his executors are bound to perform the contract; and the completion by an administrator of a decedent's contract to build a house attaches to his work all the liabilities of the original contract, so that a subcontractor is entitled to his lien for materials furnished the intestate."

From 3 Williams on Executors, 7th ed. 1892, the plaintiff quotes: "It must be observed that, when the law speaks of executors not carrying on the business of their testator, it means that they are not to buy and sell. There are many cases when executors not only may, but are bound to, continue the business to a certain extent. Thus, if a party contracts for himself and his executors to build a house, and dies, the executors must go on, or they will be liable in damages for not completing the work. So, if a party engages to build a house, and dies, after having procured all the necessary materials, it should seem that his executors ought to complete the work; . . . for otherwise those parts which he has purchased, upon the faith of the work being completed, are useless." *1794. (Italics ours.)

These authorities do not go the extent claimed by the plaintiff. All they decide is that building contracts are binding upon the heirs and executors of a decedent, and must be performed, or the estate "will be liable in damages for not completing the work." We fail to find any modern authority which upholds the contention that building contracts are in a class by themselves, and bind the executor or administrator to carry them out, regardless of consequences.

Executor and administrator—contract by executor—who bound.

In Chicago Lumber Co. v. Tomlinson, 54 Kan. 770, 39 Pac. 694, an action was brought against the executor and heirs to foreclose a mechanic's lien for material and labor used in erecting a building. In that case two parties made a contract for the erection of a building; one of them died, and the other contractor abandoned the contract before the completion of the building. The executor of the deceased contractor, who was also one of the heirs, entered into a new contract with the plaintiff and completed the building. It was held that he was personally liable, but could not as executor, without express authority in the will, bind the estate by the new contract. The contention of the plaintiff in the present case that building contracts stand in a class by themselves was not considered.

In 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, 236, there will be found an exhaustive note, with numerous citations from the American courts, on the question of the powers and liabilities of a personal representative, testamentary trustee, or guardian carrying on business. The author classifies the exceptions to the rule, holding the personal representative alone liable, some of the exceptions being based upon statutory provisions, or the fact that the business has been carried on under the order of court; but no reference is made to any exception to the rule based upon building contracts. It is said in the note: "The weight of authority is to the effect that the executor, even though he carries on a trade or business pursuant to testamentary authority, is individually liable to creditors for all debts contracted by him while so engaged, and that the creditors cannot proceed against the estate in order to satisfy their claims." 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 203.

In 11 R. C. L., the exhaustive article on Executors and Administrators, while enumerating some of the exceptions to the general rule, makes no mention, so far as we have been able to discover, of any exception based upon building contracts. It is said that "to authorize executors to carry on a trade with the property of a testator held by them, there ought to be the most distinct and positive authority and direction given by the will itself for that purpose." Page 139.

Again it is said:

"Although, where a business or trade is carried on under the provisions of a will by virtue of a statute permitting it, or by an order of a competent court, a personal representative will be relieved from individual liability to the estate for losses, he will continue to be bound personally for all debts incurred by him in reference to the business. The courts take the position that he need not carry on the trade and incur this hazard, although authorized or directed to do so by the will; but by engaging in the business he voluntarily assumes the responsibility of making its contracts his personal obligations." (Italics ours.) Section 147.

"So careful have the courts always been to guard against the perilous consequences resulting from embarking the assets of an estate in trade that, even when the will authorizes the executor to carry on the business of the decedent, he cannot in so doing create liabilities against the general estate. Hence, such creditors have no claim on the general assets, since to hold the general assets liable would be attended with great inconvenience, and would prevent their distribution for a considerable period, or disturb a distribution already made." 11 R. C. L. § 148.

In Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760, which is not, however, directly in point, because the contract there was one which was dissolved by the death of the decedent, it was held that in the absence of a testamentary direction an administrator cannot carry on the business of a deceased person, "and if he does so without authority he will be individually bound for the contracts of the business." 73 Kan. 675, syl. 2. It was said in the opinion that one authorized by will "is not bound to incur the hazard; but, if he does, the contracts made will be his own, and he will be individually bound by them." 73 Kan. 679.

In arguing for the necessity of an exception to the general rule, the plaintiff says in its brief that "to say in one breath that there are certain contracts which the representative must complete, and in the next that he will be held personally liable for his acts, would be to create a situation so unjust and repugnant to the present-day standards that it could not be tolerated."

But the representative is not bound to complete a building contract. There are doubtless situations where it would be the exercise of wise discretion on his part to elect to finish a building, but he is not obliged to do it; and in case he does elect to carry on, he and all those who deal with him are charged with knowledge of the law, which declares that the estate is interested in the business only to the extent of the profits. Besides, no executor or administrator has general authority to borrow capital or funds with which to carry on or complete a contract made by the decedent. In any event, he would have authority to do no more than to employ capital or funds coming into his hands from the estate. He cannot bind the estate by executing notes for money borrowed by him, no matter whether the proceeds are used for the benefit of the estate or otherwise.

—duty to complete contract.

—authority to borrow money.

—notes for material—who bound.

It is insisted that the original contract was not one which required the personal skill of J. B. Betts. This may be conceded, and the reason why it is a contract which survives is that because, upon the death of J. B. Betts, it would not have been difficult to find others equally capable of completing the building according to the plans and specifications. But this very test, which demonstrates that the services of the contractor were not personal, and might have been performed by the successors of the promisor, or some other person employed by them, also demonstrates that the damages likely to be sustained by the owner of the building by the breach of the contract would probably not amount to much. In such a situation, an executor or administrator in determining whether to elect to carry out the contract might well consider the hazard of attempting to carry on, compared with the slight damages the owner of the building would be entitled to recover for the breach of the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Marshall, J., who did not sit.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of estate for debts incurred by executor or administrator in completing performance of a contract made by decedent.

The few decisions on the question concur with the reported case (EXCHANGE NAT. BANK v. BETTS, ante, 1604) in holding that (except where the executor is authorized by statute to complete unfinished work; see Bambrick v. Webster Groves Presby. Church Asso. (Mo.) infra) the general rule that an executor or administrator cannot bind the assets of the estate by his contracts is not subject to an exception in the case of debts incurred in completing the performance of a contract made by decedent in his lifetime, the obligation of which is not terminated by his decease. See Chicago Lumber Co. v. Tomlinson (1895) 54 Kan. 770, 39 Pac. 694; Alam's Estate (1901) 199 Pa. 573, 49 Atl. 252; Oram's Estate (1874) 9 Phila. (Pa.) 358; Bates's Estate (1910) 11 Del. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 429.

In Bambrick v. Webster Groves Presby. Church Asso. (1893) 53 Mo. App. 225, it was held that, under a statute providing that "if any person die leaving . . . property so exposed as to be in danger of loss in value, or work in an unfinished state, so that the estate would suffer material loss from the want of care and additional labor, the executor or administrator may until the meeting of the court procure such indispensable labor to be performed on the most reasonable terms that he can," the executrix of one who had died pending the completion of his contract for the erection of a building, might bind the estate for the reasonable value of materials furnished for the completion of the building, the executrix having acted in good faith, and to prevent injury to the estate.

To say that the rule that an executor or administrator cannot bind the assets of the estate by his contract is not subject to an exception in the case of debts incurred by him in carrying on an uncompleted contract is not, however, completely to dispose of the question, which has in it a further possibility which seems to have been overlooked in the reported case.

It is well settled that where an executor or administrator continues his decedent's business by virtue of authority conferred by the will or by articles of copartnership, he is entitled to be indemnified out of the assets embarked in the business (and, in some instances, out of the general assets of the estate) against the personal liability thus incurred (see 11 R. C. L. p. 140); and, as to the right of recourse for debts contracted in the performance of an unfinished contract, to the compensation received for the performance of the contract (Allam's Estate (1901) 199 Pa. 573, 49 Atl. 252, supra; Re Walsh (1904) 35 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 289, and Bates's Estate (1910) 11 Del. Co. Rep. (Pa.) 429). This right, however, may not be asserted as against testator's creditors, who have the right to insist on immediate realization and payment, unless it can be shown that the business was not merely continued under the will for the benefit of those interested under the will, but that it was so carried on with the sanction and assent of the creditors and on their behalf. See 11 R. C. L. p. 141. Thus, in Allam's Estate (Pa.) supra, it was held that the executor could not exercise his right to reimbursement for debts contracted in completing an unfinished contract as against creditors of the decedent. The auditor, whose report was affirmed by the court, said: "In Pennsylvania, when a person dies, all his creditors at once acquire a lien upon all his personal property within the state, and the law commits it to the care of an administrator or executor, upon the express trust to give each his due according to law. Horn-er v. Hasbrouck (1861) 41 Pa. 169. Was, then, this lien of the general creditors at death subject to be defeated by the election of the administrator to complete these contracts, or was their lien superior to any right of reimbursement by the administrator? No authority has been cited upon this question, and the auditor has been unable to find any in this state. Upon principle, however, he is of the opinion that debts contracted by the decedent in his lifetime are the superior lien. These debts are known, or ought to be known, by the administrator to be in existence at the time of the decedent's death, and his election to complete the contracts was made with this knowledge. His right to reimbursement in this regard is somewhat similar to the right of the heir to inherit personal property, subject to be defeated by those who were his creditors at his death. This seems to have been the accepted view in the analogous case of a direction in a will to continue the business of the testator. In

Lindley on Partnership, vol. 2, p. 609, the author says: "The liability of the estate of a deceased partner to persons who become creditors after his decease is subject to its liability to those who were his creditors at his decease. These last must first be paid, and although, as in such a case as Ex parte Garland (1803) 10 Ves. Jr. 120, 32 Eng. Rprint, 787, they might not be able to follow the assets of the deceased into the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy, yet, in administering the estate of a person whose assets have been employed in trade, in pursuance of directions contained in his will, the creditors who have become such since his decease cannot compete with his other creditors." See also Collyer on Partnership, § 633. The effect of this view will be to exclude from the present distribution all debts contracted by the administrator in the completion of these contracts, for the reason that the claims of creditors in existence at the time of the death of the decedent will much more than consume the fund. In fact, the amount of these claims in existence when decedent died exceeds many times the amount for distribution. This is no doubt a hardship as to the debts contracted by the administrator; but parties dealing in this way are bound to look to his authority, and are held to a knowledge of the limitations which the law places upon him. Their only remedy is against the administrator, and where, as here, there is no property against which he can have recourse."

It is, however, generally conceded that the case of an unfinished contract stands upon a different plane than the case of an ordinary business enterprise, engaged in by the decedent at the time of his death, from which his executor or administrator may withdraw without subjecting the estate to any liability for damages. Thus, it is said in Marshall v. Broadhurst (1831) 1 Crompt. & J. 403, 148 Eng. Reprint, 1480: "When the law speaks of the executors not carrying on the business of their testator, it means that they are not to buy and sell. We do not say that executors are bound to go on to an indefinite extent, but it is reasonable that they should do so to a certain extent. For instance, if a man make half a wheelbarrow or half a pair of shoes, and die, the executors may complete them, and they are not bound to sacrifice the property of their testator by selling articles in an imperfect state." It was accordingly held in that case that if one contracts for himself and his executors to build a house, and dies, the executors must go on, or be liable in damages for not completing the work; and that, having done so, they may recover in their representative capacity. So also, in Allam's Estate (1901) 199 Pa. 573, 49 Atl. 252, it is said that the principle to be deduced from the authorities seems to be that the administrator is vested with a sound discretion as to whether or not he will complete such contract; and that if he has acted as a cautious and prudent man would act under similar circumstances, and in good faith, he will not be surcharged, although the consequence may be bad.

Accordingly, in Re Walsh (1904) 35 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 289, it was held that as an administrator has the right to complete his decedent's contracts, he should be entitled to a pro rata distribution with the creditors of the decedent on the amount of loss sustained by him in their completion, the court saying: "It is true this conclusion does not appear to be sustained by Allam's Estate (Pa.) supra; but there does not appear to have been any claim made in that case by the administrator for a pro rata distribution with the other creditors on the amount of loss sustained by him, and this question was not discussed nor decided there. Had the executor here refused to complete these contracts, the estate would have been liable for the loss sustained by the hospital, Rowe, and Verner in finishing them, and they would have been creditors of the estate to the amount of such loss, and entitled to pro rata distribution thereon. And if the executor had paid them he would be subrogated to their rights as creditors, and entitled to pro rata distribution on the amount so paid. His right to such distribution is surely not defeated because, instead of allowing them to finish the work and paying them directly the amount of the loss, he assumed and paid it by completing the contracts himself."

And in Macdonald v. O'Shea (1910) 58 Wash. 169, 108 Pac. 436, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 417, it was held that a surety on the contractor's bond, which had discharged obligations incurred by the administrator in carrying out the contract after the contractor's death, might collect the amount so paid by foreclosing an indemnity mortgage held by it upon property of the decedent.

Now, where the executor or administrator is entitled to be indemnified for indebtedness incurred by him in carrying on the business, the creditors of the business may be subrogated to the rights of the executor or administrator against his decedent's estate (see Foxworth v. White (1882) 72 Ala. 224; Fridenburg v. Wilson (1885) 20 Fla. 359; Laible v. Ferry (1880) 32 N. J. Eq. 791, reversing (1879) 31 N. J. Eq. 566; Re Johnson (1880) L. R. 15 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 548, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 43 L. T. N. S. 372, 29 Week. Rep. 168; Re Frith [1902] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 342, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 86 L. T. N. S. 212; Re Kidd (1894) 70 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 648, 8 Reports, 261, 42 Week. Rep. 571; Frisby v. Owen (1892) 66 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 718; Braun v. Braun (1902) 14 Manitoba L. R. 346); such right, however, being governed by the same conditions as attend the right of the executor or administrator to be indemnified.

Accordingly, it would seem that where the completion of an unfinished contract is a proper act of administration, a debt thereby incurred by the executor or administrator might, though not a debt of the estate, be asserted against it on the theory that the creditor is equitably subrogated to his debtor's right to indemnity.

One other possibility remains to be considered.

It has been held that where an executor or administrator carries on the decedent's business for a reasonable time for the purpose of winding it up, the debts incurred by him may be allowed as expenses of administration. See Fleming v. Kelly (1902) 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272 (where, however, the business was carried on under the authority of the court and at a profit); Carroll v. Davidson (1871) 23 La. Ann. 428 (where the business was carried on under the authority of the court); Cornwell v. Deck (1874) 2 Redf. (N. Y.) 87, affirmed on other points in (1876) 8 Hun, 122; Merritt v. Merritt (1876) 62 Mo. 150; Re Semple (1899) 189 Pa. 385, 42 Atl. 28, reversing (1898) 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. (Pa.) 431; Newton v. Poole (1841) 12 Leigh (Va.) 112.

It would seem entirely consistent with the principle of these cases that an executor or administrator who, acting reasonably and in good faith, has elected to complete an unfinished contract made by his decedent, instead of paying damages, should be allowed (at least, where the estate is solvent) the amount of the debts thereby incurred. ### Constitutional law — industrial farm for women — discrimination.

1. Chapter 298 of the Laws of 1917, establishing a state industrial farm for women, does not violate § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nor § 1 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the state of Kansas, and does not deny the equal protection of the law to women convicted of offenses punishable by imprisonment.

— equal protection — different punishment for men and women.

2. The legislature may determine that women convicted of crime shall be less severely punished than men convicted of the same crime.

[See 6 R. C. L. 430.]

Criminal law — parole — interference with power of court.

3. A statutory provision giving the board of administration the power to parole women convicts after they are placed on the state farm does not interfere with the power of the court to grant parole at time of judgment, or before confinement on the farm begins.

APPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from custody to which she had been committed for alleged violation of the so-called Bone Dry Law. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. M. Etchen and Bert Van Leuven, for petitioner:

Chapter 298, laws of 1917, is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it contravenes § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and § 1 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the state of Kansas, in that females over twenty-five years are denied the equal protection of the laws.

Messrs. Alfred G. Armstrong and Thurman Hill for appellee.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Josie Dunkerton presents an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Notice of the hearing of the application has been given, and the matter is submitted on its merits. The petitioner is confined on the state industrial farm for women, under conviction for violating § 1 of chapter 215, Laws of 1917, commonly known as the "Bone Dry Law." She argues that the act under which she is confined (Laws 1917, chap. 298) is unconstitutional, for the reason that it contravenes § 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for the further reason that it contravenes § 1 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the state of Kansas, in this, that the act denies the equal protection of the law to women over twenty-five years of age. To support this argument, the petitioner contends that, in every case where a woman is convicted of violating any criminal law, and punishment by imprisonment is prescribed, the act takes from the trial court the right to impose the minimum penalty on her; that it takes from that court the right to parole women; that, under the act, women must be sentenced to the penitentiary; and that in these respects the punishment of women is more severe than the punishment of men for the same offense.

Boys under the age of sixteen years, who commit offenses punishable by imprisonment, may be sent to the state reform school. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 10,081. Girls under the age of eighteen years who commit similar offenses may be sent to the industrial school for girls.

Gen. Stat. 1915, § 10,108. Any male person between the ages of sixteen and twenty-five, who shall be convicted for the first time of any offense punishable by confinement in the state penitentiary, may be sent to the Kansas state industrial reformatory. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 10,053. Under these statutes boys and girls, and men and women, are not treated alike. Women cannot be sent to the state industrial reformatory. Boys over sixteen years of age cannot be sent to the state reform school, while girls between sixteen and eighteen years of age may be sent to the industrial school. Prior to the passage of the act now questioned, a woman over eighteen and under twenty-five who committed an offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, was sent to that institution. She could not be sent to any one of the other three institutions. Reformation and education are the primary objects of the reform school, of the state industrial reformatory, and of the industrial school. Punishment is incidental only. These institutions are primarily schools, not prisons. The constitutionality of the acts creating them, and of the acts providing for confinement of violators of the law in them, has not heretofore been questioned on the ground now presented.

The statute under consideration establishes an industrial farm for women, to which all women above the age of eighteen years, who shall be convicted of any offenses against the criminal laws of this state, must be sent. Section 5 of the act reads: "Every female person, above the age of eighteen years, who shall be convicted of any offense against the criminal laws of this state, punishable by imprisonment, shall be sentenced to the state industrial farm for women, but the court imposing such sentence shall not fix the limit or duration of the sentence. The term of imprisonment of any person so convicted and sentenced shall be terminated by the state board of administration, as authorized by this act, but such imprisonment shall not exceed the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the person was convicted; provided, that where the person, so convicted and sentenced to said industrial farm for women, is not more than twenty-five years of age and said conviction is for her first offense, the board of administration may parole or release such person under rules and regulations prescribed by said board before the expiration of the minimum term, but in all other cases, the person so committed to said institution shall not be eligible to parole by the board of administration until the expiration of the minimum term fixed by law for the punishment of the offense for which she has been convicted; provided further, that where any person has been committed to such institution on conviction for murder in the first or second degree, such person shall not be released from said institution until the expiration of the term for which such person is sentenced, except by action of the governor exercising his pardoning or parole power." (Laws 1917, ch. 298, § 5.)

The petitioner directs the attention of the court to part of § 14, and to all of § 22 of the act. The material part of § 14 reads: "The state board of administration shall provide equipment for the regular employment of all inmates of the state industrial farm for women, by erecting shops for the manufacture of goods and utensils and the purchase of farm machinery and stock which will permit light forms of agriculture, such as truck gardening, chicken raising and dairying, not to the exclusion of the cultivation of cereals and grasses. It shall be the duty of the superintendent to provide for the daily labor of all inmates according to their capacity and adaptability."

The purpose of the Act of 1917 is to ameliorate the condition of women who have been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment. Under the act, women are not subject to the debauching influence of the county jail and of the penitentiary, and of the close confinement therein, but are placed in a field where labor is pleasant and restraint is limited, and where the evil influence of other persons convicted of crime is minimized. The act seeks to improve, to educate, and to build up, not to punish. The court is asked to say that the law is unconstitutional because, in accomplishing these objects, it imposes restraint on women different from that imposed on men. Morgan v. State, 179 Ind. 300, 101 N. E. 6, is cited by the petitioner. There, the supreme court of Indiana held that a statute which prescribed a treatment of men acquitted of crime on the ground of insanity, different from that accorded women thus acquitted, denied to women the equal protection of the law, and contravened the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The reasoning in that case is not convincing. The legislature may very properly determine that women convicted of crime shall be less severely punished than men convicted of the same crime. The number of women that commit crimes is much smaller than the number of men committing similar crimes, and that fact may be taken into consideration by the legislature, and punishment may be prescribed which recognizes that difference.

It is argued that the Act of 1917 takes away from the district court the right to parole a woman convicted in that court of any offense. The statute does not in terms so declare. It does provide that, after she has been placed on the farm, the board of administration may parole, but that does not exclude the trial court from paroling at the time judgment is rendered, or before confinement on the farm begins. There is always a department of the state government with authority to parole a woman who has been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment, or who is confined on the industrial farm.

Criminal law—parole—interference with power of court.

It is argued that sentencing a woman to the industrial farm is the same as sentencing her to the penitentiary. The industrial farm is not the penitentiary; they are separate institutions, operated in different ways, to accomplish different objects. The only resemblance between the two is the restraint placed upon their inmates to prevent them from leaving the institutions. The petitioner's attack on the law cannot be sustained, and her application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute as affected by discrimination in punishments for same offense based upon age, color, or sex.

- I. Age, 1614.
- II. Race or color, 1616.
- III. Sex, 1618.

I. Age.

The constitutionality of statutes providing for the detention of juveniles who have been convicted of offenses punishable by imprisonment for a period of time and at a place different from that of more mature offenders has often been upheld, as against the contention that unequal penalties are thus imposed.

California.—Ex parte Liddell (1892) 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251; Ex parte Nichols (1896) 110 Cal. 651, 43 Pac. 9.

Georgia.—Taylor v. Means (1912) 139 Ga. 578, 77 S. E. 373.

Illinois.—People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory (1894) 148 Ill. 413, 23 L.R.A. 139, 36 N. E. 76.

Massachusetts.—Com. v. Pear (1903) 183 Mass. 242, 67 L.R.A. 935, 66 N. E. 719.

Minnesota.—State ex rel. Schulman v. Phillips (1898) 73 Minn. 77, 75 N. W. 1029.

New York.—People ex rel. Duntz v. Coon (1893) 67 Hun, 523, 22 N. Y. Supp. 865.

Texas.—Ex parte Walker (1889) 28 Tex. App. 246, 13 S. W. 861; Johns v. State (1911) 63 Tex. Crim. Rep. 416, 140 S. W. 1093.

Thus, in California, it has been held that the fact that, under statutes providing that minor children who have been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the county jails or penitentiaries may be committed to the state reformatory or industrial schools for a term not less than one nor more than five years, the term of detention at the reform school may be made greater by the judgment of the court than the term of imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison for the same offense would be, does not render the statute unconstitutional as prescribing unjust or unequal penalties; since, as the object of the act is not punishment, but reformation, discipline, and education, it cannot be said that the punishment inflicted is greater than would be put upon an adult for the same offense. Ex parte Liddell (1892) 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251; Ex parte Nichols (1896) 110 Cal. 651, 43 Pac. 9. In Ex parte Liddell (Cal.) supra, the court argued as follows: "While detained for a longer period, perhaps, than he would be if sent to state prison or the county jail, the conditions surrounding the child are vastly different. He is given the opportunity and instruction to learn a trade, and qualify himself for the duties of citizenship, so that at the end of his term he will go out prepared to take care of himself and those dependent upon him, without the odium which is attached to an ex-convict. There is no doubt of the power of the state to make and enforce provisions for the compulsory education of all children within the state; and it is equally clear that the state may arrest the downward tendency of those who have offended against its laws, and manifest a disposition to follow a criminal career, by placing them in an institution where they will receive the care, education, and discipline necessary to prepare them for honorable citizenship. . . . The legislature, in its wisdom, has endeavored to provide a place for children manifesting criminal traits, where they can be cared for without being thrown under the baneful influence of veterans in crime. We think the policy of the act a wise one, and we see no constitutional ground for declaring it invalid."

So, in Georgia, it has been held that the sentencing of a minor to an industrial farm, in accordance with a statute providing for so sentencing minors convicted of misdemeanors, was not void on the ground that such minor was thereby denied the equal protection of the laws, in that all other persons, upon being convicted of a misdemeanor, can only be sentenced to a term of imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, whereas the sentence complained of was for confinement for a term not exceeding eleven years. Taylor v. Means (1912) 139 Ga. 578, 77 S. E. 373. This, also, was upon the theory that the sentence in the present case was not one imposing punishment under the purely penal statutes of the state, it being said that the purpose of the statute was not punishment alone, but restraint and correction under circumstances that tended to the mental and moral uplift of the child, and the proper formation of its character.

Likewise, in State ex rel. Schulman v. Phillips (1898) 73 Minn. 77, 75 N. W. 1029, it was held that a statute providing for the commitment of minors under sixteen years of age, convicted of crime, to a state training school during minority, unless sooner released by the board of managers, was not unconstitutional as inflicting a greater degree of punishment upon children under sixteen years of age than for older children, and, therefore, that an infant under sixteen, who had been convicted of petit larceny and sentenced to the reform school under the statute, could not obtain his release by habeas corpus. The court said: "The school is not a 'prison,'—a place of punishment,—in the usual acceptation of the term, but a public industrial school, where children who have made a wrong start in life are educated, trained, and afforded an opportunity to become honest, self-reliant, industrious, and useful citizens. The necessary restraint imposed upon them is not punitive, but parental, in its character."

And in People ex rel. Duntz v. Coon (1893) 67 Hun, 523, 22 N. Y. Supp. 865, a statute establishing a house of refuge for women, and providing for the sentencing thereto of all females between the ages of fifteen and thirty, who have been convicted of certain specified misdemeanors, for a term of not more than five years, unless sooner discharged by the board of managers, has been held not to be unconstitutional as an unequal protection of the laws, in that the statute provides a longer term and a different place of confinement for females falling within its terms than for females of other ages, whose punishment for similar offenses is a fine or imprisonment for one year or both. It was said that it is within the power of the legislature to provide a punishment for children and young women at a different place and for a different period than the imprisonment provided for persons of a different age for the same offense, that the statute applies equally to all females within the ages specified, and that such power has been too long exercised to be now questioned.

And again, in Illinois, it has been held (People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory (1894) 148 Ill. 413, 23 L.R.A. 139, 36 N. E. 76) that a constitutional requirement that all penalties shall be apportioned to the nature of the offense was not violated by a statutory provision for the commitment of minors between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, who have been convicted of crime, to a reformatory for an indefinite period, while an adult convicted of the same crime has a statutory right to have the term of his imprisonment, within the limits fixed by statute, determined by a jury. The court reasoned that there is a marked distinction between persons of mature age and those who are minors, and that the legislature could properly take such distinction into consideration in fixing the punishment for crime, both in determining the method of its infliction, and in limiting its quantity and duration. However, the court was also of opinion that a sentence imposed by virtue of the statute was, in fact, a penalty and punishment for crime committed, and not for the sole and only purpose of reforming the offender.

In Ex parte Walker (1889) 28 Tex. App. 246, 13 S. W. 861, without setting out the reasons therefor, it was held that a statute abolishing capital punishment in all cases where the offender has not, at the time of the commission of the offense, arrived at the age of seventeen years, was not subject to the constitutional objection that it was class legislation, and contrary to the principles of American government.

And that a statutory provision for incarceration of defendants under sixteen years of age in a state reformatory instead of a penitentiary is not unconstitutional, but is a wise and salutary provision of the law, see Johns v. State (1911) 63 Tex. Crim. Rep. 416, 140 S. W. 1093.

In Com. v. Pear (1903) 183 Mass. 242, 67 L.R.A. 935, 66 N. E. 719, it was held that the exemption of minors from the penalty imposed by a statute for refusal to be vaccinated did not render the statute unconstitutional as working an inequality, since it only limited such liability to persons who had a right to control their own conduct.

II. Race or color.

Equality of protection under the laws, as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, implies that in the administration of criminal justice no person, by reason of his race or color, shall be subjected for the same offense to any greater or different punishment than that to which persons of another race or color are subjected. Pace v. Alabama (1883) 106 U. S. 583, 27 L. ed. 207, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637; Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan (1879) 5 Sawy. 552, Fed. Cas. No. 6,546; Ellis v. State (1868) 42 Ala. 525.

Applying this general rule, it has been held that an ordinance which was directed against and confined in its execution to Chinamen, and which provided for the cutting or clipping of the hair of all persons confined in the county jail to within 1 inch of the head, was in violation of the 14th Amendment in that it constituted special legislation, and imposed an additional as well as degrading and cruel punishment upon a class of persons who are entitled to the equal protection of the law. Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan (1879) 5 Sawy. 552, Fed. Cas. No. 6,546.

But in the Maryland case of Plunkard v. State (1887) 67 Md. 364, 10 Atl. 225, 309, it was held that a bastardy law relating to "any white woman" giving birth to an illegitimate child, and not embracing in its terms colored women, and providing for her incarceration unless she give bond or disclose the father of the child, was not unconstitutional as denying the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. The majority of the court, after recognizing that a proceeding under this statute against the white mother of an illegitimate child would be criminal in its nature, adopted the following views: "The statute aims at no redress for private or personal wrongs done to the mother. The act intended to be punished involves no invasion of the mother's rights; no element of trespass or violence; she is a consenting party. It is not a case where she would otherwise be left exposed, without the protection of the law, to trespasses, assaults, or violence; hence the argument that the colored mother is exposed when the white mother is protected, and that redress is extended to the one and denied to the other, is really without foundation. No personal right is invaded; no privilege or immunity of the white or colored mother is interfered with. Still more unfounded is the suggestion that the child itself is protected in the one case, and left exposed in the other. No such result is contemplated by the statute, and nothing of the kind follows as an incident of its enforcement. The security required is not for the benefit of the child; it is intended only to protect the public from the maintenance of the child; and if that indemnity is not given, it is a mistake to suppose that the child is left without nurture, maintenance, or support. The county or public is charged with its maintenance, and unless the indemnity contemplated by the statute is given, the burden of maintaining the child, whether the illegitimate offspring of a white or colored mother, still rests upon the public. If the child is not left to perish under the law, as the argument assumes, the burden of its support is only shifted and placed on the father as a measure of punishment upon him, and this punishment falls equally, without respect to race or color." It should be noted that in this case the defendant was the disclosed father of an illegitimate child by a "white" woman, and that the objections to the constitutionality of the statute were raised by him, and not by "any white woman" incarcerated for failure to comply with the statute. In the latter case it would seem that a stronger case of discrimination could be presented. It is also of interest that Stone, J., dissented, upon the ground that since the 14th Amendment means that there shall not be in any state one law applying to the white race, and another and different one applying to the black, especially with respect to criminal laws, the Maryland statute above cited is in direct controversion of that Amendment, in that it applies exclusively to the whites.

And it has been held that an Alabama statute, punishing adultery or fornication committed by a white person and a negro with each other more severely than the same offense committed between persons of the same race and color is punished, does not make a discrimination against the colored person, within the meaning of the rule as laid down in the preceding paragraph where the statute applies the same punishment to both offenders, the black and the white, the offense, as outlined, being distinct, and the discrimination in the punishment prescribed being directed against the offense designated, and not against the person of any particular race or color. Pace v. Alabama (1883) 106 U. S. 583, 27 L. ed. 207, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637, affirming (1881) 69 Ala. 231, 44 Am. Rep. 513 (see also Rose's Notes to this case); Ellis v. State (1868) 42 Ala. 525; Ford v. State (1875) 53 Ala. 150, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 161.

In Arkansas, it was held that a statute making it a capital offense for a negro or mulatto merely to attempt the commission of rape on a white woman, whereas a white man was only to be imprisoned therefor, did not contravene a constitutional provision that "any slave who shall be convicted of a capital offense shall suffer the same degree of punishment as would be inflicted upon a free white person, and no other." Charles v. State (1851) 11 Ark. 389; Pleasant v. State (1853) 13 Ark. 360. In Charles v. State (Ark.) supra, the court argued as follows: "It is contended that the proper construction of this constitutional provision is that the legislature cannot declare that a negro shall be hung for an offense, when a white man, for the same offense, is only punishable by imprisonment. It is conceded by counsel for the accused that the legislature possesses the power to make an act criminal in a slave, which would not be so in a white man; but then he insists that, as to acts or offenses which are common to both, and made criminal in both, a slave cannot be hung, when for the same offense a white man would only be imprisoned. We cannot concur in the construction claimed for the constitutional provision referred to; but, on the contrary, are fully persuaded that it is not in accordance with the spirit and intention of that instrument. If the offense charged against the appellant had been declared capital, whether committed by a white man or negro, but that, in the case of the former, the mode of execution should be by hanging by the neck, whereas the latter should be first scourged, and then burned, and finally destroyed by hanging, there can be no doubt but that such act would be unconstitutional, and consequently void. . . . All that was designed to be understood by the provision in the Constitution was that, in case a negro should be convicted of a capital crime, he should not undergo other or greater punishment than that which should be inflicted upon a white man for an offense which would subject him to capital punishment." It will be observed that this decision, therefore, was made to turn upon the fact that a distinctive crime was provided for by the act, and does not amount to an adjudication that discriminating penalties may be imposed upon persons of different color for the same offense.

III. Sex.

In the reported case (EX PARTE DUNKERTON, ante, 1611), it was held that a statute establishing a state industrial farm for women was not unconstitutional because of the fact that it allowed women to be less severely punished than men convicted of the same crime. In other words, that the legislature may make a discrimination in punishment for the same offense, based entirely upon the sex of the offender. This conclusion, that the legislature may very properly determine that women convicted of crime shall be less severely punished than men convicted of the crime, seems to have been based upon the theory that the legislature, in prescribing punishment for a crime, may take into consideration and recognize the fact that the number of women who commit crimes is much smaller than the number of men committing similar crimes.

So, in State v. Heitman (1919) — Kan. —, 181 Pac. 630, it was held that a special statute, providing that a woman upon conviction of a misdemeanor should be sentenced to the state industrial farm for women, for an undetermined period, with a maximum limit, was not violative of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, either as denying the equal protection of the law, or as abridging women's privileges and immunities, in that men convicted of similar offenses would be sentenced under the general law to the county jail for a definite period, within the same maximum limit, the court adopting the theory that female criminals, because of their different nature, etc., should be completely segregated from male criminals, so that the attendant problems of the two classes may be differentiated, and each given the proper and necessary corrective treatment; that the principle of the indeterminate sentence is the only correct one; and that the effort of the legislature, in enacting the statute under consideration, was evidently an honest attempt to keep law up with the advanced tenets of the new penology, and seemed neither arbitrary nor unreasonable.

And a New York statute, relating to the medical examination and confinement of prostitutes who have been convicted of vagrancy, has been held not to be unconstitutional as discriminating between men and women, it being declared a health measure, and within the police power. People ex rel. Barone v. Fox (1910) 69 Misc. 400, 127 N. Y. Supp. 484, reversed on other grounds in (1911) 144 App. Div. 611, 129 N. Y. Supp. 646, 26 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 177, which was reversed in (1911) 202 N. Y. 616, 96 N. E. 1126.

But a contrary conclusion was reached in Morgan v. State (1912) 179 Ind. 300, 101 N. E. 6, set out and disapproved in the DUNKERTON CASE. In the Morgan Case it was held that Indiana Act March 5, 1909, § 16½ (Acts 1909, p. 202), which provides that if a male person charged with a felony shall interpose the defense of insanity, and there shall be a finding for him on such plea, but against him as to the commission of the act charged, he shall be confined in the state colony for insane criminals, denied the equal protection of the law as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, in that the statute included only "male," and did not include "female," defendants; the court, in effect, maintaining that such a classification was arbitrary.

EUGENE TAYLOR, Appt.,
v.
ALBERT SHIELDS et al.

Kentucky Court of Appeals — February 25, 1919.

(183 Ky. 669, 210 S. W. 168.)

Police — unlawful arrest — liability of bond.

1. An arrest by a police officer without warrant, and in the absence of circumstances where an arrest is authorized by statute without warrant, is in his private and not his official capacity; and, therefore, sureties on his official bond are not liable for his act.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1623.]

Bond — official — liability.

2. The surety on the bond of a police officer is not liable for his wrongful act in making an arrest not authorized by statute.

Police — individual liability.

3. Police officers who arrest and assault persons without authority of law are individually liable for the trespass.

[See 2 R. C. L. 490.]

Pleading — allegation of official action — sufficiency.

4. An allegation of a complaint in an action on the bond of a police officer that at the time of the alleged wrong the officer was acting as a police officer of a specified city is not sufficient to show that he was acting by virtue of his office, so as to render it good against demurrer.

[See 2 R. C. L. 491; 21 R. C. L. 440 et seq.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing the petition, as to the defendant surety company, in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged unlawful arrest of plaintiff by the defendant policeman. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles Carroll and J. Frank Withers for appellant.

Messrs. Furlong, Woodbury, & Furlong, for appellees:

The petition and the petition as amended fail to state a cause of action against any of the defendants, because of a failure to negative in every respect the legal presumption that the officers did their duty in making the arrest, and by omitting to allege that plaintiff, at the time he received the injuries complained of, was not resisting the officers generally, and was not resisting his incarceration in the police station.

Connelly v. American Bonding & T. Co. 113 Ky. 903, 69 S. W. 959; Kouns

v. Townsend, 165 Ky. 163, 176 S. W. 989.

The assault of the plaintiff complained of, if made by the officers, was their individual act, and not in the line of their official duties, and therefore imposed no liability upon the surety company.

Hurt, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1171, 64 S. W. 911, 65 S. W. 610; Carson v. Dezarne, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 761, 90 S. W. 281.

Sampson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Shields and Shore were members of the police force of Louisville in 1916, and the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company was the surety on the official bond of each of said policemen. In October, 1916, this action was filed in the Jefferson circuit court by Taylor against Shields and Shore as policemen, and their surety, the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company, to recover $5,000 for the malfeasance in office of Shields and Shore.

The petition alleges that on the "night of August 29, 1916, plaintiff was arrested by the defendants Shields and Shore, and was by them detained and confined in the Highland police station, in Louisville, Kentucky, and that while so detained and confined he was assaulted by said defendant officers, and was struck and beaten upon and about his head, body, and limbs, and his head, body, and limbs were thereby bruised, cut, and lacerated, and he was caused, by reason of said injuries, great pain and suffering, both physical and mental. Plaintiff says that said assaulting, beating, and striking as aforesaid, were done wantonly and maliciously by the said defendants Shields and Shore."

On December 9th following, an amended petition was filed, the material allegations of which are as follows:

"The plaintiff says that each of defendants, Albert Shields and John J. Shore, executed before the 29th day of August, 1916, to the commonwealth of Kentucky, a bond upon which the defendant Chicago Bonding & Surety Company was surety, that he would well and faithfully discharge the duties of his office as policeman according to law. Said bond was accepted and approved by the board of public safety of Louisville, and was in full force and effect on the 29th and 30th of August, 1916. Certified copies of each of said bonds will be filed herewith, if required.

"Plaintiff says that on the night of August 29, 1916, he was arrested by the defendants Albert Shields and John J. Shore, acting as police officers of the city of Louisville; that said arrest was wrongful and without warrant or judicial order, or other authority of law, and at said time plaintiff was acting in a quiet, peaceable and law-abiding manner, and he had not committed any breach of the peace, or committed any offense, either a misdemeanor or felony, in or out of the presence of defendants, or either; and that neither of said defendants had reasonable grounds to believe plaintiff had committed a misdemeanor or felony.

"Plaintiff says said defendants wrongfully and unlawfully, under the circumstances before set out, under their authority as police officers of the city of Louisville, took plaintiff and detained and confined him in the Highland police station, in Louisville, Kentucky, and while he was detained and confined he was assaulted by said defendant officers and each, and was struck and beaten on and about his head, body, and limbs, with great force and violence by said defendants and each, and his head, body, and limbs were thereby bruised, cut and lacerated, and he was caused, by reason of said injuries, great pain and suffering, both physical and mental, and that said beating and striking by said defendants and each was done wrongfully and unlawfully and wantonly and maliciously, and at said time he was not resisting arrest by said defendants, or either, or by any other officer or any other person, and had not attacked or attempted to attack said defendants, or either, or any other officer, and he says at the time or prior thereto he had not committed a felony and had not been arrested for the commission of a felony, and was not attempting to escape arrest, and, by reason of said acts, defendants and each violated the covenants of the bonds aforesaid executed by each."

To this petition, as amended, the three defendants interposed a general demurrer, which was overruled as to the policemen Shields and Shore, and sustained as to the Chicago Bonding & Surety Company, and the plaintiff declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed as to the Surety Company, and of this Taylor complains and prosecutes this appeal, seeking a reversal of the judgment, asserting that a surety upon the official bond of a policeman of the city of Louisville is liable for the act of the policeman in committing assault and battery upon a prisoner while confined in a station house by said policeman, after having been arrested by him, there being no effort on the part of the prisoner to escape or to assault the officer.

"An arrest may be made by a peace officer, or by a private person." Crim. Code, § 35.

"A peace officer may make an arrest (1) in obedience to a warrant of arrest delivered to him; (2) without a warrant, when a public offense is committed in his presence, or when he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony." Crim. Code, § 36.

"A peace officer in this state, under the provisions of § 36 of the Criminal Code, may lawfully arrest one only in obedience to a warrant delivered to him, or without a warrant if a public offense is committed in his presence, or if he has reasonable grounds to believe that the arrested person has committed a felony." Morton v. Sanders, 178 Ky. 839, 200 S. W. 25.

"A policeman of the city of Louisville, like any other peace officer, can make an arrest without a warrant only where a public offense is committed in his presence, or he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has been guilty of a felony." Madden v. Meehan, 151 Ky. 220, 151 S. W. 681.

"A peace officer can make an arrest without a warrant only where a public offense is committed in his presence, or where he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony." Jamison v. Gaernett, 10 Bush, 222.

According to the allegations of the petition as amended, the arrest of Taylor "was wrongful and without warrant or judicial order, or other authority of law, and at said time plaintiff (Taylor) was acting in a quiet, peaceable, and law-abiding manner, and he had not committed any breach of the peace, or committed any offense, either a misdemeanor or felony, in or out of the presence of defendants, or either, and that neither of said defendants had reasonable grounds to believe plaintiff (Taylor) had committed a misdemeanor or a felony."

If these allegations be true, and upon demurrer they are so considered, then the acts of the policemen were their individual acts, and not their official acts, or acts done by virtue of their office. The policemen had no right to arrest Taylor without a warrant, or other order of a court, unless he had committed a public offense in the presence of the officers, or the officers had reasonable grounds for believing that Taylor had committed an offense. The allegations of the petition show that the arrest of Taylor was made without process of any kind, and that Taylor had committed no public offense either in or out of the presence of the officers. The officers had no writ for Taylor; he had committed no public offense, either in or out of their presence, and they had no reasonable grounds to believe that Taylor had committed a felony. There was, therefore, no ground for the exercise of their authority as policemen.

Where there is a duty imposed by law on a police officer, as when he has in his hands a warrant, or a public offense is committed in his presence, if the duty is neglected, or performed in an improper manner, the surety is liable, but if there is no duty imposed upon the officers, as aforesaid, to make an arrest, and the officer voluntarily undertakes to do so and thereby commits a trespass, the surety is not liable. Whatever the policemen did to Taylor, if anything, was their individual act, and not their official act.

Bond—Official—

In order for the surety to become liable on the bonds of Shields and Shore, their acts must have been done by virtue of their office as policemen, and in order for their acts to have been so done, the acts must have been done in attempting to serve or execute a writ or process, or as a means to that end, or in acting under a statute giving them the right to arrest without a writ or process. If they acted otherwise, and without a writ, or other process, and without Taylor having committed a public offense in their presence, then they acted as individuals and not as officers. If they acted on their individual responsibility they are liable for the trespass as individuals, but the surety on their official bond is not liable, because the act was not an official act, or done by virtue of their offices.

Police—unlawful arrest—liability of bond.

When an officer assumes to act under color of his office, having no writ or process whatsoever, or having process which on its face is utterly void, it seems to be the prevailing doctrine that whatever he may do under such circumstances imposes no liability on his sureties. To constitute color of office such as will render an officer's sureties liable for his wrongful acts, something else must be shown besides the fact that in doing the act complained of the officer claimed to be acting in an official capacity. If he is armed with no writ, or if the writ under which he acts is utterly void, and if there is at the time no statute which authorizes the act to be done without process, then there is no such color of office as will enable him to impose a liability upon the sureties in his official bond." Chandler v. Rutherford, 48 C. C. A. 218, 101 Fed. 774; Jones v. Van Bever, 164 Ky. 80, L.R.A.1915E, 172, 174 S. W. 795; Kouns v. Townsend, 165 Ky. 163,

176 S. W. 989; Jewell v. Mills, 3 Bush, 64; Murrell v. Smith, 3 Dana, 463; Calvert v. Stone, 10 B. Mon. 152; Com. v. Hurt, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1171, 64 S. W. 911, 65 S. W. 610; Carson v. Dezarne, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 761, 90 S. W. 281.

"An official bond is not regarded as imposing liability for the purely personal acts of officers not done as a part of or in connection with their official duty, as, for example, the receipt of money which it was not the officer's duty to receive, or the arrest of an individual, or the seizure of property without a warrant." 29 Cyc. 1455; 2 R. C. L. 486.

In the case at bar, no writ had been issued for Taylor, and the officers had no process whatever for his arrest, and he had committed no public offense, either in or out of their presence, and therefore there was no excuse whatever for his arrest by Shields and Shore. They were not, therefore, acting in their official capacity or by virtue of their office, because they were not armed with a writ for his arrest, and there was no statute or city ordinance authorizing the arrest of a person who had committed no public offense without a warrant.

It therefore appears Shore and Shields were acting in their individual capacity, and that their surety, Chicago Bonding & Surety Company, is not liable for their wilful and wanton trespass, as alleged in the petition as amended, and the general demurrer was properly sustained to the petition as amended; and, the plaintiff failing to plead further as to the Bonding Company, the petition was properly dismissed.

The allegation of the petition that the policemen Shields and Shore were "acting as police officers of the city of Louisville" is a mere description of the person, or a conclusion of the pleader, and does not sufficiently show that Shields and Shore were acting by virtue of their offices at the time of the alleged assaulting and beating of Taylor.

Pleading—allegation of official action—sufficiency.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of sureties on police officer's bond for unlawful arrest without a warrant.

This note does not include arrests on void or defective warrants, or warrants for a third party. Cases holding that bonds of municipal officers are simply for the benefit of the municipality are also excluded. It will be observed that some of the cases in the latter part of the note refer to the change of opinion, showing an enlarged view of the liability of sureties on official bonds, for acts of the principals, while the greater number of the cases cited are on the side of non-liability; but it is to be remembered that the cases here cited are on a small subdivision of the general subject of the liability of sureties on official bonds.

It has been held in a number of cases that the sureties on a police officer's bond are not liable for an unlawful arrest by him without a warrant.

In Scott v. Com. (1906) 29 Ky. L. Rep. 571, 93 S. W. 668, where judgment was affirmed giving damages against a marshal and his surety for unlawful arrest without a warrant and assault, the surety did not object or except to the trial court's actions, nor did it move for a new trial.

In Taylor v. Morgan (1914) 43 Okla. 142, 141 Pac. 679, supra, the court said: "Where an officer, while doing an act within the limits of his official authority, exercises such authority improperly, or exceeds his official powers, or abuses an official discretion vested in him, he becomes liable on his official bond to the person injured. But where he acts without any process, and without the authority of his office, in doing such act he is not to be considered an officer, but a personal trespasser. Sureties on the official bond of a town marshal are only answerable for the acts of their principal while engaged in the performance of some duty imposed upon him by law, or for an omission to perform some such duty."

In People use of Tamplin v. Beach (Colo.) supra, the court said in relation to the liability of sureties: "If the arrest of the prisoner was not a lawful one,—if made under a void warrant, or without warrant in a case where a warrant is required, or if not made in such circumstances as justify the arrest without warrant,—the officer was not acting in his official capacity, either by virtue of, or under color of, office."

"To make the sureties in his official bond liable for personal injury or wrongful death, inflicted by him in making an arrest, a constable must act under a warrant or other writ calling into execution his official powers in the particular case, or he must act under a claim that an offense has been committed in his presence, based upon conduct giving color to such claim, or calling for judgment and opinion as to whether an offense has been so committed. That he is an officer and professes to act in his official capacity are not sufficient to impose liability upon the sureties." State v. Mankin (W. Va.) supra.

Some of the cases go upon the principle that sureties are liable only for acts done virtute officii, and not for those done colore officii. Others, while holding that a surety may be liable for an act done colore officii, set a high standard for colore officii. In State ex rel. Brennan v. Dierker (1903) (Mo.) supra, the court said: "A distinction which formerly enjoyed a wider vogue than it does now is taken between the acts of a sheriff, or other executive officer, done by virtue of his office, or virtute officii, and acts done under color of his office, or colore officii; and there have been many decisions that the officer's sureties are responsible for acts of the first sort when they are illegal, but not for those of the second sort. This distinction is subtle, and, having proved barren of wholesome results, in recent well-considered judgments it has given place to the rule that illegal acts done only colore officii lay the bondsmen liable if the illegality consists in an abuse of authority, instead of an outright usurpation. . . . Whether this doctrine is more tangible than the other, or more likely to work satisfactorily, remains to be seen; and it may well be doubted whether an official's sureties ought not to answer for any of his misconduct under color of office, unless it is apparent he made a pretext of his authority to gratify personal malice or accomplish a personal end."

Cases holding the surety liable.

In Mitchell v. Malone (1886) 77 Ga. 301, the court, in a brief opinion, held that the sureties of a sheriff were liable for an arrest of the wrong person for felony, made by him out of his county, without a warrant.

While most of the cases holding the sureties of a police officer liable for an unlawful arrest, made without a warrant, do so on the ground that the officer exceeded his authority, these cases divide into classes. One class is in general accord with the general view of nonliability of the surety. Thus, in Riter v. Neatherly (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 157 S. W. 439, where an arrest without warrant by a marshal was illegal only because of mistaken identity of the person arrested, the sureties on the marshal's bond were held liable. Probably of the same class is Gomez v. Scanlan (1909) 155 Cal. 528, 102 Pac. 12, holding that, while "the sureties on a constable's bond are not liable for his trespasses committed not under color of office nor in the line of official duty," a complaint against a constable and his sureties is sufficient which alleges that he, acting in his capacity as constable, did arrest and imprison the plaintiff on a pretended charge of grand larceny, as he had authority, on a charge of felony, to arrest without a warrant.

Other cases decided on the ground of excess of authority take a more enlarged view of the sureties' liability. Thus, in Clancy v. Kenworthy (1887) 74 Iowa, 740, 7 Am. St. Rep. 508, 35 N. W. 427, it was held that the sureties on a constable's bond were liable for an arrest made by him without a warrant for a private and malicious purpose, without probable cause, in pretense of a cause which would have justified arrest without a warrant, where the bond was conditioned that he would "faithfully and impartially, without fear, favor, fraud, or oppression, discharge all the duties now or hereafter required of his officer by law." (For the condition, see Yount v. Carney (1894) 91 Iowa, 564, 60 N. W. 114.) The court said: "But it is insisted that, as the constable is shown to have had no lawful authority to arrest plaintiff, his act was, therefore, not done in the line of his duty. In truth his act was in the line—direction—of official duty, but was illegal because it was in excess of his duty. In the discharge of official functions he violated his duty, and oppressed the plaintiff. This is all there is of it. If, in exercising the functions of his office, defendant is not liable for acts because they are illegal or forbidden by law, and for that reason are trespasses or wrongs, he cannot be held liable on the bond at all, for the reason that all violations of duty and acts of oppression result in trespasses or wrongs. For lawful acts in discharge of his duty he, of course, is not liable. It follows that, if defendant's position be sound, no action can be maintained upon the bond in any case."

Similarly, in Yount v. Carney (1894) 91 Iowa, 559, 60 N. W. 114, it was held to be error under a similar bond, to direct a verdict for the defendants, and not to submit to the jury the question whether a marshal, in making an arrest without a warrant, had reasonable ground for believing that the plaintiff had committed a public offense.

Clancy v. Kenworthy (Iowa) supra, was quoted from in Drolesbaugh v. Hill (1901) 64 Ohio St. 257, 60 N. E. 202, holding that the sureties on the bond of an officer, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, are liable thereon to the party injured, where, in making an arrest under color of his office, with or without warrant, and without probable cause, he uses more force and violence than is necessary.

In Lee v. Charmley (1910) 20 N. D. 570, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 275, 129 N. W. 448, it was held that "a deputy sheriff who, falsely claiming to have a warrant for the arrest of a person not formally charged with crime of any kind, goes to his house in the nighttime, and, under guise of the authority of his office, arrests and takes such person into custody, has committed an unauthorized and unlawful act under color of his office, for which the sureties upon his official bond are liable in a proper action." The court said: "The almost uniform current of the latter cases . . . regards wrongful acts of a public officer, colore officii, as official acts, for which the sureties upon his bond are liable."

In Greenius v. American Surety Co. (1916) 92 Wash. 401, L.R.A.1917F, 1134, 159 Pac. 384, the court, in holding a constable's surety liable for the arrest of the wrong person for felony without a warrant, said: "It is insisted by counsel for respondent, and the court below so held, that the complaint sets forth a naked trespass, an act done colore officii, for which the surety is not liable. Much mental energy has been expended in drawing distinctions between acts of public officers done colore officii, and acts done virtute officii, and we shall not undertake to assemble definitions. Our understanding is that, when an officer acts in the performance of his duty, and, so acting, acts to the hurt or annoyance of a third party, or an innocent party, he is nevertheless acting in virtue of his office. That is to say, if his office gives him authority to act, he is acting in virtue of his office, although, in the performance of a specific duty, he improperly exercises his authority. For instance, if an officer have a warrant for 'A', and, without reasonable ground for believing him to be the guilty person, takes 'B', he is still acting in virtue of his office. If it were not so, he would never be liable upon his bond. Nor would his surety ever be liable except for his lawful acts, which is reductio ad absurdum, for it follows that there could be no liability if there had been no breach of duty.

. . . The best argument against attempting to fix an arbitrary line of demarcation between acts done colore officii, and those done in virtue of office, is that the cases, after a hundred years of exposition, are in hopeless and interminable confusion. . . . We think, too, that this court is committed to the latter and better rule, and is in line with the preponderating authority." The court, in referring to Marquis v. Willard (1895) 12 Wash. 528, 50 Am. St. Rep. 906, 41 Pac. 889, criticizes the statement therein that, "when an officer without process does an act which, under the law, he has no right to do, he cannot in any proper sense be said to be acting by virtue of his office, and it is going far enough to hold that in so doing he is acting under color of office. Such is the reasonable rule," and says: "We think the use of the words, 'when an officer without process does an act which, under the law, he has no right to do,' was ill advised. The court should have said, rather, that when one who is an officer is engaged outside of the performance of any duty imposed by law, his surety is not liable."

In view of the foregoing case, reference may be here made to Weber v. Doust (1914) 81 Wash. 668, 143 Pac. 148, holding that the sureties of the chief of police of a city were liable for the illegal arrest, without a warrant, of a child thought to be a juvenile delinquent, as the officer was attempting to perform an official act in the general line of official duty, but acted in excess of his authority. The court, however, said in the opinion that the child was "taken into custody and detained, without any attempt to comply with the statute." This case was reversed on rehearing;— (1915) 84 Wash. 330, 146 Pac. 623,—on the ground that the restraint without a warrant was not false imprisonment as matter of law.

Perhaps the theory of excess of authority is the explanation of the decision in People use of Johnson v. Morgan (1914) 188 Ill. App. 250, holding that the sureties on the bond of a village night policeman were responsible for his illegal arrest without warrant, and malicious beating, of the plaintiff, under color and by virtue of said office, the bond being given under the statute directing that the bonds of officers be "conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the office, and the payment of all moneys received by such officer, according to law and the ordinances of said city or village." The court said: "Official acts in performance of the duties of an office do not mean simply the lawful acts of the officer holding that office, but include all acts done in his official capacity, under color and by virtue of said office."

It has been held that a statute making sureties liable for acts of the officer done under color of his office will bind the sureties for illegal arrests without a warrant. Thus, where the statute extends the liability of sureties on official bonds to injuries from wrongful acts done by the officer under color of his office, the sheriff and the surety on his official bond are responsible for an illegal arrest by a deputy sheriff without warrant. Deason v. Gray (1914) 189 Ala. 672, 66 So. 646. Similarly, in holding that the sureties on a constable's bond were liable for illegal arrests without a warrant, the court said: "Whatever may have been the liability of official bonds for such conduct formerly, the following lines, added to § 1883 of the Code by the Code Commissioners, are broad enough to cover this case, to wit: 'Every such officer and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable to the person injured for all acts done by said officer by virtue and under color of his office.'" State ex rel. Warren v. Boyd (1897) 120 N. C. 56, 26 S. E. 700.

It may be noted that, where a sheriff having a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff arrested him without the state, falsely representing that he had a warrant for his extradition, the sureties of the sheriff were not liable for the acts without the state, but were liable for so much of the imprisonment as occurred within the state, as the plaintiff was not found within the state, within the terms of the warrant. Kendall v. Aleshire (1890) 28 Neb. 707, 26 Am. St. Rep. 367, 45 N. W. 167. B. B. B.

ROBERT W. HARGADINE, State Fire Marshal, Resp't.

Minnesota Supreme Court — April 11, 1919.

(— Minn. —, 171 N. W. 773.)

Constitutional law — destruction of dilapidated building.

1. Chapter 469, Laws 1917 (amending sections 5140–5146, Gen. Stat. 1913 [Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 5140–5146]), authorizing the state fire marshal to condemn and order torn down a building which, by reason of age, dilapidated condition, or other defect, is especially liable to fire, and is so situated as to endanger life and limb or other buildings or property in the vicinity, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. A structure coming within the purview of the statute may be regarded as a nuisance and abated as such.

Evidence — sufficiency.

2. The evidence sustains the finding that the building condemned is especially liable to fire and dangerous to life and surrounding structures.

Nuisance — dilapidated building.

3. A building in the condition established by the finding is in fact a nuisance, even if that term is not used either in the findings or the statute mentioned.

[See 4 R. C. L. 413.]

Constitutional law — abatement of building — taking of property.

4. Abatement of old and dilapidated buildings which endanger life or property is not a taking of private property for public use for which compensation must be made.

[See 6 R. C. L. 477.]

Nuisance — dilapidated building — repairs.

5. Where repairs or alterations can be made lawfully upon a wooden building so as to eliminate the special dangers arising from its condition and location to surrounding property and to persons, such repairs or alterations should be ordered, rather than destruction of the building.

APPEAL by administrator from a finding of the District Court for Hennepin County (Leary, J.) that an order of the state fire marshal, condemning and ordering demolished a wooden building located within the fire limits of the city, and belonging to the estate of William Anheier, deceased, was reasonable. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George M. Bleecker for appellant.

Messrs. Clifford L. Hilton, Attorney General, James E. Markham, and Elias Rachie, Assistant Attorneys General, for respondent:

The Fire Marshal Law is valid and constitutional under the police power which every state exercises under and by virtue of its sovereignty to promote the general welfare.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In virtue of the authority given by chapter 469, Laws of 1917 (amending the §§ 5140-5146, Gen. Stat. 1913 [Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 5140-5146]), the state fire marshal condemned and ordered demolished a wooden building located within the fire limits of the city of Minneapolis and belonging to the estate of William Anheier. Upon a hearing in the district court the order was found reasonable. The administrator of the estate appeals.

The section here assailed as unconstitutional reads: "The state fire marshal may condemn and by order direct the destruction, repair, or alteration of any building or structure which by reason of age, dilapidated condition, defective chimneys, defective electric wiring, gas connections, heating apparatus or other defect, is especially liable to fire and which building or structure, in the judgment of said state fire marshal, is so situated as to endanger life or limb or other buildings or property in the vicinity." Section 5140.

The right to condemn and direct the destruction of property granted by this statute must be sought in the police power possessed by the state. It is contended the power does not extend to a destruction of property without compensation to the owner, unless the property constitutes a nuisance, except perhaps in cases of extreme emergencies. The proposition is not tenable. Regulating or compelling the repair or alteration of buildings that have become a nuisance to persons or surrounding property is conceded by appellant to be a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Whether as a result of the compulsory repair or alteration, or the manner in which it is required to be done, the owner suffers a pecuniary loss, thus depriving him of his property, is of no vital consequence. In principle there would seem to be no room for making a distinction between the right under the police power to compel the alteration of a building, and the right to compel its reduction into lumber, so far as in either case it may result in a loss to the owner.

Appellant also concedes that the police power of the state is properly directed against the abatement of a nuisance, and that no valid objection to legislation enacted for that purpose can be made on the ground that the owner of the nuisance is deprived of property by the abatement. Our statutes define certain conditions and acts to be private or public nuisances, and provide for their abatement or redress. If a structure is so old and dilapidated that it endangers life and limb or buildings and property in the vicinity it is in fact a nuisance, although that word is not applied to it in the act. We deem chapter 469, Laws 1917, a valid exercise of the police power, so far as it relates to condemning buildings found in the condition therein prescribed. Public welfare calls for the abatement of that which endangers life and property. Such

erty for public use, entitling the owner to compensation. The public takes nothing, it simply causes one who maintains upon his land that which unduly endangers life and property to remove it. In Patterson v. Johnson, 214 Ill. 481, 73 N. E. 761, it is held that under the power granted cities to abate and remove nuisances was included the power to regulate the removal or construction of wooden buildings within the corporate limits, and in the opinion the following was quoted, with approval, from Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 50 Am. Rep. 830: "A wooden building is not in itself a nuisance, but when erected in a place prohibited by law, and where it endangers the safety of adjoining property, it may become a nuisance. If the locality and character of such a building do endanger the safety of surrounding buildings, then it may be treated as a nuisance, and a governmental body, having authority to legislate upon such subjects, may prohibit its erection in places where it would endanger the safety of surrounding property."

Appellant contends that the findings of fact are not sustained by the evidence. The court finds "that said building is a frame structure approximately sixty-two years old; that it is composed almost entirely of combustible material; that the sills and supporting members are decayed and weak; that the walls of the building are warped and bulging; that the roof is shingled and the shingles are curled and loose. That said building is in a region densely occupied and populated. That said building, due to its age and composition, is especially liable to fire, and is dangerous to other buildings and property in the vicinity and to human life and limb."

The building is on Marquette avenue and First street, within the established fire limits. It is a low two-story structure, with dilapidated additions on the end and side vided into small rooms by wooden partitions; the hall leading to those rooms is narrow; the only access is by a narrow staircase. The rooms cannot well be used except as sleeping quarters for transients who must needs put up with the meanest accommodations. The chimney rests on wall brackets. There is no basement, but a small cellar has been excavated wherein is placed a furnace which may be used to heat a part of the building. The wall next to First street is about 6 inches out of plumb. The roof sags in the middle. We consider the findings amply sustained. That other old shacks within the fire limits have so far escaped condemnation by the fire marshal does not tend to prove that the one in question should be immune. That the building still is capable of producing a considerable income for its owner is not decisive proof that it is not dangerous to life or surrounding property. We think the situation presented by the evidence and the findings fully justified the conclusion that the order of the marshal was reasonable.

sufficiency.

We disagree with appellant's contention that since the court did not, in terms, declare the building a nuisance the order directing it to be torn down cannot be sustained. As already stated, the finding that, due to its age and composition, the building is especially liable to fire and dangerous to property in the vicinity and to human life and limb is equivalent to a finding that it is a nuisance, and one to be removed under the authority of the statute mentioned. We agree with appellant that both the fire marshal, in determining whether a building which is in use or usable shall be torn down, and the court, when called upon to determine whether the order in directing it to be dismantled is reasonable, should exercise great caution. Where repairs or alterations can be made lawfully upon a wooden building so as to eliminate the special dangers arising from its location and condition to surrounding property and to persons, such repairs or alterations should be ordered rather than a tearing down of the building.

In this case, however, we think the record sustains the conclusion of the learned trial court that the fire marshal's order was reasonable and should be carried out:

Affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Validity of statute requiring the tearing down or removal of a building.

It is held in the reported case (YORK v. HARGADINE, ante, 1627) that the state may, by statute, provide for the destruction of buildings in certain circumstances.

A statute providing that, when the mayor and aldermen of any city or the selectmen of any town, after due notice to the owner of any burnt, dilapidated, or dangerous building, shall adjudge the same to be a nuisance to the neighborhood or dangerous, they may cause it to be removed, was held constitutional in Swett v. Sprague (1867) 55 Me. 190.

A statute conferring upon the state fire marshal power to order buildings to be repaired, torn down, demolished, materials removed, and all dangerous conditions remedied and abated, where it appears that, by reason of age and dilapidated conditions, defective or poorly installed electric wiring, or equipment, defective chimneys, defective gas connections, defective apparatus, or for any other cause or reason, the building is especially liable to fire, and provide for appeal to the district court from the decision of the state fire marshal, is not unconstitutional as depriving persons of property without due process of law. Runge v. Glerum (1917) 37 N. D. 618, 164 N. W. 284.

Nor is such a statute an unconstitutional interference with the local government of cities and villages; and it is, therefore, not invalid for this reason. Ibid.

But in case of a statute providing for the destruction of any building which shall have become dangerous or insecure, upon the order of a court, it has been held that the statute must make provision for notice to the owner of the building, and an opportunity to be heard in the proceeding for the destruction of the property, in order to afford due process of law. Re Brooklyn (1895) 87 Hun, 54, 33 N. Y. Supp. 869. The fact that notice was given to the owner in the particular case was held insufficient to meet the difficulty that, to answer the requirements of the Constitution, the statute itself must confer the right to a notice.

A statute conferring upon the state fire marshal power to make an inspection of buildings and, in certain cases, order their destruction, vests in the state fire marshal the primary duty of determining whether the premises are dangerous; and it is only when the trial court is convinced that the marshal has abused his discretion that his judgment will be interfered with. Runge v. Glerum (N. D.) supra.

The power to order the destruction of buildings erected in violation of statute has not been considered herein.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Fourth District, to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Clair County (Crow, J.) in plaintiffs' favor, in a suit to recover possession of property alleged to have been wrongfully taken from them by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. E. Chamberlin, August Barthel, James A. Farmer, and Louis Klingel for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Dan McGlynn and T. M. Webb for defendant in error.

Duncan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Thomas Kearney and Henry Becker, plaintiffs in error, sued defendant in error in assumpsit in the circuit court of St. Clair county. The declaration consists of the common counts only, with this bill of particulars: "This suit is brought to recover from the defendant the sum of, to wit, $2,000, with lawful interest from the 18th day of January, A. D. 1913, to date, which said sum is the property of the plaintiffs, and which defendant took from the possession of the plaintiffs, or their agents, on, to wit, the 18th day of January, A. D. 1913, in a certain building known as 126 West Broadway, in the city of East St. Louis, and which said sum the defendant has since said date wrongfully and unlawfully withheld from the plaintiffs, and still unlawfully withholds, and has refused, and still refuses, to return same to the plaintiffs, although requested so to do."

Defendant in error pleaded non-assumpsit. At the close of plaintiffs in error's evidence, and again at the close of all of the evidence, defendant in error moved the court to instruct the jury to find a verdict in his favor, but the court refused so to do. Plaintiffs in error then asked the court to direct a verdict for them in the sum of $1,536.75, which the court did, and entered judgment accordingly. On appeal to the appellate court for the fourth district, the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause was remanded, but on reconsideration the appellate court changed its order and reversed the judgment, without remanding. The cause has been brought to this court for review by certiorari.

The trial court having given judgment on a directed verdict, the facts to be considered by us must be those most favorable to defendant in error. Those facts, as recited by the appellate court, are, briefly, that plaintiffs in error on and prior to January 18, 1913, conducted a gaming house in the basement of the building at said number in East St. Louis, in violation of the statutes of this state. For that purpose there were in said room a large and a small gaming table, at which was played the game called "craps." Plaintiffs in error had employed John Schneider, John Maguire, and a man by the name of Rosenberg, who had charge of and operated the gaming tables. On said date plaintiffs in error gave to their said employees $1,600 in silver, contained in three sacks, to be used by them "to bank the crap game." Maguire and Schneider stationed themselves at each end of the large table with $600 each of the money, and Rosenberg had $400 of the silver at the small table, and those parties conducted the game at their several stations. They began the games that afternoon, and continued them for more than an hour. One hundred persons or more were crowded around and betting at the tables; the bets running from 25 cents to $4. At about 4 o'clock P. M. said employees had lost about $60 of the money so furnished them by plaintiffs in error. About that time a raid was made on the gaming house by police officers under the direction of defendant in error, as the state's attorney of said county, and the tables and other paraphernalia used by the employees in conducting the game, and the money that had been furnished them therefor, or what remained of it, were seized by the officers. The money was delivered in said sacks to the state's attorney, who counted it, and found it to amount to $1,536.75. He took charge of the money, and has refused to return it at all times on demand of plaintiffs in error, who had paid their fines, and made demand for the money after all intended prosecutions for violations of the statute for gaming and keeping gaming houses at said place had been concluded.

It is argued by defendant in error that when plaintiffs in error turned the money in question over to their employees to run the games, they parted with all title and right to the money, and that it became the money of the gamekeepers; that they could neither sue for and re-such delivery by any legal or equitable proceedings, nor maintain any action at law or equity against defendant in error, who took the money, not from plaintiffs in error, but from their said employees. Defendant in error's position cannot be sustained under the law and the facts. When plaintiffs in error delivered the three sacks of silver to their said employees, and put them in charge of the room and the gambling tables and other paraphernalia in use for the said business, with directions to conduct or manage the gambling room and the games to be conducted there, the agents did not take title to the money, the room, the tables, or any of the other paraphernalia to be used in connection with the gaming to be there conducted. The silver money in the sacks was just as much a necessity to conduct the gaming to be done there as were the tables and other paraphernalia. The money was delivered to them in bulk, in sacks, and was kept in bulk, unmixed with the money of the employees, and for the purpose of conducting a crap game, and for no other purpose. They had no right or authority to use it for any other purpose. The tables and other paraphernalia were placed under their charge for the same purpose. They took the same right and title to the money that they did to the other personal property there,—nothing more, nothing less,—the right to possess and use it for the business which they had been employed to manage and control. They had no interest in the business in which they were employed, or in the profits thereof. They shared no profits or losses, and there were no profits or gains on that day. They were simply paid employees. The money taken by the officers was a part and parcel of the money so delivered to said employees. The very moment those employees should have undertaken to divert the money placed in their hands for use in that gamappropriate it to their own personal use, a right of action, on demand, would have accrued to plaintiffs in error against such employees for money had and received. Morgan v. Groff, 4 Barb. 524; Klock v. Brown, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 48, and cases cited in note (172 Mich. 379, 137 N. W. 636).

Plaintiffs in error also had the legal right to repudiate the illegal contract or direction to their employees to use the money for gambling, if done before it had been used for the illegal purpose, and to maintain a suit directly against the agents for money had and received in case they refused to return the money on demand. Tyler v. Carlisle, 79 Me. 210, 1 Am. St. Rep. 301, 9 Atl. 856; Clarke v. Brown, 77 Ga. 606, 4 Am. St. Rep. 98. It is a well-established rule of law that where a party delivers money to another party, to bet for him upon an election or a horse race or other such event, and his agent makes the bet for him and deposits the money with the stakeholder, or where the party himself makes such a bet and deposits his money with a stakeholder, he may retract his illegal act, and, on demand of the stakeholder at any time before the money is delivered to the other party, recover from the stakeholder the amount so deposited on the common counts for money had and received. Permitting recovery in such a case is not a recognition or sanction of the illegal contract. It is simply a recognition by the courts of the party's right to repudiate, and to refrain from further recognition of, the illegal contract. The stakeholder in such a case, after demand made upon him for the money, pays the money to the other party, although the winner of the bet, at his peril. Hardy v. Hunt, 11 Cal. 343, 70 Am. Dec. 787; Pabst Brewing Co. v. Liston, 80 Minn. 473, 81 Am. St.

Gaming—recovery of money from stakeholder.

Rep. 275, 83 N. W. 448; McLennan v. Whiddon, 120 Ga. 666, 48 S. E. 201; Stevens v. Sharp, 26 Ill. 404.

It is a well-established rule of law that a party to a gaming contract, or to any illegal contract, cannot recover profits or gains made in the carrying out of such illegal contract, or recover in any way directly upon the illegal contract, against the other party, whether agent or not. The reason for the rule is that to allow such a recovery the court would be lending its aid and sanction to such illegal contract. Where any party seeks a recovery on such a contract by suing directly thereon, or brings an action of account against the other party to the illegal contract to recover for his money and profits embarked and gained in the carrying out of such illegal contract, courts of law and equity will refuse to aid either party in such recovery because they are both equally culpable, and the courts will leave them where it finds them, without giving aid to either party. In such cases the parties rely on the illegal contract for recovery, and in such cases only are they said to be in pari delicto. The cases of Bishop v. American Preservers' Co. 157 Ill. 284, 48 Am. St. Rep. 317, 41 N. E. 765, and Shaffner v. Pinchback, 133 Ill. 410, 23 Am. St. Rep. 624, 24 N. E. 867, relied on by defendant in error, belong to that class.

The appellate court erred in holding that the plaintiffs in error are prohibited by law from having the aid of the courts to restore to them their money in this case. They proved their title to the money without relying on the illegal contract in question,—i. e., they made out completely under their declaration, without even a reference to the illegal contract, their prima facie case. They used two of their said employees as their witnesses, and there is no claim to the money in question by anyone except the plaintiffs in error.

It was the defendant in error himself who introduced the proof of the illegal contract, and relied thereon for his defense. He cannot be permitted to rely on the illegal contract for a defense. Clarke v. Brown, supra.

It is also insisted by defendant in error that the action in assumpsit for money had and received is in its nature an equitable action, and that it is contrary to the principles of equity to permit plaintiffs in error to recover under the facts in this case. It is true that such action is equitable in its nature, and that a plaintiff in such action can only recover where the defendant has money of the plaintiff which in equity and good conscience he ought not to withhold from the plaintiff. The facts here show just such a case. In determining the equities in such a case, the respective rights of the parties in the suit to the money are only to be considered. If the money is found to belong to the plaintiff, and the defendant shows no right thereto whatever, courts will not go back to inquire by what unconscionable or illegal methods the plaintiff obtained it, or to what illegal purposes he had, in other transactions, employed the use of it. The subject of recovery in this case—money—is not of the obnoxious class of property which the law condemns, but is of the harmless and moral class, that cannot be condemned or destroyed by the state under any statute. Glennon v. Britton, 155 Ill. 232, 40 N. E. 594. The money can serve the state, as evidence or otherwise, in no suit pending or contemplated, as the evidence clearly shows that there is no further suit contemplated in the way of criminal prosecutions, and none pending that grew out of the transactions at said gambling house. Defendant in error has no right to the money or to the possession of it, and does not claim to have, in his official capacity or otherwise. No one of the employees of plaintiffs in error from

money seized by police official.

whose manual possession the money was taken makes any claim to the money in question. Defendant in error cannot legally make it for them, as he does not represent them, or claim to represent them. When the evidence in the case is properly limited to the legitimate issues, it will be seen that the proof will simply show that the plaintiffs in error have proved their title to the money, and that defendant in error has proved no right or title thereto, and does not even claim any right or title to the money. Under such a showing, how can it be said that the legitimate evidence shows that plaintiffs in error are not equitably entitled to receive the money, or that defendant in error is not in equity and in good conscience bound to return the same to them? When the evidence in the case is properly restricted, plaintiffs in error will not be shown to claim the money or the right to recover it through any illegal contract, as no evidence thereof in such case will appear in the record. The court, therefore, cannot properly be said to be recognizing or sanctioning any illegal contract or action by permitting a recovery by plaintiffs in error. No court of law or equity has ever denied a recovery to a party simply because he has been a violator of the law, if he can show his right to such recovery without reference to any illegal contract, and without causing the court to recognize or sanction any illegal conduct on his part. There is absolutely no reason, therefore, for saying that an action in assumpsit for money had and received cannot be maintained for the money in question by plaintiffs in error. The action was in every way appropriate. Highway Comrs. v. Bloomington, 253 Ill. 164, 97 N. E. 280, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 471.

ANNOTATION.

Right to recover money which the plaintiff placed in the hands of an agent, to be used for gambling purposes.

This note does not include stock jobbing nor dealings in futures, nor does it include cases where the agent has used the money as directed.

The reported case (KEARNEY v. WEBB, ante, 1631) rightly decides that money placed in an agent's hands for gambling purposes can be followed by the principal into the hands of a police officer who has seized it.

The law is clear that a principal may sue his agent for money he has placed in his hands to be used for gambling, and which has not been so used. Morgan v. Groff (1848) 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 524 (overruling in effect an earlier decision in the same case (1848) 5 Denio, 364, 49 Am. Dec. 273); Klock v. Brown (1912) 172 Mich. 379, 137 N. W. 636, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 48; Kohler v. Rosenthal (1909) 135 App. Div. 438, 120 N. Y. Supp. 325 (obiter).

Thus, one who gives his agent money to bet with a certain person on an election may recover the amount from the agent, where he bet it with a person other than the one designated, and lost it. Morgan v. Groff (1848) 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 524, supra.

In Klock v. Brown (1912) 172 Mich. 379, 137 N. W. 636, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 48, supra, it was held that the plaintiff might recover money given to the defendant to bet on an election, which was not bet.

"If one commissions another to make a bet for him, and gives him money for that purpose, and recalls his authority before the money is used, he has a right of action on demand to recover it back." Kohler v. Rosenthal (N. Y.) supra.

The owner of property who has employed the defendant gratuitously to put it up in a lottery, and has handed it to him for that purpose, may recover from him the value of the property which has been lost by the gross carelessness of the defendant. Woolf v. Bernero (1883) 14 Mo. App. 518, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 911.

This note does not include cases arising out of gambling partnerships; but it may be said in general that unused original capital may be recalled, and that, while the courts will not, in general, settle the accounts of such partnerships, they may dispose of assets not connected with gambling. Thus, for example, in Keen v. Price [1914] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 98, 83 L. J. Ch. N. S. 865, 111 L. T. N. S. 204, 30 Times L. R. 494, 58 Sol. Jo. 495, it was held that a partner in a betting partnership can recover any balance of his capital which has not been applied in payment of bets, so an account may be ordered for this purpose. In Watson v. Fletcher (1850) 7 Gratt. (Va.) 1, it was held in substance that an account between a gambling partnership would exclude gambling matters, but would include matters not connected with gambling, and in Central Trust & S. D. Co. v. Respass (1902) 112 Ky. 606, 56 L.R.A. 479, 99 Am. St. Rep. 317, 66 S. W. 421, it was held, upon settlement of the affairs of a partnership for racing horses, that money lost in bets made for the benefit of the firm could not be allowed to the surviving partner. B. B. ## RE TRANSFER TAX UPON THE ESTATE OF CHARLES E. ORVIS, Deceased.

EDWIN W. ORVIS et al., Appts.

COMPTROLLER OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Respt.

New York Court of Appeals — February 26, 1918.

(223 N. Y. 1, 119 N. E. 88.)

Tax — inheritance — survivorship of joint fund.

1. The right of the survivor under a contract between two partners by which a fund is established, to belong to the partners jointly during life, and to the survivor upon the death of either, for the continuation of the business, is subject to transfer tax under a statute imposing such tax upon a transfer by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death.

Partnership — contract for continuation fund — enforceability.

2. An agreement between partners to constitute, from undivided profits, a fund for continuation of the business, which shall be the property of the survivor upon the death of either, rests upon mutual and equal consideration, and is enforceable.

Tax — inheritance — transfer for consideration.

3. Transfers resting upon a valuable and adequate consideration, although within the classification of the Inheritance Tax Law, are not within its intendment, and are not taxable.

APPEAL by the surviving partner et al. from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of the Surrogate's Court for New York County, assessing a transfer tax upon the estate of Charles E. Orvis, deceased, and amending the report of the appraiser by adding a certain amount to the amount reported taxable. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

he Transfer Tax Law does not impose a tax upon property passing under a contract made for a valuable consideration.

Messrs. Alexander Otis, Schuyler C. Carlton, and Lafayette B. Gleason for respondent.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellate division added to the taxable estate of Charles E. Orvis, deceased, the sum of $443,342.11 under these facts: Charles E. Orvis and Edwin W. Orvis had, on January 2, 1911, constituted the firm of Orvis Brothers & Company for many years. Since December 31, 1903, the liability of each for the joint losses, and the interest of each in the firm assets, were equal with those of the other. The duration of the firm was without limit, subject to dissolution at any time by mutual consent. On January 2, 1911, they signed, sealed, and delivered an agreement reading: "Whereas, it is the desire of Charles E. Orvis and Edwin W. Orvis, founders of the firm of Orvis Brothers & Company, to provide for the continuation of said firm by the survivor, in event of the death of either of them: Now, therefore, it is hereby mutually agreed by and between said Charles E. Orvis and Edwin W. Orvis, that the sum of $500,000 shall be drawn from the profits and accumulations of said firm, heretofore accrued, and shall be placed to the credit of foundation account, and that such account shall be owned equally (half and half) by said Charles E. Orvis and Edwin W. Orvis; and it is hereby expressly and distinctly agreed by and between the parties hereto, that in the event of the decease of either of them, the survivor of them shall be the sole owner of the said foundation account, and the heirs of the one deceased shall have no right, title, interest, or claim thereto. And it is hereby further agreed that, to provide against any impairment of said foundation account, an equal amount of $500,000 shall be placed to the credit of contingent account, and it is expressly and distinctly agreed by the parties hereto that the terms of this agreement, in relation to the said contingent account shall in every respect be exactly the same, as the terms in regard to the foundation account, as hereinbefore stated."

The two funds provided for by the agreement were created, and the firm carried on its business with them as its capital. On June 1, 1914, the agreement creating the firm was renewed and extended for a period to expire on June 1, 1916, and the $500,000 foundation account was the capital contributed by Charles and Edwin under such renewal or extension agreement. In the contingent account was kept all the business of the firm down to June 1, 1914, and the account was used to liquidate the business of the firm to that date, as in that liquidation nobody was interested except Charles and Edwin. Charles died on March 8, 1915. Between December 31, 1903, and March 8, 1915, the membership of the firm was changed, but the liability and interest, of each, of Charles and Edwin in the two funds remained unchanged. At the death of Charles, the contingent account was intact. The foundation or capital account had been reduced to $386,644.22. The one half of the two accounts is the sum of $443,342.11. Edwin took this sum under the agreement of January 2, 1911. The surrogate's court decided that the agreement effected a transfer to Edwin upon the death of Charles, nontaxable because made for a valuable consideration. The appellate division reversed the decision.

The statute authorizing the tax is § 220 of the Tax Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 60), which provides: "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any tangible property within the state and of intangible property, or of any interest therein or income therefrom, in trust or otherwise, to persons or corporations in the following cases, subject to the exemptions and limitations hereinafter prescribed: (1)

(2) . . . (3) . . .
(4) When the transfer is of intangible property, or of tangible property within the state, made by a resident, or of tangible property within the state made by a nonresident, by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor or donor or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death. (5) . . . (6) . . .
(7) . . . Laws, 1911, chap. 732.

Subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 relate to transfers by will or by the intestate laws of this state. Subdivisions 5, 6, and 7 are irrelevant to the instant case.

The intention, nature, and effect of the instrument of January 2, 1911, are neither complex nor obscure. It (a) established the two funds within the capital and accumulated profits of the firm, and (b) provided that upon the death of either member, during the existence of the firm, the survivor should be the owner of the interest of the deceased in the joint assets as comprised in those funds. It did not create the firm, nor did it fix, extend, or affect the period of its existence. The relations of the members to each other as partners, their respective contributions to the capital of the firm, or their respective shares in the joint liabilities or profits during the period of the lives of both and the existence of the firm, were not affected by it. During that period each member owned, possessed, and enjoyed his interest as a partner as he would had the agreement been nonexistent. The appellants assert, and correctly, that the execution of the agreement was not a gift of the interest of either to the other. It did not attempt to interdict either member from withdrawing moneys from either fund, or to compel the survivor to continue the business after the dissolution of the firm by the death of a member. As an instrument of transfer, it was intended to and did take effect in ownership, possession, and enjoyment at the death of the transferor. Such death was the event which effected the transfer and secured to the survivor the possession and enjoyment of the interest or property. The record here presents the clear-cut question: Is the share of a deceased partner in the assets of a firm of two members dissolved by the death received in ownership by the surviving member under a mutual agreement that either surviving the other shall be the owner of the share of the other, taxable under § 220 of the Tax Law?

The agreement rested upon a mutual and equal consideration and was enforceable. The language of the statute, literally adopted and applied, would, manifestly, subject the share to the tax.

The only limitation expressed on the imposition of the tax upon the transfer "by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift" is that it be not made "in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death." Carter v. Craig, 77 N. H. 200, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 90 Atl. 598, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1179. The nature of the tax (Re White, 208 N. Y. 64, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 714, 101 N. E. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 75; Keeney v. Comptroller, 222 U. S. 525, 56 L. ed. 299, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1139, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105) and the language of the statute, considered in its entirety, have convinced us that the legislature did not, however, intend that conclusion. Transfers resting upon a valuable and adequate consideration, although within the classification of the statute, are not within the intendment of it, and are not taxable.

Re Baker, 83 App. Div. 530, 82 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed on opinion below in 178 N. Y. 575, 70 N. E. 1094. In certain other jurisdictions it is so enacted. Clarke v. Treasurer, 226 Mass. 301, L.R.A.1917D, 800, 115 N. E. 416; State v. Mollier, 96 Kan. 514, L.R.A.1916C, 551, 152 Pac. 771. The legislature did not intend that a purchaser who had paid full value for the property transferred should directly or indirectly pay the tax besides. We have not decided, however, that subdivision 4 of the section which we have quoted is applicable only to voluntary transfers or gifts which are within its conditions. Re Keeney, 194 N. Y. 281, 286, 87 N. E. 428. Its language does not permit that conclusion. It makes taxable a transfer by bargain or sale when made in contemplation of the death of the grantor or vendor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death. The provision discloses a distinction in the legislative mind between a transfer by gift and a transfer by bargain or sale. It enacts, moreover, that transfers by bargain or sale should be taxable, or should not always and indiscriminately be non-taxable. The meaning of that enactment must be ascertained from the context and the object sought to be accomplished by the statute. The statute was not intended to restrict or burden the right of persons to transfer property in all legitimate ways and for all the usual and manifold purposes and objects of trade, commerce, and purchase, or of voluntary transfers or gifts not made in contemplation of the death of the transferor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death. It was intended to tax all transfers which are accomplished by will or the intestate laws of this state, and those made or incepted prior to the death of the transferor in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after his death, which are, in their nature and character, instruments or sources of bounty or benefaction, and which can be classed as similar in nature and effect with transfers by wills or the intestate laws, because they accomplish a transfer of property, donative in effect, under circumstances which impress on it the characteristics of a disposition made at the time of the transferor's death. In all cases in which the value of the consideration for the property transferred, under the statutory conditions, is so disproportionately less than the value of the property transferred that the transfer is, in the light of reason or of ordinary intelligence and judgment, beneficent and donative, the transfer is taxable. The taxability does not depend upon fraud, or an attempt to evade the statute; nor does it depend upon the purpose or inducement of the transfer; nor does it depend upon the form given the transfer. The law searches out the reality, and is not halted or controlled by the form. Re Gould, 156 N. Y. 423, 51 N. E. 287. The measure determining the liability of freedom from liability to the tax is the nature, the essence, the effect of the transfer. If, in truth, it in effect bestows, under the statutory conditions, a bounty or benefaction, and is not a transfer for money's worth, it is taxable.

The application of the statute in the instant case leaves no ground for discussion. The mind does not hesitate in determining <sup>—inheritance—survivorship of joint fund.</sup> that the transfer was in essence and in effect beneficent and donative, or in classing it as similar in nature and effect with transfers by wills.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

I. In general.

Property passing under agreements between partners for vesting in the survivor certain property of the partnership has usually been held taxable, as was held in the reported case (RE ORVIS, ante, 1636). Thus, the agreement of two partners to the effect that, upon the death of either, his interest in the good will of the business should be deemed to be of no value, does not prevent the state from ascertaining whether such good will has a market value, and from assessing a tax upon the value so ascertained, against the surviving partner, or other persons who are the beneficiaries thereof. Re

Halle (1918) 103 Misc. 661, 170 N. Y. Supp. 898; Re Cohen (1918) 170 N. Y. Supp. 156. An agreement between partners that the survivor should have the right to purchase, and should purchase, the stock of the other at a certain specified price, was held not to limit the state in assessing a transfer tax to the price agreed upon, but that the state might appraise the stock at its actual value. Re Cory (1917) 177 App. Div. 871, 164 N. Y. Supp. 956, affirmed in (1917) 221 N. Y. 612, 117 N. E. 1065. The interest of a decedent in the good will of a partnership which passed to the surviving members thereof by the death of the decedent, under an agreement that in the event of the dissolution of the co-partnership by reason of the death of any member the good will of the business and the right to use the firm name, etc., should belong to and become the property of the survivors, without any compensation, and should form no part of the assets of the firm, is taxable, even though the agreement was for a valuable consideration. Re Hellman (1918) 172 N. Y. Supp. 671.

In Brown v. Atty. Gen. (1898) 79 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 572, there was held a taxable succession upon the interest of a father which vested in his son, upon the father's death, under an agreement between them, upon entering into a partnership, that if the father should die the whole capital should go to the son, who was to give to his father's executors a bond sufficient for payment of a certain amount, and, if the son should die, the father was to have the entire business and capital, but was to pay the executors of the son a stipulated amount. The English Succession Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. VI. chap. 51) provided as follows: "Section 2. Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act . . . shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition of devolution a succession." The Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, in holding the property which vested in the son subject to the tax, states that, looking at the whole circumstances and the provisions in the partnership agreement, the father was actuated by a desire to provide, in the event of his death, for his son. In consequence the son must be liable to duty, because it is his father's provision for him. Nothing is said about the provision in the agreement looking to the contingency of the death of either.

In Re Reimers (1919) 107 Misc. 322, 176 N. Y. Supp. 430, the two members of a partnership contributed, as special partners, a specified sum to a limited partnership, under an agreement that, upon the decease of any member of the original partnership, the survivor shall "have the benefit and shall assume the burden of all the rights and liabilities of a deceased member of the firm." The interest in the limited partnership which passed to the survivor of the original partnership was held subject to the tax.

But the transfer to the surviving partner of the good will of the partnership business upon the death of one of the partners, under an agreement that upon the death of any of the partners the surviving partner or partners should have the exclusive right to use the firm name, has been held not to be a transfer taxable, under the statutory provisions taxing transfers by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death. Re Borden (1916) 95 Misc. 443, 159 N. Y. Supp. 346.

The United States Revenue Act of June 13, 1898 (30 Stat. at L. 448, chap. 448, Comp. Stat. § 6144, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 185) making subject to a duty tax, personal property, or any interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons, was construed as applying only to deeds, etc., without consideration, and, as thus construed, the interest passing to a son under a partnership agreement with his father, by which the son, upon the death of the father during the term of the partnership, became vested with the father's interest for a recited consideration, was held to be not taxable in Blair v. Herold (1907) 150 Fed. 199, affirmed in (1908) 86 C. C. A. 64, 158 Fed. 804.

A case involving an agreement somewhat similar to that involved in the reported case (RE ORVIS, ante, 1636), although not a partnership agreement, is Re Spring (1912) 75 Misc. 586, 136 N. Y. Supp. 174, where it was held that the half interest in mortgages, which were assigned to a mother and daughter by instruments containing provisions that the survivor of the two assignees should become the absolute owner, and neither should have the power to affect the rights of the last survivor, and in others assigned by instruments, stating that the security should be held by the party and the survivor of them, was taxable under the provision of the Transfer Tax Act, taxing transfers intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at death. It is stated that by the agreement and transfer the decedent took an interest in the mortgages which can be likened to an intermediate estate; while the survivor took a remainder under the assignment which thus amounted to a transfer, intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment on the death of one of the joint tenants.

In Re Pitou (1913) 79 Misc. 384, 140 N. Y. Supp. 919, decided before the statute subsequently referred to, upon the theory that there was no joint tenancy in mortgages and bonds which had been transferred to husband and wife, and the survivor of them, with habendum to them and the survivor of them, to their assigns, and to successors, legal representatives, and assigns of each survivor, it was held that the part of these securities owned by the husband was taxable upon his death, as within the statute taxing transfers intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at death. In the assignment of three of the mortgages there was a provision that it was the intention that the survivor of the said husband and wife should become the absolute owner of the bond and mortgage, and that neither the husband nor wife should have the power to affect the rights of the survivor thereof.

In most instances mutual survivorship agreements have been of such a nature that they have been held to create a joint tenancy, and it is a general theory that the interest going to the survivor upon the death of the cotenant passes as an incident to the estate, and is not a taxable transfer. Re Dalsimer (1915) 167 App. Div. 365, 153 N. Y. Supp. 58, affirmed in (1916) 217 N. Y. 608, 111 N. E. 1085. This is held true, regardless of the proportion in which the cotenants contributed to the estate. Ibid.

But where the statute expressly makes the vesting in the survivor of a joint tenancy of the entire estate upon the death of the other, a taxable transfer, it has been held that personal property that was vested in the joint tenancy before the enactment of the statute, under an agreement that the survivor should have the entire amount should the agreement be in force at the death of either, may be taxed upon the subsequent death of one to the extent of one half the value thereof. Re McKelway (1917) 221 N. Y. 15, L.R.A.1917E, 1143, 116 N. E. 348. Similar decisions appear under this statute in Re Teller (1917) 178 App. Div. 450, 165 N. Y. Supp. 517, appeal dismissed in (1918) 223 N. Y. 565, 119 N. E. 1081; Re Moebus (1917) 178 App. Div. 709, 165 N. Y. Supp. 887; Re Horler (1918) 180 App. Div. 608, 168 N. Y. Supp. 221, in cases of mortgages and joint bank accounts held by two persons as joint tenants. And the same is held with reference to a joint certificate of deposit, in Re Hauser (1917) 166 N. Y. Supp. 1079. The contrary decisions of surrogates' courts in Re Maguire (1917) 99 Misc. 466, 165 N. Y. Supp. 1067, and Re Teller (1916) 161 N. Y. Supp. 1110, cases involving joint bank accounts, seem to be overruled by the foregoing decisions. The statute involved in the foregoing New York cases was enacted in 1915 (Laws 1915, subd. 7, chap. 664) after the date of many of the decisions from that state set out in the present note.

II. Statutes taxing transfers in contemplation of death.

In the absence of a statute expressly taxing joint tenancies, the creation of a joint tenancy by the owner of personal property between himself and another, with all the incidents of a joint tenancy, particularly that of survivorship, does not, upon the death of the owner and the consequent vesting of the property in the surviving joint tenant, amount to a gift intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after death, and is, therefore, not taxable under a statute taxing such gifts. Thus, stocks and bonds owned by a husband and deposited by him with a trust company in a joint account for himself and wife, the husband and wife thereafter signing a writing directed to the trust company and requesting that all securities and money then held or thereafter received by the trust company for their account should be held for the joint account of the husband and wife, acting jointly and severally as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common, with all the rights that such joint and several relations can confer, and particularly with the rights to each, at any time, to withdraw or otherwise dispose of the same, and, upon the death of either, the survivor to be the sole owner of the securities and money remaining to the credit of the account, pass to the wife upon the death of the husband by virtue of the contract, and are held not to be a taxable transfer under a statute taxing gifts intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the donor's death. Re Dalsimer (1915) 167 App. Div. 865, 153 N. Y. Supp. 58, affirmed in (1916) 217 N. Y. 608, 111 N. E. 1085. Bonds and mortgages purchased with the husband's money, made payable to husband and wife jointly, and others made payable to the husband and assigned by him to himself and wife, were held not taxable to the wife on the death of the husband, in Re Thompson (1915) 167 App. Div. 356, 153 N. Y. Supp. 164, affirmed in (1916) 217 N. Y. 609, 111 N. E. 1101, although the assignment was not recorded until after the decedent's death, but the mortgages were delivered to the wife during the lifetime of the husband and were in her possession at the time of his death. It is stated that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary it must be presumed a right of survivorship is created when the security is taken which, upon the death of the husband, is not taxable. This case was followed in Re Keil (1915) 91 Misc. 667, 155 N. Y. Supp. 824, and a bond secured by a mortgage, and a certificate of deposit purchased with money earned by the joint industry of husband and wife, and standing in their joint name, were held not taxable as to any part thereof upon the death of the husband, the court stating that, even if there had been no evidence of the source of the money, the same result would obtain. Where there was no evidence of the ownership of the money which was loaned on bonds and mortgages executed in favor of husband and wife, and "the survivor of them," or of any agreement between the husband and wife limiting the interest which each of them legally took under the bonds and mortgages, the same are not taxable to the wife upon the death of the husband. Re Teller (1916) 161 N. Y. Supp. 1110. It seems that a different decision is required under the New York statute referred to above, subd. I.

A conveyance in pursuance of an antenuptial contract of property to the wife is not a transfer taxable under a statute taxing transfers of property made in contemplation of death, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at the death of the transferor, although, on the next day, the woman transfers the stock in trust to her intended husband under an agreement by which he is to hold the same, and that the property shall vest in the survivor. Re Miller (1902) 77 App. Div. 473, 78 N. Y. Supp. 930.

In some cases involving a joint tenancy created by joint contributions by both parties, the joint contribution is emphasized, and it is held that in that situation there is no taxable transfer. Thus, the interest in bonds and mortgages held in joint tenancy, passing to the survivor upon the death of one of the tenants, is not subject to transfer tax, where the joint tenants each contributed to the purchase of the property. Re Heiser (1913) 85 Misc. 271, 147 N. Y. Supp. 557.

On the contrary, where corporate stock is transferred by the owner thereof to himself and another as joint tenants, by way of a gift to take effect at the death of the donor in case the other joint tenant survives, and a new stock certificate is issued and delivered to the other, and remains in his possession until the death of the donor, the transfer is taxable under the statutory provisions taxing gifts intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death, in Re William B. Dana Co. (1914) 164 App. Div. 45, 149 N. Y. Supp. 417, affirmed in (1915) 214 N. Y. 710, 108 N. E. 1112.

As to whether the creation of a joint bank account, and the consequent vesting of the entire amount in the survivor, is a transfer intended to take effect at death, see infra, III.

III. Joint bank accounts.

Where money belonging to one person is deposited in a joint bank account to the credit of himself and another, with the provision that either or the survivor may draw thereon, it is the general theory of some cases that the money thereby becomes the joint property of the persons, and, upon the death of the depositor, vests in the survivor by virtue of the joint tenancy, and is not a taxable transfer. McDougald v. Boyd (1916) 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168; Re Stebbins (1907) 52 Misc. 438, 103 N. Y. Supp. 563; Re Graves (1907) 52 Misc. 433, 103 N. Y. Supp. 571. Some statutes expressly provide that money deposited in a bank in a joint account becomes the property of the persons in whose names it is deposited as joint tenants. Under such a statute, money belonging to a husband and deposited in a bank to the joint account of himself and wife, both of whom sign an agreement that it shall be payable to either during their joint lives, and shall belong absolutely to the survivor of them, has been held to become the property of the husband and wife as joint tenants, and, upon the death of the husband, the wife is held to take by virtue of her estate originating at the time of the creation of the joint tenancy, and there is, therefore, no taxable transfer under a statute which does not purport to tax the right accruing to a surviving joint tenant upon the death of his cotenant. McDougald v. Boyd (Cal.) supra; Re Gurnsey (1918) 177 Cal. 211, 170 Pac. 402. In some such deposits the parties have expressly agreed to create a joint tenancy, nothing being said as to survivorship. Re Gurnsey (Cal.) supra (money deposited belonged to community estate). Under a similar statute, making a deposit in the name of the depositor, and another in form to be paid to either or the survivor of them, the property of such persons as joint tenants, with the right to the whole amount in the survivor, there was held to be no taxable transfer upon the wife, succeeding to such a deposit upon the death of her husband. Re Tilley (1915) 166 App. Div. 240, 151 N. Y. Supp. 79, affirmed in (1915) 215 N. Y. 702, 109 N. E. 1094, where the money deposited belonged in part to husband, and in part to wife.

Money deposited to the credit of the depositor "or" another was held not taxable upon the death of the depositor, in Re Reynolds (1916) 163 N. Y. Supp. 803. Upon entering the account in the form above stated, the parties signed an agreement reciting that any money which "is now standing to or may be hereafter deposited to the credit of account No. 495, . . . shall be especially set aside and made subject to the provisions of this agreement, that either of us shall have full power at all times to draw all or any part of such money, and that, upon the death of one of us, any money then standing to the credit of said account shall belong to the survivor."

It has been held, however, that where the proof is clear that money belonging to one person was deposited in a joint account of herself and another, with no intention to vest any interest in this other, this fact may be shown, and, upon the death of the other, no transfer tax is assessable against the original owner. Re Buchanan (1918) 184 App. Div. 237, 171 N. Y. Supp. 708. The money in question in this case was deposited in four savings bank accounts; two of these accounts were made payable to the original owner, "or" the other person as her attorney, or the survivor; the other accounts omitted the word "attorney," and were payable to the other person or the original owner, payable to either or the survivor of them.

Where a joint tenancy in a bank deposit is created by the deposit to the joint names of the depositors, the transaction is complete, and does not constitute a gift intended to take effect at or after death. Re Thompson (1915) 167 App. Div. 356, 153 N. Y. Supp. 164, affirmed in (1916) 217 N. Y. 609, 111 N. E. 1101; Re Stebbins and Re Graves (N. Y.) supra. Where a joint tenancy is created by a husband depositing funds to the credit of himself and wife in a joint bank account under circumstances making them joint tenants, in contemplation of the husband's death, and intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment after his death, there is no taxable transfer, under a statute taxing a transfer of property without valuable consideration, in contemplation of the death of the transferor, and intended to take effect at or after such death, where it is not further shown that there was no valuable consideration. McDougald v. Boyd (1916) 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168. See statute referred to in Re Gurnsey (Cal.) supra.

See II. supra, for decisions as to whether the transfer to the survivor, of property other than joint bank accounts, is a transfer in contemplation of death.

A joint deposit made up of sums which appeared to have been previously given by the decedent to his wife was held not taxable in Re Rosenberg (1908) 114 N. Y. Supp. 726.

The decisions in the foregoing cases are not based upon the original ownership of the funds making up the joint deposit. In some cases, this fact is held the determinative feature. Money originally belonging to one person, which vests in another who is made a joint depositor with the original owner, upon the death of the original owner, is held subject to the transfer tax. Thus, in Re Durfee (1913) 79 Misc. 655, 140 N. Y. Supp. 594, so much as belonged to the husband, of a bank deposit made by the husband and wife in their joint names with the intention that upon the death of one the survivor should come into immediate, absolute, and sole possession of what remains, was held to become transferable to the wife upon the death of the husband, as a gift to the wife, and taxable under the provisions of the Transfer Tax Law, subjecting to such a tax gifts intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death. Under a statute making a deposit in the joint names of two persons the property of such persons as joint tenants, it has been held that, where one of the joint depositors originally owned the entire amount, the transfer upon his death to the survivor was subject to the transfer tax, as one intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death. Re Reed (1915) 89 Misc. 632, 154 N. Y. Supp. 247. The courts regard a provision in the statute that it is to be conclusively inferred that both parties intended to vest the title in the "survivor," as requiring this construction, since until death there could be no survivor. A joint account of husband and wife, made up of money belonging to the wife, payable to the order of either, and vesting in the survivor upon the death of either, was held taxable upon the wife's death in Re Von Bermuth (1913) 143 N. Y. Supp. 672, on the theory that it was a gift taking effect at death. "To the right which the husband had," says the court, "during the lifetime of his wife, to draw any part of the money from the bank, was added, upon her death, the absolute right of ownership to the amount then on deposit. This latter right he did not have before, and could not have until her death." This decision was rendered by the same surrogate's court which subsequently rendered the decision in Re Dalsimer (1915) 167 App. Div. 365, 153 N. Y. Supp. 58, affirmed in (1916) 217 N. Y. 608, 111 N. E. 1085. In Re Dalsimer, the money belonged partly to the husband and partly to the wife. This seemingly is the distinction, although no reference is made to Re Von Bermuth in this connection.

The interest of the parties is emphasized in Re Kline (1909) 55 Misc. 446, 121 N. Y. Supp. 1090, where the court, in holding that the interest of the husband in a joint deposit in a bank, in the joint names of himself and his wife, and payable to either or to the survivor, is taxable upon the death of the husband, states that from the evidence it appears that it was not the intention of either party to divest himself or herself of the controlling use of this money so long as both lived, and that the accounts were entered as joint accounts so that either could draw money during their joint lives, and that upon the death of either, the deposit would become the absolute property of the survivor. Accordingly, the transfer was held not to have become absolute in the wife until the death of the husband, and the transfer to the wife was, therefore, taxable.

But under this theory, where the joint tenancy is created by contributions of the joint tenants, it is not taxable. Thus, where husband and wife have each contributed to a joint account, and have agreed that either of them could draw upon the account, and that the survivor would be entitled to what remained to the credit of the account upon the death of either, the amount remaining to the credit of the account after the husband's death, has been held to pass to the widow by virtue of the agreement entered into between them, and is not a gift intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after death; consequently, is not subject to a transfer tax. Re Delsimer (1914) 148 N. Y. Supp. 914.

Some statutes expressly tax the right of the survivor in a joint bank account. See supra, I. W. A. E.

RE SUCCESSION OF ABRAHAM LEVITAN and Wife.

DR. LOUIS LEVY, Appt.

Louisiana Supreme Court — June 29, 1918.

(143 La. 1025, 79 So. 829.)

Physician — charges — ability to pay.

1. It is a matter of common information that physicians and surgeons do not regulate their charges for professional services by any fixed standard of pecuniary value, but, to a certain extent, upon the basis of the ability of the patient to pay, and, on that basis, more frequently than otherwise, perhaps, are but poorly compensated. Where such services are shown to have been of the highest value, in so far as the life and welfare of the patient were concerned, and the charge is neither unreasonable nor inconsiderate, as compared with the financial ability of the employer, it should be allowed by the court.

Evidence — employment — corroboration.

2. The testimony of a physician and surgeon, to the effect that he was employed by the mother of his patient, a married woman, rather than by the patient or her husband, and rendered valuable services, for which he considered the mother able to pay, but doubted the ability of the husband so to do, is strongly corroborated by the circumstance that the patient, having succeeded, as sole heir to the estate of her mother, hears the testimony, and does not take the stand to question its verity.

Headnotes by MONROE, Ch. J.

APPEAL by opponent from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division "B" (King, J.), dismissing opposition to and vitan. Judgment annulled.

Statement by Monroe, Ch. J.:

Dr. Louis Levy rendered professional services to Mrs. Esther J. Gordon, wife of J. Gordon, and daughter of decedent, from about May 27, 1914, until November or December of that year, during which period he successfully performed a Cæsarian operation upon her. There is no issue here as to the value of the services or the necessity of the operation, in so far as the life and well-being of the patient were concerned; the real question in the case being one of dollars and cents. In July, 1915, the doctor brought suit against Mrs. Levitan and J. Gordon for $500, alleging that he had been employed by the former and had performed the operation at her request, and that the latter was cognizant of the fact that the services were rendered and of the necessity therefor. The defendants filed exceptions and answers, but the case, for one reason or another towards the last, because of the illness of Mrs. Levitan), was never brought to trial; and, she having died on December 6, 1916, it was hereafter discontinued, following which, on February 19, 1917, the plaintiff therein set up the same claim by way of opposition to the provisional account filed by Mrs. Gordon, who is the executrix and sole heir of her deceased mother. It is shown that opponent had been the family physician of Mrs. Levitan and had no acquaintance with Mr. Gordon, but knew that he was a gentleman of very limited means; that Mrs. Levitan brought her daughter to him and requested him to take charge of her; that on November 16 she called him to her house, where her daughter was having convulsions from kidney trouble; that she was very much excited, and said that she wanted everything done that could be done, and, at her instance, a consultation was had, and the patient was taken to the infirmary, where the operation mentioned was at once performed; that at the infirmary, after the operation, Mrs. Levitan told opponent to put special nurses on the case, and spare no expense; that opponent was never, at any time, consulted by Mr. Gordon about the case; and that the services were well worth the amount charged. Attention is called to the circumstance that Mrs. Gordon was present in court when the facts thus recapitulated were testified to, and did not take the stand to deny the truth of the testimony. The opposition was dismissed and opponent appealed.

Monroe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the evidence, uncontradicted as it is, and given under circumstances in which it would have been easy and natural for the person most interested to have contradicted it, if she thought that she could conscientiously do so, sufficiently establishes the employment of the opponent by Mrs. Levitan. It is a matter of common information that physicians and surgeons do not regulate their charges by any fixed standard of pecuniary value, but, to a certain extent, base them on the ability of the patient to pay, and, on that basis, more frequently than ability to pay.

otherwise, perhaps, are but poorly compensated. The provisional account filed by Mrs. Gordon shows only the cash collections which came into her hands, up to the date of its filing, amounting to $9,140.85, against which there are some $4,000 or $5,000 of bills, due or paid, from which we infer that the decedent had been engaged in quite an active furniture business. The inventory of the succession property has not, however, been filed in evidence. Considering the case as presented, we find no sufficient reason for holding that the amount demanded by the opponent is unreasonable, or even inconsiderate.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be annulled, and that there now be judgment in favor of the opponent, recognizing him as an ordinary creditor of this succession in the sum of $500, and directing that he be placed on the account for that amount, with legal interest thereon from November 16, 1914, until paid.

Petition for rehearing denied, November 4, 1918.

ANNOTATION.

Ability to pay as factor in determining reasonableness of charge of physician or surgeon.

- I. Majority rule, 1648.
- II. Minority rule, 1649.
- III. Rule in Pennsylvania, 1650.

I. Majority rule.

The rule in the majority of the jurisdictions which have passed on the question is that the affluence, financial ability, or pecuniary circumstances of a patient cannot be considered as a factor in determining the reasonableness of a physician's charge for professional services, and evidence to that effect in an action or proceeding is inadmissible.

Morrisett v. Wood (1898) 123 Ala. 384, 82 Am. St. Rep. 127, 26 So. 307; Cotham v. Wisdom (1907) 83 Ark. 601, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1090, 119 Am. St. Rep. 157, 104 S. W. 164, 13 Ann. Cas. 25; Robinson v. Campbell (1878) 47 Iowa, 625; Morrell v. Lawrence (1907) 203 Mo. 363, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 11 Ann. Cas. 650; Swift v. Kelly (1910) — Tex. Civ. Rep. —, 133 S. W. 901.

Thus, in Robinson v. Campbell (1878) 47 Iowa, 625, wherein the plaintiff attempted to show, in an action to recover for the value of professional services consisting in a surgical operation on the mother of the defendants, that the affluence and pecuniary condition of the defendants justified the amount of the charge, the court held that the evidence was improper, and that the circumstances of the defendants did not constitute an element in fixing the services, saying: "There is no more reason why this charge should be enhanced on account of the ability of the defendants to pay than that the merchant should charge them more for a yard of cloth, or the druggists for filling a prescription, or a laborer for a day's work. It is true a physician in general practice will often be called upon to treat indigent persons from whom he will not be able to recover the value of his services. He may take this into account and regulate his charges with reference to that fact, just as a merchant may take into account probable bad debts in fixing his per centum of profit upon his goods. But the value of a service depends upon the difficulty of rendering it, and the skill required in its performance, and, sometimes, upon the results accomplished, and not upon the riches or the poverty of the person for whom the service is performed. If the ability to pay determines the reasonableness of a charge, then the richer a man is the more he should pay for any service. No such rule of charge can be recognized or countenanced by the law."

So, in Swift v. Kelly (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 133 S. W. 901, an action to recover the value of medical services rendered to the defendant, the court held that evidence as to the defendant's wealth and ability to pay, as a factor controlling the reasonableness of the physician's fees, was inadmissible, the court saying: "Certainly no court would hold that the value of ordinary labor could be determined by such a test, and upon principle we can see no distinction between such a claim and one of the character now under discussion."

Where the plaintiff, a physician, brought an action to recover on an implied contract the value of professional services rendered to the defendant's son, and in the course of the action offered to prove the affluence of the defendant as a factor in determining the professional fee, the court held that such evidence was inadmissible, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the reasonable value of the services rendered, uncontrolled by the wealth of the defendant. The court said: "He is entitled to a verdict for the reasonable value of his services, although the defendant may be a poor man; he is not entitled to a verdict for more than the reasonable value of his services, although the defendant may be a man of great wealth." Morrell v. Lawrence (1907) 203 Mo. 363, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 11 Ann. Cas. 650.

In Morrisett v. Wood (1898) 123 Ala. 884, 82 Am. St. Rep. 127, 26 So. 307, an action brought by a physician to recover from the defendant, as executor of the patient's estate, compensation for medical services rendered, it was sought to show the value of the estate. The court held the evidence to be inadmissible, since the amount or value of the decedent's estate could shed no light on the value of the plaintiff's services.

In Cothan v. Wisdom (1907) 83 Ark. 601, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1090, 119 Am. St. Rep. 157, 104 S. W. 164, 13 Ann. Cas. 25, a proceeding to recover the value of medical services rendered immediately after an accident and while the patient was unconscious, evidence as to the wealth of the patient and the fact that he was a bachelor was held to be inadmissible, since there was no actual contract, but a mere legal fiction implied by the law because of the circumstances, the court saying: "There is a conflict in the authorities as to whether it is proper to prove the value of the estate of a person for whom medical services were rendered, or the financial condition of the person receiving such services, and while the law may admit such evidence as throwing light upon the contract and indicating what was really in contemplation when it was made, yet a different question is presented when there is no contract to be ascertained or construed, but a mere fiction of law creating a contract where none existed, in order that there might be a remedy for a right. This fiction merely requires a reasonable compensation for the services rendered. The services are the same, be the patient prince or pauper, and for them the surgeon is entitled to fair compensation for his time, service, and skill. It was, therefore, error to admit this evidence and to instruct the jury . . . that in determining what was a reasonable charge they could consider the 'ability to pay of the person operated upon.'"

II. Minority rule.

In at least three jurisdictions it is well settled that the financial ability of a patient or his estate to pay is one of the elements to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a physician's charge for professional services rendered. Czarnowski v. Zeyer (1883) 35 La. Ann. 796; Haley's Succession (1898) 50 La. Ann. 840, 24 So. 285; Lange v. Kearney (1889) 21 N. Y. S. R. 262, 4 N. Y. Supp. 14, affirmed without opinion in (1891) 127 N. Y. 676, 28 N. E. 255; Schoenberg v. Rose (1914) 145 N. Y. Supp. 831; Gibson v. Mackay (1907) 10 Ont. Week. Rep. 1081; Paquet v. Balcer (1913) Rap. Jud. Quebec 45 C. S. 202; Chevallier v. Girard (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 48 C. S. 211. And see the reported case (LEVITAN'S SUCCESSION, ante, 1646).

In Lange v. Kearney (1889) 21 N. Y. S. R. 262, 4 N. Y. Supp. 14, affirmed without opinion in (1891) 127 N. Y. 676, 28 N. E. 255, an action to recover the value of medical services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant's son, the court laid down the rule that evidence of the financial ability or condition of a person is admissible as a factor bearing on the reasonableness of a physician's charge for professional services.

In Schoenberg v. Rose (1914) 145 N. Y. Supp. 831, the court followed the rule laid down in Lange v. Kearney (N. Y.) supra, holding that in an action to recover the value of medical services evidence as to the value of the patient's estate was competent as a proper element entering into the question, what charge should be made by the physician. The court said: "The financial condition of a patient is an element that, it may be assumed, is considered by both physician and patient when the services are contracted for, rendered, and accepted, and may also be considered by the court in determining the reasonableness of the charge; and that element should apply to a case where there is and was no contract, but a mere fiction of the law creating one, else, in a case where services are rendered to an unconscious man who never recovers, the charge against his estate might be so great and unreasonable as to be out of all proportion to the value of the estate. This charge a man who recovers could resist and successfully defend by showing his limited means, and, in the case of an unconscious man who does not recover, such value is an aid to the court in fixing the reasonableness of the claim, whether made against a large or a small estate. Therefore, the evidence as to the value of the deceased's estate was properly allowed and properly taken into consideration, and that, together with the experience of the physician as such, and the nature and difficulty or easiness of the case, and what is considered by him and by other physicians an ordinary or reasonable charge for the services, are the proper elements upon which a judge or jury may act in fixing the value of the services."

In the reported case (LEVITAN'S SUCCESSION, ante, 1646), on the question of the reasonableness of a physician's charge of $500 for professional services rendered to the defendant's testatrix, the court held that, in view of the value of the estate, the amount of the fee was not unreasonable, saying: "It is a matter of common information that physicians and surgeons do not regulate their charges by any fixed standard of pecuniary value, but, to a certain extent, base them on the ability of the patient to pay, and on that basis, more frequently than otherwise perhaps, are but poorly compensated."

In Haley's Succession (1898) 50 La. Ann. 840, 24 So. 285, in making an allowance for medical services rendered a deceased person on the proceedings for a settlement of the estate, the court held that it was proper to fix the physician's fees by taking into consideration the value of the succession.

In Czarnowski v. Zeyer (1883) 35 La. Ann. 796, an appeal from an allowance of $500 for medical services rendered to the defendant's testator, the court held that the allowance was disproportionate to the decedent's estate and condition in life, his estate being inventoried at $8,705, and accordingly raised the allowance to $1,000.

In Chevalier v. Girard (1915) Rap. Jud. Quebec 48 C. S. 211, the court held, in an action to determine the value of medical services rendered by the plaintiff physician to the defendant, that regard must be had to the financial and pecuniary circumstances of the patient to determine the reasonableness of a physician's charge.

So, in Paquet v. Balcer (1913) Rap. Jud. Quebec 45 C. S. 202, it was held in an action to recover the value of professional services rendered by the plaintiff, a physician, to the defendant, that a charge of $250 was excessive, regard being had to the pecuniary circumstances of the defendant.

In Gibson v. Mackay (1907) 10 Ont. Week. Rep. 1081, the court received evidence as to the custom in vogue in the medical profession of charging fees in proportion to the financial ability of the patient.

III. Rule in Pennsylvania.

In Pennsylvania, the question has not been passed on by the court of last resort. Of two decisions of lower courts, treating of the subject, one holds that the ability to pay is not a factor governing the charge of a physician or surgeon, while the other adopts the rule that ability to pay is a factor, and uses the rule to determine the reasonableness of a physician's fee.

In Mortimer's Estate (1904) 29 Pa. Co. Ct. 387, in the settlement of a claim of a physician against the estate of a decedent, it appeared that the plaintiff maintained two rates of charging for professional services, a "maximum" rate for the rich, and the ordinary rate for the resident patients. The court held that, while such a custom no doubt existed in the profession, it could not be recognized in a court of law, since the existence of the two rates furnishes the strongest evidence, on the question of reasonableness of the charge, that the "maximum" fee was unreasonable and excessive. In Moyer's Estate (1912) 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 187, the court held, in a proceeding to determine the claims of a physician for services rendered to a person since deceased, that an award of fifty dollars ($50) was ample, considering that "the balance of the estate for distribution . . . was small." The court received and considered the testimony of a practicing physician, who testified as follows: "I really would have to make an allowance for poor people always, and I should think that a proper fee for that sort of an operation would be fifty dollars ($50) for the whole matter. I think that that would be a very proper, reasonable, and right fee."

ALBERT J. BEROT, Appt.,

v.

ALBERT PORTE.

Louisiana Supreme Court — March 3, 1919.

(— La. —, 81 So. 323.)

Libel — privilege — statement to committee of secret society.

1. A qualified, not an absolute, privilege, applies in favor of communications to a committee of a secret society engaged in investigating the character and qualifications of an applicant for membership in the order.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1654.]

Evidence — burden of proof — malice of slanderer.

2. To recover damages for slander uttered under circumstances of qualified privilege, plaintiff must show malice in fact, or that defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made.

[See 17 R. C. L. 418.]

Libel — investigation of applicant for secret society.

3. One who applies for membership in a secret society is charged with notice that his character and reputation will be subjected to investigation, and cannot complain of disclosures made thereat unless he shows that objectionable testimony was given through actual malice or ill will towards him.

— conditions of privilege.

4. One need not be under legal obligation to speak to be entitled to qualified privilege, but it is sufficient if the duty is social or moral in its nature, and he believes in good faith that he is acting in pursuance thereof, although he is mistaken.

[See 17 R. C. L. 341-343.]

Appeal — finding on conflicting evidence.

5. The finding of the jury on conflicting evidence as to whether or not an alleged slanderous statement was in fact made will not be disturbed on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 194.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans (Parker, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged slander. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John D. Nix, Jr., and Ulic Burke, for appellant:

Proof of actual malice is admissible in evidence as in this case, though no charge of actual malice is made in the petition.

Spotorno v. Tourichon, 40 La. Ann. 423, 4 So. 71; Newell, Slander & Libel, 942; 25 Cyc. 496; Root v. Lowndes, 6 Hill, 518, 41 Am. Dec. 762; Botelar v. Bell, 1 Md. 175; Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. 500; Miller v. Holstein, 16 La. 389; Daly v. Van Benthuyzen, 3 La. Ann. 69; Billet v. Times-Democrat Pub. Co. 107 La. 751, 58 L.R.A. 62, 32 So. 17; Covington v. Roberson, 111 La. 326, 35 So. 586; Tresca v. Maddox, 11 La. Ann. 206, 66 Am. Dec. 198; Cass v. New Orleans Times, 27 La. Ann. 214.

If imputation be made, the exact language used is immaterial.

Fellman v. Dreyfous, 47 La. Ann. 907, 17 So. 422; Luzemberg v. O'Malley, 116 La. 699, 41 So. 41; Warner v. Clark, 45 La. Ann. 863, 21 L.R.A. 502, 13 So. 203; Spotorno v. Tourichon, 40 La. Ann. 423, 4 So. 71.

Messrs. Friedrichs, Moise, Barksdale, & Barksdale for appellee.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sues defendant in damages for alleged slanderous words spoken on two separate occasions. He says that defendant, without cause or provocation, referred to him as being of negro blood; that the statements were slanderous, false, and defamatory; but he does not charge malice, evil intent, or ill will on the part of defendant.

Defendant denied the use of the language attributed to him in the petition, and it was not proved. He claimed that the only occasion upon which he had referred to plaintiff was when he, as a member of the Order of Druids, appeared before the investigation committee of the George Washington Grove of Druids, by request, where the application of plaintiff for admission to the Grove was being considered, and that the communications he there made were privileged. He denied the second charge of slander, and that was not proved. Only one witness testified to the use of the objectionable statements alleged to have been made on the second occasion, on the street, and that witness was contradicted by witnesses who were present at the time, and who testified on the trial. There was a trial by a jury, a verdict in favor of defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

The privilege claimed by defendant is not absolute.

It does not belong to that narrow class which is limited to legislative, judicial, and other acts of state. But it falls within the class of qualified privileged communications, where the occasion on which it was made rebuts the inference prima facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character or reputation of plaintiff, and puts the burden on him to prove that there was

Libel—privilege

Evidence—
burden of proof —malice of malice in fact, that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made.

"Although the general rule is that a communication made in good faith on any subject-matter in which the person communicating has a duty is privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest, and this duty need not be a legal one, but may be only a moral or social duty of imperfect obligation, it has been very clearly stated that no privilege results merely from the fact that a defendant believes that he owes a social duty to give currency to rumors of a libelous character, so that the victim of them may be avoided. Such broad and indefinite duties the doctrine of qualified privilege has not yet been extended to cover." 17 R. C. L. 342.

No attempt was made to prove malice or ill will on the part of defendant, either before, at the time of, or after the meeting of the committee of Druids. The testimony shows that defendant was acting solely in the interest of the order to which he belonged, and to which he owed certain duties, and to which plaintiff applied for membership. Plaintiff knew when he made application that his character and reputation would be investigated, and he submitted himself thereto. He cannot be heard to complain of that investigation, unless he shows that objectionable testimony was given through actual malice or ill will towards him.

Libel—investigation of applicant for secret society.

The rule of Mr. Newell in his work on Defamation, Slander, and Libel is quoted in the case of Bayliss v. Grand Lodge, 131 La. 579, 59 So. 996, as follows: "Where words imputing misconduct to another are spoken by one having a duty to perform, and the words are spoken in good faith and in the belief that it comes within the discharge of that duty, or where they are spoken in good faith to those who have an interest in the communication and a right to know and act upon the fact stated, no presumption of malice arises from the speaking of the words, and therefore . . . an [no] action can be maintained in such case without proof of actual malice."

It is held in the case of Gilbert v. Palmer, 8 La. Ann. 130: "Where the declarations of the defendant concerning the plaintiff appear to have been uttered without malice, and under circumstances from which no malice is in law implied, they carry with them no pecuniary responsibility."

The duty under which the party is qualifiedly privileged to make the communication need not be one having the affairs of a legal obligation; but <sup>—conditions of privilege.</sup> it is sufficient if it is social or moral in its nature, and defendant in good faith believed he was acting in pursuit thereof, although in fact he was mistaken.

Only one witness testified to the use of the language charged in the petition; and he was contradicted by another witness for plaintiff, who said that he was present all of the time while the investigating committee was examining defendant, and that he did not use the language alleged, but that he said there was a streak in the family, and that a full investigation should be made. The two other persons present at the meeting, and defendant, testified positively that the language, or its equivalent, was not used. The allegations made in the <sup>Appeal—finding on conflicting evidence.</sup> petition were not proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and their finding will not be disturbed.

The testimony shows that the communication, whatever it may have been, was made by defendant in good faith, without malice, prejudice, or ill will towards plaintiff, to a social or fraternal organization of which defendant was a member, and which plaintiff had applied to be admitted to while the character of the application for membership was being investigated. The statement was privileged, and carried with it no pecuniary responsibility from defendant to plaintiff.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, March 31, 1919.

ANNOTATION.

Libel and slander: privilege of communication in relation to member, or prospective member, of society, other than church.

- I. General rule, 1654.
- II. Communications to society by members, 1654.
- III. Communication by officers, or higher bodies, to local society or members, 1655.
- IV. Statements made by one member to another member, 1656.
- V. Communications before committees, 1657.
- VI. Statements at conference of officers, 1658.
- VII. Member's statement to prospective member, 1658.

I. General rule.

Upon the theory that a communication is qualifiedly privileged, if made bona fide by one who has an interest in the subject-matter, to one who also has an interest, or stands in such a relation that it is a reasonable duty, or proper, to give the information, it is held, as a general rule, in accord with the reported case (BEROT v. PORTE, ante, 1651), that communications by members, or officers of societies, made in good faith to the society, its members, or committees, concerning members, or prospective members, are qualifiedly privileged. Wise v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen (1918) — C. C. A. —, 252 Fed. 961; Graham v. State (1909) 6 Ga. App. 436, 65 S. E. 167, second appeal in (1910) 7 Ga. App. 407, 66 S. E. 1038; Cadle v. McIntosh (1912) 51 Ind. App. 365, 99 N. E. 779; Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge (1881) 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316; Holmes v. Royal Fraternal Union (1909) 222 Mo. 556, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1080, 121 S. W. 100; Kersting v. White (1904) 107 Mo. App. 265, 80 S. W. 730; Ostheimer v. Blumert (1883) 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. Supp. 17; Hayden v. Hasbrouck (1912) 34 R. I. 556, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1109, 84 Atl. 1087; McKnight v. Hasbrouck (1890) 17 R. I. 70, 20 Atl. 95.

The burden of proving malice, and thus avoiding the privilege, in such cases, is upon the plaintiff. Graham v. State (1909) 6 Ga. App. 436, 65 S. E. 167, second appeal in (1910) 7 Ga. App. 407, 66 S. E. 1038; Cadle v. McIntosh (1912) 51 Ind. App. 365, 99 N. E. 779; Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge (1881) 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316; Holmes v. Royal Fraternal Union (1909) 222 Mo. 556, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1080, 121 S. W. 100; Ostheimer v. Blumert (1883) 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. Supp. 17.

II. Communications to society by members.

It has been held that a presentment by a member of the Odd Fellows, to a lodge of which both the plaintiff and defendant were members, of charges against the plaintiff, for the purpose of having their truth inquired into and the plaintiff dealt with according to the laws of the order, is prima facie privileged. Streety v. Wood (1853) 15 Barb. N. Y. 105.

And it was further held in this case that, if the defendant had probable cause for presenting the charges to the lodge, no recovery could be had against him, whether he was actuated by malice or not. The court stated that in cases of communications addressed to public officers to prevent the appointment of particular individuals to office, and to procure removals from office, or for the redress of grievances, if charges made in them are pertinent, and the officers addressed have power to act in the matter, the doctrine is firmly established that, to maintain an action for a libel founded upon them, it must appear that the charges were made both maliciously and without probable cause; that the action, though in the form of a libel, was in the nature of an action for malicious prosecution, and required the same proof in the respects mentioned to sustain it, and the court stated that they did not feel at liberty to hold that the privilege allowed by law to the communication in the case at bar was less in extent than the privilege allowed in case of communications to public officers.

And it has been held that a charge against a member of a secret organization, made by another member to the society for the purpose of bringing him to trial before the organization of which they were members, is privileged if made in good faith. Graham v. State (1915) 6 Ga. App. 436, 65 S. E. 167. The same conclusion was reached on a second appeal of this case. (1910) 7 Ga. App. 407, 66 S. E. 1038.

And in McKnight v. Hasbrouck (1910) 17 R. I. 70, 20 Atl. 95, it was held that where it is the duty of a member, and an official of a medical society, to communicate to the society statements with regard to other members, a communication in the bona fide discharge of this duty is privileged. In this case the defendant's plea, stating that he was a member of a physician's society organized to maintain the honor and dignity of the medical profession, and that the duty was imposed upon him to inform the society of all matters and things relating to members, which, in his judgment, it was necessary or advisable that the society should be acquainted with, and that he wrote the letter complained of in discharge of this duty, and without any malice, or intent to injure the plaintiff, was held good on demurrer, although it did not allege that the defendant made the statements, believing them to be true.

In Caldwell v. Hayden (1914) 42 App. D. C. 166, certain statements made by the president of a union of musicians at a regular meeting, concerning another member, were construed as a mere criticism and not actionable, the court stating that the words were uttered at a meeting of the union, in relation to a matter in which all the members were equally interested, and that under the circumstances wide latitude would be tolerated in discussion; that the member criticized, in assuming to serve the union in a certain matter, was subject to reasonable criticism in respect to the work performed, and that the presumption was that the statement was made under these circumstances, without malice and for the good of the order, unless the contrary could be inferred reasonably from the language itself. The court does not, however, deal specifically with the question of privilege in this case. In Fawcett v. Charles (1835) 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 473, however, an incorporated county medical society was held to have no power to expel a member because he had procured himself to be admitted as a member by means of false pretenses concerning his qualifications to practice, and it was accordingly held that a resolution introduced by another member for the purpose of procuring the expulsion of the disqualified member was not privileged.

The facts in Miller v. Roy (1855) 10 La. Ann. 231, are not clearly shown, but it was there held that the fact that certain defamatory language was used by the defendant at a session of the grand division of the Sons of Temperance should not be taken into consideration in mitigation of damages. It does not appear whether the plaintiff and defendant were members of the organization, or what the nature of that organization was, and nothing is specifically said as to the matter being privileged.

III. Communication by officers, or higher bodies, to local society or members.

In Bayliss v. Grand Lodge (1912) 131 La. 579, 59 So. 996, a communication sent by the Grand Master of a state, upon whom the duty rests to see that the edicts of Masonry are carried out, to lodges within his jurisdiction, warning them against spurious Masonic bodies organized by the plaintiff, was held privileged, where it was not shown to have been actuated by malice. And the phraseology of the communication, referring to the plaintiff's organization as bogus, spurious, and clandestine, and charging him with selling degrees, was held not to show malice.

In Wise v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen (1918) — C. C. A. —, 252 Fed. 961, an action against a brotherhood to recover for a libel contained in communications by the secretary and president to the lodge of which the plaintiff was a member, in which it was stated that the injuries for which he sought payment under a benefit certificate issued by the brotherhood were self-inflicted, and that the claim was an attempt to defraud the brotherhood, it was held that, in the absence from the record of the constitution, it could not be said that the court did not have evidence before it showing that the members addressed had an interest in the subject-matter, and that the occasion and subject-matter were privileged. And the form of the benefit certificate not being in the record, it was held that it could not be said that the statements complained of did not relate to legitimate defenses claimed by the society.

In the Wise Case, however, the failure to submit the question of malicious publication to the jury, was held error, there being some evidence that the statements were false, and no testimony by the president that he believed his statements to be true.

In Burton v. Dickson (1919) — Kan. —, 180 Pac. 216, motion for rehearing denied in (1919) — Kan. —, 180 Pac. 775, a circular, stating that an officer of a state grange had been suspended and expelled, which the executive committee caused to be printed and distributed among officers and members of subordinate granges, was held qualifiedly privileged, and the evidence in the case was held not to show malice.

And it has been held that a written communication from the president of a fraternal society to members at a certain place, to the effect that the collecting agent of the order at such place was behind in his remittances, and that it had become necessary to withdraw authority from him, and directing the members to pay their dues to another, is qualifiedly privileged, especially where he had threatened to withdraw from the order and take its members with him, so that the society had a right to guard against such threat. Holmes v. Royal Fraternal Union (1909) 222 Mo. 556, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1080, 121 S. W. 100. And in this case the incorporation, in a letter to members of the organization, notifying them of the cancelation of the authority of the collecting agent, and instructing them to pay their dues to another, of a statement that the agent was short in his remittances, was held not evidence of express malice, where the officers of the association ascertained that fact by a thorough examination of the books, and he had threatened suit against the association unless money which he claimed to be due him was paid, and to withdraw from the society and take a large portion of its members with him.

It has been held that the report of a member of a committee of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows, stating that the committee had examined the members of the subordinate lodge, and that they were unanimous in their opinion that charges of perjury against the plaintiff were justified, and that his expulsion for that reason was proper, which report was made in accordance with the regular procedure of the lodge, was held conditionally privileged, the circumstances being such as to repel the inference of malice. Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge (1881) 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316.

IV. Statements made by one member to another member.

A communication by a member of the Odd Fellows to another member of the association, for the purpose of procuring his signature to a presentment by which it was sought to have certain charges investigated, has been held prima facie privileged. Streety v. Wood (1853) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 105.

And it has been held that a member of the Knights of Pythias has such an interest in the character and qualifications of persons seeking admission to that order as will warrant him in communicating to other members of the order, having a like interest, anything that he may know regarding the character, qualification, or fitness of a prospective member, and that a statement regarding such an applicant, made by a member of one lodge of the order to members of another lodge at their place of business, although they were not members of any committee to investigate the fitness of the applicant, if made in good faith and without malice, are privileged. Cadle v. McIntosh (1912) 51 Ind. App. 365, 99 N. E. 779. It was held error in this case to direct a verdict for the defendant, there being testimony that the defendant had a private grievance against the plaintiff, and therefore some evidence on which a verdict for the plaintiff could rest. The court said: "It appears from the evidence that appellee had come 20 miles to impart to members of Orleans Lodge the information that appellant was a drunkard, a gambler, and a thief. The fact that the information was volunteered is no evidence of malice, if it was his duty to volunteer it. He may have been influenced in his conduct by the highest motives, a love of the order, and a laudable desire that none except men of good morals and of the highest character for honesty should become members; but there was evidence from which the jury would have been justified in finding that he acted from a different motive. Appellee told the gentlemen with whom he conversed of his own private grievance against appellant. He said that appellant, on one occasion, in company with two others, had waylaid him and beaten him. It may be that this treatment by appellant engendered in the breast of appellee feelings of resentment and hatred against him, and that these feelings were still harbored, and furnished a motive for the charges made. If the case had been submitted to the jury under proper instructions on the subject of express malice, it might have found that appellee made the charges complained of, not from a sense of duty, but from personal resentment, and that the object of the conversation was to prejudice appellee because of such personal resentment. There is some evidence in the record on which a verdict for plaintiff could rest."

It has been held that where plaintiff, by her own evidence, conclusively shows that a communication was qualifiedly privileged, and offers no proof whatever of express malice, a nonsuit should be entered, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant failed to allege in his answer that the communication was a qualifiedly privileged one. Kersting v. White (1904) 107 Mo. App. 265, 80 S. W. 730. The questions in this case, whether or not the circumstances under which the actionable words were communicated made them privileged, and, if so, whether the defendant acted in good faith, were held questions of fact for the jury, and a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence was held properly denied.

V. Communications before committees.

It will be observed that in the reported case (BEROT v. PORTE, ante, 1651), a communication concerning an applicant for membership in a secret society, made without malice by a member to an investigating committee, was held qualifiedly privileged.

In Pate v. Trollinger (1916) 113 Miss. 255, 74 So. 131, where a statute defined what should constitute defamatory matter, and provided that a plea, exception, or demurrer should not be sustained to preclude a jury from passing upon the evidence, there was held to be error in holding the communications privileged, and in striking out the evidence of certain witnesses which tended to show that the defendant, a member of a lodge, who had had charges preferred against him, while talking with other members of the lodge who were on a certain committee, spoke the words complained of by the plaintiff, who was also a member of the lodge, the court stated that the record did not disclose fully the circumstances, or show the charge preferred, nor that the committee was taking evidence on the charge, and that, if this was assumed, still it would be a question for the jury to determine whether the statements were necessary under the circumstances, and whether they were made maliciously, and that the mere fact that two men belong to the same fraternal organization, and that such organization is trying to settle some difference between them, does not authorize one of the parties to denounce the other as a perjurer, even to fraternal brothers.

In Holmes v. Johnson (1850) 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 55, an action of slander by one member of the Odd Fellows against another member, for statements made to a committee appointed to investigate charges against the plaintiff, it appearing that the lodge had by-laws regulating the conduct and duties of members, and requiring them to disclose anything against the character of a member, and these by-laws having been admitted in evidence, in affirming a judgment for plaintiff, it was held proper to exclude testimony by a witness that there were certain customs as to the duty of a member of a lodge to give information concerning the bad morals or character of other members. The court said that it was obviously the purpose to get from the witness his opinion of the moral duty of the defendant in making disclosures.

VI. Statements at conference of officers.

Statements by the president of a state organization of women's clubs, at a conference solicited by officers of a local club to devise means to stop larcenies which had occurred at meetings of the local club, made in answer to questions propounded by the officers concerning a member of the club in question, were held qualifiedly privileged in Hayden v. Hasbrouck (1912) 34 R. I. 556, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1109, 84 Atl. 1087. The court stated that it is a principle well recognized that a communication made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has, or honestly believes he has, a duty, is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains criminatory matter which, without this privilege, would be slanderous and actionable, and that the word "duty," as used, could not be confined to legal duties which might be enforced, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation. And the president's statements with respect to a particular member that, although there was no positive proof, she was convinced that the suspect's husband had "paid her out before," and giving as a reason for the member's conduct that she was "as poor as Job's turkey," were held not per se evidence of malice.

VII. Member's statement to prospective member.

In Bleitz v. Carton (1908) 49 Wash. 545, 95 Pac. 1099, where a member of a fraternal order made a defamatory statement concerning one applicant for membership, to another applicant, the court, in arriving at its conclusion, in an action for slander against the member, that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant, apparently took into consideration the question of privilege, although the evidence in the case seems to have been such as to show that the member's statements were true, and also insufficient to sustain the plaintiff's allegations. JONES HOLLOW WARE COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY, Appt.,
v.

CHARLES T. CRANE et al., Constituting the State Board of Prison Control, and State Roads Commission.

Maryland Court of Appeals — March 5, 1919.

(— Md. —, 106 Atl. 274.)

Constitutional law — impairing obligation of contract — convict labor.

1. A statute permitting prison authorities to contract for the employment of convicts in the open air outside the prison, for the benefit of their health and morals, notwithstanding existing contracts for their services at inside work, does not unconstitutionally impair the latter contracts.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1671.]

Evidence — judicial notice — public sentiment — convict labor.

2. The court takes judicial notice that, prior to the general election in Maryland in 1915, the public sentiment in favor of prison reform was such that both of the leading political parties declared in favor of abolishing contract labor in penal institutions.

[See 15 R. C. L. 1092.]

Constitutional law — impairing obligation of contract — what contract protected.

3. Contracts between individuals and a state, as well as those between individuals, are within the provisions of the Federal Constitution forbidding the passing of laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

[See 6 R. C. L. 333.]

— police power — care of convicts.

4. The police power of the state extends to providing for the preservation of the health and morals of persons confined in its penal institutions.

[See 6 R. C. L. 203 et seq.]

Contracts — by state — labor of convicts.

5. The state cannot bargain away its right and duty to adopt such measures as it may from time to time deem advisable for the promotion of the health and morals of persons confined in its penal institutions.

[See 21 R. C. L. 1186-1188.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court, No. 2, of Baltimore City (Ambler, J.) sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a bill filed to enforce a contract for convict labor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bernard Carter & Sons for appellant.

Messrs. Albert C. Ritchie, Attorney General, Ogle Marbury, Acting Attorney General, and Philip B. Perlman, Assistant Attorney General, for appellees:

The contract with the Jones Hollow Ware Company is the contract of the state, and the suit against the state board of prison control, involving that contract, is therefore a suit against the state, which has not consented to be sued.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Sections 623 to 651, art. 27, of vol. 3 of the Code of Public General Laws, under the subtitle, "State Penitentiary," provided for the appointment of six directors to manage the affairs of the penitentiary, and declared that the name and style of that institution should be the "Directors of the Maryland Penitentiary," and that by that name the directors should have power to institute any suit or suits for any sums of money due the institution, for injury to its property, for breach of any contract made with them in their official capacity, or on official bonds of any officer, etc. By § 639, the directors were given the control and management of the financial affairs of the institution. Section 641 authorized the directors to "enter into such contracts for the employment of the convicts in the penitentiary and for the sale of the manufactures in the institution as they" deemed proper, etc., and § 642 provided that the expenses of the penitentiary should be defrayed out of the funds thereof, and that no demand should be made upon the state for that purpose, "except for such sums as may be payable by law."

For some years prior to 1914 there existed a public sentiment in favor of prison reform and the abolishment of contracts for prison labor, and in that year a bill was introduced in the legislature to repeal the sections of the Code referred to, to abolish the board of directors of the Maryland penitentiary and the board of managers of the Maryland house of correction, and to create a board under the name of the "state board of prison control," with full power and authority to manage and control said institutions. That bill was passed by both houses of the general assembly, but, because of certain features not affecting its general purpose, failed to receive the approval of the governor. Acts of 1914, chap. 466. It is a matter of common knowledge that, prior to the election of a new governor and a new legislature in the fall of 1915, the sentiment in favor of the reforms mentioned had become so pronounced that both of the leading parties in the state declared in favor of abolishing contract labor in penal institutions.

In November, 1915, the directors of the penitentiary, acting under the authority contained in § 641 of article 27 of the Code, entered into a contract with the Jones Hollow Ware Company of Baltimore City, a body corporate, the appellant in this case, by which the directors agreed, for the period of five years, commencing on the 1st of December, 1915, "to hire to" that company "two hundred and forty (240) male convicts at 75 cents per day for each male convict up to the number of one hundred and twenty (120), and seventy cents (70c) per day for each male convict in excess of the first one hundred and twenty (120)." The contract provided: "In the event of the party of the first part (the directors of the penitentiary) becoming short of convicts, however, and thereby being unable to furnish the complement of convicts under this contract and under other contracts for the hiring of convicts, then it is understood that it is to furnish to the said party of the second part only its pro rata of convicts, the number to be furnished them and other contracts to be ratably reduced. It is also understood and agreed that during the continuation of this contract, that, when any new convicts received and confined in the Maryland penitentiary, after the 1st day of December, 1915, are employed under this contract, no compensation is to be paid to the party of the first part by the party of the second part for the labor of said new convicts for the space of thirty (30) days from the date of their first employment, unless previous service or employment on this kind of work has rendered said new convicts familiar with the same."

The fourth paragraph of the contract is as follows: "The party of the first part also agrees to rent to the party of the second part the ground floor of the building north of the warden's office; the entire two-story and basement building west of the warden's office, with the one-story building immediately north of the last described building (but not to include any part of the building east of the warden's office), together with the use of the engine and boiler located in the west wing, and also the new plain one-story brick building heretofore erected by them, for the sum of fourteen hundred and eighty dollars ($1,480) per annum, payable monthly in cash; and the parties of the second part further agree to furnish stoves and fuel for heating and to keep the glass in the workshop in good order, and to keep and leave said buildings, engine, and boilers in good order, damage by fire and usual wear and tear excepted. It is further agreed that the parties of the second part shall pay the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150) annually for water used by them, said sum to be paid on the 1st day of March of each year."

By the sixth paragraph of the contract it was agreed that the appellant should have the exclusive right to carry on the business of an iron foundry in the penitentiary during the term of the contract. The twelfth paragraph required the appellant to give a bond in the penalty of $20,000 for the faithful performance of the contract, and by the thirteenth paragraph it was agreed: "If national legislation adversely affects the employment of contract convict labor in the penitentiary, or interferes with the disposal of the product of such labor, either party shall have the right to terminate this contract by giving one year's notice in writing to the other."

Shortly after the execution of the contract with the appellant, the legislature passed the Act of 1916, chap. 556, providing for the appointment of the "state board of prison control," and declaring that "From and after the appointment and qualification of the said state board of prison control, the said directors of the Maryland penitentiary and the board of managers of the Maryland house of correction shall be and the same are hereby dissolved and abolished." § 627.

Section 626 of the act provided: "from and after the appointment and qualification of said board of prison control, all rights, powers, duties, functions, liabilities, obligations, franchises, privileges, and property, real and personal, in any wise had, enjoyed or held by or vested in the directors of the Maryland penitentiary or the board of managers of the Maryland house of correction, shall be had, enjoyed and held by and vested in the said state board of prison control; and, from and after their appointment and qualification, the said state board of prison control shall be in all respects successors in right, title, interest and liability, to the directors of the Maryland penitentiary, and the board of managers of the Maryland house of correction; but nothing in this act shall be construed to impair or abrogate any existing contract."

Section 628 gives the board of prison control full power and control over the Maryland penitentiary and the Maryland house of correction, and declares that the board "shall have any and all incidental powers and authority appropriate and convenient to enable the said board to fully discharge the powers of management, control, supervision, visitation and inquisition conferred upon them" by the act. Section 629 provides that the title to and possession of all the property "appertaining to" the Maryland penitentiary and Maryland house of correction shall vest in and be held by the state board of prison control, as trustees for the state, and authorizes the board, with the consent of the board of public works, to purchase or otherwise acquire on behalf of the state any real property appropriate to the needs of said institutions. Section 630 of the act was as follows: "The said board shall establish and maintain a system of labor for prisoners to supersede the present system of contract labor in the Maryland penitentiary and the Maryland house of correction, as soon as it shall deem the same expedient and proper, and in case said board does not establish such a system of labor before the convening of the general assembly of 1918, then the board shall report to such general assembly the result of the investigation of the subject, and any recommendations which it may deem desirable to make thereon. The said board shall have power and authority to place prisoners at labor upon state works whenever in the judgment of said board the same shall be expedient and proper, upon such terms as to it shall seem wise. The said board is hereby directed to provide, whenever in its judgment the same may be expedient, such form of labor as will offer an opportunity to prisoners to earn a surplus over the cost of their maintenance to the state, and said board shall further provide in its discretion for the payment of any surplus so earned, to the prisoner earning the same, or to such person or persons as he may direct."

In accordance with § 630 of the Act of 1916, chap. 556, and an order passed by the senate of Maryland, the state board of prison control reported to the general assembly of 1918 that there were 853 prisoners in the Maryland penitentiary on February 28, 1918, and that of that number 731 were employed by contractors. Senate Journal 1918, 531. Thereafter the legislature passed the Act of 1918, chap. 354, entitled: "An Act to Repeal and Re-enact with Amendments, §§ 626 and 630 of Article 27 of the Annotated Code of Maryland, Title 'Crimes and Punishments,' Subtitle 'III. Places of Reformation and Punishments,' Subhead 'The State Board of Prison Control,' as the Same Were Enacted by Chapter 556 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland of 1916, the Said Sections as Thus Amended Relating to the Establishment of a System of Labor for Prisoners to Supersede the Present System of Contract Labor in the Maryland Penitentiary and the Maryland House of Correction."

The only amendment made by the Act of 1918 of § 626 as enacted by the Act of 1916 is the omission from that section of the provision, "but nothing in this act shall be construed to impair or abrogate any existing contract," and the amendment of § 630 consists in the omission of the words, "and in case said board does not establish such a system of labor before the convening of the general assembly of 1918, then the board shall report to such general assembly the result of the investigation of the subject, and any recommendations which it may deem desirable to make thereon," and the insertion, in their place, of the following provision: "And the board is hereby vested with all power and authority necessary to that end and to put such system of prison labor when established into operation and effect."

The legislature also passed chapter 306 of the Acts of 1918, repealing and re-enacting with amendments § 61 of article 91 of the Code, so as to read as follows: "61. For the purpose of building and constructing or maintaining any roads, bridges and highways under the provisions of this act, or for the purpose of working in any stone quarry operated by said Commission [State Roads Commission], the said Commission is hereby authorized to make requisitions on the state board of prison control for as many inmates of the Maryland penitentiary and the Maryland house of correction as may be necessary for said purpose; and the said state board of prison control is hereby directed to furnish the same with such guards or keepers as can be spared from their duties at said institutions; and any additional guards or keepers necessary for the safekeeping of said inmates shall be furnished and appointed by said Commission. The said Commission shall in conjunction with the aforesaid state board of prison control provide for the maintenance and safe-keeping of said inmates of the house of correction and the Maryland penitentiary while so employed."

On the 2d of October, 1918, the Jones Hollow Ware Company filed in circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city its bill of complaint against Charles T. Crane and others, constituting the state board of prison control, and the State Roads Commission, in which, after alleging that it was a corporation duly incorporated under the general incorporation laws of the state for the purpose of manufacturing and selling hollow ware and other iron goods, and after setting out the execution and provisions of the contract with the directors of the Maryland penitentiary referred to, it alleges that in order to enable it to perform said contract the plaintiff had installed and maintained in the buildings of the penitentiary, machinery, trucks, and other foundry equipment and fixtures, and had constructed and maintained permanent buildings upon the penitentiary premises to the value of $100,000, and that, relying upon the faithful performance of the contract by the directors of the penitentiary and the state board of prison control, it had obligated and bound itself by contracts for fuel and materials sufficient to enable it to perform its said contract and certain contracts by which it had bound itself for the manufacture and delivery of cooking and food preserving utensils, sanitary plumbing fixtures, and special castings, to the amount of $157,000. The sixth paragraph of the bill alleges that notwithstanding the contract of the plaintiff with the directors of the penitentiary had been entered into by said directors, and continued by the state board of prison control, "for commercial uses, reasons, and purposes, to secure the moneys and revenue issuing and resulting therefrom; and notwithstanding the fact that prior, up to and since July 5, 1918, there had been a sufficient number of convicts committed to and confined in the Maryland penitentiary, and under the control and direction of the state board of prison control, . . . to enable them to furnish the plaintiff at least two hundred and sixteen (216) male convicts daily," under the terms and provisions of the contract, nevertheless the state board of prison control, in wilful disregard of its obligations, against the protest of the plaintiff, and to the plaintiff's irreparable loss and injury, "and for commercial and business purposes only, and for the revenue to be derived therefrom, have arbitrarily, . . . assuming the right so to do under the provisions of chapter 354 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland of the year 1918, and under the provisions of chapter 306 of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland of the year 1918, at the instance of the State Roads Commission of Maryland, . . . not only refused to furnish the plaintiff with the number of convicts to which it is entitled in accordance with the terms" of the contract, "but have also, purely for the commercial and business purposes aforesaid, and the revenue to be derived therefrom, since July 5, 1918, from time to time, taken out of the plaintiff's foundry in the penitentiary sixty-six (66) or more convicts, thus reducing the number of convicts in the plaintiff's foundry from the number of 221 on July 5, 1918, to 155 or less on September 30, 1918, on which last-mentioned day twenty-one convicts were taken from the plaintiff's foundry and hired out to work for contractors for railroad companies, and put to work for contractors and others on state roads,

. . . the larger number of said convicts so taken from the plaintiff's foundry being long-term convicts, who, under the long and careful tutelage and instruction and teaching of the plaintiff, had become expert and skilled molders and iron foundrymen, whose places it is now impossible for the plaintiff to fill from the men left it up to this time, and whose loss to the plaintiff is irreparable; and whose continued absence will render it impossible for the plaintiff to fulfil its contracts and meet its obligations." This paragraph further alleges that the plaintiff is credibly informed by the officers and agents of the state board of prison control in the penitentiary, that said board, at the instance of the State Roads Commission "and otherwise," will further reduce and curtail the number of convicts in the plaintiff's foundry in the penitentiary by removing them therefrom, and, "purely for commercial and business purposes and the increased revenue to be derived therefrom, intend to hire them out and put them to work for contractors and others outside of the penitentiary."

The seventh paragraph alleges that if the state board of prison control, "at the instance of the State Roads Commission, or otherwise, . . . are permitted to disregard" said contract, and are allowed to put to work outside of the penitentiary "any more of the convicts now in the plaintiff's foundry in the penitentiary, and are not required to return to the plaintiff's foundry the long-term men heretofore hired out and put to work outside of the penitentiary, and the twenty-one men convicts taken from the plaintiff's foundry on September 30, 1918, the obligation of the plaintiff's contract with the state board of prison control will not only be impaired in contravention of plaintiff's rights secured to it by § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting any state to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," but in addition thereto the plaintiff would thereby suffer irreparable damage for which no adequate redress could be obtained at law, "for the reason that the convict labor contracted to be supplied by the defendants to the plaintiff in its foundry in the penitentiary is indispensable to the business of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff could not otherwise obtain labor for its foundry in the penitentiary, nor has it a foundry, nor could it now obtain one, outside of the penitentiary, or labor to work therein even if it had a foundry outside of the penitentiary, and fulfil its contracts and obligations."

The prayers of the bill are:

(1) That the contract may be specifically enforced so that the state board of prison control "may be required to furnish the plaintiff in its foundry in the penitentiary the number of convicts under their control to which it may be entitled under and by the terms" of the contract, "including the return to the plaintiff's foundry in the penitentiary the long-term convicts recently removed therefrom."

(2) That the state board of prison control and its officers, etc., may be enjoined "from removing any more convicts now or hereafter confined or committed to the penitentiary, which are now assigned to work in plaintiff's foundry in the penitentiary, or who may hereafter be so assigned, for the purpose of hiring them out or putting them to work to or for contractors or other persons outside of the penitentiary," and that the State Roads Commission, its officers, etc., may be enjoined "from making requisition upon, or otherwise securing, from the state board of prison control, convicts now confined in, or who may hereafter be confined in or committed to, the Maryland penitentiary, so far as the same would reduce the number of convicts in plaintiff's foundry."

(3) That chapters 306 and 354 of the Acts of 1918 may be declared unconstitutional and void, so far as they may be construed "as authorizing and empowering the state board of prison control to remove convicts confined in and committed to the Maryland penitentiary from the plaintiff's foundry therein, and not to comply in all respects with" said contract, "as being laws impairing the obligation of said contract in contravention of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States."

The defendants demurred to the bill on the ground that it does not state such a case as entitled the plaintiff to any relief against the defendants, and is bad in substance, and this appeal is from the decree of the court below sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill.

The power and authority of the directors of the penitentiary, under the provisions of the Code then in force, to make the contract sought to be enforced in this case, is not questioned. Nor can it be doubted that the provision of the Constitution of the United States here invoked refers to contracts between individuals and a state as well as contracts between individuals. 8 Cyc. 930; Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358, 26 L. ed. 395. It must also be conceded that the things complained of in the bill of complaint were done by the state board of prison control in pursuance of the power and authority supposed to be vested in the board by chapters 306 and 354 of the Acts of 1918. The important question, therefore, to be determined in this case, is whether the contract between the appellant and the directors of the penitentiary is one within the scope and purpose of the constitutional restriction relied on by the appellant.

It is said in 21 R. C. L. 1168: "The erection and operation of prisons and jails . . . is a purely governmental function, being an indispensable part of the administration of the criminal law. They are a part of the police system for the preservation of order and the security of society, and are established by the state in the exercise of its sovereign powers, in performance of its duty to provide for the custody, employment, and maintenance of convicts. They are a public necessity."

Again it is said that statutes authorizing the hiring out of convicts are constitutional, and that among the reasons given for upholding the right of the state to so provide is "that the substitution of hard labor outside of the walls of the prison when the convict's condition is normal, where he has fresh air, pure water, and wholesome food, which are superior advantages over close confinement, is a humane and ameliorating policy in reference to the convict himself, as well as a more profitable use of his labor for the state." 21 R. C. L. 1186, 1187.

In the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "That the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the states in the regulation of their civil institutions, adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed, may be admitted."

In the case of Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989, it is said: "All rights are held subject to the police power of the state. . . . Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the extent and boundaries of the police power, and however difficult it may be to render a satisfactory definition of it, there seems to be no doubt that it does extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals. The legislature cannot, by any contract, divest itself of the power to provide for these objects. They belong emphatically to that class of objects which demand the application of the maxim, 'Salus populi suprema lex;' and they are to be attained and provided for by such appropriate means as the legislative discretion may devise. That discretion can no more be bargained away than the power itself."

The principle was applied in Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036, where it was claimed that an ordinance passed in pursuance of an authority to define and abate nuisances impaired the obligation of the contract contained in the charter of the Fertilizing Company. In the case of Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, where the legislature of Mississippi in 1867, in consideration of the payment of certain sums, granted a charter to a lottery company for twenty-five years, and where the provisions of a Constitution adopted by that state in 1868 declared that no lottery should thereafter be drawn, the Supreme Court said: "If the legislature that granted this charter had the power to bind the people of the state and all succeeding legislatures to allow the corporation to continue its corporate business during the whole term of its authorized existence, there is no doubt about the sufficiency of the language employed to effect that object. . . . Whether the alleged contract exists, therefore, or not, depends on the authority of the legislature to bind the state and the people of the state in that way. All agree that the legislature cannot bargain away the police power of a state. 'Irrevocable grants of property and franchises may be made if they do not impair the supreme authority to make laws for the right government of the state; but no legislature can curtail the power of its successors to make such laws as they may deem proper in matters of police.' Metropolitan Bd. of Excise v. Barrie, 34 N. Y. 657; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302. . . . The question is therefore directly presented whether, in view of these facts, the legislature of a state can, by the charter of a lottery company, defeat the will of the people, authoritatively expressed, in relation to the further continuance of such business in their midst. We think it cannot. No legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants. The supervision of both these subjects of governmental power is continuing in its nature, and they are to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require. Government is organized with a view to their preservation, and cannot divest itself of the power to provide for them. For this purpose the largest legislative discretion is allowed, and the discretion cannot be parted with any more than the power itself. . . . The power of governing is a trust committed by the people to the government, no part of which can be granted away. The people, in their sovereign capacity, have established their agencies for the preservation of the public health and the public morals, and the protection of public and private rights. These several agencies can govern according to their discretion, if within the scope of their general authority, while in power; but they cannot give away nor sell the discretion of those that are to come after them, in respect to matters the government of which, from the very nature of things, must 'vary with varying circumstances.'"

In the case of Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652, the court had to pass upon the validity of an ordinance, passed in pursuance of authority conferred by the Constitution adopted by the state of Louisiana in 1879, which in effect repealed an exclusive privilege granted to the appellee by the legislature of 1869 for stock landing and slaughter-houses at New Orleans for twenty-five years. The court held that the Constitution of 1879 and the ordinance were not void as impairing the obligations of the contract, and said: "While we are not prepared to say that the legislature can make valid contracts on no subject embraced in the largest definition of the police power, we think that, in regard to two subjects so embraced, it cannot, by any contract, limit the exercise of those powers to the prejudice of the general welfare. These are the public health and public morals. The preservation of these is so necessary to the best interests of social organization that a wise policy forbids the legislative body to divest itself of the power to enact laws for the preservation of health and the repression of crime."

In the case of Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, referring to the limitations contained in the Federal Constitution, the court said they were not "designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people." In the case of New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252, the contract was one growing out of a grant of an exclusive right or franchise to supply gas to a municipality. The court held that it was protected by the Constitution, and, in the course of the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, said: "The constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the state to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Rights and privileges arising from contracts with a state are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, in the same sense, and to the same extent, as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations. Whatever, therefore, in the manufacture or distribution of gas in the city of New Orleans proves to be injurious to the public health, the public comfort, or the public safety, may, notwithstanding the exclusive grant to plaintiff, be prohibited by legislation, or by municipal ordinance passed under legislative authority. It cannot be said with propriety that to sustain that grant is to obstruct the state in the exercise of her power to provide for the public protection, health, and safety. The article in the state Constitution of 1879 in relation to monopolies is not in any legal sense an exercise of the police power for the preservation of the public health, or the promotion of the public safety; for the exclusiveness of a grant has no relation whatever to the public health, or to the public safety. These considerations depend upon the nature of the business or duty to which the grant relates, and not at all upon the inquiry whether a franchise is exercised by one rather than by many."

In the more recent case of Manigault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 473, 50 L. ed. 274, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127, decided in 1905, the court said: "It is the settled law of this court that the interdiction of statutes impairing the obligation of contracts does not prevent the state from exercising such powers as are vested in it for the promotion of the common weal, or are necessary for the general good of the public, though contracts previously entered into between individuals may thereby be affected. This power, which in its various ramifications is known as the police power, is an exercise of the sovereign right of the government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals. . . . While this power is subject to limitations in certain cases, there is wide discretion on the part of the legislature in determining what is and what is not necessary—a discretion which courts ordinarily will not interfere with. . . . It only remains to consider, in connection with this branch of the case, whether the act of the general assembly of 1903 was a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Of this we have no doubt. Although it was not an exercise of that power in its ordinarily accepted sense of protecting the health, lives, and morals of the community, it is defensible in its broader meaning of providing for the general welfare of the people, by the reclamation of swampy, overflowed, and infertile lands, and the erection of dams, levees, and dikes for that purpose."

Turning now to the decisions in this state, it will be found that the decisions we have referred to have been frequently quoted, and the principles therein announced consistently applied. In the case of State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L.R.A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 775, where the court was considering an act prescribing certain sanitary regulations to be observed by dairymen who supplied milk to cities, Chief Judge McSherry, after stating that the rights of property were subject to the power of the legislature to enact reasonable restraints and regulations in respect thereto, said: "This power, legitimately exercised, can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation."

In State v. Hyman, 98 Md. 596, 64 L.R.A. 637, 57 Atl. 6, 1 Ann. Cas. 742, where the court was passing upon the constitutionality of an act providing that no room in any tenement or dwelling house should be used for the manufacture of coats, vests, trousers, etc., until a permit was obtained from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics, the court held, quoting from the syllabus: "It is a legitimate and important function of the state to make laws to preserve and protect the public health, morals, and safety, and in regard to such laws the authority of the state is complete, unqualified, and exclusive. This power can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation. It is for the legislature to determine whether particular acts or things are or are not dangerous to the public health or safety. And if a statute designed to protect the public health has a real and substantial relation to this power of the state, the courts will not hold it to be void merely because it is, in their judgment, unreasonable and unwise."

In the case of Byrne v. Maryland Realty Co. 129 Md. 202, L.R.A. 1917A, 1216, 98 Atl. 547, Judge Burke, speaking for the court, said: "All uses of property or courses of conduct which are injurious to the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society may be prohibited under the sovereign power of the state, even though the exercise of such power may result in inconvenience or loss to individuals. In this respect individual rights must be subordinate to the higher rights of the public. The power that the state may exercise in this regard is the overruling law of necessity, and is founded upon the maxim, 'Salus populi est suprema lex.' The existence and exercise of this power are an essential attribute of sovereignty, and the establishment of government presupposes that the individual citizen surrenders all private rights, the exercise of which would prove hurtful to the citizens generally."

In the case of Yeatman v. Towers, 126 Md. 513, P.U.R.1915E, 811, 95 Atl. 158, where there was a contract to supply water to dwelling houses at a certain rate, and where it was claimed that an order of the Public Service Commission had the effect of impairing the obligation of that contract, Judge Stockbridge, speaking for the court, said: "The true principle, which must control in a case like the present, is that laid down in Manigault v. Spring, supra, in the following language: 'It is the settled law of this court that the interdiction of statutes impairing the obligation of contracts does not prevent the state from exercising such powers as are vested in it for the promotion of the common weal, or are necessary for the general good of the public, though contracts previously entered into between individuals may thereby be affected.

This power, which in its various ramifications is known as the police power, is an exercise of the sovereign right of the government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals.'"

The rule applicable to contracts relating to matters within the police power of the state has been applied to contracts for hiring of convict labor. It is said in 12 C. J. 1001: "No contract can be made by the state for hiring convict labor which will deprive the state of its police power over convicts, and statutes, therefore, passed in the exercise of the police power are not invalid as impairing the obligation of prior contracts."

And it is said in 13 C. J. 927: "But inasmuch as the state cannot surrender its police power over convicts, prison authorities cannot make contracts for convict labor which would preclude the legislature from adopting another system, necessarily interfering with the execution of such contracts; and contracts for convict labor must necessarily imply a right of the legislature to change its policy in regard to the penal system, and the parties to such contracts must be presumed to know that such changes of policy may occur."

In the case of Hancock v. Ewing, 55 Mo. 101, the court said: "The question is whether the warden of the penitentiary, or the supervisors, called inspectors, or both, can make contracts for convict labor which will preclude the legislature from adopting another system necessarily interfering with the execution of such contracts, and we are clearly of the opinion that this could not be done. Such contracts, it may be conceded, are warranted by the law, and seem in various instances to have been made and sanctioned by the legislature; but all such contracts must necessarily imply a right on the part of the legislature to change its policy in regard to the penal system. This is a necessary result of the peculiar character of such contracts. It may be that the legislature will abolish the whole system and require solitary confinement without labor, as we know is the policy of some states, or it may happen that the number of convicts will not enable the warden to furnish the contractors with the number called for in the contract."

In Georgia Penitentiary Cos. v. Nelms, 71 Ga. 301, the supreme court of that state held that the constitutional restriction against impairing the obligation of a contract did not prevent the state from changing "its penitentiary system."

No one will deny that it is the duty of the state, in the exercise of its police power, to provide for the custody and maintenance of convicts as an essential part of the administration of criminal laws enacted for the protection of the public. It would seem equally clear that regulations providing for the release of convicts from confinement in the prisons, and their employment in the open air outside of the penitentiary, under conditions that enable them to earn for their own benefit something beyond the cost of their maintenance, have a direct relation to the public welfare and public safety, the preservation of their health and the preservation of public morals. It is the duty of the state to make all reasonable regulations for the preservation of their health, and the public have a direct interest in their moral and physical well-being. The state cannot, therefore, by contract or otherwise, barter away its duty and right to adopt such measures as it may, from time to time, deem advisable for the promotion of those ends.

Contracts—by state—labor of convicts.

It is alleged in the bill that the convicts were hired out to contractors and others for work outside of the penitentiary, for commercial and business purposes, in order to obtain the increase in revenue therefrom, and the appellant contends that there is not the slightest ground for holding that the acts referred to were "necessary for the public health, safety, morals, or welfare, in the sense in which the police power may be used to override constitutional property and personal rights." It relies upon the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Waters, 105 Md. 396, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 326, 66 Atl. 685, where the court held that the charter of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company was not repealed by the Act of 1906, chap. 457, and that the said act was not a police regulation designed to protect the public health, safety, or morals, but was enacted in the interest of property owners adjoining the line of the proposed lateral road. But in that case Judge Pearce quoted the statement of the court in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 3 Ann. Cas. 1133, that "the purpose of a statute must be determined from the natural and legal effect of the language employed; and whether it is, or is not, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, must be determined from the natural effect of such statutes, and not from their proclaimed purpose."

In the case at bar the acts in question were passed in reference to a matter clearly within the police power of the state. In the case of State v. Hyman, supra, Chief Judge McSherry, speaking for the court, said: "Running through all the cases, both Federal and state, is the doctrine that if the measure designed for, or purporting to concern, the protection or preservation of the public health, morals, or safety, is one which has a real and substantial relation to the police power, then no matter how unreasonable or how unwise the measure itself may be, it is not for the judicial tribunals to avoid or vacate it upon those grounds. . . . If the act has a real and substantial relation to the police power, no inquiry as to its unreasonableness can arise, because it is the judgment of the lawmakers and not of the courts which must control; and if, in the judgment of the former, the thing be reasonable, all inquiry on that ground by the latter is foreclosed."

Upon the authorities referred to, and for the reasons stated, we hold that the acts in question are not unconstitutional and void as impairing the obligation of the contract here sought to be enforced, and that the appellant is not entitled to a decree for specific performance of that contract to the extent of depriving the state board of prison control of the power and authority vested in said board by said acts, or to an injunction restraining said board from the further exercise of such power and authority.

In this view of the case, it is not necessary to determine whether this is a suit against the state, or whether the acts referred to amount to a naked breach or repudiation of the contract in question as distinguished from an impairment of the obligation thereof within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, or to consider the other questions discussed by counsel, Decree affirmed, with costs.

ANNOTATION.

Impairment of obligation of convict labor contracts.

This note does not include cases where the contract is ended pursuant to a provision therein for its annulment by the state. See F. H. Mills Co. v. State (1906) 110 App. Div. 843, 97 N. Y. Supp. 676, affirmed in (1907) 187 N. Y. 552, 80 N. E. 1109. Contracts for the hire of convicts, made after the passage of an act providing for the annulment of such contracts, are, of course, subject to such statute. See, for example, Jefferson County v. Truss (1888) 85 Ala. 486, 5 So. 86.

Is the leasing of convict labor a matter of police power? Does the abrogation of such a lease impair the obligation of the contract? May the state abrogate the contract without compensation?

In Graham v. State (1918) — S. C. —, 96 S. E. 138, where the court sustained a complaint in an action brought under a statute authorizing one whose contract for the hire of convicts was abrogated by the legislature to bring an action for the recovery of such damages, if any, as he may have suffered by the abrogation of his contract, counsel for the state demurred, claiming that: "(1) The provisions of the law relating to the care and employment of convicts are embraced within the police power of the state; (2) that the contract in question was made subject to the right of the state to exercise such police power, and to change its policy with regard to its penal system and the employment of its convicts; and (3) that the obligation of such contract is not impaired by the exercise of such powers, and plaintiff has sustained no injury in consequence of the act abolishing the said hosiery mill." The court said: "The first two grounds of the motion are scarcely debatable. The propositions therein stated may be affirmed upon reason and the weight of authority. The major premise of the third proposition has been affirmed and denied by respectable authority." It was unnecessary, however, for the court to consider the questions suggested by the last ground of demurrer, for the reason that the statute under which the action was brought was construed to waive, not only the state's immunity from suit, but also the defense that the contract was abrogated in the exercise of a sovereign power rightfully exercised. In this connection, the court said that even if it be conceded that the contract was rightly rescinded in the exercise of the power impliedly reserved to the state, and therefore sheared of its legal obligation, the circumstances may have given rise to a moral obligation to compensate the plaintiff for the damage thereby done him, which the state unquestionably had the right to recognize.

It will be observed that in the reported case (JONES HOLLOW WARE CO. v. CRANE, ante, 1658) it is held that after a contract for the hire of convicts for indoor work has been lawfully made by the directors of a state penitentiary, the legislature may, by act, supersede the board by a new board, and give it power to abrogate the contract by the hire of convicts to outdoor employments; that such act is not void as impairing the obligation of the contract; and that the hirer may not have his contract enforced, for the reason that the act authorizing the abrogation of the contract was an exercise of the police power.

In Hancock v. Ewing (1874) 55 Mo. 101, quoted from JONES HOLLOW WARE CO. v. CRANE, the management of the penitentiary was by the new act taken from the state officials, and the penitentiary was leased. The court said: "If the plaintiffs by this sustained a loss, they undoubtedly have a claim against the state; but such a claim it is not in the province of the courts to allow, much less can the courts interfere by injunction to prevent the execution of the law."

But in Georgia Penitentiary Cos. v. Nelms (1883) 71 Ga. 301, it was held that a state, having made a contract for the leasing of its convicts reserving the police power over them, cannot pass thereafter a valid act directing the leasing of part of the convicts otherwise. The court said: "We find that the state, through its chief executive, has leased its convicts for twenty years, and is to receive $25,000 per annum. Whether the contract thus made was proper, or whether now one more remunerative to the state could be made, are considerations by which this court cannot afford to be influenced; it is the mission of the courts to enforce, and not to make, contracts. The state can change its penitentiary system; can change its modes of punishment, may reduce felonies to misdemeanors, or make, prospectively, misdemeanors felonies; but as long as the state continues its present system and modes of punishment, contracts made, in having the same enforced, are binding on the state. If this were not so, with what claim of right or degree of propriety could the state insist that the lessees should perform their part of the contracts, as hereinbefore set forth?"

In People ex rel. McCauley v. Brooks (1860) 16 Cal. 11, it was held that the state may not impair the obligation of her contract of lease of convict labor. Field, Ch. J., said: "Rights of property once vested under contracts, whether between individuals or between the state and individuals, cannot be frittered away by legislation. They have the protection of both the Federal and state Constitutions. If the state desire to resume the possession of the state prison, and the control of the convicts, she can do so only in one way,—by compensation, as is required in all cases where private property is taken for public use. The leasehold interest is as much property for which compensation is to be made before it can be subjected to the uses of the state as are lands held in fee."

It has also been held that the manner of employing convicts is not embraced within the police power. Thus, in Bronk v. Barckley (1897) 13 App. Div. 72, 43 N. Y. Supp. 400, it was held that it could not be said that a new state "Constitution, regulating the manner of employing state prisoners confined in its penal institutions, affects the public health, morals, comfort, or safety. Hence, it should not be given a retrospective operation, so as to nullify a contract authorized by the state and adopted by it prior to the enactment of the new Constitution."

The foregoing statement of Chief Justice Field in People ex rel. McCauley v. Brooks (Cal.) supra, would seem to be unanswerable. If the sovereign power desires to take property, for a public purpose, it takes it, but the constitutions declare that there must be compensation.

The following two cases, while not relating to statutory impairment of obligation, may be referred to in this connection.

In Porter v. Haight (1873) 45 Cal. 631, it was held that a board of directors of state prisons, having inferential authority to hire out the labor of convicts, have no power "to enter into any contract for the employment of convict labor, or for any other purpose, that would deprive them in any degree of the full and exclusive control of the prisoners and prison labor, or of the grounds, buildings, and property, with which they are charged by" statute; and "if at any time after the making of a contract originally free from the vice we have mentioned, circumstances should arise which would, in the judgment of the directors, render the continuance of the contract incompatible with the safety of the convicts, or the proper management of the prison, it would be their right and duty to terminate it. This is a power of which they cannot deprive themselves by contract. It is imposed upon the board by the act which created it." In that case, the contractor had sued the board. The court said:

"The plaintiff is not left without remedy. His remedy, however, as was held by the court below, is, in fact, only against the state." The court does not refer to People ex rel. McCauley v. Brooks (Cal.) supra.

In refusing a mandamus to compel a state board of public lands and buildings to perform a contract for the hiring of convict labor, the Nebraska court said: "The state, like an individual or private corporation, may refuse to keep its engagements; and the board of public lands and buildings, as a governmental agency having plenary authority in all matters pertaining to the control and management of the penitentiary, is vested with power to determine whether the state will perform or refuse to perform its contracts for the leasing of convict labor. The action of the members of the board in the matter is the action of the state; their determination is its determination." State ex rel. Davis v. Mortensen (1903) 69 Neb. 376, 95 N. W. 831, 5 Ann. Cas. 291. B. B. B.

RE ESTATE OF MARY ARKWRIGHT HUTTON, Deceased.

W. H. WINFREE, Guardian ad Litem of Lillian Dorothy Arkwright, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 180 Pac. 882.)

Will — right of children of deceased child — application of statute.

1. A devise to the children of a deceased person will not pass to children of a child dead at the time the will was made, to the knowledge of testator, leaving surviving brothers and sisters, under a statute providing that when any estate shall be devised to any child, and such devisee shall die before testator, having lineal descendants, such descendants shall take the property which such devisee would have taken had he survived the testator.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1682.]

— children as grandchildren.

2. The word "children" does not, in its ordinary acceptation as used in a will, include grandchildren.

Costs — allowance to defeated party.

3. An allowance of costs and counsel fees upon appeal cannot be made to a minor defendant in a suit by an administrator to determine such minor's rights under a will, in case of affirmance of a decree denying the minor's claim, although the appeal was justified.

APPEAL by guardian ad litem from a decree of the Superior Court for Spokane County (Oswald, J.) in favor of the executor of the estate of Mary Arkwright, deceased, in a proceeding to determine who was entitled to take under the nonintervention will left by her. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. H. Winfree for appellant:

The court erred in concluding and decreeing that the minor, Lillian Dorothy Arkwright, took nothing under the will.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary Arkwright Hutton died in Spokane county on October 6, 1915, being then a resident of that county. She left a nonintervention will, which was made by her on December 2, 1913, naming her husband, L. W. Hutton, executor thereof. She made no testamentary disposition of her property other than as evidenced by the following language found in her will:

"First. I give and bequeath unto my half sister, Eliza Grombacher, of Cleveland, Ohio, the sum of $1,000.

"Second. I give and bequeath unto my half brother, Lyman B. Arkwright, of Youngstown, Ohio, the sum of $1,000.

"Third. I give and bequeath unto my half brother, Delaney Arkwright, of Youngstown, Ohio, the sum of $1,000.

"Fourth. I give and bequeath unto the children of my deceased half brother, William Arkwright, late of Youngstown, Ohio, the sum of $1,000.

"Fifth. I direct my executor, hereinafter named, to contribute out of the funds belonging to my estate the sum of $5,000 toward the completion of a labor temple in the city of Spokane, Washington, payable at his discretion when such temple shall have been substantially constructed.

"Sixth. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, both real and personal, wherever situated, I give, devise and bequeath to my husband, L. W. Hutton, with full power to use, retain, hold, manage, invest, and keep the same invested, and receive and retain the rents, issues, and profits thereof, for and during the term of his natural life, if he should so long remain my widower, and upon his remarriage or death, or in case he shall not survive me, I give, devise and bequeath to the said Eliza Grombacher, to the said Lyman B. Arkwright, to the said Delaney Arkwright, and to the children of the said William Arkwright, each an undivided one fourth part thereof absolutely and in fee."

William Arkwright, the deceased half brother of Mrs. Hutton, named in the fourth and sixth paragraphs of her will, died long prior to her decease, leaving several children, one of whom, named Lyman Arkwright, died on August 19, 1904, which date, it will be noticed, was some nine years prior to the making of the will by Mrs. Hutton. At the time of and long prior to the making of her will, Mrs. Hutton was fully advised and well knew that Lyman Arkwright, the son of her deceased half brother, William Arkwright, had died in the year 1904. Lyman Arkwright left a daughter, Lillian Dorothy Arkwright, the grandniece of Mrs. Hutton. L. W. Hutton, the executor, acquired the entire interest of each and all of the legatees and devisees entitled to take under the will, except the possible interest which Lillian Dorothy Arkwright might take by virtue of being a daughter of Lyman Arkwright. L. W. Hutton, the executor, having fully administered the estate, and being desirous of having the question of whether or not Lillian Dorothy Arkwright shall take under the will, on March 27, 1918, filed in the probate proceeding in the superior court for Spokane county, wherein the will had been proved and the estate administered, in so far as it was necessary to be administered under the direction of the court, his petition for the distribution of the remaining property of the estate to himself as legatee and devisee under the will, and as assignee of the entire interest of each and all of the other legatees and devisees entitled to take under the will, alleging that he is advised and believes that Lillian Dorothy Arkwright took no estate by the terms of the will, and has no interest in the estate. This petition was filed in pursuance of § 92 of our new Probate Code (Laws of 1917, p. 666), providing for the rendering of a decree determining who is entitled to take under a non-intervention will. The matter of distribution presented by the petition coming on for hearing in the superior court, timely notice thereof having been given, and a guardian ad litem to represent Lillian Dorothy Arkwright, who is a minor, having been appointed, evidence was introduced which, taken with the record in the proceeding already made, shows the facts as above summarized; and, the matter being submitted for final decision upon the merits, the court decreed distribution of the remaining property of the estate, as prayed for by L. W. Hutton as executor and individually, the court holding that Mary Arkwright Hutton, deceased, "did not intend or purpose to make either the said Lyman Arkwright or the said Lillian Dorothy Arkwright a beneficiary of her said will, and that the said Lillian Dorothy Arkwright took and takes no estate or interest thereunder either in her own right or as sole lineal descendant of the said Lyman Arkwright." From this disposition of the matter, the guardian ad litem of Lillian Dorothy Arkwright has, in her behalf, appealed to this court.

Counsel for appellant Lillian Dorothy Arkwright contends that she is entitled to take in the place of her father, Lyman Arkwright, under the will of her great-aunt, Mary Arkwright Hutton, by virtue of § 1328, Rem. Code, which reads: "When any estate shall be devised to any child, grandchild, or other relative of the testator, and such devisee shall die before the testator, having lineal descendants, such descendants shall take the estate, real and personal, as such devisee would have done in case he had survived the testator."

Had the appellant's father, Lyman Arkwright, been living at the time of the making of the will by Mrs.

Hutton, he being a son of William Arkwright, the deceased half brother of Mrs. Hutton, whose children are designated as beneficiaries in the fourth and sixth paragraphs of the will, this contention would seem to be well grounded. Or had Mrs. Hutton in her will designated her nephew Lyman Arkwright by name, or in some other manner specifically pointed him out as a beneficiary under her will, though then knowing that he was dead, it would also seem, under the weight of modern authority, that appellant would take in his place. But such is not our problem here to be solved. We are dealing with a gift to a class, designated in the will as "the children of my deceased half brother, William Arkwright;" the testatrix knowing at the time of making the will that there were several children of William Arkwright then living, and knowing that one, appellant's father, was then dead. The real question here to be answered is: Did Mrs. Hutton intend to include in the class she designated as "the children of my deceased half brother, William Arkwright," the then deceased son of William Arkwright, to wit, Lyman Arkwright, the father of appellant? The correct answer to this question will become decisive of this case, for, under § 1328, Rem. Code, appellant's right to take depends upon her right of substitution in the place of one of the class designated by Mrs. Hutton in the will by the language above quoted.

We do not understand counsel for appellant to here contend that the language, "the children of my deceased half brother William Arkwright," as used in the will by Mrs. Hutton, includes "grandchildren" of her deceased half brother. Indeed we think there would be no sound ground upon which to rest any such contention, since manifestly the word "children" was used in the will in its ordinarily accepted meaning, which does not include grandchildren. 40 Cyc. 1488; Re Roberts, 84 Wash. 163, 146 Pac. 398.

It is therefore plain, we think, that appellant can take under the will, if at all, only as she may be substituted for one of the class designated by the language of the will above quoted. So the question remains: Was her father, Lyman Arkwright, who was the deceased son of William Arkwright, at the time of the making of the will by Mrs. Hutton, intended by her to be a member of the class of beneficiaries designated in her will, as though he were living at the time she made the will?

It was the rule of the common law, in the absence of any statute similar to § 1328, Rem. Code, that a legacy or devise to a person deceased at the time of the making of the will was void ab initio, and that a bequest or devise to a person who died after the making of the will, and before the death of the testator, would lapse, so that no one could take thereunder. 2 Alexander, Wills, 1101; 1 Jarman, Wills, 6th ed. 423; 40 Cyc. 1052, 1925.

Some of the American courts have noticed and have been somewhat influenced by the distinction recognized at common law between void and lapsed legacies and devises, in their application of statutes similar to § 1328, Rem. Code, which now exists in most, if not all, of our states. It seems, however, that the present view of such statutes, adopted by a majority of the courts, is that, when the legacy or devise is to a person named, or otherwise specifically designated in the will, who is dead, and even known by the testator to be dead at the time of the making of the will, the legacy or devise is not void, in the sense that those whom the statute substitutes for the deceased devisee or legatee shall not be permitted to take under the will. In other words, the majority rule seems to be that in the application of such statutes there is no occasion for making any distinction between void and lapsed legacies, in so far as the rights of those whom the statute substitutes in the place of the deceased legatees or devisees are concerned. Pimel v.

Betjemann, 183 N. Y. 194, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580, 76 N. E. 157, 5 Ann. Cas. 239. Counsel for appellant invoke this view of the statute, and seem to argue that it is of controlling force in our present inquiry. We may concede that there should no longer be any distinction between void and lapsed legacies or devises, in determining the application of § 1328, Rem. Code, and similar statutes; but we think that is not a question of any serious moment in our present inquiry. The question still remains: Did Mrs. Hutton intend to designate her deceased half brother, William Arkwright's deceased son, Lyman Arkwright, the father of appellant, as one of the class of beneficiaries designated in her will as the "children of my deceased half brother, William Arkwright?" The decisions of the courts of this country are not in harmony upon this question, but it seems to us that the weight of authority, as well as the better reason, supports the view that such a class designation of beneficiaries in a will does not evidence an intent of the

Will—children as grandchildren.      testator to include in such class one who is dead, and

known by the testator to be dead at the time of the making of his will, though, if such a one were then living, he would be one of such class. We will now notice some of the decisions of the courts adopting this view of the law.

In Davie v. Wynn, 80 Ga. 673, 6 S. E. 183, there was involved a residuary gift made by a testator reading: "Share and share alike, to my nephews and nieces, the children of my deceased brother, John L. Wynn, and of my deceased brother-in-law, John Wilkinson."

Holding that the deceased's nieces, who died before the making of the will, and who would have been of the designated class had they been living at that time, did not take under the will by virtue of a statute similar to § 1328, Rem. Code, Justice Blandford, speaking for the court, said: "The will gave the property to a class, to wit, the testator's nephews and nieces, the children of his deceased brother, John L. Wynn, and of his deceased brother-in-law, John Wilkinson. At the death of the testator, the ancestors of these complainants were not in being, and were not of the class to whom this property was devised and bequeathed; and hence the complainants can take nothing under this clause of the will. . . .

It was contended by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that, under § 2462 of the Code, these representatives of the dead nieces would come in. That section is as follows: 'If a legatee dies before the testator, or is dead when the will is executed, but shall have issue living at the death of the testator, such legacy, if absolute and without remainder or limitation, shall not lapse, but shall vest in the issue in the same proportions as if inherited directly from their deceased ancestors.'

. . . The case of Cheney v. Selman, 71 Ga. 384, is relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs in error. In that case the testator devised certain property to the 'children of Tilda Cleckler.' At the death of the testator, Cleckler was dead, and her only child, a son, was also dead. This son left two children, who were in life when the testator died; and these children contended that they were entitled to represent their deceased father. And the court held, under the section of the Code above cited (§ 2462), that to prevent a lapse of the legacy the property, under the will, should go to these children. That decision is doubtless correct; for the bequest in that case was the same as if it had been made to the son of Tilda Cleckler; he was dead at the time the will was made and at the death of the testator; and, under this section of the Code, to prevent a lapse of the legacy, the property vested in the children. But in this case there is no lapse of the legacy. Here it appears from the bill filed by the complainants there are other nephews and nieces who fall within the class designated by the testator. So there is a marked distinction between the two cases."

That decision was adhered to by the Georgia court in the later case of Tolbert v. Burns, 82 Ga. 213, 8 S. E. 79.

In Howland v. Slade, 155 Mass. 415, 29 N. E. 631, the court had under consideration a testamentary gift to "first cousins," and also the application of a statute in substance the same as ours. Justice Morton, speaking for the court, said: "It is clear that the issue of the first cousins who died before the making of the will cannot take under it. There is nothing in the will to indicate a purpose on the part of the testator that they should share his bounty, and, in the absence of such an intention, it is plain, upon the authorities, that they are not to be regarded as beneficiaries. Merriam v. Simonds, 121 Mass. 198, 203; Re Webster, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 737, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 767, 49 L. T. N. S. 585; Re Chinery, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 614, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 804, 59 L. T. N. S. 303; Groves v. Musther, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 569, 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 296; Re Hotchkiss, L. R. 8 Eq. 643, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 631; Hebergham v. Ridehalgh, L. R. 9 Eq. 395, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 545, 23 L. T. N. S. 214, 18 Week. Rep. 427. At the time when the will was made, they did not fall within the description of first cousins, and, without something to show that such was to be the case, they could not take as substitutes for or in the place of the first cousins who were dead, because these could not themselves have taken as members of the original class."

In the later case of White v. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 171 Mass. 84, 50 N. E. 512, this view of the law is adhered to.

In Harrison's Estate, 202 Pa. 331, 51 Atl. 976, there was involved a gift by a testator to "the children of my sisters in equal shares." One daughter of a sister of the testator died before the execution of the will. Appellant, a child of such deceased daughter, claimed under the will the share her mother would have taken as one of the designated class of beneficiaries had she been living at the time of the making of the will. The supreme court, adopting the language of the superior court, the intermediate appellate court of that state, in holding that the appellant could not take under the will, said, in part:

"The appellant now contends, however, that being of the issue of Teresa L. C. Anderson, the daughter of a sister of the testatrix who died during the lifetime of the latter and prior to the execution of the will, she is entitled to participate in the distribution of this fund by force of the provision of the Act of July 12, 1897 (P. L. 256): 'No devise or legacy hereafter made in favor of a brother or sister, or of brothers or sisters of any testator, or in favor of the children of a brother or sister of any testator, whether such brothers or sisters, or children of brothers or sisters be designated by name or as a class, such testator not leaving any lineal descendants, shall be deemed or held to lapse or become void by reason of the decease of such devisee or legatee, in the lifetime of the testator, if such devisee or legatee shall leave issue surviving the testator; but such devise or legacy shall be good and available in favor of such surviving issue, with like effect as if such devisee or legatee had survived the testator, saving always to every testator the right to direct otherwise.' This legislation is not and was not intended to have any bearing upon the interpretation of wills; its effect is confined to the manner in which the intention of the testatrix, as ascertained from the words of the will, shall be carried into execution. Whether the person within the class designated by the act, who has died during the lifetime of the testator, was a legatee or devisee within the intention of the testator, must first be ascertained from the language which he used in disposing of his property. When the devise is to a person by name, it is conclusive as to the intention of the testator that that person should take, and, the intention of the testator being established, the subject of the devise or bequest will, upon the death of the testator, be good and available in favor of the issue, when the primary devisee or legatee has died during the lifetime of the testator. This is the effect of legislation of this character, even in a case when the primary devisee was dead at the time the testator specifically designated him as the object of his bounty. Minter's Appeal, 40 Pa. 111; Winter v. Winter, 5 Hare, 306, 67 Eng. Reprint, 929.

"The legislation in question was no doubt enacted for the purpose of changing the law, as it had been determined in Gross's Estate, 10 Pa. 360, and in kindred cases, that in case of a devise to children of brothers and sisters, as a class, only those children who were in existence at the death of the testator were entitled, to the exclusion of the representatives of children dying before the testator, but after the date of the will. A bequest to a number of persons, not named but answering a general description, is a gift to them as a class; this rule of construction is intended to settle the testator's intention, unless the will itself shows that he intended otherwise. Denlinger's Estate, 170 Pa. 104, 32 Atl. 573. Prior to the Act of 1897, the persons who constituted a class described by the testator would have been ascertained as of the time when the legacy vested, and it is only in case of a devise or bequest to a class that the legislation has worked any change in the law, for devisees and legatees nominatim, standing in the same degrees of relationship, were protected by the Act of May 6, 1844 (P. L. 565). The effect of the Act of 1897 is to provide that, where one is within a class designated by the testator as the object of his bounty, the devise or legacy to him shall not lapse by his death during the lifetime of the testator, but the person so dying must have been a member of the class at some time in the period during which the will remained ambulatory, between the execution of the will and the death of the testator. . . . The act was not intended to set up a new rule for the construction of wills or to include as primary legatees persons who did not come within the meaning of the language employed by the testator; its purpose was to provide for the substitution of the issue upon the death of one who was at the date of the will, or subsequently came, within the class to which the devise or bequest was made, and there was, therefore, nothing which the appellant was entitled to take by substitution."

In Nicholson v. Nicholson, 115 Iowa, 493, 88 N. W. 1064, there was under consideration a residuary clause in a will reading: "After paying all the foregoing amounts, I give and bequeath the balance of my property to be divided equally between all my nephews and nieces."

A niece of the testator died before the making of the will. A son of such deceased niece was claiming under the will, invoking the statute of that state reading as follows: "If a devisee die before a testator, his heirs shall inherit the property devised to him, unless from the terms of the will a contrary intent is manifest."

Judge Deemer, speaking for the court, holding that the claimant could not take under the will as a substitute for his mother, who had died before the making of the will, though she would have been one of the class designated as beneficiaries had she been living at that time, said: "Under the common-law rule, the members of the class to whom testator left his residuary estate would be determined upon the day of his death; and, as applicant herein is neither a nephew nor a niece, he would be excluded. Applicant's counsel contend, however, that the statute which we have quoted modifies this rule to this extent: That, although the members of the class are to be determined as upon the day of the testator's death, yet, as the applicant is an heir of one of that class, who would have taken under the will had his mother survived, he is entitled to her share.

. . . . If a deceased beneficiary is specifically named in the will, this, perhaps, is a sufficient indication that the testator intended his heirs to take, under the statute before quoted, as substitutional or representative devisees. But where the gift is to a class, of which there are many members, it is reasonable to suppose that the testator had in mind only those of that class who were living at the time he made his will. To apply the rule to the instant case, when testator made his will he had several nephews and nieces living. He also had at least one grandnephew, whose mother had been dead for more than ten years. In the residuary clause of his will he devised his remaining property to his 'nephews and nieces,' share and share alike. Did he intend by this description to give any part of it to this grandnephew? Surely not; for it would have been easy to include him if he had so desired. Taking the will by its 'four corners,' and reading it in the light of the admitted facts, we hardly think one unversed in the law would say that testator intended to include applicant in the class described as 'nephews and nieces.' If he had intended to include the grandnephew, we think it more likely that he would have named him. Nephews and nieces are here the primary devisees. Nothing whatever is given to their issue except as they may be substituted under the statute. In order to claim under the will, this substituted legatee must point out the original legatee in whose place he would stand. At the date of the will none but living nephews and nieces of the testator could have taken. The issue of the one who was dead at that time can show no object of substitution, and to give him an original legacy would be, in effect, to make a new will for the testator."

In Pimel v. Betjemann, 183 N. Y. 194, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580, 76 N. E. 157, 5 Ann. Cas. 239, the court had under consideration a state of facts and a statute similar to the facts and the statute here involved. In that case, Chief Judge Cullen, speaking for the court, made observations in harmony with the view of the law expressed in the above-noticed decisions, as follows: "Nothing is better settled in the law of wills than that the term 'children' does not include grandchildren or more remote descendants, unless there is something in the will to show that the word was used in a broader sense. This is not based on any technical rule of law; on the contrary, it is founded on the ordinary meaning of the word and the presumption that the testator has used the term in its ordinary sense. The decision below overturns this rule and declares that a devise or bequest to children of the testator includes grandchildren. The distinction between a dead child expressly named or otherwise identified in a will, and one who must take under the designation of a class, seems to me very plain. Where the testator names the deceased child, there can be no room for doubt that he intends him or his issue to take, and the statute gives effect to that intent. Where, however, a testator writes or speaks of his children in general terms, he does not include grandchildren. So the courts have uniformly held, and such, I think, the experience of all of us will confirm as being the actual fact. So also there is a plain distinction between the death of a member of a class subsequent to making the will and a death prior to that time. In the first case it is both possible and probable, unless some provision for the contingency is made in the will, that the testator did not anticipate its occurrence. In the latter the occurrence is not contingent, but has actually happened, and therefore the fact is necessarily present in the testator's mind except in some exceptional case. Take the present case. The plaintiff's mother had died five years before the will was made, and of her death the testator was entirely aware. If he had intended to leave a legacy to his grandchild, he would have said so, instead of leaving his intention to be worked out in an indirect manner."

There was a dissenting opinion rendered by a minority of the court in that case, but the majority view of the law has been adhered to, and apparently has become the settled law of New York, as shown in Re Turner, 208 N. Y. 261, 101 N. E. 905, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 245.

These decisions seems to be quite in harmony with the settled law of England, as shown by the decision of the supreme court of judicature rendered in Re Musther, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 569, the decision being stated in substance in the syllabus of the case as reported as follows: "A testatrix, by her will, gave the residue of her property to be equally divided between her nephews and nieces, sons and daughters of her late brothers, G., J. W., and C., and then proceeded: 'But should any of them be dead before me I then direct that his or her share shall be equally divided between his or her children.' Held, by the court of appeal, affirming the decision of Kay, J., that the children, living at the death of the testatrix, of nephews or nieces who were dead at the date of her will, did not take."

We have noted that the decisions of the American courts upon this question are not harmonious. We think, however, the decided weight of authority, as well as the better reason, supports the view of the courts rendering the decisions above noticed. The decision of the Illinois court in Kehl v. Taylor, 275 Ill. 346, 114 N. E. 125, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 948, we think, may be regarded as the leading decision holding to the contrary, wherein are collated the decisions which that court regards as supporting its conclusion. We are of the opinion that appellant Lillian Dorothy Arkwright cannot take under the will of her great-aunt, Mary Arkwright Hutton, by substitution in the place of her father, who was dead at the time of the making of the will, and then known by Mrs. Hutton to be dead, though he would have been a member of the class of beneficiaries designated by the language of the will had he been living at the time of its making.

—right of children of deceased child.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appellant by her counsel has asked this court to deny to the respondent executor costs against her in this court, in the event of the affirmance of the trial court's judgment, and also to award compensation to her counsel as a charge against the estate for taking the appeal, whether the trial court's judgment be affirmed or reversed. This question seems to be rested upon the theory that appellant should be so favored, because the appeal was in any event justifiable. We are not cited any authority in support of these requests, and we know of none which would authorize us granting either of them. We therefore feel constrained to deny the requests.

Costs—allowance to defeated party.

It is so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability of statute to prevent lapses, in case of person dead at time will was made.*I. Introduction, 1682.

- II. Applicability of statute where person dead at date of will is named or otherwise specifically designated as a legatee, 1682.

I. Introduction.

The purpose of this annotation is to discuss the right of the issue of a person deceased when a will was made, who, had he survived the testator, would have been a beneficiary thereunder, to take by virtue of a statute to prevent lapses. It does not include cases in which the claim of such persons to participate is based not upon a statute, but upon a provision in the will itself for the children or issue of deceased beneficiaries. These may be found in a note in 8 B. R. C. 365, on "Right of descendants of a person deceased when a will was made, who, had he survived the testator, would have been a beneficiary thereunder, to take under provision for children or issue of deceased beneficiaries."

It does not include cases in which the children of persons deceased at the time the will was made were held entitled to take by virtue of a provision therein, requiring the division to be made according to the Statute of Distributions, as in Re Paine (1900) 176 Mass. 242, 57 N. E. 346.

In one respect, however, this annotation exceeds the limitations imposed by its title. This is in the discussion of the applicability to class gifts of statutes to prevent lapsing, since a complete development of the question of their applicability in the case of persons dead at the time of the making of the will, who, had they survived, would have been members of the class, involves a consideration of the question of their applicability in the case of persons dying after the making of the will, but before the testator.

The question whether the descendants of a person deceased at the time the will was made may, in any given case, claim to take by virtue of a statute against lapsing, while at the outset a question of statutory interpretation, may also involve a question of testamentary construction; since the statute can in no case operate, except on the hypothesis that the deceased ancestor was within the contemplation of the testator. (See, upon this point, Fuller v. Martin (1895) 96 Ky. 500, 29 S. W. 450; Barnhill v. Sharon (1909) 135 Ky. 70, 121 S. W. 983; White v. Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1898) 171 Mass. 84, 50 N. E. 512.)

These two questions have been so confused, confounded, commixed, and commingled by the courts that their decisions must be read with the utmost circumspection, and applied with the greatest discrimination.

II. Applicability of statute where person dead at date of will is named or otherwise specifically designated as a legatee.

Where a person dead at the date of the will is expressly named, or otherwise expressly designated therein, the question is purely one of statutory interpretation. There is, in such case, no doubt of the testator's intention to confer a benefit, either upon such person, if the fact of his death was not known, or, if it was known, upon his family. The only doubt as to the applicability of the statute in such a case has arisen from the distinction formerly observed between a legacy to a person dying after the date of the will, but before the testator, which was said to lapse, and a legacy to a person who was dead when the will was made, which was said to be void. Hence it has been contended that, as the legacy had no inception, there is nothing upon which the statute can operate, that it is impossible to vivify what never had life. This view prevailed in Billingsley v. Tongue (1856) 9 Md. 575; Lindsay v. Pleasants (1846) 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 320; Scales v. Scales (1860) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 163; Almy v. Jones (1891) 17 R. I. 265, 12 L.R.A. 414, 21 Atl. 616; Pegues v. Pegues (1860) 32 S. C. Eq. (11 Rich.) 554; and Suber v. Nash (1909) 84 S. C. 12, 65 S. E. 947.

The reasoning upon which this view is based may be illustrated by reference to the following cases:

In Billingsley v. Tongue (Md.) supra, it is said that a statute which provides that no devise, etc., shall lapse or fail of taking effect by reason of the death of the devisee in the lifetime of the testator, clearly imports the happening of some future contingency to defeat the devise, which, without the happening of such contingency, would have been valid and effectual, and hence does not operate where the legacy was void at the beginning by reason of the fact that the legatee was dead when the will was made.

In Lindsay v. Pleasants (1846) 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 320, the court said: "The legacies and devises to the three dead children of the testator were void. And the children of such deceased children cannot take, by force of the act of assembly, Rev. Stat. chap. 122, § 15. That section of the statute declares that when any person shall bequeath or devise to his child or children, and such child or children shall have died in the lifetime of the testator, the said legacy or devise shall take effect and vest a title to the property described and mentioned in the issue of such child or children. Such a testamentary disposition must have lapsed, by the death of the legatee or devisee, during the life of the testator, were it not for the statute. 1 Roper, Legacies, 320. The case before us is not within the definition of a lapsed legacy or devise, and therefore it is not aided by the above statute. The legislature never thought of a case like this, and has not provided for it."

In Pegues v. Pegues (1860) 32 S. C. Eq. (11 Rich.) 554, the court said: "It [the statute] contemplates the case of a legacy given; that is, a provision made for the child of such a character as would be valid if the will should come forthwith into operation. Such a legacy being given, the statute goes on to provide that if the child (thus provided for) should die, then the legacy given to him shall go to his issue, unless, etc. This language seems to be intended to describe a case (not uncommon) where a legatee should happen to die after the execution of a will in his favor, by which casualty his personal enjoyment of the intended bounty would be frustrated. I can hardly suppose the legislature contemplated the case of a man's giving a legacy to a dead child, or that it intended to remedy the effect of such an absurdity. It may be very well conceived that it intended to make good a legacy which had become void, without going the length of supposing it intended to give effect to one which was void ab initio. There is room for another remark upon the statute. It provides that the legacy to the child shall be made good to the child's issue, 'unless such deceased child was equally portioned with the other children, by the father or mother' (who made the will), 'when living.' Advancements are, by law, to be taken into consideration only in cases of intestacy. A testator may make what provision he pleases among his children, though it result, from gifts previously made by him aliunde the will, that he has dealt unequally by them. The legatee in this case would have taken the whole of his legacies mentioned in the will, had he been alive when the will was made, and had he survived his father. When the statute gives his legacies to his children upon condition that he has not been fully advanced, does it not refer to advancements made after the will, and which may be considered as an equitable satisfaction of the legacies it contains? And, if so, does it not follow that it contemplated the case of the legatee being in esse at the date of the will?"

Majority view.

The weight of authority, however, is to the effect that such statutes apply to a case in which the beneficiary named was dead at the time the will was made. See

And, in some jurisdictions, the question has been set at rest by the explicit inclusion in the statute of the case of a person dead when the will is executed. See Cheney v. Selman (1883) 71 Ga. 384; Shumaker v. Pearson (1902) 67 Ohio St. 330, 65 N. E. 1005; Mather v. Copeland (1898) 5 Ohio N. P. 151.

It makes no difference whether the legatee named was dead when the will was made, or was living when the will was made, but had died at the time of the making of a codicil which reaffirmed the provisions of the will not inconsistent therewith. See Lee v. Lee (1914) 88 Conn. 404, 91 Atl. 269; Winter v. Winter (1846) 5 Hare, 306, 67 Eng. Reprint, 929.

In discussing this point, in Lee v. Lee (Conn.) supra, the court said: "It is said that, as both of the sisters named in the third clause of the will were dead when the codicil was executed, the bequests contained in the third clause are, in legal effect, gifts to persons already dead at the date of the execution of the will, and therefore legacies which were void when made. The legal conclusion of the argument is that our statute for preventing lapses in certain cases is confined to legacies which lapse by reason of the death of the beneficiary after the execution of the will, and that it does not operate to save a bequest which was void when made, because the beneficiary was already dead when the will was executed. In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to determine whether our statute is so limited or not, because this case must be controlled by the universally accepted principle that no rule for the construction of wills shall be permitted to defeat the intention of the testator, expressed in the will itself. The first enacting clause of the codicil here in question is as follows: 'First: I hereby reiterate and reaffirm all the provisions of my said last will and testament, except in so far as the same are altered hereby.' That is to say, the testatrix reiterates and reaffirms, as of January 20th, 1908, the third clause of her will, making certain bequests to sisters already dead; obviously intending, so far as her written word is concerned, that such legacies, in common with all other unaltered provisions of her will, should continue in the same legal force and effect as before the codicil was executed. The statute, which the testatrix is presumed to know, had, at the dates of the sisters' deaths, converted their legacies into valid gifts to the issue of such sisters; and it would be a misapplication of the rule contended for, to hold that the testatrix, by the very act of reaffirming these gifts, had inadvertently made them utterly ineffectual in law. Blakeslee v. Pardee (1903) 76 Conn. 267, 56 Atl. 503. The codicil of 1908 did not convert the bequests contained in the third clause of the will into void legacies. They still remained of the same effect, and therefore still remained operative under the statute as gifts to the issue of the original legatees."

In Nutter v. Vickery (1874) 64 Me. 490, it was said: "The adverse argument is based upon the distinction between lapsed and void devises, and the assumption that the statute takes effect only in cases of lapse. But no such limitation of its effect is found in the statute, the intent of which, obviously, is to save to the lineal descendants of the person named as devisee in the will, the benefit of a devise which would, at the common law, fail of effect by reason of the death of the original devisee before the testator. The statute has regard rather to the class of individuals for whose relief it is interposed, than to any technical distinction in the manner of the failure against which it proposes to guard them. As to them, the result at the common law would be the same, whether their ancestor died before or after the date of the will, if he died before the testator. Against this result, in either case, the statute places a barrier."

In Barnes v. Huson (1871) 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 598, it is said that no reason can be perceived for the different rule, whether the death happened before or after the making of the will, either occurrence being entirely within the mischief intended to be remedied. Continuing, the court said: "In fact, the circumstance that the death of a proposed legatee had occurred before the making of the will would strengthen the presumption that the name of the deceased, as a legatee or devisee, was inserted through ignorance of the death, or by mistake. Besides, many wills are made upon the eve of the death of the testator, when the death of the beneficiary named may have been so recent that information of the fact could not have reached the testator, even though it had occurred under ordinary circumstances, and at no very remote distance, until it would be too late to remedy the accident. The construction of the statute contended for by the appellants' counsel would call upon us to hold that a devise or legacy to a child, contained in a will made in extremis, would lapse and be wholly avoided, if the child had died one hour before the making of the will, although such death was wholly unknown to the testator. Such a discrimination between the case of a death happening before the making of the will, and one happening after, is founded in no reason, and we cannot believe it to have been within the intention of the legislature. Considering the evident purpose and policy of the act, the mischief intended to be remedied, and the fact that it is a remedial statute, to be liberally construed, we are of the opinion that its meaning is to prevent the lapse of a devise, or bequest, to a descendant of the testator, although the proposed devisee or legatee shall have died before the testator; provided such devisee or legatee shall have left lineal descendants, who shall be living at the testator's death; and this, whether the death of the proposed devisee or legatee shall have occurred before or after the date or making of the will."

In Winter v. Winter (1846) 5 Hare, 306, 67 Eng. Reprint, 929, it was said by Vice Chancellor Wigram: "The question on the construction of the 33d section is whether the words, 'shall die,' mean shall die after a bequest to him by a will made after the 31st of December, 1837, or whether they mean shall die after the act comes into operation. If the former meaning be given to the words, the claim of the representatives fails. If the latter, it is good. Upon the face of the act itself, I certainly can find nothing to exclude the latter construction in favor of the former; and in the absence of anything upon the face of the act to fix the meaning of the words, I am bound, as well as I can, to fix that meaning by considering the policy of the act, and the objects it was intended to accomplish. Now, the policy of the act, and the objects it was intended to accomplish, are, for the present purpose, sufficiently manifest. It was intended to prevent a portion given by a testator to a child going from the estate of such child, and his family from being left portionless, by reason only of the death of the child under certain circumstances—a consequence of law which the common feelings of mankind declared to be a disappointment of the intention of the father. The cases in which this event most commonly happened, and against which the act was intended to provide, were cases in which the child died in the testator's lifetime, after the bequest was made, and cases in which the testator, in providing for an absent child, was ignorant of the fact that such absent child was dead. In both cases, the family of the child dying after, or dead at the time of, the bequest, was left unprovided for; and it was to remedy this evil, amongst others, that the 33d section of the Wills Act was passed. The construction of the act which alone will include all the cases which the act must presumably have been intended to include is that which makes the time of the legatee's death unimportant, provided he died after the act came into operation, and the bequest to him is by a will made after that date; and, as far as I can see, that construction cannot possibly include any case not obviously within the purposes of the act."

The statute, however, does not apply to a case in which the legatees named were dead, not only at the time of the making of the will, but before the statute came into operation. Wild v. Reynolds (1846) 5 Notes of Cases (Eng.) 1.

Statute does not apply where contrary intention manifested.

A statute which provides that if a devisee or legatee is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survive, such issue shall take the estate devised and bequeathed unless a different disposition thereof is made or required by the will, does not apply when its application destroys the general plan of bequest. Eckler v. Hilgerich (1888) 9 Ky. L. Rep. 723.

The child of a person deceased at the date of the will is not entitled to take, where the context shows that the naming of such deceased person in the will was a mere inadvertence. Ibid.

III. Applicability of statute to class gifts.

a. In general.

Where the gift is not one to an individual, but to a class, a further difficulty arises. In such cases the claimants, if they have succeeded in establishing that the operation of the statute is not limited to cases where the legatee was living when the will was made, must meet the further objection that as, in the case of a gift to a class, the gift is presumably to those only who survive the testator, one who, had he survived, would have been a member of the class, was not an object of the testator's bounty, and, as there was no gift, there is no lapse, and no room for the statute to operate. This the claimants can do either (a) by showing that the testator intended the membership of the class to be ascertained at some period prior to his death, which would admit of the inclusion of their deceased progenitor,—in other words, that what appears to be a class gift is, in reality, a gift to described individuals; or (b) by persuading the court that the effect of the statute is to displace the ordinary rule of testamentary construction, that the members of a class are presumably to be determined at the time of the testator's decease, in cases in which the conditions defined by the statute exist.

View that such statutes are inapplicable.

Some courts have taken the view that such statutes were intended to provide against lapse merely, and were not meant to alter the rules of testamentary construction, and hence do not operate in the case of gifts to a class.

Eberts (1880) 42 Mich. 404, 4 N. W. 172, sometimes cited as supporting this view, turned on the fact that the devise was "to the surviving children of my brothers," and is so explained in Strong v. Smith (1891) 84 Mich. 567, 48 N. W. 183.

In Browne v. Hammond (1878) Johns. V. C. 210, 70 Eng. Reprint, 400, the Vice Chancellor said: "I agree with what was argued on behalf of the plaintiff, that the testator in making his will intended to include in the devise and bequest all his children who were then in existence; but I must treat him as having had that intention, subject to the rule of construction which the authorities had well established, and of which I must presume him to have been informed, that under a gift by his will to his children those only could take who should be in existence at the time of his death. It was argued that the reasons which induced the legislature to interfere, as it has done by the 33d section of the act, in cases where the devise or bequest is to the testator's children nominatim, apply with equal force where the devise or bequest is to children as a class. But the rule of construction to which I have already referred was perfectly well established in all the courts when the act was passed. According to that rule, under a gift to children as a class, the share to which a child surviving the testator would have been entitled does not lapse in consequence of his death in the testator's lifetime. Had the legislature intended to suspend that rule so as to bring all such cases within the operation of the 33d section, it would have expressed that intention."

This rule is not affected by the fact that, in the event which happened, the class consisted of but one individual (Re Harvey [1893] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 567, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 328, 68 L. T. N. S. 562, 41 Week. Rep. 293), or that one of the class is named specially, or is to get a double share (Re Moir (1907) 14 Ont. L. Rep. 541).

The observation in Davis v. Sanders (Ga.) supra, that, though the statute has no application in the case of the death of a member of a class between the time of the execution of the will and the death of the testator, it may apply when all the members of the class predecease the testator, seems to have been made per curiam. In such a case, as pointed out in Re Harvey [1893] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 567, supra, "extraordinary anomalies would result. If a testator had several children, say five, living at the date of his will, and four of these died in his lifetime, leaving issue who survived him, the effect of the decisions is that the fifth child surviving would take the whole; but if that child also happened to die in the testator's lifetime, leaving issue who survived him, the representatives, not only of the fifth child, but of all the other four children, would, according to the defendant's argument, be let in, and in equal shares. And further, if there had been a sixth child who had died before the date of the will, leaving issue who survived, the representatives of the sixth child, who by no possible construction of the will could himself have taken, would be inevitably let in to share with representatives of his brothers and sisters, all dying as above supposed."

Where the view prevails that the statutes to prevent lapse do not operate in the case of gifts to a class, it is immaterial whether the claimants' ancestor died before or after the making of the will. See, for example, Guenther's Appeal (1877) 4 W. N. C. (Pa.) 41. In either case they derive no aid from the statute, and can succeed, if at all, only by establishing that testator meant to include their ancestor in his description of the persons who were to take (proposition (a) supra).

For instances in which the statute was held applicable on this ground, see Cheney v. Selman (1883) 71 Ga. 384; Jamison v. Hay (1870) 46 Mo. 546; Bradley's Estate (1895) 166 Pa. 300, 31 Atl. 96; Shetter's Estate (1892) 2 Pa. Dist. R. 284. The question when a gift, which is apparently one to a class, may be construed as one to described individuals, is not peculiar to the class of cases falling within the purview of this annotation, and forms the subject of discussion in notes in L.R.A.1918B, 234, and 7 B. R. C. 784.

In other jurisdictions, the courts have held that the statute operates in favor of the issue of members of a class dying after the execution of the will, but before the testator. See

And see also Hoke v. Hoke (1878) 12 W. Va. 427, in which it is held that, although the statute was intended to prevent the lapsing of legacies in certain cases, it also was intended in part to modify the common-law rule that where a devise is made to two persons jointly, and one of them does not survive the testator, the survivor takes the whole, the effect being to prevent the operation of such rule where the devisee leaves issue who survive the testator, and who accordingly, in such case, take the estate as the original devisee would have done if he had survived the testator.

To hold that the statute operates in favor of the issue of members of a class is to give it the effect of a legislative declaration that the ordinary rule that the objects of a class gift are to be ascertained at the time of the testator's death does not operate to give effect to the testator's intention, where the legacy is of the type described by the statute and there are surviving issue. Possibly this is the case; but to pretend, as some courts have done, that the statute, as so construed, does not prevent the giving effect to the testator's intention, because the testator must be taken to have known that the statute would have the operation which the court has given it, is, to say the least, little more than a pious fraud.

It may also be remarked in criticism of this view, that in some cases it does not seem to have been deliberately and understandingly adopted, but to be based upon a misunderstanding of decisions in which the gift, while nominally a class gift, was really a gift to individuals; and some of the cases above cited as supporting the rule are perhaps susceptible of differentiation on this ground.

The reasoning upon which this view is based may be illustrated by the following excerpts:

In Yeates v. Gill (1848) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 203, the court said: "It is contended that the word 'lapse' must be taken in its technical sense, as indicating the falling back of the legacy or devise, or its subject, into the testator's estate, and that this single word, in this sense, is to govern the construction and restrict the operation of the entire statute. And it is argued that, as a legacy given to children does not thus lapse by the death of one or more children before the death of the testator, if there be at that time any survivors who come within the description, therefore, the statute has no application to such a case, but applies only to the case where all the persons who, if alive, might take as children or grandchildren, die before the testator. But if this had been intended, it is probable that, instead of saying the legacies shall not lapse by the death of the legatee in the singular number, the language would have been that they shall not 'lapse by the death of the legatees,' etc. The use of the singular number throughout the statute, in reference to the person for whose death it is intended to make provision, shows that the statute should be understood as if it read, 'that legacies, etc., to children, etc., shall not lapse by the death of any legatee, etc., provided,' etc. And the nature of the proviso which limits the cases to which the statute applies shows that it was intended for the benefit of the children of such legatee, etc. Although, as the law formerly stood, legacies to children did not, in a proper sense, lapse by the death of one of the children before that of the testator, yet so far as related to any interest of the decedent, it did lapse, not into the estate of the testator, but into the interest of the survivors, and the heirs or distributees of the decedent were deprived of it. The word 'merge' would have been more proper than the word 'lapse.' But it is sufficiently clear that the legislature had in view, not the death of all of the legatees, but the death of any of them, and intended to provide for such death, provided the decedent shall have children, etc.; and this intention, manifested by the general language and object of the statute, must control the meaning of the single word 'lapse.' It is obvious, too, that if the operation of the act be confined to the case of the death of all of the legatees or devisees, constituting the class of children or grandchildren at the date of the will, it will make little change in the law in those cases in which the devise is to the testator's own children or grandchildren."

In Woolley v. Paxson (1889) 46 Ohio St. 307, 24 N. E. 599, the court said: "The rule as to the lapsing of devises and legacies that prevailed before the statute defeated, in most cases, the intention of the testator. He generally made his will with reference to the objects of his bounty as they existed at the time, and as though his will took effect at the date of its execution—not apprehending that a lapse would occur in case any of them should die before himself, unless some express disposition should be made in anticipation of such event. The statute was passed to remedy such disappointments and should receive a liberal construction, so as to advance the remedy and suppress the mischief. It, among other things, provides that where a devise is made to a child or other relative of the testator, who dies before the testator, the issue of such object of his bounty shall take the portion devised to such child or relative. Nothing is more just and conformable to the probable intention of the testator in every instance. The fact that the child or relative is not mentioned by name should not defeat the application of the statute, where the language applied to the facts, as they were at the execution of the will, designates a child or relative as an object of the testator's bounty, with as much certainty as if it were mentioned by name. At the time the testator made this will, his son Isaac had four children living. They were all adults and their names well known to him; and the devise that he makes is to Isaac for life, and then to his children in fee simple. This, in the light of the circumstances, must be taken in a distributive sense, and is a devise to each of Isaac's children of the fee simple in remainder, as definitely as if it had been to each by name. For, as observed by Vice Chancellor Malins in Re Porter (1869) L. R. 8 Eq. (Eng.) 52, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 102, 20 L. T. N. S. 649, there can be no substantial difference between a gift, for instance, to six children named, and a gift to children simply, there being six. The real objects of the gift are in such cases easily ascertainable by parol testimony. It is not, however, claimed that the individuals constituting Isaac's children were, at the date of the will, indefinite, and so incapable of taking as individuals under its provisions, but that the devise was to them as a class, and must be construed, under the rules applicable to such devises, not as a devise to each of the children, but to such of them as should survive the testator. The ground of this rule was that no one can be a devisee or legatee until the will takes effect by the death of the testator. But any argument drawn from this rule proves too much, for, if applied according to its reason, it would abrogate the statute, as no object, however definitely described, can take in this sense, until the will ceases, by the death of the testator, to be ambulatory. It was upon this ground that a devise to one by name, who predeceased the testator, was held to lapse. The fact that, in the latter case, the extinguished or lapsed legacy went to the residuary legatees, or to the heir, where there were no such legatees, whilst in the case of the death of a member of a class it went to the survivors, supplies no reason for excluding the application of the statute where the devise is to a class. It was not because the extinguished legacy or devise was disposed of by the law in one way rather than another that the statute was adopted, but because it did not go to the issue of the deceased devisee, as the testator in all probability supposed it would. In other words, it was not designed to prevent the failure of a legacy by the death of the legatee before the testator; that were impossible; but to make a new disposition by law of such legacy, where the testator had himself failed to do so, in anticipation of the possible death of any one of the chosen objects of his bounty before himself, where such object was a child or other relative of his. Hence, the only question that can arise in the construction of a will under this statute is whether it, as a matter of fact, contains a devise of real or personal estate to a child or other relative of the testator, which such devisee would have taken had he survived the testator; if so, then, by the express language of the statute, the issue of such devisee surviving the testator 'shall take the estate devised in the same manner as the devisee would have done if he had survived the testator,' unless a different disposition shall be made or required by the will. Now, it is a settled rule that, in a devise to children as a class, each member who survives the testator then takes a vested interest in the devise (Hawkins, Wills, 68); and this is so, though the devise is not immediate, subject, however, in such case, to the liability to be partially divested by children subsequently coming into existence before the period fixed for enjoyment (Hawkins, Wills, 71; Schouler, Wills, § 562). Hence as, under a devise to a class, each member who survives the testator would, independent of the statute, take an aliquot part of the devise as a tenant in common with the other survivors, therefore, under the statute in such case, the issue of a deceased member of the class surviving the testator must take what the deceased would have taken had he survived. Any other construction would render the statute nugatory in a large class of cases to which its provisions are, by its terms, directly applicable."

Legislative determination of question.

In some jurisdictions, any doubt as to the applicability of the statute to class gifts is settled by their express inclusion therein. See Renaker v. Lemon (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 212; Chenault v. Chenault (1888) 88 Ky. 83, 11 S. W. 424; Sloan v. Thornton (1897) 102 Ky. 443, 43 S. W. 415; Har- rison's Estate (1902) 202 Pa. 331, 51 Atl. 976; Fosbenner's Estate (1901) 26 Pa. Co. Ct. 56; Todd's Estate (1907) 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 117.

b. Where person dead at date of will would have taken as a member of a class had he survived testator.

But both in those jurisdictions in which the statute is held to operate in the case of class gifts, and in those in which the terms of the statute provide that it shall so operate, the question still remains whether the statute operates in favor of the descendants of one dead at the time of the making of the will who, had he survived the testator, would have taken under a gift to a class. So to hold is, in effect, to create a presumption that the testator intended to benefit not only the members of the class who might survive him, but also the descendants of those who at any time answered to the class description.

Majority view.

Upon this point there is a difference of opinion, the preponderance of authority being that such an extension of the operation of the statute is unjustifiable where there is nothing in the will to indicate a purpose on the part of the testator that the issue of members of a class deceased when the will was made should share his bounty.

Rep. 345, in which it was held that (apart from the fact that the gift was to a class) the children of a daughter who had died leaving issue before the execution of the will could not take by virtue of the statute, there having been no gift to their parent.

In Davie v. Wynn (Ga.) supra, it was expressly held, distinguishing Cheney v. Selman (1883) 71 Ga. 384, that a statute providing that if a legatee is dead when the will is executed, leaving issue living at the death of the testator, such issue shall take the legacy, does not so operate in the case of a bequest to a class as to let in the children of persons deceased at the time of the making of the will who, had they survived, would have been members of the class.

See also, to the same effect, Tolbert v. Burns (1888) 82 Ga. 213, 8 S. E. 79.

In Nicholson v. Nicholson (Iowa) supra, the court said: "If a deceased beneficiary is specifically named in the will, this, perhaps, is a sufficient indication that the testator intended his heirs to take, under the statute before quoted, as substitutional or representative devisees. But where the gift is to a class, of which there are many members, it is reasonable to suppose that the testator had in mind only those of that class who were living at the time he made his will. To apply the rule to the instant case, when testator made his will he had several nephews and nieces living. He also had at least one grandnephew, whose mother had been dead for more than ten years. In the residuary clause of his will he devised his remaining property to his 'nephews and nieces,' share and share alike. Did he intend by this description to give any part of it to this grandnephew? Surely not, for it would have been easy to include him if he had so desired. Taking the will by its 'four corners,' and reading it in the light of the admitted facts, we hardly think one unversed in the law would say that testator intended to include applicant in the class described as 'nephews and nieces.' If he had intended to include the grandnephew, we think it more likely that he would have named him. Nephews and nieces are here the primary devisees. Nothing whatever is given to their issue, except as they may be substituted under the statute. In order to claim under the will, this substituted legatee must point out the original legatee in whose place he would stand. At the date of the will, none but living nephews and nieces of the testator could have taken. The issue of the one who was dead at that time can show no object of substitution, and to give him an original legacy would be, in effect, to make a new will for the testator. Of course, if the proposed legatee or devisee is living at the time the will is made, and subsequently dies before the death of the testator, a different intent is manifest, which will be given effect in virtue of the statute under which applicant claims. But where, as in this case, the gift is to a class, it is perfectly clear that testator had in mind only those members of the class who were then in existence."

In Harrison's Estate (1902) 202 Pa. 331, 51 Atl. 976, the court said, with reference to a statute preserving to their issue legacies to brothers or sisters, or children of brothers or sisters, whether designated by name, or as a class: "This legislation is not and was not intended to have any bearing upon the interpretation of wills; its effect is confined to the manner in which the intention of the testatrix, as ascertained from the words of the will, shall be carried into execution. Whether the person within the class designated by the act, who has died during the lifetime of the testator, was a legatee or devisee within the intention of the testator, must first be ascertained from the language which he used in disposing of his property. When the devise is to a person by name, it is conclusive as to the intention of the testator that that person should take, and, the intention of the testator being established, the subject of the devise or bequest will, upon the death of the testator, be good and available in favor of the issue, when the primary devisee or legatee has died during the lifetime of the testator. This is the effect of legislation of this character, even in a case when the primary devisee was dead at the time the testator specifically designated him as the object of his bounty."

See also in Todd's Estate (1907) 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 117, it was said with reference to a statute expressly including legacies to members of a class: "The act does not apply unless deceased legatee was a member of a class at some time between the execution of the will and the death of the testator."

Minority view.

The authority to the contrary consists of some Kentucky cases (Chenault v. Chenault (1888) 88 Ky. 83, 11 S. W. 424; Dunlap v. Shreve (1885) 2 Duv. (Ky.) 334, and Sloan v. Thornton (1897) 102 Ky. 443, 43 S. W. 415), the decision of which is largely influenced by the peculiar form of the Kentucky statute; and of the Illinois case of Kehl v. Taylor (1916) 275 Ill. 346, 114 N. E. 125, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 948.

In Kehl v. Taylor (Ill.) supra, the court, in holding a statute which provided: "Whenever a devisee . . . in any last will and testament, being a child or grandchild of the testator, shall die before such testator and no provision shall be made for such contingency, the issue, if any there be, of such devisee or legatee shall take the estate devised or bequeathed as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator," which, as a matter of construction, had been applicable to gifts to a class,—applicable to the case of the death, before the making of the will, of one who, had he survived, would have been included in the class to which a bequest was made, said: "Without reviewing the various decisions on this question and the reasons given to sustain the conclusions there reached, we think the construction most in harmony with both the spirit and intention of the act, as well as the policy of our law, is that which allows all devisees or legatees of the class named in the statute to take, irrespective of the time of their death, either before or after the time of the execution of the will, so long as their death occurred prior to that of the testator, leaving issue, and no provision is made for such contingency. . . . Under the harsh rule of the common law, all gifts and devises were avoided by the death of the devisee or legatee before that of the testator. At common law, a bequest or devise by will to a child of the testator who was dead when the will was made was void, and a bequest or devise to a child who died after the will was made, and before the testator, lapsed; and such rules would prevail in this state but for the statute in question, and do prevail where the beneficiaries are other than children or grandchildren. This must often have thwarted the intention of the testator, and worked a hardship upon those who were the natural beneficiaries of his bounty, when it is considered that wills were frequently made in extremis,—but a few days, or even hours, before the testator's death, and at a time when it could not be known to a certainty, or ascertained, whether or not all the devisees or legatees, in case they were numerous and widely scattered, were alive and in being at the time of the execution of a will. It was to provide against such contingencies that this statute was enacted. It does not, in direct terms or by implication, take any notice of the time of the execution of the will, or impose as a condition to its operation or nonoperation upon a gift or devise that the devisee or legatee shall be in esse at the date of the execution of the will. The only conditions imposed by it are that the devisee or legatee shall die before the testator, leaving issue surviving the testator, and that no provision shall be made in the will for the contingency of the death of such devisee or legatee before that of the testator. The words, 'shall die,' refer not to the time of the execution of the will, but to the death of the devisee or legatee before the testator, and, we think, included those whose death occurred prior to the execution of the will, as well as those whose death occurred in the interim between the making of the will and the death of the testator."

In Chenault v. Chenault (1888) 88 Ky. 83, 11 S. W. 424, it was held (overruling Sheets v. Grubbs (1863) 4 Met. (Ky.) 339) that a statute providing that if a devisee or legatee was dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survives the testator, such issue shall take unless a different disposition is made or required by the will, applies in the case of a gift to a class, as well as in a case where the legatees are specially named, when construed in juxtaposition with the kindred and simultaneous statutory provision that, when a devise is made to several as a class, the share of any who shall die before the testator shall go to his descendants, if any, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser.

A similar conclusion was reached in Dunlap v. Shreve (1885) 2 Duv. (Ky.) 334.

In Sloan v. Thornton (1897) 102 Ky. 443, 43 S. W. 415, it was held that under a statute providing that if a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, or is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survives the testator, such issue shall take, the children of persons who were dead at the time the will was made were entitled to participate in a bequest "to the children of my late uncle, John Woods, deceased, their names, number, or place of residence being unknown to me, . . . to be divided equally between them, share and share alike; but if none of said children should be living at the time of my death, then this legacy shall fall into and become a part of my residuary estate, and pass accordingly."

The force of the foregoing Kentucky decisions is, however, considerably lessened by the fact that in other Kentucky cases the court has expressly declared that before a statute providing that if a devisee or legatee dies before the testator, or is dead at the making of the will, leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take, can apply, it must first be determined whether the testator meant to include persons dead at the date of the will in his description of the legatees therein. See Fuller v. Martin (1895) 96 Ky. 500, 29 S. W. 315; Barnhill v. Sharon (1909) 135 Ky. 70, 121 S. W. 983.

Statute operates where testator manifests intention to include deceased persons in class.

Where the will shows that the testator regarded a certain person as a member of the class to whom a gift was made, the fact that such person was deceased at the time will not (except in those jurisdictions in which the statute to prevent lapses is not regarded as applicable in the case of persons deceased) prevent the operation of the statute.

So, where a testator, who at the date of his will, and when he died, had only one living brother and five living sisters, and also two brothers and a sister dead, who left children, made a devise to his "brothers and sisters," his use of the word "brothers," when in fact there was only one brother living, indicated that he meant to include all his brothers and sisters, living and dead, and therefore the children of those who were dead may, under the statute, take what their parents, if living, would take. Fuller v. Martin (Ky.) supra.

In Barnhill v. Sharon (Ky.) supra, where testator, who at the time his will was made had a half sister, who was then dead, leaving issue, and a living sister, devised the remainder, after a life estate in land, to his "brothers and sisters," it was held that as, in order to give the word "sisters" any meaning at all, it must be made to include more than one sister, it was apparent that the deceased's half sister was included in the class, and, accordingly, that her issue were entitled to the benefit of the statute.

The statute was held in Bray v. Pullen (1892) 84 Me. 185, 24 Atl. 811, to operate in the case of a bequest to the "children of" a certain person, to be "equally divided between them," but in which, however, it appeared that the inclusion of the deceased child was necessary to satisfy the plurality of terms employed in the bequest.

The statute was likewise held to operate in Moses v. Allen (1889) 81 Me. 268, 17 Atl. 66, where it was held to make no difference that the legatees, instead of being referred to by name, were described by their relationship to the testator, as his nephews and nieces.

Evidence of an intention on the part of the testator to include a deceased child as a member of a class to whom a bequest is made may be found in the fact that the testator mentions her in his will as though she was alive, stating the advancement which he had made to her, as well as to the rest of his children. Guitar v. Gordon (1853) 17 Mo. 408.

In Dunlap v. Shreve (1885) 2 Duv. (Ky.) 334, it is said with reference to a devise to a class described as "the children of" a deceased sister that, had two of her children, who were dead at the time of the publication of the will, been then believed by the testator to be alive, or had he not known that they were dead, his simple devise to her children would undoubtedly have included them, and then, beyond question, the statute would have substituted their children as devisees.

STATE OF NEVADA

v.

B. E. KUHL, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

Nevada Supreme Court — September 5, 1918.

(— Nev. —, 175 Pac. 190.)

Evidence — comparison of palm prints.

1. Palm prints may be compared by experts for identification purposes in a criminal case.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1706.]

— photographic enlargements.

2. Photographic enlargements of palm prints may be used by experts in testifying before the jury as to identity in a criminal case.

— projectoscope.

3. A projectoscope may be used by experts in testifying as to identity from palm prints, in a criminal case, for the purpose of displaying photographic impressions to the jury.

— illustrative marks — effect.

4. The placing upon photographic impressions of palm prints, of markings by experts, for the purpose of illustrating their testimony, does not render the photographs inadmissible in evidence.

Appeal — preserving objection — sufficiency.

5. An objection that an expert is testifying positively instead of giving his opinion cannot be preserved for review by merely stating that the question has already been answered.

[See 2 R. C. L. 77-79.]

— positive statement.

6. An expert may testify positively as to the identity of two palm impressions rather than state his belief or judgment as to their identity.

[See 11 R. C. L. 627-629.]

Witness — impeachment — contradictory statements.

7. Where a witness, who, in a criminal trial, has denied the making of a statement out of court as to ability to identify an article of clothing, the one to whom the statement was made may testify to the statement for purposes of impeachment, if time, place, and person are brought to the attention of the witness.

Sunday — judicial proceeding — validity.

8. Under a statute permitting the reception of a verdict on a nonjudicial day, the court, upon receiving a verdict on Sunday, may fix the day for pronouncing judgment.

APPEAL by defendant Kuhl from a judgment of the District Court for Elko County (Taber, J.) convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edwin E. Caine and Harold P. Hale for appellant.

Messrs. George B. Thatcher, Attorney General, William McKnight, E. P. Carville, and Charles A. Cantwell for the State.

McCarran, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this we are dealing with the appeal of B. E. Kuhl only. The appeal of Ed. Beck, who was tried separately, is dealt with by this court in another opinion. — Nev. —, 174 Pac. 714.

The appellants Kuhl with his codefendants were jointly informed against by the district attorney of Elko county for the crime of murder. They were specifically charged with the killing of one Fred M. Searcey, a United States mail stage driver, at or near Jarbidge, in Elko county, Nevada. The testimony was wholly circumstantial. One of the elements in the case was an envelop, secured from one of the rifled mail sacks, on which was a bloody print or impression of a portion of the palm of a human hand. The trial of the defendant Kuhl resulted in a verdict of murder in the first degree, by reason of which the death penalty was imposed. From the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial, this appeal ensues.

It is the contention of appellant here that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of the witnesses Stone and Botorff, offered in behalf of the state, as experts on palm-print identification. From the record it is disclosed that the impression found upon the envelop taken from the rifled mail sack was made by that portion of the palm which is immediately below the base of the little finger of the left hand. In offering the testimony of the experts, photographic enlargements and projectoscope views were used and presented to the jury. Objections were interposed to these methods of presenting the evidence, and with such we will deal during the course of the opinion.

The first question which we propose to discuss is a novel one, inasmuch as our research has failed to disclose an expression from any court from which we might gain aid or guidance. After the arrest of the appellant Kuhl, and while he was confined in the jail at Elko, an impression was taken of the palm of his left hand, and particularly that portion of the palm below the base of the little finger. The fact that the witnesses Stone and Botorff testified that the two impressions were made by the same hand gives rise to that phase of the appeal most strongly contended for by appellant.

Before testifying to their opinion as to the identity of the defendant's palm print with the impression found upon the bloody envelop taken from the mail sack, each of the witnesses fully explained his qualifications. The witness Stone related in detail as to his study on the subject of finger-print identification and classification. It is disclosed that his investigation and research in this line had taken up his time almost continuously from the year 1908, or 1909, to the time of the trial; that during that time he had been engaged by at least two recognized identification bureaus, one under the state police department of the state of Nevada, the other under the police department of the city of Fresno in California. He testified to his having visited numerous identification bureaus and to having attended conventions held by those engaged in this science in the United States. The witness Botorff related an experience entailing research and investigation in the line of finger-print identification and classification, continuing from the year 1903 up to the time of the trial. Each of the witnesses was, as the record discloses, exhaustively and skilfully cross-examined on every phase of the subject that would bring forth to the jury their ability or lack of ability to give a correct or worthy conclusion as to the identity of finger-print impressions.

Were we dealing here with a finger-print impression, or the question of the comparison or identity of finger-print impressions, our course would be easy, for the courts of this country, and of England as well, have paved the way for the recognition of this science as an evidentiary element in criminal prosecutions. The main contention here is that the experts who testified were not qualified to give an opinion as to the identity of palm-print impressions; and, as we understand the contention of appellant, it is that science has not yet developed this question sufficiently to bear out the conclusion of an expert on the subject. Will the same rule which has led the courts to recognize experts on finger-print identification permit such experts to testify as to their conclusion upon palm-print identification? This is the one vital question here.

The origin of finger-print identification may be traced back to a period some 100 years before the birth of Christ. Scientific American, April 1, 1916, p. 356. By a Japanese scholar, Mr. Kumagusu Minakata, in an article entitled, "The Antiquity of the Finger Print Method," we are told that the discovery of this phenomenon of identity, as it may be termed, was made by the Chinese. In a most interesting article, entitled, "History of the Finger Print System" (Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institute for the year ending June 30, 1912, p. 631), Mr. Berthold Laufer traces the subject back to an era before the birth of Christ. He refers to the writings of Kai Kung-Yen, an author who wrote about the year 650 A. D., and who makes allusion to the employment of finger-print impressions in his time, and earlier, for the purposes of identification.

It may have come as a result of the diversified and extensive reading of the learned author that, in his famous novel, "Pudd'n Head Wilson," Mark Twain causes one of his characters to make the significant speech: "Every human being carries with him from his cradle to his grave certain physical marks which do not change their character and by which he can always be identified—and that without shadow of doubt or question. These marks are his signature, his physiological autograph, so to speak; and this autograph cannot be counterfeited, nor can he disguise it or hide it away, nor can it become illegible by the wear of the mutations of time. This signature is each man's own—there is no duplicate of it among the swarming millions of the globe. Upon the haft of this dagger stands the assassin's natal autograph, written in the blood of that helpless and unoffending old man who loved you and whom you all loved. There is but one man in the whole earth whose hand can duplicate that criminal sign."

When these lines were written by the beloved author modern science and modern culture had as yet failed to grasp the full significance of his words. Indeed, it was not until recent years that the true force of the lines of the great Westerner could be fully appreciated. However ancient may be the origin of this means of identification, it remained for Sir Francis Galton to bring forth the principle in such a way as to gain the recognition of the world of science. In his book, published in 1892, we find the following significant paragraph: "We read of the dead body of Jezebel being devoured by the dogs of Jezreel, so that no man might say, 'This is Jezebel,' and that the dogs left only her skull, the palms of her hands, and the soles of her feet; but the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet are the very remains by which a corpse might be most surely identified, if impressions of them, made during life, were available."

All of the writers upon the subject, to whose lines we have had access, agree that the palmar surface of the hands and the soles of the feet in men and monkeys are covered with minute ridges that bear a superficial resemblance to those made on the sand by wind or flowing water. Galton first gave expression to this fact; and Sir E. R. Henry, commissioner of police of the metropolis of London, corroborates with the statement that the inner part of the hand and the sole of the foot are traversed in all directions by lines of varying length. He says that the most conspicuous are the creases caused by the folding of the skin; but the least conspicuous, but much more numerous, lines, are the papillary ridges which exist over the whole palmar surface, giving it an appearance that may be likened to that of a newly plowed field with its ridges and furrows, or to sand, which the water, in receding from, has left ribbed. In Mr. Frederick A. Brayley's book, entitled, "Finger Prints Identification," we find the following significant language: " 'God's finger-print language,' the voiceless speech, and the indelible writing imprinted on the fingers, hand palms, and foot soles of humanity by the all-wise Creator for some good and useful purpose in the structure, regulation, and well-being of the human body, has been utilized for ages before the civilization of Europe as a means of identification by the Chinese, and who shall say is not a part of the plan of the Creator for the ultimate elimination of crime by means of surrounding the evilly disposed by safeguards of prevention, and for the unquestionable evidence of identity in all cases where such is necessary, whether it be in wills, deeds, insurance, or commercial mediums of finance, as well as in the discovering and identification of lawbreakers."

Mr. Tighe Hopkins, in his work, "Wards of the State," makes extended reference to the papillary lines as covering the palms of the human hands and the soles of the human feet. In a work entitled, "Criminal Investigation," translated by John and J. Collyer Adam from the work entitled, "System der Kriminalistik," by Dr. Hans Gross, extended reference is made to the general subject. In a pamphlet published by Sir William J. Herschel, dealing with the subject of fingerprint identification, we find a most interesting history of experiments made by the learned author while acting in the British service in India. He interestingly relates of his experimentation with his own whole hand and with his right foot, which, he says, after an interval of fifty-seven years, remained irresistibly unchanged. "The Origin of Finger Printing," by Sir William J. Herschel, Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, June, 1916, p. 11.

In his work, "Guide to Finger Print Identification," by Henry Faulds, late surgeon superintendent of Tsukiji Hospital, Tokyo, Japan, reference is made to the papillary ridges found covering the face or palmar surface of the hands and feet of the human being. In a terse and graphic little work, entitled, "Hints on Finger Prints," written by Rai Sahib Hem Chandra Bose, fingerprint expert of Bengal, India, and a pupil of Sir Edward Henry, we find that, after dwelling on the possibility of error in finger-print comparison, the author makes this most significant assertion: "In fact, the indications on the inner surface of the hand are so numerous that, if half a square inch of any part of it were all that remained, that would be enough, in that it would prove identity by comparison."

In his work entitled, "The Finger Print Instructor," Mr. Frederick Kuhne, of the bureau of criminal investigation of the police department of the city of New York, after dwelling at length on the basis of finger-print identification and the methods of classifying finger-print impressions, and especially upon the extent and usefulness of such identification, tells us that in some European cities impressions of the palms of the hands are utilized as an additional means of identification, especially because numerous patterns and characteristics appear in the palms as well as in the fingers, and in his work (page 96) he sets forth an illustration vividly portraying the truth of his assertion.

The lines on the palms of the human hand and the soles of the feet, which form the basis of individual identification, are the papillary ridges. They serve the office of raising the mouths of the ducts, so as to facilitate the discharge of the sweat, and perhaps perform the additional functions of aiding the sense of touch and of giving elasticity to the skin of the hand, and, having a vacuumistic tendency, they assist in preventing against slipping. These papillary ridges form figures, patterns, or designs, which research, study, and science have divided into classes named after their particular form, to wit, arches, loops, whirls, and composites. These patterns, as they have been established and named by those who have become devotees to the science of finger-print identification, while they have been discussed principally in connection with finger impressions, are not confined to the human finger alone, but are found with equal importance and equal persistency in the human palm and the sole of the human foot.

Mr. Harold J. Shepstone, in an article entitled, "The Finger Print System of Identification," appearing in the Scientific American of date October 1, 1910, at page 256, after dwelling upon the wonderful lineations in the form of ridges and patterns which adorn the palmar surface of the human hand, says: "One of the most interesting facts about this system is that every member of the human race, irrespective of age or sex, carries in person certain delicate markings by which identity can be readily established."

The learned author illustrates his article by a whole-hand impression showing the systems and the identifying markings. In the issue of the Scientific American of date August 19, 1911, there appears an article entitled, "No Two Finger Prints Alike," and there reference is made to a communication addressed to the French Academy of Science by Mr. M. V. Balthazard, a student of the finger-print science. This learned authority declares his findings to the effect that, if any finger print be divided into 100 squares, each square will contain some distinctive mark. He says that two finger prints will differ from each other, either in the arrangement of the marks in the different squares or in the character of the marks in a particular square. He says the total number of combinations of the two kinds of marks (branching or termination of ridges) in the 100 squares is the 100th power of 4. "This," says the author, "is a number that no one can possibly imagine. It is equal approximately to a number that would be represented by the figure 1 followed by 60 zeros. This means that there are possible just so many different kinds of prints, and that no particular combination will occur more frequently than others. The chances, therefore, of any particular combination of marks occurring, may be represented by a fraction with 1 as the numerator and a denominator represented by 1, followed by 60 zeros, a very tiny fraction of a chance indeed." To the suggestion as to how many points must agree in two finger prints to make sure of identity, this author bases his reply on mathematical grounds, to the effect that, when two finger prints agree in 17 out of the 100 squares, it is practically certain that they were made by the same finger. His reasoning in establishing this basis is most interesting and instructive.

In the issue of "Law Notes" of February, 1917, there appears an article entitled, "Finger Print Evidence," in which the subject is treated at some length. In an issue of the same publication, of date January, 1918, and under the same caption, attention is directed to the learned discussion of the subject by Judge Wadhams, of the court of general sessions of the peace of New York, where, in the case of People v. Sallow, 100 Misc. 447, 165 N. Y. Supp. 915, the matter is historically dealt with in the consideration of the validity of an act requiring the taking of the finger prints of persons arrested for crime.

In a most exhaustive work that has just come to our attention, in the writing of which Mr. Harris Hawthorne Wildes, Ph. D., and professor of zoölogy in Smith College, and Mr. Bert Wentworth, former police commissioner of Dover, New Hampshire, collaborate, a system somewhat similar to that established by Galton is made the basis of sectional investigation by which palm-print identification may be carried out by means of the human hand. On page 138 of the work, illustrations are set forth in which the several sections of the hand are portrayed. By this work our attention is called to a term applied to the skin of the palmar surface of the hand and the sole of the foot, which we think most appropriate, to wit, "friction skin." After dwelling upon the nature and character of this, the authors reassert the statement found in the works of all the other writers to whom we have referred, to the effect that this friction skin is covered by breaking, forking, splitting ridges, which ridges form patterns and designs most irregular and individual, and, say the authors: "As these features remain absolutely constant throughout the entire life, and are far too complicated to make a duplication of even a single ridge probable, it naturally follows that a small area of friction skin, no matter where taken, is sufficient for an absolute and positive identification, provided only that a record of it, in the form of a 'print,' or some other form of accurate reproduction, has been previously made, and is available for comparison."

On page 126 of the work the authors refer to an instance where a small square area was cut out from the same place in the hand prints of two individuals, the place selected being one which has never occasioned any special interest among investigators, and where the ridges run monotonously in straight or slightly curved parallels. The area from which this patch of friction skin was taken lies above the proximal end of the metacarpal bone of the thumb, which would be approximately at the base of the first system of the hand under Galton's plan of subdivision. The authors refer to the fact that this region, or area, from which the experimental patch was taken, is the most featureless and monotonous of any of the parts of the human hand. Yet they say a careful scrutiny of the prints, especially when aided by a slight magnification, shows such marked differences that even a beginner in the work of identification would have no trouble in distinguishing them at once.

In concluding a most interesting chapter on the subject of structure and development of friction ridges on the palmar surface of the human hand and the sole of the human foot, dealing with details of their course and arrangement, the authors conclude that these surfaces furnish a basis upon which to found a system of identification positive and absolute. Here we find the unequivocal declaration that the patterns of the friction skin are individual, and, taken together, impossible to duplicate in another individual. Further, they declare that the separate ridges, too, show numerous details, which are in themselves so individual that a small area of friction skin, taken even in the most featureless portion, cannot be matched by any other piece. "Personal Identification," by Wildes and Wentworth.

All of the learned authors, experts, and scientists on the subject of finger-print identification, and each of those to whom we have heretofore referred, agree that these patterns, formed by the papillary ridges on the inner surface of the human hand and the sole of the foot, are persistent, continuous, and unchanging, from a period in the existence of the individual extending from some months before birth until disintegration after death. While most of the experts on finger-print identification deal most extensively with impressions of the human fingers, we find that some, of whom Mr. Galton is first and foremost, have divided the palmar surface of the human hand into what they term well-marked systems of ridges. Mr. Galton in his work fixes these systems thus:

First, that which runs over the ball of the thumb and adjacent parts of the palm, bounded by a line which starts from the middle of the palm, close to the wrist, and sweeps around the ball of the thumb to the edge of the palm on the side of the thumb, which it reaches about half an inch, more or less, below the base of the forefinger. The second system is bounded toward the thumb by the base line of the first system and toward the little finger by a line starting from about the middle of the little-finger side of the palm, and ending on the opposite side, just below the forefinger. The third system is bounded thumbwards by the base line of the second until that line arrives at a point immediately below the axis of the forefinger. There the boundary of the third system leaves this base line and skirts the base of the forefinger, until it reaches the interval which separates the fore and middle fingers. The upper boundary of the third system consists of a line which leaves the middle-finger side of the palm a small distance below the base of the little finger, and terminates between the fore and middle fingers. Galton on Finger Prints, Macmillan & Co. London and New York, 1892, p. 53.

Mr. Galton in his work draws comparison between the patterns that may occur in these individual systems of the palm and those which occur on the bulbs of the thumb and fingers. He refers to the latter as being more definite in position, more conspicuous in lineation, and more instructive to study. Moreover, he says they are more easy to classify. The palm print or impression involved in this case is made by that portion of the hand which falls principally in the third system, and perhaps partly in the second system, as these systems have been established by Galton in his arrangement of the human palm heretofore referred to.

purpose of evolving the indisputable conclusion that there is but one physiological basis underlying this method of identification; that the phenomenon by which identity is thus established exists, not only on the bulbs of the finger tips, but is continuous and coexisting on all parts and in all sections and subdivisions of the palmar surface of the human hand. History of the Finger Print System, by Berthold Laufer, supra. The rules and systems established by students of the subject, through which identification is made positive, apply no more to one section or system of student of the subject may have confined his research and study largely to prints or impressions made only by the finger tips or by the bulbs on the ends of the fingers, but the knowledge and experience thus gained, and the methods of determining identity thus established and used, are applicable with equal significance and effect to any given surface of the palm of the hand. This is true, because of the truth of our former assertion as to a common physiological basis underlying this established method of identification.

Progressive and scientific processes and appliances which belong to the various human endeavors belong equally to the machinery of the law. The principle underlying the Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, 8 Eng. Reprint, 1034, 8 Jur. 793, and recognized by Greenleaf in his work on Evidence (Greenl. Ev. 516), has found sanction by the courts in modern American jurisprudence, and this principle it is which will allow evidence of those scientific processes, the work of trained, skilful men in their respective departments, to be applied by way of demonstration of a fact, leaving the weight and effect of such demonstration entirely to the consideration of the jury under proper instruction. **State v. Cerciello*, 86 N. J. L. 309, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1010, 90 Atl. 1112.

In the case of State v. Miller, 71 N. J. L. 528, 60 Atl. 202, the court held that it was not erroneous to admit evidence of the coincidence between the hand of the accused, and the bloody print of a hand upon the wall of a house where a crime was committed. This case, as we understand it, did not turn upon finger-print identification, such as is involved in the case at bar; but the principle there applied is worthy of note as supporting the position which we deem proper here. In the case of State v. Connors, 87 N. J. L. 419, 94 Atl. 812, the court recognized the propriety of admitting the testimony of finger-print experts for the purpose of establishing identity.

In the case of Parker v. Rex, 14 C. L. R. (Austr.) 681, 3 B. R. C. 68, the only evidence upon which conviction of breaking and entering rested was a comparison of one of several finger prints found on a bottle in the premises entered, with the print of the middle finger of the accused's hand taken in jail. The High Court of Australia, in considering the case on appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Griffith, made reference to the fact of the general recognition by courts and authorities of the individuality of the corrugations in the skin on the fingers of the human hand, and said: "A finger print is, therefore, in reality, an unforgeable signature. That is now recognized in a large part of the world, and in some parts has, I think, been recognized for many centuries."

The court, after thus referring to the finger print, concluded by saying: "There is in this case evidence that the prisoner's signature was found in the place which was broken into."

In the case of Emperor v. Sahdeo (1904; India) 3 Nagpur L. Rep. 1 [cited in 3 Chamberlayne, Ev. § 2072] the court recognized the propriety of establishing the identity of the party accused by the use of sheets bearing impressions of finger markings. Again, in the case of Emperor v. Hulost, 7 Crim. L. J. (India) 406, the principle was followed that identity of the individual might be established by the opinion of experts, testifying as to the identity of finger impressions made upon certain impression slips with those of the accused taken in court. To the same effect is the case of Emperor v. Abdul Hamid, 32 Indian L. Rep. (Calcutta Series) 759 [cited in 3 Chamberlayne Ev. § 2561].

The courts of Great Britain have followed the principle that, inasmuch as the science of finger-print identification was an established science, evidence proving identity by this means should be received; and in Castleton's Case, 3 Crim. App. (England) 74, a conviction was sustained where the only proof of identity in the lower court was the evidence of finger prints.

Two leading cases in this country have gone at length into this question. In Peoplé v. Jennings, 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077, the supreme court of Illinois, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Carter, on an appeal from conviction of murder in the first degree, upheld the trial court, wherein it admitted the evidence of experts as to the comparison of photographs of the finger prints found on a railing in the premises, with the enlarged finger prints of the defendant. The opinion of the chief justice of the Illinois court is to our mind exhaustive of the subject, and we cite it here with approval.

In the case of People v. Roach, 215 N. Y. 602, 109 N. E. 618, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 410, Mr. Justice Seabury went at length into the subject, and referred approvingly to the case of People v. Jennings, supra, and upheld the ruling of the admissibility of such evidence. In the Roach Case, as in the Jennings Case, the appeal was from a conviction of murder. The appellant assigned as error the testimony of an expert as to finger-print impressions found upon the clapboards of a house where the homicide was committed. There the experts testified positively that the impressions on the clapboards were finger prints of the left hand of the defendant. This testimony was rendered after the expert had opportunity to compare the finger prints of the defendant with those markings found in the house. The supreme court of New York in that case held that the evidence was admissible, its weight being for the determination of the jury.

These cases, and others to which we might properly refer (Young v. State, 68 Ala. 569; People v. Storrs, 207 N. Y. 147, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 860, 100 N. E. 730, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 196), establish the rule of the admissibility of this character of evidence, and in the light of progressive science, and inasmuch as the underlying principle of this science, as recognized in the cases cited, is directly applicable and is the underlying principle here, the foundation was sufficiently laid for the testimony of the witnesses Stone and Botorff. The evidence of these experts as to the identity of the palm print of the defendant with that found upon the blood-smearred envelop taken from the rifled mail sack was a proper subject for the consideration of the jury. The weight to be given to this testimony was for the jury to determine.

It is contended by appellant here that the court erred in admitting certain photographic enlargements, and in permitting the witnesses Stone and Botorff to illustrate their testimony by the use of a projectoscope, by means of which an enlarged photograph of the impressions was displayed to the jury. It might suffice to say that no question is raised as to the accuracy of the photographic exhibits, nor is any question raised as to the method of identifying the photographs, or as to the manner in which the palm-print impression of the defendant was taken, or as to the correctness of the enlargements. The appliances used and the methods resorted to, so far as we are able to determine, were those appliances and methods recognized by science. By these appliances, the jury was afforded an opportunity to follow the testimony of the experts in their direct and cross examination. By this means they were better able to judge of the correctness of the testimony as it was being given, and to

This method of presenting proof has received the sanction of the highest authority. Whart. Crim. Ev. 8th ed. § 544; pert Testimony, 2d ed. § 140; Dederichs v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 35 L.R.A. 802, and note (14 Utah, 137, 46 Pac. 656); State v. Connors, 87 N. J. L. 419, 94 Atl. 812. That instruments may be photographed for the purpose of so enlarging as to make the proportions plainer, and such photographs, when already in evidence, may be projected to illustrate the testimony of witnesses, is a rule that has found general sanction. First Nat. Bank v. Wisdom, 111 Ky. 135, 63 S. W. 461; United States v. Ortiz, 176 U. S. 422, 44 L. ed. 529, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466; Howard v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 189 Ill. 568, 59 N. E. 1106; Marcy v. Barnes, 16 Gray, 161, 77 Am. Dec. 405.

Appellant complains of the act of the trial court in admitting photographs of the palm impressions, when upon such photographs there were certain lines and markings, placed there by the witnesses Stone and Botorff before their testimony was given. These lines, as appears from what record there is before us, were placed on the photographs by the experts for the purpose of more clearly illustrating their testimony. They indicated the points of similarity and identity to which the experts testified. Their existence and significance were fully explained by the witnesses. These markings in no wise affected the photographs, and we are at a loss to discern any prejudice or injury that could have thus accrued to the appellant.

Error is assigned to the ruling of the trial court in permitting the witness Stone to make a positive statement as to the identity of the palm impressions. In this respect he testified positively that these palm prints were made by one and the same hand. We might with propriety pass this assignment without comment, for the reason that the only ground of objection assigned in the trial court was that the question had already been answered. Aside <sup>Appeal—pre-serving objection—sufficiency.</sup> from this, it may with propriety be said that, while it is the usual practice for expert witnesses to testify as to their belief in a given conclusion, or as to their best judgment, no rule of law prevents them from ly on such subjects. Whether they give their best judgment or belief, or testify positively as to their conclusion, the fact remains that it is for the jury to determine the weight to be given to their testimony. People v. Jennings, supra.

Near the scene of the murder there was found an overcoat bearing blood stains. From the briefs of counsel we are informed that E. B. Williams, a restaurateur, testified to having seen the appellant wearing this overcoat in and about his place of business. In putting in his case, the appellant called as a witness Pearl Williams, associated with E. B. Williams in the restaurant business. We are informed by the briefs that Pearl Williams testified on her examination in chief positively, as did E. B. Williams, in regard to Kuhl's familiarity with and treatment in the restaurant. She, however, testified that she had never seen the appellant, Kuhl, wear such a coat; that the only coat she had ever seen him wear was a brown mackinaw. The record as to this testimony is not before us, either in narrative form or otherwise; hence, we must content ourselves with such statement of facts bearing on this phase of the case as we find in the briefs of the respective counsel. It appears that on cross-examination the witness Pearl Williams was asked as to a statement she had previously made to Sheriff Harris, and, if we understand the proceedings correctly, she was asked, on cross-examination by the state, if it were not true that shortly after the murder, in the town of Jarbidge, where her restaurant was located, she had told Sheriff Harris that she could positively identify the coat as the property of Kuhl, but that she did not want to be drawn into the case, for business reasons. At the trial, and on cross-examination, she denied having made this statement. The state called the sheriff in rebuttal, and, it appears, propounded the question to the sheriff, incorporating therein the language of the witness Pearl Williams, as used by her on the occasion referred to.

Appellant contends that the court erred in permitting this interrogatory to be answered by the sheriff on rebuttal. The question propounded to the witness Pearl Williams by the state, if we are correctly informed, implied that she had, on another and former occasion, made a contradictory statement as to the defendant's having worn the coat. If her statement made on a former occasion was brought home to her on cross-examination, with the proper elements of impeachment incorporated therein (that is, as to time, place, and the party to whom the statement was made), and if she denied having made the statement at the time and place and to the party, it was proper for the state, on rebuttal, to present the party to whom her former statement was made, and to propound to that witness, after the fixing of the time and place, the exact language of the witness sought to be impeached. We find no error in the conduct of the court in this respect.

The verdict in this case was rendered and received by the court on Sunday, and, after the recording of the verdict, the court proceeded to fix a date on which judgment would be pronounced. The act of the trial court in this respect is assigned as error. Under the second subdivision of § 4870 of our Revised Laws, the court is authorized to receive the verdict of a jury on a nonjudicial day. This statute necessarily contemplates the making of such order or orders, on the reception of the verdict, as may be necessary for the proper and expeditious course of justice. If a verdict of acquittal were received by the court on a nonjudicial day, manifestly the statute permitting the reception of such a verdict would contemplate an order discharging the defendant. So, too, where a verdict of conviction is rendered and received on a nonjudicial day, the right to receive the same implies the right and power in the court to remand the defendant and to fix a date for further proceedings. In the case of State v. Rover, 13 Nev. 17, Mr. Justice Hawley, speaking for this court, said: "The power given to the court to sit on Sunday to receive the verdict necessarily authorizes it to have the verdict then read and recorded, to discharge the jury, and make such other orders as are incident to the power given by the statute."

The making of the order setting a date on which judgment would be pronounced pursuant to the verdict was an act incident to the reception of that verdict.

We have scrutinized the instructions given by the trial court in this case, and find no error upon which reversal could be predicated. Assignment No. 54 deals with an instruction on which we commented in the case of State v. Sella, 41 Nev. 113, 168 Pac. 285. The decision of this court in the Sella Case was not in the hands of the trial court at the time of the trial of this case. As to the propriety or advisability of the giving of such an instruction in this case we are not at liberty to say, in view of the meager record that is here before us. In the Sella Case we gave expression to our views, discouraging the giving of this instruction, inasmuch as one clause impeachment—contradictory statements.

Sunday—judicial proceeding—

therein, at least, might be considered as a comment by the court on the weight to be given to witnesses whose testimony might agree on all points. We again express our disapproval of this instruction, and advise against its being given.

At the outset of our opinion, we made mention that the proof of guilt in this case rested entirely on circumstantial evidence. We are not advised as to the completeness of the circumstantial chain connecting appellant with the commission of the crime. We note, however, in the brief of his able and painstaking counsel, the following assertion: "It is fully appreciated that this is one of those curious cases where every link in the chain of circumstantial evidence seems satisfactorily forged."

We find nothing in the appeal from which it might be inferred that appellant received other than a fair trial, or that there was other than the utmost diligence put forth by able counsel.

The judgment is affirmed. The court below is directed to fix a time and make all necessary orders for having its sentence carried into effect by the warden of the state penitentiary.

Let the order be entered accordingly.

Sanders, J., concurs. By reason of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Justice Coleman, he does not participate in the foregoing opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Identification by palm-print impressions.

That evidence as to the correspondence of finger prints is admissible to prove identity is affirmed in all the cases which have considered the question. See People v. Jennings (1911) 252 Ill. 534, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1206, 96 N. E. 1077; State v. Cerciello (1914) 86 N. J. L. 309, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1010, 90 Atl. 1112; State v. Connors, 87 N. J. L. 419, 94 Atl. 812; People v. Roach (1915) 215 N. Y. 592, 100 N. E. 618, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 410; Castleton's Case (1909) 3 Crim. App. (Eng.) 74; Parker v. Rex (1912) 14 C. L. R. (Austr.) 681, 3 B. R. C. 68; Rex v. Morris [1914] St. R. Qd. 274; Emperor v. Sahdeo (1904; India) 3 Nagpur L. Rep. 1, cited in 3 Chamberlayne, Ev. § 2072.

And while the weight of the evidence of identity of the prisoner with the person who committed the crime, thus adduced, is a question for the jury (see People v. Jennings (Ill.) supra; State v. Cerciello (1914) 86 N. J. L. 309, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1010, 90 Atl. 1112; Emperor v. Abdul Hamid (1905) 32 Indian L. Rep. (Calcutta Series) 759, cited in 3 Chamberlayne, Ev. § 2561, note 3), such evidence is sufficient to support a conviction (Castleton's Case (1909) 3 Crim. App. (Eng.) 78; Parker v. Rex (1912) 14 C. L. R. (Austr.) 681, 3 B. R. C. 68; Rex v. Morris [1914] St. R. Qd. 274).

The reported case (STATE v. KUHLE, ante, 1694) seems to be one of first impression upon the question whether evidence as to the identity of palm-print impressions is admissible, as tending to connect the accused with the commission of the crime.

There are, however, several decisions in which it was held competent to show that hand marks found at the scene of the crime were apparently made by the hand of the accused.

Thus, in Powell v. State (1907) 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 592, 99 S. W. 1005, where it appeared that the defendant's little finger on his right hand was abnormal, and that in using it it made marks different from an ordinary hand, and it was further shown that impressions of a bloody hand were discovered at the scene of the crime, showing a peculiarity of the little finger of the right hand, it was held that impressions of the defendant's right hand, which had been taken with his consent, were admissible, in order to show their similarity with those found at the scene of the crime.

And in Brown v. State (1915) 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 316, 174 S. W. 360, it was held not error to refuse to exclude, as the opinion of the witness, testimony that the accused had a peculiarly deformed thumb, and that a blood print made on a door casing was apparently made by such a thumb.

And in State v. Miller (1905) 71

N. J. L. 527, 60 Atl. 202, where it appeared that, before the defendant was arrested, he accompanied some officers to the house where the murder in question was committed, and when in a room where an imprint of a bloody hand appeared, he was asked to place his hand upon the bloody mark, which he voluntarily did, it was held proper to admit testimony as to the comparison of his hand with the mark.
